Whereby it doth evidently appear that Prieſts in thoſe days were married, and had their lawful wives. The like before that in King Inas time is plain, that Biſhops then had wives and children, as appeareth by the words of the Law then ſent forth, extant in the Hiſtory of the ſaid Jornalenſis, which be theſe, Si quis filiolum alterius occidat vel patrinum, ſit ſimile cognationi, & creſcat emendatio ſecundum Weram ejus Regi, ſicut cognationi. Si de parentela ſit qui occidit eum, tunc excedat emendatio patrini, ſicut mandata Domini. Si Epiſcopi filiolus ſit, ſit dimidium hoc, &c. And thus much by the way for Prieſts wives and their children.

Jornalenſ.

Now to the purpoſe again of our matter, which is to declare how the Duke and Nobles of England expelled the Monks out of the Monaſteries after the death of King Edgar; whereof let us hear what the Monkiſh ſtory of the Abbey of Crowland recordeth: Monachis de quibuſdam Monaſteriis ejectis, Clerici ſunt introducti, qui ſtatim Monaſteriorum maneria ducibus terræ diſtribuebant, ut ſic in ſuas partes obligati eos contra monachos defenſarent. Tunc de Monaſterio Eveſhamenſi, monachis expulſis, Clerici fuerunt introducti. Terræque tyranni de terris Eccleſiæ præmiati ſunt quibus Regina novercali nequitia, ſtans cum Clericis in Regis opprobrium, favebat. Cum monachis autem Rex, & ſancti Epiſcopi perſiſtebant. Sed tyranni, fulti reginæ favore & potentia, ſuper monachos triumphabant. Multus inde tumultus in omni angulo Angliæ factus eſt. Ex Chronico Ingulphi abbatis de Crowland, &c. that is, The Monks being expelled out of certain Monaſteries, the Clerks again were brought in, who diſtributed the Mannors or Farms of the ſaid Monaſteries to the Dukes and Lords of the land, that they being obliged to them, ſhould defend them againſt the Monks. And ſo were the Monks of Eveſham thruſt out, and the ſecular Clerks placed, and the lands of the Church given to the Lords; with whom the Queen, the Kings ſtepmother holding the ſame time, took part alſo with the ſaid Clerks againſt the King. On the contrary part ſtood the King and the holy Biſhops, taking part with the Monks. Howbeit the Lords and Peers of the Realm, ſtaying upon the favour and power of the Queen, triumphed over the Monks, &c.

Ex Chronico Ingulphi abbatis de Crowland.

Great buſineſs in the land about placing of Monks, and diſplacing Prieſts.

Thus, as much ado there was through all quarters of the Realm about the matter among the Lords, ſo aroſe no leſs contention between the Prieſts and Monks of England. The Prieſts complaining to the King and Dunſtan, ſaid for themſelves that it was uncomely, uncharitable, yea and unnatural, to put out an old known dweller for a new unknown; and that God was not pleaſed that that ſhould be taken from the ancient poſſeſſor which by God was given him; neither that it could be of any good man accepted, to ſuffer any ſuch injury to be done, leſt peradventure the ſame thing, wherein he was prejudicial to another, might after revert and redound upon himſelf at length. The Monks, on the other ſide ſaid for their part, that Chriſt allowed neither the old dweller, nor the new comer, nor yet looked upon the perſon, but who ſo would take the Croſs of Penance upon him, and follow Chriſt in vertuous living, ſhould be his Diſciple.

A controverſie between Prieſts and Monks. Prieſts Marriage noted for an old cuſtom in England. The objection of Prieſts againſt the Monks. Guliel. de Regib. lib. 2.

The anſwer of Monks againſt the Prieſts.

Theſe and ſuch other were the allegations of the Monks. But whether a Monks Cowl, or a wifeleſs life make a ſufficient title to enter into other mens poſſeſſions or no, I refer it to the judgment of the godly. The troublous cares in marriage, the neceſſary proviſion for Houſe-keeping, the vertuous bringing up of children, the daily helping of poverty, and bearing of publick charges, with other manifeſt perturbations and combrances daily incident unto Matrimony, might rather appear to godly wiſe men to come nearer to the right Croſs of Penance, than the eaſie and loitering idleneſs of Monkery. In the end, upon this controverſie was holden a Council of Biſhops, and other of the Clergy. Firſt, at Reading or at Wincheſter (as Guliel. ſaith) where the greater part both of the Nobles and Commons judged the Prieſts to have great wrong, and ſought by all means poſſible to bring them again to their old poſſeſſions and dignities. Jornalenſis here maketh rehearſal of an Image of the Crucifix, or a Rood ſtanding upon the Frater-wall, where the Council was holden. To this Rood Dunſtan required them all to pray, being belike not ignorant of ſome ſpiritual proviſion beforehand. In the midſt of their prayer the Rood (or elſe ſome blind Monk behind it in a Trunk) through the wall, is reported to ſpeak theſe words, Abſit hoc ut fiat; abſit hoc ut fiat: judicaſtis bene, mutaretis non bene. In remembrance whereof theſe verſes were written under the Roods feet.

{Anno 977.}

A vain miracle of Dunſtans Rood that ſpake.

Humano more crux præſens ædidit ore,
Cœlitus affata, quæ perſpicis hic ſubarata,
Abſit ut hoc fiat, & cætera tunc memorata.

Here lacked a Thomas Cromwell to try out falſe jugling.

Of this Dunſtanical, or rather Satanical Oracle, Henricus maketh no mention, nor Ranulphus, nor yet Hovedenus, nor Fabian in their Hiſtories. Gulielmus in his Book De Regibus reporteth it but by hear-ſay, in theſe words ſaying, Aliæ literæ docent, &c. Wherefore the leſs it ſeemeth to be of credit. Albeit if it were of credible truth, yet it proveth in this matter nothing elſe but Dunſtan to be a Sorcerer, as Polydore Virgil alſo himſelf ſeemeth to ſmell ſomething in this matter.

Another aſſembly called at Calve.

Notwithſtanding, for all this yet the ſtrife ceaſed not; inſomuch that a new aſſembly of the Clergy and other was appointed after at a place called the Street of Calve, where the Council was kept in an upper loft. In this Council many grievous plaints were objected (as Malmsb. ſaith) againſt Dunſtan; but yet he kept his opinion, and would not there remove from that which he began to maintain. And while they were in great contention and argument which way ſhould be admitted and allowed (if it be true that in the ſtories is written) ſuddenly the Joyces of the Loft failed, and the people with the Nobles fell down, ſo that certain were ſlain, and many hurt. But Dunſtan (they ſay, only ſtanding upon a poſt of the Sollar which remained unbroken) eſcaped without danger. Which thing whether it ſo happened to protend before the ruin of the Realm and of the Nobles (as Henry Huntington doth expound it) which after inſued by the Danes, or whether it was ſo wrought by Dunſtan's ſorcery (as was not unpoſſible) or whether it were a thing but feigned of the Monkiſh writers, and not true; all this I leave to the Readers, to think therein what them liketh. The Stories ſay further, that upon this the matter ceaſed, and Dunſtan had all his will.

Dunſtan an enemy to Prieſts wives.

A ſudden fall of the people at the Council of Calve.

Henricus lib. 5. Guliel. Ranulph. Jornalenſis, Fabian.

Theſe things thus done at Calve, it happened not long after the ſame, that King Edward, whom the writers deſcribe to be a vertuous and a meek Prince, much pitiful and beneficial to the poor, about the fourth year of his reign came upon a ſeaſon from hunting in the Foreſt alone, without the company of his ſervants to the place in the Weſt Country, where Alfrith his mother with her ſon Egelred did lye. When the Queen the mother was warned of his coming by her men, anon ſhe calleth a ſervant of hers which was of her ſpecial truſt, opening to him all her conceived counſel, and ſhewing him all points how and what to do for the accompliſhing of her wicked purpoſe. Which thing ſo done, ſhe made towards the King, and received him with all courteſie, deſiring him to tarry that night; but he in like courteſie excuſed himſelf, and for ſpeed deſired to ſee his Brother, and to drink upon his Horſe ſitting, the which was ſhortly brought.

The horrible wickedneſs of a Queen-mother.

Now while the Cup was at his mouth, the ſervant of the Queen (being informed) ſtrake him in the body with a long two edged Dagger. After the which ſtroke the King took the Horſe with the ſpurs, and ran toward the way where he ſuppoſed to meet with his company, but he bled ſo ſore, that with faintneſs he fell from his Horſe, his one foot being in the Stirrup. By reaſon whereof he was drawn of his Horſe over fields and lands till he came to a place named Corifgate, where he was found dead; and for that neither the manner of his death, nor yet he himſelf was known to be the King, he was buried unhonourably at the Town of Warham, where the body remained the ſpace of three years, and then after was taken up by Duke Alfer above mentioned, and with pomp and honour accordingly was removed to the Minſter of Shaftsbury, and there beſtowed in the place called Edward-

K. Edward found dead and buried, not known to be King. Corif Caſtle.

The body of King Edward after three years, honourably taken up and tranſlated to Shaftsbury.

Edwardſtow. Many tales run (more perchance than be true) concerning the finding and taking up of his body, which our moſt common Hiſtories aſcribe to miracles and great wonders wrought about the place where the King was buried. As firſt, how a poor woman born blind received her ſight by the means of St. Edward, there where he did lie. Alſo how a pillar of fire from Heaven deſcended over the place of his burial. Then how the foreſaid Queen Alfrith taking her Horſe to go to the place, was ſtopped by the way, that neither her Horſe could be driven by any means, nor ſhe her ſelf on foot was able to approach near to the place where the Corpſe of St. Edward was. Furthermore, how the ſaid Queen in repentance of her fact, afterward builded two Nunneries, one at Amesbury by Saliſbury; the other at Werewell, where ſhe kept her ſelf in continual repentance all the days of her life. And thus as ye have heard, was this vertuous young King Edward murthered, when he had reigned almoſt four years, leaving no iſſue behind him, whereby the rule of the land fell to Egelredus his Brother.

Two Nunneries founded upon murther.

§ But here by the way is to be noted (upon the name of this Edward) that there were three Edwards before the Conqueſt. The firſt was King Edward the Senior; the ſecond, King Edward the Martyr, which was this King; the third was King Edward called the Confeſſor, whereof hereafter ſhall follow (Chriſt willing) to be declared.

{ Anno 979. }

Three Edwards Kings before the Conqueſt.

In the order and courſe of the Roman Biſhops, mention was made laſt of Agapetus the ſecond, after whom next ſucceeded Pope John the thirteenth, of whom Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury received his Pall, as in the ſtory of King Edgar is before minded. This Pope is noted to be very wicked and infamous, repleat from his firſt bringing up with abominable vices; a Whoremaſter, an Adulterer, Inceſtuous, Libidinous, a Gamſter, an Extortioner, perjured, a fighter, a murtherer, cruel and tyrannous. Of his Cardinals, ſome he put out their eyes, from ſome he cut off their tongues, ſome their fingers, ſome their noſes, &c. In a General Council before the Emperor Otho the firſt of that name (who was the firſt Emperor of the Germans) after the Empire was tranſlated out of France to Germany by Pope Agapetus (as is above Hiſtoried) theſe Objections were articulate againſt him. Firſt, that he never ſaid his Service; that in ſaying his Maſs he did not Communicate; that he Ordained Deacons in a Stable; that he committed Inceſt with two of his Siſters; that playing at Dice he called for the Devil to help; that for money he made boys Biſhops; that he deflowred Virgins and ſtrangers; that of the Palace of Lateran he made a Stews; that he lay with Stephana his Fathers Concubine; likewiſe with Ramera, and with Anna and her Neece; that he put out the eyes of the Biſhop Benedict; that he cauſed houſes to be ſet on fire; that he brake open houſes; that he drank to the Devil; that he never croſſed himſelf, &c. For the which cauſes (and worthily) he was depoſed by the conſent of the Emperor with the Prelates, and Pope Leo was ſubſtitute in his place. But after his departing (through the Harlots of Rome, and their great promiſes) the ſaid Pope John was reſtored again to his place, and Leo (ſet up by the Emperor) was depoſed. At length about the tenth year of the Popedom of this John, he being found without the City with another mans wife, was ſo wounded of her husband, that within eight days after he died.

After him the Romans Elected Pope Benedictus the fifth, without the conſent of the Emperor; whereupon the ſaid Otho the Emperor being not a little diſpleaſed for diſplacing of Leo, whom he had before promoted, and for the chooſing alſo of Benedict, came with his Army and laid ſiege to Rome, and ſo ſet up Pope Leo again the Eighth of that name; which Leo to gratifie his Benefactor again, Crowned Otho for Emperor, and intituled him to be called Auguſtus. Alſo the power which Carolus Magnus had given before to the Clergy and people of Rome, this Leo by a Synodal Decree granted to the Emperor and his Succeſſors; that is, touching the Election of the Biſhop of Rome. The Emperor again reſtored to the See of Rome all ſuch Donations and Poſſeſſions which either Conſtantinus (as they falſely pretend) or which Carolus Magnus took from the Lombards, and gave to them.

After Pope Leo had reigned a year and three months, ſucceeded Pope John the Fourteenth, againſt whom (for holding with the Emperor) Petrus the Head-captain of the City, with two Conſuls, twelve Aldermen, and divers other Nobles, gathering their power together, laid hands upon him in the Church of Lateran, and clapt the Pope in priſon eleven months. The Emperor hearing this, with all ſpeed returned with his Army again to Rome; who after execution done upon the Authors and chief doers of that fact; among other committed the foreſaid Petrus to the Popes arbitrement, whom he cauſed firſt to be ſtript naked, then his beard being ſhaven, to be hanged by the hair a whole day together, after that to be ſet upon an Aſs (his face turned backward, and his hands bound under the Aſſes tayl) and ſo to be led through the City, that all men might ſee him; that done, to be ſcourged with rods, and ſo baniſhed the City. Thus ye ſee how the holy Father obſerveth the injunction of the Goſpel, Diligite inimicos veſtros, Love your enemies, Luk. 6. &c. From this Pope proceeded firſt the Chriſtening of Bells, Ann. 971.

Then came Pope Donus the Second, after whom Bonifacius the Seventh was Pope, who likewiſe ſeeing the Citizens of Rome to conſpire againſt him, was conſtrained to hide himſelf, and ſeeing no place there for him to tarry, took the Treaſure of St. Peters Church, and ſo privily ſtole to Conſtantinople. In whoſe ſtead the Romans ſet up Pope John the Fifteenth. Not long after Boniface returning again from Conſtantinople, by his money and treaſure procured a Garriſon or Company to take his part: by whoſe means the foreſaid Pope John was taken, his eyes put out, and ſo thrown in priſon, where he was, as ſome ſay, famiſhed; ſome ſay he was ſlain by Ferrucius. Neither did Boniface reign many days after but ſuddenly died; whoſe carcaſs after his death was drawn by the feet through the Streets of Rome after a moſt deſpightful manner. the people ſhrieking and exclaiming againſt him, An. 976.

Next Pope after him was Benedictus the Seventh by the conſent of the Emperor Otho the Second, and reigned nineteen years. In the time of this Pope Hugh Cappet the French King took Charles (the right heir to the Crown) by the Treaſon of the Biſhop of Laon, and when he had impriſoned him, he alſo committed to priſon Arnoldus Archbiſhop of Reims, and placed in his room Gillertus a Monk of Floriack (a Necromancer) who was Schoolmaſter to Doctor Robert the Kings Son. But this Pope Benedictus called a Council at Reims reſtored the ſaid Arnoldus again, and diſplaced Gilbertus, which after by the help of Otho was made Archbiſhop of Ravenna, and at length was Pope, as in proceſs hereafter (Chriſt granting) ſhall be declared.

After Benedictus ſucceeded in the See of Rome Pope John the Sixteenth, and died the eighth month of his Papacy; next to whom came John the Seventeenth, and after him Gregory the Fifth in the year of our Lord 995. This Gregory (called before Bruno) was a German born, and therefore the more maliced of the Clergy and people of Rome. Whereupon Creſcentius with the people and Clergy conventing againſt the ſaid Gregory ſet up John the Eighteenth. Gregory upon the ſame ſped himſelf in all convenient haſt to the Emperor Otho the Third in Germany; who, hearing the complaint of Gregory, and underſtanding his wrongs, ſet forward with his Army well appointed to Italy, got the City, and there took both Creſcentius the Conſul, and John the Pope. Which John firſt having his eyes put out, was deprived after of his life. Creſcentius the Conſul was ſet upon a vile horſe, having his noſe and ears cut off, and ſo was led through the City, his face being turned to the horſe-tayl, and afterward having his members cut off, was hanged upon a Gibbet.

King Egelred, or Elred.

King Egelred.

Anno 979.

KING Edward thus being murthered, as is aforeſaid, the Crown fell next to Egelred his younger Brother, and Son to King Edgar by the foreſaid Queen Alfrith, as we have declared. This Egelred had a long reign given him of God, which dured the term of eight and thirty years, but very unfortunate and full of great miſeries; and he himſelf (by the Hiſtories) ſeemeth to be a Prince not of the greateſt courage to govern a Commonwealth. Our Engliſh Stories writing of him, thus report of his reign, that in the beginning it was ungracious, wretched in the middle, and hateful in the later end. Of this Egelred it is read, that when Dunſtan the Archbiſhop ſhould Chriſten him, as he did hold him over the Font, ſomething there happened that pleaſed not Dunſtan, whereupon he ſware, Per ſanctam Mariam iſte ignavus homo erit: By the mother of Chriſt he will be a Prince untoward and cowardly: Chron. de Crowland. I find in William of Malmesbury, Lib. 2. de Regib. that this Egelred being of the age of ten years, when he heard his Brother Edward to be ſlain, made ſuch ſorrow and weeping for him, that his mother falling therewith in a rage, took Wax-candles (having nothing elſe at hand) wherewith ſhe ſcourged him ſo ſore (well near till he ſwounded) that after the ſame he could never abide any Wax-candles to burn before him. After this, about the year of our Lord 981, (the day of his Coronation being appointed by the Queen the mother, and the Nobles) Dunſtan the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (who firſt refuſed ſo to do) with Oſwald Archbiſhop of York, were inforced to Crown the King, and ſo they did at Kingſton. In doing whereof, the report of Stories goeth, that the ſaid Dunſtan ſhould ſay thus, prophecying unto the King, That forſomuch as he came to the Kingdom by the death of his Brother, and through the conſpiracy of the wicked conſpirators, and other Engliſhmen, they ſhould not be without blood-ſhedding and ſword, till there caſhe a people of an unknown tongue, and ſhould bring them into thraldom, neither ſhould that treſpaſs be cleanſed without long vengeance, &c.

The Coronation of Egelred.

The Proteſie of Dunſtan as Monkiſh Stories give it.

In the Chronicles of Crowland I find theſe words, Quoniam aſcendiſti ad thronum tuum per mortem fratris tui, quem occidit mater tua, propterea audi verbum Domini: Hoc dicit Dominus, non deficiet gladius de domo tua, ſæviens in te omnibus diebus vitæ tuæ, & interficiens de ſemine tuo, & de gente tua, uſque dum regnum tuum transferatur in regnum alienum: cujus ritum & linguam, gens tua non novit, nec expiabitur niſi longa vindicta, & multa ſanguinis effuſione peccatum matris tuæ, & peccatum virorum peſſimorum, qui conſenſerunt conſilio ejus nequam, ut mitterent manum in Chriſtum Domini ad effundendum ſanguinem innocentem. Chron. de Crowland.

Not long after the Coronation of this King, a Cloud was ſeen throughout the land, which appeared the one half like blood, and the other half like fire, and changed after into ſundry colours, and vaniſhed at the laſt in the morning. Shortly after the appearance of this Cloud, in the third year of his reign the Danes arriving in ſundry places of the land, firſt ſpoiled Southampton, either ſlaying the inhabitants, or leading them captive away. From thence they went to the Iſle of Thanet, then they invaded Cheſter, from thence they proceeded to Cornwal and Devonſhire, and ſo to Suſſex, where in thoſe coaſts they did much harm, and ſo retired to their Ships again. Roger Hoveden writing hereof, ſaith, that London the ſame time, or (as Fabian ſaith) a great part of London was conſumed with fire. About this time fell a variance between the foreſaid Egelred and the Biſhop of Rocheſter; inſomuch that he made war againſt him, and beſieged the City. And notwithſtanding that Dunſtan required the King, ſending him admoniſhment, to give over for the ſake of Saint Andrew; yet continued he his ſiege till the Biſhop offered him an hundred pounds of Gold; which he received, and ſo departed. The Danes ſeeing the diſcord that then was in the Realm, and eſpecially the hatred of the ſubjects againſt the King, roſe again, and did great harm in divers places of England; inſomuch that the King was glad to grant them great ſums of money for peace to be had. For the aſſurance of which peace, Analaffe Captain of the Danes, became a Chriſtian man, and ſo returned home to his Country, and did no more harm. Beſides theſe miſeries before recited, a ſore ſickneſs of the Bloody-flux, and hot Fevers fell among the people, whereof many died; with a like Murren alſo among the Beaſts. Moreover for lack of juſtice, many thieves, rioters and bribers were in the land, with much miſery and miſchief.

Anno 990.

The Bloody flux and hot Fevers reigned in this land.

About the eleventh year (ſome ſay the ninth year) of this Kings reign died Dunſtan. After whom ſucceeded Ethelgarus, or as Fornalenſis writeth, Stilgerus. After him Elfricus, as affirmeth Guliel. lib. 1. de Pontif. But as Polydorus ſaith, Siricius. After him Elfrisius came; but Siricius after the mind of Guliel. lib. 1. but Polydore ſaith, Aluricius, then Elphegus, &c.

About the ſame time in the year of our Lord 995, Aldunus Biſhop tranſlated the body of St. Cuthbert from Cheſter (which firſt was a Northern Iſland, then at Rocheſter) to Durelme or Dunelme. Whereupon the Biſhops See of Dureſm firſt began.

Anno 995.

The Biſhops See of Durham.

Not long after the death of Dunſtan, the Danes againe entred England, in many and ſundry places of the land; in ſuch ſort that the King was to ſeek to which coaſt he ſhould go firſt to withſtand his enemies. But in concluſion, for the avoiding of more harm, he was compelled to appeaſe them with great ſums of money. But when that money was ſpent, they fell to new robbing of the people, and aſſailing the land in divers places, not only about the Country of Northumberland, but alſo beſieged the City of London at the laſt. But being from thence repelled by the manhood of the Londoners, they ſtrayed to other Countries adjoyning, as to Eſſex, Kent, Suſſex, and Hampſhire, burning and killing whereſoever they went; ſo that for lack of a good Head or Governour many things in the land periſhed. For the King gave himſelf to the vice of lechery, and polling of his ſubjects, and diſinherited men of their poſſeſſions, and cauſed them to redeem the ſame again with great ſums of money; for he payed great tributes to the Danes yearly, which was called Danegilt. Which tributes ſo increaſed, that from the firſt tribute of ten thouſand pounds, it was brought at laſt in proceſs of five or ſix years to forty thouſand pounds. The which yearly (until the coming of St. Edward, and after) was levied of the ſubjects of this land.

London beſieged of the Danes.

The Danes ſpoiled the land.

Great tribute levied of the Engliſh men. Danegilt.

The ſorrowful affliction of the Engliſh Nation.

What diſcention and diſcord doth among the Nobles in a realme.

To this ſorrow moreover was joyned hunger and penury among the Commons, inſomuch that every one of them was conſtrained to pluck and ſteal from others. So that what for the pillage of the Danes, and what by inward thieves and bribers, this land was brought into great affliction. Albeit the greateſt cauſe of this affliction (as to me appeareth) is not ſo much to be imputed to the King, as to the diſſention among the Lords themſelves, who then did not agree one with another. But when they aſſembled in conſultation together, either they did draw divers ways; or if any thing were agreed upon any matter of peace between the parties, ſoon it was broken again; or elſe if any good thing were deviſed for the prejudice of the enemy, anon the Danes were warned thereof by ſome of the ſame counſel. Of whom the chief doers were Edrike Duke of Mercia, and Alfrike the Admiral or Captain of the Ships, who betrayed the Kings Navy to the Danes. Wherefore the King apprehended Alfagarus Son of the ſaid Alfrike, put out his eyes, and ſo did he after to the two Sons of Duke Edrike in like manner.

The Danes recourſe to England.

The pride and wretchedneſs of the Danes toward the Engliſhmen.

The Danes thus prevailing more and more over the Engliſh men, grew in ſuch pride and preſumption, that when they by ſtrength cauſed the Husbandmen to ear and ſow the land, and to do all other vile labour belonging to the houſe, they would ſit at home holding the wife at their pleaſure, with daughter and ſervant. And when the Husbandman came home, he ſhould ſcantly have of his own, as his ſervants had; ſo that the Dane had all at his will, and ſill, faring of the beſt; when the owner ſcantly had his ſill of the worſt. Thus the common people being of them oppreſſed, were in ſuch fear and dread, that not only they were conſtrained to ſuffer them in their doings, but alſo glad to pleaſe them, and called every one of them in the houſe where they had rule, Lord-Dane. Which word after (in proceſs of time when the Danes were voided) was for deſpight of the Danes turned of the Engliſh men to a name of opprobry, that when one Engliſh man would rebuke another, he would for the more part call him Lurdane.

And thus hitherto (through the aſſiſtance of Chriſt) we have brought this Hiſtory to the year of our Lord 1000. During now and continuing theſe great miſeries upon this Engliſh Nation, the land being brought into great ruin by the grievous tributes of the Danes, and alſo by ſuſtaining the manifold villanies and injuries, as well by them as by other oppreſſions within the Realm; this year which was the year of our Saviour 1000, this Egelred through the counſel of certain his familiars about him, in the one and twentieth year of his reign, began a matter, which was occaſion either given by the one, or taken by the other, of a new Plague to inſue upon the Saxons, who had driven out the Britains before; that was in joyning with the Normans in Marriage. For the King this year aboveſaid, for the more ſtrength (as he thought) both of him and the Realm, married Emma the daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. Which Richard was the third Duke of the Normans, and the firſt of that name. By reaſon of which Marriage King Egelred was not a little inhanced in his own mind; and, by preſumption thereof, ſent ſecret and ſtrict commiſſions to the Rulers of every Town in England, that upon St. Brices day at an hour appointed, the Danes ſhould be ſuddenly ſlain. And ſo it was performed, which turned after to more trouble.

The Danes by ſecret commiſſion ſlain in every Town of England.

After that tidings came into Denmark of the murther of thoſe Danes, anon after Swanus King of Denmark with a great Hoſt and Navy landed in Cornwal; where by treaſon of a Norman, named Hugh, which by favour of Queen Emma was made Earl of Devonſhire, the ſaid Swanus took Exceſter, and after beat down the walls. From thence proceeding further into the land, they came to Wilton and Shireborne, where they cruelly ſpoiled the Country, and ſlew the people. But anon Swanus hearing that the King was coming to him with the power of his land, took his Ships and ſet about to Northfolk; where after much waſting of that Country, and ſpoiling the City of Norwich, and burning the Town of Thetford and deſtroying the Country thereabout, at length Duke Uskatel met him and beat him, and ſlew many of the Danes. Wherefore Swanus for that year returned to Denmark, and there made great proviſion to re-enter the land again the next year following; and ſo did, landing at Sandwich about the five and twentieth year of the reign of K. Egelred, and there ſpoiled that Country. And as ſoon as he heard of any Hoſt of Engliſh men coming toward him, then he took Shipping again. So that when the Kings Army ſought to meet him in one coaſt, then would he ſuddenly land in another. And when the King provided to meet with him upon the Sea, either they would feign to flee, or elſe they would with gifts blind the Admiral of the Kings Navy. And thus wearied they the Engliſh men, and in concluſion brought them into extream and unſpeakable miſery. Inſomuch that the King was fain to take peace with them, and gave to King Swanus 30000 pounds. After which peace thus made, Swanus returned again to Denmark.

But this peace continued not long, for the year next following, King Egelred made Edricus above mentioned Duke of Mercia, who was ſubtil of wit, gloſing and eloquent of ſpeech, untruſty, and falſe to the King and the Realm. And ſoon after one Turkillus (a Prince of the Danes) landed in Kent with much people, and there did ſuch harm that the Kentiſh men were fain to make peace with great gifts, and ſo thence departed. But this perſecution of the Danes (in one Country or other in England) never ceaſed, nor the King did ever give to them any notable battel. For when he was diſpoſed to give them battel, this Edricus would ever counſel him to the contrary, ſo that the Danes ever ſpoiled and robbed, and waxed rich, and the Engliſh men ever poor and bare.

After this Swanus being in Denmark, and hearing of the increaſe of his people in England, brake his Covenants before made, and with a great Army and Navy, in moſt defenſible wiſe appointed, landed in Northumberland, proclaimed himſelf to be King of this land. Where after much vexation when he had ſubdued the people, and cauſed the Earl with the Rulers of the Country to ſwear to him fealty; he paſſed the river of Trent to Gainsburgh, and to Northwatling-ſtreet, and ſubduing the people there, enforced them to give him pledges; which pledges he committed with his Navy unto Canutus his Son to keep while he went further into the land; and ſo with a great Hoſt came to Mercia, killing and ſlaying. Then he took by ſtrength Wincheſter and Oxford, and did there what him liked. That done, he came toward London, and hearing the King was there, paſſed by the river Thames, and came into Kent, and there beſieged Canterbury, where he was relieved the ſpace of twenty days. At length by Treaſon of a Deacon called Almaricus (whom the Biſhop had preſerved from death before) he wan it, and took the Goods of the People, and fired the City, and tithed the Monks of Saint Auguſtine's Abby (that is to mean they ſlew nine by cruel torment, and the tenth they kept alive as for their ſlave.) So they ſlew there of religious men, to the number of 900 perſons; of other men, women and children, they ſlew above 8000. And finally, when they had kept the Biſhop Elphegus in ſtrait priſon the ſpace of ſeven months, becauſe he would not condeſcend to give unto them 3000 Pounds; after many villanies unto him done, they brought him to Greenwich, and there ſtoned him to death.

King Egelred in the mean time, fearing the end of this Perſecution, ſent his wife Emma, with his two Sons Alfred and Edward, to the Duke of Normandy, with whom alſo he ſent the Biſhop of London. The Danes proceeded ſtill in their fury and rage, and when they had won a great part of Weſtſaxony, they returned again to London. Whereof the Londoners hearing, ſent unto them certain great gifts and pledges. At laſt the King about the five and thirtieth year of his reign, was chaſed unto the Iſle of Wight, and with a ſecret company he ſpent there a great part of the winter; and finally, without cattel or comfort ſailed into Normandy to his wife. Swanus being aſcertained thereof (inflamed with pride) reared exceeding Impoſitions upon the people. And among other he required a great ſum of money of St. Edmunds lands, which the people there claiming to be free from Kings tributes, denied to pay. For this Swanus entred the territory of St. Edmund, and waſted and ſpoiled the Country, deſpiling the holy Martyr, and menacing alſo the place of his Sepulture. Wherefore the men of that Country fearing his tyranny, fell to prayer and faſting, ſo that ſhortly after Swanus died ſuddenly, crying and yelling among his Knights. Some ſay that he was ſtricken with the Sword of St. Edmund, whereof he died the third day after.

In fear whereof Canutus his Son, which ruled as King after his Father, granted them the freedom of all their Liberties; and moreover ditched the land of the ſaid Martyr with a deep ditch and granted to the Inhabitants there of great freedoms, quitting them from all task or tribute; and after builded a Church over the place of his Sepulture, and ordained there an Houſe of Monks, and endued them with rich poſſeſſions. And after that time it was uſed, that Kings of England when they were Crowned, ſent their Crowns for an offering to Saint Edmunds Shrine, and redeemed the ſame again afterwards with a condigne price.

When King Egelred heard of the death of Swanus, he made proviſion and returned into England. For whoſe ſudden coming Canutus, being unprovided, fled to Sandwich, and there cutting off the noſes and hands of the Pledges, which his Father left with him, ſailed into Denmark; who the next year returned again with a great Navy, and landed in the South Country. Wherefore the the eldeſt Son of King Egelred, called Edmund Ironſide, made proviſion with the aid of Edrike Duke of Mercia to meet him. But Edrike faining himſelf ſick, came not, but deceived him. For as it was after proved, Edrike had promiſed his Allegiance to Canutus. By reaſon whereof, Canutus entred the Country of Weſt-Saxon, and forced the people to be ſworn unto him, and to give him pledges. In this ſeaſon, King Egelred being at London, was taken with great ſickneſs, and there died, and was buried, in the North ſide of Pauls Church, behind the Quire, after he had Reigned unproſperouſly thirty and ſix years; leaving after him his ſaid Eldeſt Son Edmund Ironſide, and Elfred, and Edward which were in Normandy, ſent thither before as is above rehearſed. This Egelred although he was miſerably Impugned and vexed of his Enemies, yet he with his Council gave forth wholeſome Laws, whereof this is one parcel, containing good Rules and Leſſons for all Judges and Juſtices to learn and Follow.

Canutus taketh Weſt-Saxon.

A Leſſon for all Judges and Juſtices.

O Omnis judex juſtus miſericordiam & judicium liberet in omnibus, & inprimis per rectam ſcientiam dicat emandationem ſecundum culpam, & eam tamen admenſuret propter indulgentiam. Quædam culpæ reputantur a bonis judicibus ſecundum rectum emendandæ. Quædam per Dei miſericordiam condonandæ. Judicia debent eſſe ſine omni haderunga, quod non parcatur diviti alicui vel egeno amico vel inimico, jus publicum recitari. Nihil autem injuſtius eſt, quam ſuſceptio munerum pro judicio ſubvertendo: Quia munera excæcant corda ſapientum, & ſubvertunt verba juſtorum. Dominus Jeſus dixit: In quo judicio judicaveritis, judicabimini. Timeat omnis judex ac diligat Deum judicem ſuum, ne in die judicii mutus ſiat, & humiliatus ante oculos judicis cuncta videntis. Qui innocentem opprimit, & dimittit noxium pro pecunia, vel amicitia, vel odio, vel quacunque factione, opprimetur ab omnipotente judice. Et nullus dominus, nulla poteſtas, ſtultos aut improbos judices conſtituant, quia ſtultus per ignaviam, improbus per cupiditatem vitat quam diduci, veritatem. Gravius enim laceranter pauperes a pravis judicibus, quam a cruentis hoſtibus. Nullus hoſtis acerbior, nulla peſtis efficacior quam familiaris inimicus. Poteſt aliquoties homo fuga, vel defenſione vitare pravos inimicos. Non ita poſſunt judices, quoties adverſus ſubditos malis deſideriis inflammantur. Sæpe etiam boni judices habent malos vicarios & miniſtros nefandos, quorum reatibus ipſi domi conſtringuntur, ſi non eos coerceant, & a rapacitate cohibeant. Quia Dominus & miniſter ſæculorum ait, Non ſolum male agentes, ſed omnes conſentientes digni ſunt æterna morte. Sæpe etiam pravi judices judicium pervertunt, vel reſpectant, & non finiunt cauſam, donec voluntas eorum impleatur. Et quando judicant, non opera, ſed munera conſiderant. Impii judices, juxta verbum ſapientum, ſicut rapaces lupi veſpere nil reſiduant uſque mane, id eſt, de præſenti ſolum vita cogitant, de futura nihil conſiderant. Malorum præpoſitorum mos eſt, ut, quicquid poſſunt, auferant, & vix neceſſarium parum quid relinquant ſuſtentationi. Iracundus judex non poteſt attendere rectam judicii ſatisfactionem. Nam per furoris excæcationem, non perſpicit rectitudinis claritatem, Juſtum judicium, ubi non perſona conſideratur. Scriptum eſt: Non attendas perſonam hominis in judicio, nec pro aliquo facies, ut a vero declines, & injuſte judices. Suſceptio muneris eſt dimiſſio veritatis. Ex hiſtoria bibliothecæ Jornal.

A wicked Judge depoſed and deprived by the King.

Of this King Egelred I find noted in the Book of Roger Hoveden, that he depoſed and deprived from his Poſſeſſions a certain Judge or Juſticier named Walgeatus, the Son of one Leonet, for falſe judgment and other proud doings, whom notwithſtanding he loved above all others.

Edmund Ironſide a Saxon, and Canutus a Dane, Kings together in England.

{ Anno 1016. } AFter the death of Egelred variance fell between the Engliſhmen for the Election of their King. For the Citizens of London, with certain other Lords, named Edmund the Eldeſt Son of Egelred (a young man of luſty and valiant courage) in Martial adventures both hardy and wiſe, who could very well indure all pains; whereſore he was ſurnamed Ironſide. But the more of the Lords favoured Canutus the Son of Swanus, eſpecially the Abbats, Biſhops, and men of the ſpiritualty, which before had ſworn to his Father. By means whereof, between theſe two Martial Princes were fought many great Battels, firſt in Dorſetſhire, where Canutus was compelled to fly the field. And after that they fought another Battel in Worceſterſhire, ſo ſore that none could tell who had the better; but either for wearineſs or for lack of day, they departed one from the other, and on the next morrow fought again: But then Canutus was compelled to forſake the field. After this they met in Mercia, and there fought again; where Edmund (as ſtories ſay) by the Treaſon of that falſe Edrike Duke of Mercia (whom he before had received to favour) had the worſe. Thus many great conflicts there were between theſe two Princes. But upon a ſeaſon, when the hoſts were ready to joyn, and a certain time of Truce was taken before battel, a Knight of the party of Edmund ſtood up upon a high place, and ſaid theſe Words.

Edmund Ironſide Son of Egelred, King.

Canutus Son of Swanus, King.

The battels between Edmundus and Canutus.

Daily we die, and none hath the victory: And when the Knights be dead on either part, then the Dukes compelled by need ſhall accord, or elſe they muſt fight alone. And this Kingdom is not ſufficient for two men, which ſometimes ſufficed ſeven. But if the covetouſneſs of Lordſhip in theſe twain be ſo great, that neither can be content to take part and live by the other, nor the one under the other; then let them fight alone that will be Lords alone. If all men fight ſtill, at the laſt all men ſhall be ſlain, and none left to be under their Lordſhip, nor able to defend the King that ſhall be, againſt ſtrange Enemies and Nations.

Theſe words were ſo well allowed of both the Hoſts and Princes, that both were content to try the quarrel between them two only. Then the place and time was appointed, where they both met in ſight of both Hoſts. And when either had aſſaied other with ſharp ſwords and ſtrokes; firſt by the motion of Canutus (as ſome write) haſtily they were both agreed, and kiſſed each other to the comfort of both Hoſts. And ſhortly after they agreed upon partition of the land; and after that, during their lives they loved as brethren. Soon after, a Son of wicked Edricus, by the mind (as appeared afterward) of his Father, eſpied, when King Edmund was at the draught, and with a ſpear (ſome ſay with a long knife) thruſt him into the Fundament, whereof the ſaid Edmund ſhortly after died, after that he had Reigned two years. He left behind him two Sons, Edmund and Edward, whom Edrike the wicked Duke, after the death of their Father, took from their Mother (not knowing yet of the death of Edmund her Husband) and preſented them to King Canutus, ſaluting him in theſe words, Ave rex ſolus. Thus Canutus after the death of Edmund Ironſide, was King alone of the whole Realm of England, and afterward by the advice of his Council, he ſent the foreſaid Sons of Edmund Ironſide to his brother Swanus King of Sweveland to be ſlain; who, abhorring that deed, ſent them to Salomon King of Hungary, where Edmund being married to the Kings daughter, died; Edward was married to Agatha daughter of his brother Henry the fourth Emperor.

The wicked murther of King Edmund.

Two Sons of Edmund Ironſide.

When Canutus was ſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, he called a Parliament at London, where (among other things there debated) it was propounded to the Biſhops, Barons, and Lords of the Parliament there preſent, whether that in the compoſition made between Edmund and Canutus, any ſpecial remembrance was made for the children or brethren of Edmund, for any partition of any part of the land. Whereunto the Engliſh Lords falſly flattering the foreign King, and ſpeaking againſt their own minds, as alſo againſt their native Country, anſwered and ſaid; Nay: Affirming moreover with an oath (for the Kings pleaſure) that they to the uttermoſt of their powers, would put off the blood of Edmund in all that they might. By reaſon of which anſwer and promiſe, they thought (many of them) to have purchaſed with the King great favour. But by the juſt retribution of God it chanced far otherwiſe. For many of them or the moſt part (ſuch eſpecially as Canutus did perceive to be ſworn before time to Edmund, and his heirs, and alſo conſidering that they were native Engliſhmen) he miſtruſted and diſdained ever after Flattery, Infidelity, and untruth in Engliſh Lords.

False unfaithful and unconſtant mutability in Engliſh Lords well rewarded.

In ſo much that ſome he exiled, a great ſort he beheaded, and ſome by Gods puniſhment died ſuddenly. Among whom wicked Edrike alſo the Traytor (although with his ſugered words he continued a while in the Kings favour) at length eſcaped not condigne reward for his deceivable dealing. For (as the Hiſtory of Fornalenſis recordeth) as the King was in his Palace beyond Thames, this Edrike (being belike accuſed, or elſe ſuſpected of the King before) coming unto him, began to reckon up his benefits and labours beſtowed for his ſake. Firſt, in forſaking and betraying Egelred, then in ſlaying King Edmund his Son, with many ſuch other deeds more, which all for his ſake he had done. Well, ſaith the King, thou haſt here rightly judged thy ſelf, and worthily thou ſhalt die for ſlaying thy natural Prince, and my ſworn brother. And ſo commanded him to be bound immediately hand and foot, and to be thrown into the Thames. Some ſtories ſay, that when he had ſaluted the King with Ave rex ſolus, and ſhewed him the ſlaying of Edmund: Canutus (promiſing that he would make him therefore higher than all the Lords of the Realm) commanded his head to be ſtricken off, and to be ſet upon London Bridge, and his body to be caſt into the Town ditch: And thus with ſhame ended he his wretched life, as all they commonly do, which with like diſſimulation ſeek the deſtruction of their Prince, and of their Country.

This Canutus (ſhortly after the death of King Edmund) by the Council of Edrike exiled Edmund, being brother unto King Edmund, called Rex ruſticorum, the King of Churles. But afterward he was reconciled again to the Kings favour, and laſtly ſlain by certain of the Kings Secretaries or Servants. Alſo through the Council of the ſaid Edrike, and of Emma his wife, he ſent the two Sons of Edmund Ironſide (Edmund and Edward) to his brother Swanus King of Denmark, to be ſlain, as is abovesaid.

Edmund, and Edward two Sons of Edmund Ironſide ſent out to be ſlain.

In this mean time, Swanus King of Denmark, brother to Canutus, died. Wherefore that Land fell to Canutus, which anon after ſailed thither, and took thereof poſſeſſion. And after he had ſet it in an Order, he returned into England, and married Emma, late wife before of Egelred, and by her had a Son called Hardeknight or Hardeknoutus. Moreover, this Canutus aſſembled a Parliament at Oxford, where it was agreed that Engliſhmen and Danes ſhould hold the Laws made by King Egdar, becauſe they were thought ſo good and reaſonable above any other Laws.

Canutus King of Denmarke.

Canutus married Emma, Wife before of Egelred.

Lawes of King Edgar.

Thus the Danes being in England began by little and little to be Chriſtian men. And Canutus went to Rome, and ſo, returning again to England, governed that Land the ſpace of twenty years, leaving after him two Sons, Harold and Hardeknoutus; which Hardeknoutus was made King of Denmark in his Fathers time.

Harold (called Harefoot for his deliverneſs and ſwiftneſs) Son to Canutus by Elgina his firſt wife, began his Reign over England, in the year 1039. Of him his little left in memory (for he Reigned but four years) ſave that he baniſhed his ſtep-mother Emma, and took her Goods and Jewels from Her.

Harold Harefoot King of England a Dane.

Hardeknoutus being King of Denmark, and ſecond Son to Canutus by his laſt wife Emma, was next King of England. In the time of theſe Daniſh Kings, there was one Godwin an Earl in England, which had been before in great favour with Canutus, for his Acts done in Denmark againſt the Norwegians; and afterward married the Siſter (ſome ſay the Daughter) of Canutus. This Godwin was of a cruel and ſubtil wit, as he declared no leſs by the two Sons of King Egelred. For when theſe two aforeſaid (whoſe names were Alfred and Edward) came from Normandy into England, to viſit their Mother Emma, and brought with them a great company of Normans; This Godwin (having a Daughter called Godith, whom he thought to marry to Edward, and ſet him up to be King) to bring his purpoſe about, uſed this Practice, that is, to perſwade King Hardeknout, and the Lords, not to ſuffer thoſe Normans to be within the Realm for Jeopardy, but rather to puniſh them for example: By which means he gat authority to order the matter himſelf. Wherefore he met them on Guild-down, and there moſt wretchedly murthered, or rather Martyred the moſt number of the Normans, and that innocently. For as Swanus before had tithed the Monks of Canterbury; ſo he, with the cruel company of Engliſh ſouldiers, ſlew nine of the ſaid Normans, and ſaved the tenth. And yet paſſing the fury of Swanus (as not contented with that tyranny) he tithed again the ſaid tithe, and ſlew every tenth Knight, and that by cruel torment, as winding their Guts out of their bodies, as writeth Kanulphus. And among others, he put out the Eyes of the Elder brother Alfredus, and ſent him to an Abbey of Ely; where he, being fed with Bread and Water, indured not long after. Of ſome writers it was recorded that he was there ſlain with the forenamed torment, and that Edward was conveyed by ſome other unto his Mother; who fearing the Treaſon of Godwin, ſent him ſoon over the Sea into Normandy again. This cruel Fact of Godwin and his men againſt the innocent Normans, whether it came of himſelf, or of the Kings ſetting on, ſeemeth to me to be the cauſe, why the Juſtice of God did ſhortly after revenge the quarrel of theſe Normans, in conquering and ſubduing the Engliſh Nation by William Conquerer, and the Normans which came with him. For ſo juſt and right it was, that as the Normans, coming with a natural Engliſh Prince, were murthered of Engliſh men: So afterward the Engliſhmen ſhould be ſlain and conquered by the Normans, coming with a foreign King, being none of their natural Country.

The Normans tithed, and yet the tenths reſtithed again.

The cauſe expreſſed, why God ſuffered this land to be conquered by the Normans.

Examples of Gods righteous judgment.

Then it followeth in the ſtory, that this King Canute or Hardeknout, when he had Reigned two years (being merry at Lambeth) ſuddenly was ſtricken Dumb, and fell down to the ground, and within eight days after died without Iſſue of his body; who was the laſt that Reigned in England of the blood of the Danes.

The death of King Hardeknout.

This foreſaid Godwin, had by the Daughter of Canutus his Wife, but one Son, which was drowned. Of his ſecond wife he received ſix Sons, to wit, Swanus, Harold, Toſtius, Wilmotus, Sixth or Surth, and Leofricus, with one Daughter called Goditha, which after was married to King Edward the Confeſſor.

The Sons of Earl Godwin.

Concerning the ſtory of this Alfred, I find it ſomething otherwiſe reported in our Engliſh Chronicles, that it ſhould be after the death of Hardeknout; for ſo much as the Earls and Barons after his death, aſſembled and made a Council, that never after any of the Danes blood ſhould be King of England, for the deſpight that they had done to Engliſhmen. For evermore before, if the Engliſhmen and the Danes had happened to meet upon a Bridge, the Engliſhmen ſhould not be ſo hardy to move a foot, but ſtand ſtill, till the Dane were paſſed forth. And moreover, if the Engliſhmen had not bowed down their heads to do reverence unto the Danes, they ſhould have been beaten and defiled. For the which deſpites and villanies they were driven out of the Land after the death of Hardeknout; for they had no Lord that might maintain them. And after this manner avoided the Danes out of England, that they never came again.

The ſtory of Alfred repeated.

Taken out of the Engliſh ſtory or chronicle compiled certain Engliſh Clerkes.

The Earls and Barons, by their common aſſent and Council, ſent unto Normandy for theſe two brethren, Alfred and Edward; intending to Crown Alfred the Elder brother, and to make him King of England. And to this the Earls and Barons made their oath: But the Earl Godwin of Weſt-Sax (falſly and traiterouſly) thought to ſlay theſe two brethren, as ſoon as they came into England, to the intent he might make Harold his Son King: Which Son he had by his wife Hardeknouts Daughter, that was a Dane. And ſo this Godwin went privily to South-Hampton, to meet there with the two brethren at their landing. And thus it fell, that the Meſſengers that went (ſaith mine Author) into Normandy, found but only Alfred the Elder brother. For Edward his Younger brother was gone to Hungary, to ſpeak with his Couſin the Outlaw, which was Edmund Ironſide's Son.

When Alfred had heard theſe Meſſengers, and perceived their tidings, he thanked God, and in all haſte ſped him to England, arriving at South-Hampton. There Godwin the falſe Traytor (having knowledge of his coming) welcomed and received him with joy, pretending to lead him unto London, where the Barons waited for to make him King, and ſo they together paſſed forth toward London. But when they came to Guild-down, the Traytor commanded all his men to ſlay all that were in Alfreds company, which came with him from Normandy; and after that, to take Alfred, and to lead him into the the Iſle of Ely, where they ſhould put out both his Eyes; and ſo they did. For they ſlew all the company that were there, to the number of twelve Gentlemen, which came with Alfred, from Normandy; and after that they took Alfred, and in the Iſle of Ely they executed their commiſſion. That done, they opened his body, took out his bowels, ſet a ſtake into the ground, and faſtened an end of his bowels thereunto, and with needles of Iron they pricked his tender body, thereby cauſing him to go about the ſtake, till that all his bowels were drawn out. And ſo died this innocent Alfred or Adured, being the right heir of the Crown, through Treaſon of wicked Godwin. When the Lords of England heard thereof, and how Alfred, that ſhould have been their King, was put to death through the falſe Traytor Godwin, they were wonderous wroth; and ſware between God and them, that he ſhould die a worſe death than did Edrith, which betrayed his Lord Edmund Ironſide, and would immediately have put him to death, but that the Traytor fled thence into Denmark, and there held him four years and more, and loſt all his Lands in England.

Ex hiſtoria ignoti authoris.

Another Latin ſtory I have (bearing no name) which ſaith that this coming in of Alfred and the Normans, was in the time of Harold, Canutus Son. And how Godwin (after he pretended great amity to them) ſuddenly in the night came upon them at Gilford, and after he had tithed the Normans, ſent Alfred to Harold at London; who ſent him to the Iſle of Ely, and cauſed his Eyes to be put out.

Gunilda, wife to Henricus the Emperor.

And thus much of Canutus, and of his Sons, Harold and Hardecanutus. Beſides theſe two Sons, Canutus had alſo a Daughter named Gunilda, married to Henricus the Emperor. Of whom ſome write, that ſhe being accuſed to the Emperor of Spouſe-breach, and having no Champion or Knight that would fight for her, (after the manner of that Country) for trial of her cauſe, a certain little dwarfe or boy, whom ſhe brought with her out of England (ſtirred up of God) fought in her cauſe againſt a mighty big German, of a Monſtrous greatneſs, which ſilly dwarfe, cutting by chance the Sinews of his Leg, after ſtroke him to the ground, and ſo cut off his Head, and ſaved the life of the Queen, if it be true that Guliel-mus and Fabianus reporteth.

Canutus went to Rome.

The Hoſpital built at Rome for Engliſh Pilgrims.

Rome-ſhot confirmed by Canutus.

The Cathedral Church of Winche-ſter inriched by Canutus.

S. Benets in Norfolke builded.

Bury Abbey turned to Monks.

Of this Canutus, it is ſtoried, that he following much the ſuperſtition of Achelnotus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, went on Pilgrimage to Rome, and there founded an Hoſpital for Engliſh Pilgrims. He gave the Pope precious gifts, and burdened the Land with a yearly tribute, called the Rome-ſhot. He ſhrived the body of Berinus, and gave great Lands and Ornaments to the Cathedral Church of Wincheſter; he builded S. Benets in Norfolke, which was before an Hermitage. Alſo S. Edmundsbury, which King Athelſtan before ordained for a College of Prieſts, he turned to an Abbey of Monks of Saint Benets Order.

Henricus, Archdeacon of Huntington, lib. 6. maketh mention of this Canutus, as doth alſo Polydor, lib. 7. That he after his coming from Rome, walking upon a time by the Port of South-Hampton, but Polydor ſaith, and Fabian affirmeth the ſame, that it was by the Thames ſide of London, when his flatterers coming about him, began to exalt him up with high Words, calling him a King of all Kings (moſt mighty) who had under his ſubjection both the People, the Land, and alſo the Sea: Canutus revolving this matter in his mind (whether for pride of his heart exalted, or whether to try and refel their flattering words) commanded his chair of ſtate to be brought to the Sea ſide, at what time it ſhould begin to flow. Polydor ſaith that no ſeat was brought; but ſitting upon his garments, being folded together under him, there charged and commanded the floods ariſing and coming towards his feet, that they ſhould touch neither him nor his clothes. But the water keeping his ordinary courſe came neerer and neerer; firſt to his feet, and ſo growing higher, began to waſh him well favouredly. Wherewith the King abaſhed, and partly alſo afraid, ſtart back, and looking to his Lords; Lo (ſaith he) ye call me ſuch a mighty King, and yet can I not command back this little water to ſtay at my word, but it is ready to drown me. Wherefore all earthly Kings may know, that all their powers be but vain, and that none is worthy to have the name of a King, but he alone which hath all things ſubject to the power and authority of his Word, which is the Lord of Heaven and Earth, the Creator above of all things, the Father of our Chriſt and Lord, who with him for ever is to be glorified: Him let us worſhip and extol for our King for ever. After this (as Hiſtories witneſs) he never ſuffered the Crown to come upon his head, but went to Wincheſter, or (as ſome ſay) to Canterbury; but both thoſe may be true; for his going to Canterbury, was to acknowledge that there was a Lord much higher, and of more power than he himſelf was, and therewithal to render up his Crown for ever. With that, Egelnothus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury informed him of the Image of the Crucifix before mentioned, which diſſolved the matter between married Prieſts and life of Monks, and did many other miracles more, being then at Wincheſter. Wherewith the King, provoked to go to Wincheſter to the Rood, there reſigned up his regal Crown, and made the Rood King over all the Land.

Flatterers and clawbacks about Princes.

Canutus chargeth the Sea to ſtand back, but it would not be.

A leſſon notable for Kings and Princes.

God only the King of all Kings, and Lord of Lords.

The Kings Crown put on a Rood.

Here is alſo to be noted in this Canutus, that although (as is ſaid) he condeſcended in the beginning of his reign upon King Edgars Laws: Yet after in proceſs of time, he ſet forth peculiar Laws of his own. Among which, divers there be that concern as well cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, as alſo temporal. Whereby it may appear, that the government of ſpiritual matters did not depend then of the Biſhop of Rome: But appertained to the lawful authority of the temporal Prince, no leſs than of matters and cauſes temporal. As for example, by theſe ordinances of the aforeſaid Canutus may be well conſidered as here follow: Pecunia ſepulturæ juſtum eſt ut aperta terra reddatur. Si aliquod corpus a ſua parœchia deferatur in aliam, pecunia ſepulturæ, &c. In Engliſh.

Kings of England have as much right in cauſes ſpiritual as temporal.

Certain Laws of King Canutus for the ordering of matters Eccleſiaſtical.

It is meet and right, that in Funerals, money be given for opening the Earth.

If any body, or corſe, be carried from his own Pariſh into another, the money of the burial ſhall pertain by the Law to his own Pariſh Church.

All ordinances and ceremonies of God, let them be obſerved as need in all things requireth.

Upon the Sunday we forbid all publick Fairs or Markets, all Synods, or Conventicles, Huntings, or any ſuch ſecular Actions to be exerciſed, unleſs urgent neceſſity compel thereunto.

Let every Chriſtian man prepare himſelf thrice a year, to approach to the receiving of the Lords body: So to eat the ſame, as not to his Judgment, but to his wholeſome remedy.

If a Miniſter of the Altar do kill any man, or have intangled himſelf in any notorious Crime, let him be deprived both from his Order and Dignity.

Adultereſs women to loſe their Ears and Noſes.

If any married woman (her Husband being alive) have committed adultery, and be proved with the ſame; to her open ſhame in the World, let her have her Noſe and Ears cut off.

Let every widow, after the death of her Husband, ſo remain ſole twelve months; or if ſhe marry, let her loſe her Joynture.

And here is an end of the Daniſh Kings. Now to the Engliſh Kings again, whoſe right line cometh in again in Edward here Following.

King Edward, called the Confeſſor.

FOr ſo much as God of his mercy and providence who is only the maker of heirs, thought it ſo good, after the woful captivity of this Engliſh nation, to grant now ſome reſpite of deliverance, in taking away the Daniſh Kings without any Iſſue left behind them: Who reigning here in England, kept the Engliſh people in miſerable ſubjection, about the ſpace of eight and twenty years, and from their firſt Landing in the time of King Brightricus, waſted and vexed this land the term of 255. years. Now their Tyranny here coming to an end, the next Election and right of the Crown fell (as appertained) to Edward the younger Son of King Egelred and Emma, a meer Engliſhman: Who had been now long baniſhed in Normandy, as is above declared; a man of gentle and ſoft Spirit, more appliable to other mens council, than able to truſt to his own; of nature and condition ſo given from all War and Blood-ſhed, that being in his baniſhment he wiſhed rather to continue all his life long in that private eſtate, than by war or blood-ſhed to aſpire to any Kingdom. This Edward, after the death of Canutus the ſecond, or Hardecanute, being ſent for of the Lords into Normandy, to take poſſeſſion of the Realm, although he ſomething miſtruſted the unconſtant and fickle heads of Engliſhmen (yet having ſufficient Pledges laid for him in Normandy) came over, accompanied with a few Normans, and not long after was Crowned at Wincheſter, in the year 1043. by Edſius then Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And not long after that, he married Goditha, or Edithy, Daughter of Earl Godwin, whom he intreated after ſuch ſort, that he neither put her from his bed, nor yet dealt with her fleſhly. Whether it were for hate of her kin (as moſt like it was) or for love of chaſtity, it remaineth uncertain. But moſt Writers agree, that he continued his life without offence with women; for the which he is highly exalted among our ſtory Writers, and called holy King Edward. After he had thus taken upon him the Government of the Realm, he guided the ſame with much wiſdom and juſtice, the ſpace of four and twenty years, lacking two months; from whom iſſued (as out of a fountain) much godlineſs; mercy, pity, and liberty toward the poor, gentleneſs and juſtice toward all men, and in all honeſt life he gave a vertuous example to his people. He diſcharged the Engliſhmen of the great Tribute called Dane-gilt, which before time was yearly levied to the great Impoveriſhing of the people. He ſubdued the Scots and the Welſhmen, which in their borders began to rebel againſt him. In much peace he continued his Reign, having no forrein Enemy to aſſault him: Albeit, as ſome Chronicles do ſhew, certain Danes and Norgwaines there were, which intended to ſet upon England. But as they were taking ſhipping, there was brought to them firſt one Boul, then another, of Meede or Methe, to drink upon a boun Voyage. Thus one Cup coming after another, after drink came drunkenneſs, after drunkenneſs followed jangling, of jangling came ſtrife, and ſtrife turned unto ſtripes; whereby many were ſlain, and the other returned to their home again. And thus the merciful Providence of the Lord diſpatched that Journey.

King Edward Crowned.

Holy King Edward a virgin in marriage.

Methe in Greek ſignifieth drunkenneſs.

In the time of this Edward, Emma his Mother was accuſed to be familiar with Alwin the Biſhop of Wincheſter: Upon which accuſation (by Council of Earl Godwin) he took from her many of her Jewels, and cauſed her to be kept ſome-deal more ſtrictly in the Abbey of Warwel, and the Biſhop committed to the Examination of the Clergy. Polydor ſaith they were both in Priſon at Wincheſter, where ſhe ſorrowing the defame both of her ſelf and the Biſhop, and truſting upon her conſcience, delireth them of juſtice, offering her ſelf ready to abide any lawful trial, yea, although it were with the ſharpeſt.

Then divers of the Biſhops made labour to the King for them both, and had obtained, had not Robert then Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſtopped the ſuit. Who, not well contented with their labour, ſaid unto them; My brethren, how dare you defend her which is no woman but a beaſt? She hath defamed her own Son the King, and taken her Lecherous Leman the Biſhop. And if it be ſo, that the woman will purge the Prieſt, who ſhall then purge the woman, that is accuſed to be conſenting to the death of her Son Alfred, and procured venom to the poyſoning of her Son Edward? But whether ſhe be guilty or guiltleſs; if ſhe will go barefooted for her ſelf four ſteps, and for the Biſhop five, continually upon nine Plough ſhars fire hot; then if ſhe eſcape harmleſs, he ſhall be abſoyled of this challenge, and ſhe alſo.

Accuſation of the Archbiſhop againſt Emma the Kings mother.

To this ſhe granted: The day was appointed; at which day the King, and a great part of his Nobles were preſent, except only Robert the Archbiſhop. This Robert had been a Monk of a houſe in Normandy, and an helper of the King in his exile, and ſo, by the ſending for of the King, came over and was made firſt Biſhop of London, after Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Then was ſhe led blindfold unto the place between two men, where the Irons lay burning hot, and paſſed the nine ſhares unhurt. At laſt, ſaith the: Good Lord, when ſhall I come to the place of my purgation? When they then opened her eyes, and ſhe ſaw that ſhe was paſt the pain, ſhe kneeled down giving God thanks.

Falſe accuſation purged by hot Iron.

A ſtrange thing if it were true, and without falſe conveyance.

Then the King repented (ſaith the ſtory) and reſtored unto her, that he had before taken from her, and asked her forgiveneſs. But the Archbiſhop fled into Normandy.

Neer about this time, about the tenth year of his Reign, fell paſſing great ſnow from the beginning of January, to the ſeventeenth day of March. After which inſued a great mortality of men, murren of cattel, and by lightning the Corn was wonderfully Blaſted and Waſted.

Great ſnow and mortality in England.

Not long after this, a certain Earl of Bologne, who had married King Edwards Siſter, came into England: Through the occaſion of whom, when execution ſhould be done upon the Citizens of Dover, for a fray between them and the Earls men, variance hapned between King Edward, and Earl Godwin; who perceiving that he could not withſtand the Kings malice (although he gathered great company to work therein what he could) fled into Flanders, and was outlawed with his five Sons. King Edward repudiated his Wife, the Daughter of the ſaid Godwin: But the ſecond year after by mediators, he was reconciled to the King, again and called from baniſhment, and for his good abearing he gave for Pledges his two Sons, Biornon and Toſtius, which were ſent to the Duke of Normandy, there to be kept.

Variance between the King and Godwin.

Godwin with his five Sons outlawed.

Godwin reconciled to the King upon pledges given.

During the time of the Outlawry of Godwin, William Baſtard Duke of Normandy, came with a goodly company into England to ſee King Edward, and was honourably received. To whom the King made great chear, and at his return inriched him with great gifts and pleaſures; and there (as ſome write) made promiſe to him, that if he died without Iſſue, the ſaid William ſhould ſucceed him in the Kingdom of England.

William Duke of Normandy came to England to King Edward.

In this Kings reign lived Marianus Scotus the ſtory writer. As concerning the end of Earl Godwin, the cruel murtherer of Alfred, and of the Normans, although divers Hiſtories diverſly do vary, yet in this the moſt part do agree, that as he ſat at the Table with King Edward at Windſor, it happned one of the Cup-bearers, one of Earl Godwins Sons, to ſtumble and recover again, ſo that he ſhed none of the drink, whereat Godwin laughed; and ſaid, how the one brother had ſuſtained the other. With which words the King calling to mind his brothers death that was ſlain by Godwin, beheld the Earl, ſaying, So ſhould my brother Alfred have holpen me, had not Godwin been. Godwin then, fearing the Kings diſpleaſure to be newly kindled, after many words in excuſing himſelf, ſaid; So might I ſafely ſwallow this Morſel of Bread, as I am guiltleſs of the deed. But as ſoon as he had received the Bread, forthwith he was choked. Then the King commanded him to be drawn from the Table, and ſo was conveyed by Harold his Son to Wincheſter, and there Buried.

Perjury plagued.

About the thirteenth year of this Kings reign, the ſaid King Edward ſent Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter to the Emperor Henricus the fourth, praying him that he would ſend to the King of Hungary, that his Couſin Edward, Son of Edmund Ironſide, might come into England, for ſo much as he intended to make him King after him, which was called Edward Outlaw. The which requeſt was fulfilled, ſo that he came into England with his Wife Agatha, and with his children, to wit, Edgar Adeling, Margaret and Chriſtina. But the year after his return into this Realm, this Edward deceaſed at London, and was buried at Wincheſter, or as Jornalenſis ſaith, at Pauls Church in London. After whoſe deceaſe the King then received Edgar Adeling his Son, as his own child, thinking to make him his heir. But fearing partly the unconſtant mutability of the Engliſhmen, partly the Pride and malice of Harold the Son of Godwin, and of others (perceiving thereby that he could not bring that his purpoſe ſo well to paſs) directed ſolemn Ambaſſadors unto William Duke of Normandy his kinſman, admitting and aſſigning him to be his lawful heir, next to ſucceed after him to the Crown.

The death of Edward, Son of Edmund Ironſide.

William Duke of Normandy admitted heir to the Crown.

After the death of Godwin, Harold his Son waxed ſo in the Kings favour, that he ruled the moſt and greateſt cauſes of the Realm, and was Lieutenant of the Kings Army, who with his brother Toſton or Toſtius (ſent by the King againſt the Welſhmen) ſubdued their rebellion. But afterward, ſuch envy grew between theſe two brethren, for that Toſtius ſaw his brother Harold ſo greatly ad-advanced in the Kings favour, that at Hertford the ſaid Toſtius ſlew all his Brothers men. Whom, when he had cut in pieces, he powdred their quarters and mangled parts in barrels of Salt, Vinegar, Wine, and other Liquors. That done, he made a Power againſt his Brother Harold (being King) with the aid of certain Danes and Norwegians, and fought a battel with him in the North, as after ſhall follow (God willing) to be ſeen. So ungracious were theſe wicked Children of Earl Godwin, that if they had ſeen any fair Manſion or Manor-place, they would ſlay the Owner thereof with all his kindred, and enter the poſſeſſion thereof themſelves.

Ungracious Children of a wicked Father.

At length it came in the mind of this Harold to ſail over the Sea (as Polydor ſaith) unto Normandy, to ſee his Brother Wilnotus, as alſo his couſin Hacus, whom the King had ſent thither to be kept for pledges, as ye heard before. Polydor ſaith, Theſe pledges were Toſto and Biorton; but that cannot be, for Toſtius was then in England. But as Henricus Archdeacon of Huntington ſaith, his Journey was into Flanders, as ſeemeth more like. For it is not to be thought, that Harold, who was a doer in the cruel murther of Alfred, and of the Normans, would venture into Normandy: and therefore more like it is, that his ſailing was into Flanders. But as the ſtory proceedeth, he, being in the courſe of his ſailing, was weather driven by tempeſt into the Province of Pountith, where he was taken as Priſoner, and ſent to Duke William of Normandy, to whom he was made to ſwear, that he in time following ſhould marry his Daughter: and that, after the death of King Edward, he ſhould keep the Land of England to his behoof, according to the will and mind of Edward (after ſome Writers) and ſo to live in great Honour and Dignity next unto him in the Realm. This promiſe faithfully made to the Duke, Harold returneth into England, with his couſin Hacus the Son of his Brother Swanus being delivered unto him. But Wilnotus, Brother of Harold, the Duke keepeth ſtill for performance of the Covenants: Thus Harold, I ſay, returning home, ſheweth the King all that he had done in the foreſaid matters, wherewith the King was well contented. Whereby it may be gathered, that King Edward was right well willing, that Duke William ſhould Reign after him, and alſo it ſeemeth not unlike, but that he had given him his promiſe thereunto before.

A place of Polydor Virgil examined.

Harold taken of the Normans.

Harold promiſeth Duke William to marry his daughter, and to keep the Realm for his behoof.

Among all that were true and truſty to King Edward of the Engliſh Nobility, none had like commendation, as had Leofricus Earl of Mercia and of Cheſter. This Leofricus purchaſed many great Liberties for the Town of Coventry, and made it free of all manner of things, except only of Horſe. Which freedom there was obtained by means of his wife Godina, by riding (as the fame goeth) after a ſtrange manner through the Town. This Leofricus with his wife Godina builded alſo the Abbey of Coventry, and indued the ſame with great Lands and Riches.

You heard a little before of the coming over of Edward called the Outlaw, Son of King Edmund Ironſide, whom King Edward had purpoſed to have made King after him; but ſoon after his coming over, he deceaſed at London. This Edward had by his wife Agatha, a Son and a Daughter called Edgar Adeling, and Margaret. Which Margaret, being afterward married to the King of Scots, was the Mother of Matild or Mawd the Queen of England, and of David King of Scots, &c.

This vertuous and bleſſed King Edward, after he had reigned three and twenty years and ſeven months, died, and was buried in the Monaſtery of Weſtminſter, which he had greatly augmented and repaired: but afterward was more inlarged after this form which it hath now, by Henry the third Son of King John.

They that write the Hiſtory of this King, here make mention of a Dream or Revelation that ſhould be ſhewed to him in time of his ſickneſs: how that becauſe the Peers and Biſhops of the Realm were Servants not of God, but of the Devil, God would give this Realm to the hand of others. And the King deſired utterance to be given him, that he might declare the ſame to the people, whereby they might repent. It was anſwered again, that neither would they ſo do; or yet if they did, it ſhould be given to another people. But becauſe it is a Dream, I let it paſs.

The Laws of King Edward.

Divers Laws were before in divers Countries of this Realm uſed, as the Law firſt of Dunuallo Melmucius, with the Laws of Mercia, called Mercenelaga: then the Laws of Weſt-Saxon Kings, as of Ive, Offa, Alfred, &c. which was called Weſt-Saxenelaga: the third were the Laws of Canutus, and of Danes, called Danelaga. Of all theſe Laws, which before were diverſly in certain particular Countries uſed and received, this Edward compiled one univerſal and common Law for all people through the whole Realm, which were called King Edwards Laws; which Laws being gathered out of the beſt and chieſeſt of the other Laws, were ſo juſt, ſo equal, and ſo ſerving the publick profit and wealth of all Eſtates, that, mine Authors ſay, The people long after did rebel againſt their Heads and Rulers, to have the ſame Laws again (being taken from them) and yet could not obtain them.

Furthermore, I read and find in Matthew Paris, that when William Conqueror at his coming in, did ſwear to uſe and practiſe the ſame good Laws of Edward, for the Common Laws of this Realm: afterward (being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom) he forſwore himſelf, and placed his own Laws in their room, much woſſe and obſcurer than the other were, &c.

Ex Mat. Paris.

William Conqueror ſworn to King Edwards Laws, yet went from it.

Notwithſtanding, among the ſaid Laws of Edward, and in the firſt Chapter and beginning thereof, this I find among the ancient Records of the Guildhall in London; The Office of a King, with ſuch other appurtenances as belong to the Realm of Britain, ſet forth and deſcribed in the Latine ſtile; which I thought here not unmeet to be expreſſed in the Engliſh Tongue, for them that underſtood no Latine. The tenor and meaning whereof thus followeth.

De jure & appendiis regni Britanniæ, & quod ſit officium Regis.

Rex autem, quia vicarius ſummi Regis eſt, ad hoc eſt conſtitutus, ut Regnum terrenum & populum Domini, & ſuper omnia ſanctam ejus veneretur Eccleſiam & regat, & ab injurioſis defendat, & maleficos ab eo avellat & deſtruat, & penitus diſperdat. Quod niſi fecerit, nomen Regis non in eo conſtabit. Verum Papa Johanne teſtante, nomen Regis perdit: cui Pipinus & Carolus filius ejus (nec dum Reges, ſed Principes ſub Rege Francorum ſtulto) ſcripſerunt, quærentes, ſi ita permanere deberent Francorum Reges, ſolo Regio nomine contenti. . A quo reſponſum eſt, illos decet vocare Reges, qui vigilanter defendunt & regunt Eccleſiam Dei populum ejus, &c. In Engliſh thus:

The King, becauſe he is the Vicar of the higheſt King, is appointed for this purpoſe, to Rule the earthly Kingdom, and the Lords people, and above all things to reverence his holy Church, to govern it, and to defend it from Injuries; to pluck away wicked doers, and utterly to deſtroy them. Which unleſs he do, the name of a King agreeth not unto him, but he loſeth the name of a King, as witneſſeth Pope John: to the which Pope, Pipinus and Carolus his Son (being not yet Kings but Princes under the French King, being not very wiſe) did write, demanding this queſtion, whether the Kings of France ought ſo to continue, having but only the name of a King. Unto whom Pope John anſwereth again, that it was convenient to call them Kings, which vigilantly do defend and govern the Church of God and his people, following the ſaying of King David the Pſalmograph, He ſhall not dwell in my houſe which worketh pride, &c.

Ex libro reg. antiquo in prætorio London.

The office of a King deſcribed in the Laws of King Edward.

A King the Vicar of God in earth.

Moreover, the King by right and by his office, ought to defend and conſerve fully and wholly in all amplenеſs, without diminution, all the Lands, Honors, Dignities, Rights and Liberties of the Crown of his Kingdom. And further to reduce into their priſtine ſtate all ſuch things as have been diſperſed, waſted, and loſt, which appertain to his Kingdom. Alſo the whole and univerſal Land, with all Iſlands about the ſame in Norway and Denmark, be appertaining to the Crown of his Kingdom, and be of the appurtenances and dignity of the King, making one Monarchy and one Kingdom, which ſometime was called the Kingdom of Britains, and now the Kingdom of England: ſuch bounds and limits as is aboveſaid be appointed and limited to the name of this Kingdom.

The limits of the Kingdom of England, how far they do extend.

The office of a King further deſcribed.

Moreover, in the foreſaid Laws of this King Edward, it followeth in the ſame Book, where the foreſaid Edward, deſcribing the office of a King, addeth in theſe words, A King, ſaith he, ought above all things to fear God, to love and to obſerve his Commandments, and cauſe them to be obſerved through his whole Kingdom. He ought alſo to keep, cheriſh, maintain, and govern the holy Church within his Kingdom, with all integrity and liberty, according to the Conſtitutions of his Anceſtors and Predeceſſors, and to defend the ſame againſt all Enemies, ſo that God above all things be honoured, and ever be before his eyes. He ought alſo to ſet up good Laws and Cuſtoms, ſuch as be wholeſome and approved: ſuch as be otherwiſe to repeal them, and thruſt them out of his Kingdom. Item, He ought to do Judgment and Juſtice in his Kingdom, by the counſel of the Nobles of his Realm. All theſe things ought a King in his own Perſon to do, taking his Oath upon the Evangeliſt, and the bleſſed Relicks of Saints, ſwearing in the preſence of the whole State of his Realm (as well of the Temporalty as of the Spiritualty) before he be Crowned of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops. Three Servants the King ought to have under him as Vaſſals; fleſhly luſt, avarice, and greedy deſire, whom if he keep under as his Servants and Slaves, he ſhall Reign well and honourably in his Kingdom. All things are to be done with good adviſement and premeditation: and that properly belongeth to a King. For haſty raſhneſs bringeth all things to ruine, according to the ſaying of the Goſpel, Every Kingdom divided in it ſelf ſhall be deſolate, &c.

Three ſlaves and ſervants a King ought to have under his Subjection.

After the duty and office of Princes thus deſcribed, conſequently followeth the inſtitution of Subjects, declared in many good and neceſſary Ordinances very requiſite and convenient for publick Government. Of the which Laws William Conqueror was compelled, through the Clamor of the people, to take ſome, but the moſt part he omitted, contrary to his own Oath at his Coronation, inſerting and placing the moſt of his own Laws in his Language, to ſerve his purpoſe, and which as yet to this preſent day in the Norman Language do remain. Now (the Lord willing) let us proceed in the ſtory as in order followeth.

Harold laſt King of Saxons.

HArold the ſecond Son of Earl Godwin, and laſt King of the Saxons, notwithſtanding that divers of the Nobles went with Edgar Adeling, the next Heir after Edmund Ironſide; yet he through force and might contemning the young age of Edgar, and forgetting alſo his promiſe made to Duke William, took upon him to be King of England, Anno 1066. When Harold Harefagar, Son of Canutus, King of Norway and Denmark, heard of the death of King Edward, he came into England with three hundred Ships or more: who then joyning with Toſtius, Brother to the ſaid Harold King of England, entred into the North parts, and claimed the Land after the death of Edward. But the Lords of the Country aroſe, and gave them battel, notwithſtanding the Danes had the Victory. And therefore Harold King of England prepared toward them in all haſt, and gave them another ſtrong battel, and there had the Victory, where alſo Harold the Dane was ſlain by the hand of Harold King of England; and Toſtius was alſo ſlain in the battel. After this Victory, Harold waxed proud and covetous, and would not divide the prey to his Knights that had deſerved it, but kept it to himſelf; whereby he loſt the favour of many of his Knights and people.

Harold King of Denmark, and Toſtius ſlain.

In this mean time, William, Duke of Normandy, ſent Ambaſſage to Harold, King of England, admoniſhing him of the Covenants that were agreed between them: which was, to have kept the Land to his uſe after the death of Edward. But becauſe that the Daughter of Duke William (that was promiſed to Harold) was dead, Harold thought him thereby diſcharged, and ſaid, That ſuch a nice fooliſh Promiſe ought not to be holden (concerning anothers land) without the conſent of the Lords of the ſame: and eſpecially for that he was thereunto for need or for dread compelled.

The Pope ſendeth a Banner to Duke William upon boun Voyage into England.

Upon theſe Anſwers received, Duke William, in the mean while that the Meſſengers went and came, gathered his Knights, and prepared his Navy, and had the aſſent of the Lords of his Land to aid and aſſiſt him in his journey. And over that ſending unto Rome to Pope Alexander, concerning his Title and Voyage into England, the Pope confirmeth him to the ſame, and ſent unto him a Banner, willing him to bear it in the Ship, wherein himſelf ſhould ſail. Thus Duke William being provided of all things concerning his journey, ſped him to the Sea-ſide and took ſhipping at the Haven of S. Valery, where he tarried a long time ere he might have a convenient Wind, for the which his Souldiers murmured, ſaying, It was a woodneſs, and a thing diſpleaſing God, to deſire to have another mans Kingdom by ſtrength; and namely, when God was againſt it in ſending contrary Wind, &c. At the laſt, the Wind ſhortly after came about, and they took ſhipping with a great Company, and landed at Haſtings in Suſſex.

Duke William landeth at Hastings.

For three Cauſes Duke William entred this Land to ſlay King Harold. One was, for that it was to him given by King Edward his Nephew. The ſecond was to take wreke for the cruel murther of his Nephew Alfred, King Edward's Brother, and of the Normans, which deed he aſcribed chiefly to Harold. The third was to revenge the wrong done to Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which was exiled by the means and labour of Harold, in the time of King Edward.

The cauſe why Duke William entred England.

Thus, while Harold was in the North, Duke William made ſo great ſpeed, that he came to London before the King; out of which he was holden, till he made good ſurety, that he and his people ſhould paſs through the City without tarrying: which promiſe he well obſerving, paſſed the Bridge, and went over to Suſſex, from whence he ſent a Monk unto Harold, and profered him three manner of ways. Firſt, either to render to him the poſſeſſion of the Land, and ſo to take it again of him under Tribute, reigning under him; Secondly, or elſe to abide and ſtand to the Popes arbitrement betwixt them both; or Thirdly, to defend this quarrel in his own Perſon againſt the Duke, and they two only to try the matter by dint of Sword, without any other blood-ſhedding.

Three conditions offered to Harold by Duke William.

But Harold refuſed all theſe Offers, ſaying, It ſhould be tried by dint of Swords, and not by one Sword: and ſo gathered his people and joyned battel with the Normans, in the place where afterward was builded the Abbey of Battel in Suſſex. In the beginning of which fight, the Engliſhmen kept them in good Array like to vanquiſh the Normans: wherefore Duke William cauſed his men to give back, as though they fled, whereby the Engliſhmen followed faſt, and broke their Array. Then the Normans, fiercely giving a Charge upon them, in concluſion obtained the Victory through the juſt providence of God. Where King Harold, who before had murthered Alfred the true Heir of the Crown, with his Company of Normans ſo cruelly, was now wounded of the Normans in the left eye with an Arrow, and thereof incontinent died: although Gerardus ſaith he fled away to Cheſter, and lived after that a Monk in the Monaſtery of S. James. Which is not like, but rather that he was there ſlain after that he reigned nine months, and was buried at Waltham (which proveth that he died not at Cheſter) and ſo was he the laſt that reigned in England of the blood of Saxons, the which continued (to reckon from Hengiſtus his firſt Reign in Kent) by the ſpace of 591 years, and if it be reckoned from the years of the Weſt-Saxons, then it indureth the ſpace of 565 years.

The fight betwixt Harold and Duke William.

King Harold ſlain.

This Duke William and King Edward were by the Fathers ſide couſin germans removed. For Richard the firſt of that name, which was the third Duke of Normandy after Rollo, was Father to Duke Richard the ſecond of that name, and Brother to Emma Mother to King Edward. Which Duke Richard the ſecond was Father to Duke Robert, this Duke Williams Father.

The conſanguinity betwixt King Edward and William the Conqueror.

Albeit in this matter other ſome may gather otherwiſe and better, perchance; yet if I may ſay what I think, verily I ſuppoſe, that there is no Conſanguinity ſo much the cauſe, why God of his unknown Judgments ſuffered the Normans here to prevail, as was rather the cruel murther of Alfred and of the innocent Normans, wrought by the cruel deſpight of Harold and the Engliſhmen, as is before declared. The which mercileſs murther, God here juſtly in this Conqueſt recompenced.

Murther juſtly recompenſed.

Now it remaineth alſo, to theſe foreign Affairs of Kings and Princes, to add ſomething likewiſe concerning the con-continuation of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, beginning there where we laſt left: that is, with Elphegus, whom we declared a little before to be ſtoned by the Danes at Greenwich. After which Elphegus, next ſucceeded Liningus, after him Egelnothus alſo above mentioned. Then Robertus a Norman, a great doer (as is declared) about King Edward, and a faithful Counſellor unto him; but he abode not long. After whom Stigandus invaded the See (as they report) by Symony, being both Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and alſo Abbot in another place, wherein he continued a great ſpace, gathering and heaping goods together; till at length Duke William clapt him in priſon, and there kept him, placing in his room Lanfrancus a Lombard born, of whom more ſhall follow (Chriſt willing) hereafter to be declared.

Liningus, Egelnothus, Robertus, Stigandus.

The decay of the Church.

¶ Although the Church of Chriſt and ſtate of Religion, firſt founded and grounded by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, did not continually altogether remain in his primitive Perfection, wherein it was firſt inſtituted; but in proceſs of time began from better to worſe, to decreaſe and decline into much ſuperſtition and inconveniency; partly through the coming in of Mahomet, partly through the increaſe of wealth and riches, partly through the decreaſe of knowledge and diligence in ſuch as ſhould be the Guids of Chriſts Flock: yet the infection and corruption of that time (though it were great) did not ſo abound in ſuch exceſſive meaſure as afterward in the other later times now following, about the thouſand years expired after Chriſt, whereof we have to intreat, Chriſt ſo permitting. About which time and year came Sylveſter, the ſecond of that name, who next ſucceeded after Gregory the fifth before mentioned; and occupied the See of Rome about the year of our Lord, 1000. lacking one or two.

Pope Sylveſter the ſecond.

Sylveſter the ſecond a foul Sorcerer.

This Sylveſter was a Sorcerer, which after the ſort of them that work by Familiars (as they call them) and by Conjuration, compacted with the Devil to be made Pope. And ſo he was (through the operation of Satan) according to his requeſt. Which things ſome Hiſtories ſay, he did greatly repent before his death. But for a more ample declaration hereof, I will bring in the words of Johannes Stella, a Venetian, tranſlated from Latine into Engliſh, concerning the ſaid Sylveſter; to the intent that our Inchanters and Sorcerers now adays (whereof there be too many in England) may the better through his example be admoniſhed. The words of Stella be theſe, agreeing alſo with the Narration of Benno, Platina, and many others. Sylveſter, the ſecond of that name, being Pope, and a Frenchman, called Gilbertus, ſate in his Papacy four years, one month, and eight days. He entred into his Papacy through wicked and unlawful means: who from his youth being a Monk, and leaving his Monaſtery, gave himſelf wholly to the Devil, to obtain that which he required. And firſt coming to Hiſpalis a City in Spain; there he applied his Book and profited alſo, inſomuch that he was made Doctor, having amongſt his Auditors, Otho the Emperors Son, and Robert the French King, Lotharius Archbiſhop of Senon, with divers other more. By whoſe advancement he was promoted, firſt Biſhop of Rheme, afterward Biſhop of Ravenna, and at laſt, through the operation of Satan, was exalted to the Papacy of Rome; upon this condition, that after his death, he ſhould give himſelf to the Devil, by whoſe procurement he came to that promotion. Upon a certain time he demanded an Anſwer of the Devil, how long he ſhould injoy his Popedom. To whom he anſwered again, Until thou ſay Maſs in Jeruſalem thou ſhalt live. At length the fourth year of his Popedom, ſaying Maſs at Lent time in the Temple of the holy Croſs, being called then Jeruſalem, there he knew the time was come when he ſhould die. Whereupon being ſtruck with Repentance, he confeſſed his fault openly before the people, deſiring them to cut his body all in pieces (being ſo ſeduced by deceits of the Devil) and ſo being hewn in pieces, that they would lay it upon a Cart, and bury it there whereſoever the Horſes would carry it of their accord. And ſo the ſaying is, That by the Providence of God (whereby the wicked may learn, that there is yet hope of remiſſion with God, ſo that they will repent them in their life) the Horſes of their own accord ſtayed at the Church of Lateran, and there he was buried: where commonly by the ratling of his bones within the Tomb, is portended the death of Popes, as the common report goeth. Thus much out of Johannes Stella concerning Sylveſter. By whom our Sorcerers and Inchanters, or Magicians may learn to beware of the deceitful operation of Satan, who at the end deceiveth and fruſtrateth all them that have to do with him: as the end of all ſuch doth declare commonly, which uſe the like art or trade. The Lord and God of all mercy, through the Spirit of Jeſus our Redeemer, diſſolve the works of Satan, and preſerve the hearts of our Nobles, and all other Engliſhmen from ſuch Infection. Amen.

Ex Johan. Stella.

An admonition for Sorcerers and wicked Conjurers.

After Sylveſter, ſucceeded John the nineteenth, by whom was brought in (as Volateran ſaith) the Feaſt of All Souls in the year 1004. through the means and inſtigation of one Odilo, Abbot of Cluniake, to be celebrate next after the Feaſt of All Saints. This Monk Odilo, thinking that Purgatory (as he heard) ſhould be in the Mount Aetna, dreamed upon a time, in the Country of Sicil, that he by his Maſſes, had delivered divers Souls from thence: ſaying moreover, That he did hear the voyces and lamentations of Devils, crying out for that the Souls were taken from them by the Maſſes and Dirges Funeral, Ex Bakenthorpo. in prolo. 4. lib. ſentent. And not long after him, came John the twentieth, and Sergius the fourth. After whom ſucceeded Benedictus the eighth; then John the one and twentieth, who being promoted by Art Magick, of Theophylact his Nephew, Gratianus, Brazutus, and other Sorcerers, brought in firſt the Faſt of the even of John Baptiſt and Saint Lawrence. After him followed Pope Benedictus the ninth, likewiſe aſpiring to his Papacy by like Magick, practiſing Inchantments and Conjuration in Woods, after an horrible manner; who reſiſting the Emperor Henricus the third, Son to Conradus, and placing in his room Petrus the King of Hungary with this verſe,

The Feaſt of All Souls brought in to the Church.

Benedictus the ninth.

Petra dedit Romam Petro, tibi Papa coronam.

Afterward, for fear of Henricus prevailing in battel, he was fain to ſell his Seat to his Succeſſor, Gratianus, called Gregorius the ſixth, for 1500 l. At which time were three Popes together in Rome, reigning and raging one againſt another; Benedictus the ninth, Sylveſter the third, and Gregorius the ſixth. For the which cauſe Henricus, ſirnamed Niger, the Emperor coming to Rome, diſplaced theſe three Monſters at one time, placing for them Clement the ſecond, and thereupon inacting that there ſhould no Biſhop of Rome henceforth be choſen, but by the conſent and confirmation of the Emperor. Which Conſtitution, though it was both agreeable, and alſo neceſſary for publick tranquility of that City, yet the Cardinals would not ſuffer it long to ſtand, but did impugne it afterward by ſubtil practice and open violence, as in proceſs (the Lord permitting) ſhall appear in the time of Henricus the fourth and the fifth. In the time of this Clement, the Romans made an Oath to the Emperor, concerning the election of the Biſhops, themſelves to intermeddle no further therein, but as the aſſent of the Emperor ſhould go withall. Howbeit the Emperor departing thence into Germany again, by and by they forgat their Oath, and within nine months after, poiſoned the Biſhop. Which fact, ſome impute to Stephen his Succeſſor, called Damaſus the ſecond. Some impute it to Brazutus, who (as Hiſtories record) within 13 years poiſoned ſix Popes; that is, Clement the ſecond, Damaſus the ſecond, Leo the ninth, Victor the ſecond, Stephanus the ninth, Nicholaus the ſecond.

Gregorius the ſixth.

A conſtitution that no Pope ſhould be choſen, but by the confirmation of the Emperor.

Pope Clement the ſecond.

Thus Clement being poiſoned, after him ſucceeded Damaſus the ſecond, neither by conſent of the people, nor of the Emperor elected, but by force and invaſion, who alſo within 23 days being poiſoned, in the year 1049. much contention and ſtriving began in Rome about the Papal ſeat. Whereupon the Romans through the counſel of the Cardinal ſent to the foreſaid Emperor, deſiring to give them a Biſhop; and ſo he did, whoſe name was Bruno, an Alman, and Biſhop of Cullen, afterward called Leo the ninth. This Bruno being a ſimple man, and eaſie to be led with evil counſel, coming from the Emperor towards Rome in his pontifical Apparel like a Pope; there meeteth him by the way, the Abbot of Cluniack, and Hildebrand a Monk, who, ſeeing him ſo in his Pontificalibus, began to rate him, laying to his charge, that he would ſo take his authority of the Emperor, and not rather of the Clergy of Rome, and the people thereof, as other his Predeceſſors were wont to do: and ſo counſelled him to lay down that Apparel, and to enter in with his own habit, till he had his Election by them. Bruno following their counſel, and confeſſing his fault before the Clergy of Rome, obtained their favour, and ſo was nominate Leo the ninth, whereby Hildebrand was made a Cardinal, and put in high room. Under this Pope Leo, were two Councils; one kept at Verſailis, where the Doctrine of Berengarius againſt the real preſence in the Sacrament was firſt condemned, although Berengarius yet recanted not, which nevertheleſs was done after in the Council of Lateran, under Nicholas the ſecond, in the year 1060. The other was kept at Moguntia, where amongſt many other Decrees it was inacted, That Prieſts ſhould be excluded and debarred utterly from marriage. Item, that no lay-man might give Benefice or Biſhoprick, or any Spiritual Promotion, &c.

Pope Leo the ninth.

Concilium Moguntinum. Nauclerus Cranz.

This Leo, being at Wormes with the Emperor upon Chriſtmas-day, did Excommunicate the Sub-deacon; becauſe in reading the Epiſtle, he did it not in the Roman tune, he being there preſent. The Archbiſhop, moved therewith, departed from the Altar (being then at Maſs) ſaying, He would not proceed any further in his Service, unleſs his Sub-deacon were reſtored, whereupon the Pope commandeth him to be releaſed, and ſo they went forward in their Service.

Alb. Cranz. Saxo. lib. 4. cap. 45.

After the death of Leo, whom Brazutus poiſoned the firſt year of his Popedom, Theophylactus did ſtrive to be Pope: but Hildebrand, to defeat him, went to the Emperor (partly alſo being ſent by the Romans for fear of the Emperors diſpleaſure) who aſſigned another Biſhop, a German, called Victor the ſecond. This Victor, having a Council at Florence, depoſed divers Biſhops and Prieſts for Simony and Fornication: for Simony, in that they took of ſecular men their Dignities for money; for Fornication, in that, contrary to their Canon, they were married, &c. The ſecond year of his Papacy, and little more, this Pope alſo followed his Predeceſſors, being poiſoned by the foreſaid Brazutus, through the procurement of Hildebrand and his Maſter.

Concilium Florentinum.

Here now began the Church and Clergy of Rome to wring out of the Emperors hand the Election of the Pope: electing Stephen the ninth for Pope, contrary to their Oath, and to the Emperors aſſignment. Here was the Church of Millan firſt brought to Obedience of the Romiſh Church, by this Stephanus the ninth Biſhop of Rome; who alſo ſhamed not to accuſe the Emperor Henry (of whom mention is made before) of Hereſie, for miniſhing the Authority of the Roman See. So this was their Hereſie at that time, not to maintain the ambitious Proceedings of the Romiſh Prelate. And Simony they called this, to take and injoy any Spiritual Living at a ſecular mans hand. Wherefore Stephen hearing this Simony to reign in divers places, namely, in the Churches of Burgundy and Italy, ſent forth the Cardinal Hildebrand to reform the matter, who was no leſs earneſt in that kind of Commiſſion to help the matter forward.

Pope Stephen the ninth.

The Church of Millan firſt brought under the Church of Rome.

The Emperor accuſed of Hereſie.

Hildebrand ſent in Commiſſion for Simony.

Hildebrand beginneth to ſtir.

In the mean time Stephanus the Pope taſting of Brazutus Cup fell ſick. Hildebrand, hearing that, applieth home, with all poſt ſpeed. So being returned to Rome, he aſſembleth all the Companies and Orders of the Clergy together, making them to ſwear that they ſhould admit none to be Biſhop, but which ſhould be appointed by the publick conſent of them all together. This being done, Hildebrand taketh his journey into Florence, belike to fetch the Biſhop of Florence, to ſtall him Biſhop; the Clergy ſwearing unto him that no Biſhop ſhould be ordained before his return again. But the people of Rome not ſuffering the Election to ſtand ſo long, after the death of Stephen, elected one of their own City, called Benedictus the tenth. Hildebrand, hearing of this, was not a little offended: wherefore returning to Rome with one Garhardus Biſhop of Florence, he cauſed the Clergy to proceed to a new Election, ſaying, That Benedictus was not lawfully called, but came in by force and bribing. But the Clergy not daring to attempt any new Election at Rome, went to Sene, and there elected this Garhardus Biſhop of Florence, whom Hildebrand brought with him. So were two Popes in Rome together: But Garhardus, named Nicholas the ſecond, holding a Council at Sutrium, through the help of Duke Godfrid and Guibert, and other Biſhops about Italy, cauſed the other Pope to be depoſed. Benedictus underſtanding them to be ſet againſt him through the means of Hildebrand, unpoped himſelf, and went to Velitras; living there more quietly than he ſhould have done at Rome.

Hildebrand beginneth to ſtir.

Pope Benedictus the tenth.

Pope Nicholas the ſecond.

Two Popes together at Rome.

Pope Benet unpoped himſelf.

Here is to be touched by the way the error of the gloſs upon the three and twentieth Diſtinction, which falſely alledgeth out of the Chronicles, that Benedictus the tenth, which ſucceeded Stephen, was depoſed: after whom came Johannes Biſhop of Sabinecor money, and he again depoſed. Benedictus was then reſtored, and after diſplaced again, and then Johannes Archdeacon Ad portam latinam, was made Pope, and he again depoſed by the Emperor, and all in one year. Which ſtory neither is found in any Chronicle, nor agreeth to any Benedictus, ſave only that Benedictus the ninth, which was depoſed, and then reigned three Popes together: Benedictus the ninth, Sylveſtus the third, and Gregorius the ſixth, which before was called Johannes ad portam latinam (whom the Emperor depoſed) all three together. But that Benedict neither was the tenth, neither did he ſucceed Pope Stephen, as the gloſs recordeth. Nicholas thus being ſet up without the mind both of the Emperor and of the people of Rome, after his fellow Pope was driven away, brake up the Synod of Sutrium, and came to Rome, where he aſſembled another Council, called Concilium Lateranum. In which Council firſt was promulgate the terrible ſentence of Excommunication mentioned in the Decrees, and beginneth, In nomine Domini noſtri, &c. The effect whereof is this: Firſt, that he after a ſubtil practiſe (as far and as plainly as he durſt ſpeak) undermineth the Emperors Juriſdiction, and transferreth to a few Cardinals, and certain Catholick Perſons, the full Authority of chuſing the Pope. Secondly, againſt all ſuch as do creep into the Seat of Peter by money or favour, without the full conſent of the Cardinals, he thundereth with terrible blaſts of Excommunication, accurſing them and their Children with Devils, as wicked perſons, to the anger of Almighty God, giving alſo Authority and Power to Cardinals, with the Clergy and Laity, to depoſe all ſuch Perſons and call a Council-General, whereſoever they will againſt them.

The gloſs of the Popes Decrees refuted.

Concilium Lateranum. { Anno 1059. } Diſt. 23 cap. Inno.

A terrible Curſe of Nicholas.

Item, in the ſaid Council of Laterane, under Pope Nicholas the ſecond, Berengarius Andegavenſis, an Archdeacon, was driven to the recantation of his Doctrine, denying the real ſubſtance of Chriſts holy body and blood to be in the Sacrament, otherwiſe than Sacramentally and in myſtery.

Berengarius driven to recantations.

In the ſame Council alſo was hatched and invented the new found deviſe and term of Tranſubſtantiation.

Tranſubſtantiation brought into the Church.

It were too long here to declare the Confederation betwixt this Nicholas and Robertus Guiſcardus, whom this Pope (contrary to all right and good Law, diſplacing the right Heir) made Duke of Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and Captain-General of S. Peters lands: that through his force of arms and violence he might the better ſubdue all ſuch as ſhould rebel to his Obedience, and ſo did. Now let all men, which be godly wiſe, judge and underſtand how this ſtandeth with the Doctrine of Chriſt, the example of Peter, or the ſpirit of a Chriſtian Biſhop, by outward arms and violence to conquer Chriſtian men and Countries, under the Obedience of a Biſhops See. Thus Pope Nicholas the ſecond, well anſwering to his Greek name, by might and force continued three years and an half. But at length he met with Brazutus Cup, and ſo turned up his heels.

Nauclerus, Platina. Eneas Sil.

Potentia Papæ coalitus ſtandeth not with the Goſpel.

{ Anno 1062. }

At the beginning of this Nicholas, or ſomewhat before, about the year of our Lord, 1057. Henry the fourth, after the deceaſe of Henry the third, was made Emperor, being but a Child, and reigned fifty years: but not without great moleſtation and much diſquietneſs, and all through the ungracious wickedneſs of Hildebrand, as hereafter (the Lord ſo permitting) ſhall be declared.

Henricus the fourth, Emperor.

Here by the way cometh to be noted an example, whereby all Princes may learn and underſtand how the Pope is to be handled, whoſoever looketh to have any goodneſs at his hand. If a man ſtand in fear of his curſe, he ſhall be made his ſlave; but if he be depiſed of you, you ſhall have him as you luſt. For the Popes curſe may well be aſſimiled to Domitians thunder: If a man give ear to the noiſe and crack, it ſeemeth a terrible thing; but if you conſider the cauſes and effect thereof, it is a moſt vain ridicle.

The Popes Curſe compared to Domitians thunder.

In

Aldredus Archbiſhop of York.

In the Reign of this Nicholas, in the year, 1060. Aldredus Biſhop of Worceſter, after the deceaſe of Kinſius his Predeceſſor, ſhould be made Archbiſhop of York; who coming to Rome with Toſtius Earl of Northumberland for his Pall (as the manner was) could not obtain it, but was deprived of all his Dignity, for ſome default (I cannot tell what) in his anſwer; and furthermore, after his reverſion home, was ſpoiled alſo of all that he brought with him. Whereupon, he returning again to Rome with Toſtius the foreſaid Earl, there made his Complaint, but could not be heard: till Toſtius, a man of ſtout courage, taking the matter in hand, told the Pope to his face, That his Curſe was not to be feared in far Countries, which his own Neighbours, yea and moſt vile Vagabonds derided and deſpiſed at home. Wherefore he required the Pope, either to reſtore Aldredus again to his goods loſt, or elſe it ſhould be known that they were loſt, through his means and ſubtilty. And furthermore it would come to paſs that the King of England hearing this would debar him of S. Peters Tribute, taking it for a great ſhame to him and his Realm, if Aldredus ſhould come from Rome both deprived of Dignity, and ſpoiled alſo of his goods, &c. In fine, the Pope thus perſwaded by the argument of his purſe, was content to ſend home Aldredus with his Pall, according to his requeſt.

How Toſtius perſwaded the Pope.

Cadolus a Lombard made Pope by the Emperor.

After the death of Nicholas, the Lombards being oppreſſed before by Pope Nicholas, and brought under fear, were the more deſirous, and thought it good to have a Biſhop of their Company, and ſo elected the Biſhop of Parmen, called Cadolus, to be Pope: ſending to the Emperor, and deſiring his favour and ſupportation therein, for the Election of the Pope (ſaid they) moſt properly appertained unto him.

Pope Alexander the ſecond. Two battels betwixt two Popes for S. Peters Seat.

The Emperor, well pleaſed and content, giveth his good leave and voice withall. Hildebrand, no leſs a wicked Necromancer than a ſtout Maintainer of Popiſh Liberties againſt good Emperors, hearing this, ſetteth up by a contrary Faction another Biſhop, Anſelmus, after called Alexander the Second. Cadolus, thus elected by the Emperor and the Cardinals, ſetteth forward to Rome with a ſufficient Army and ſtrength of men. Alexander alſo, no leſs prepared, there received him with another Army, where they had a great Conflict, and many ſlain on both ſides. But Cadolus as he had the better cauſe, ſo he had the worſe fortune: who being repelled, yet repaired himſelf and came again with a greater Power: albeit he prevailed not. The Emperor ſeeing this hurly burley, to take up the matter, ſent thither his Ambaſſador Otho Archbiſhop of Cullen: who coming to Rome, beginneth ſharply to chide the Pope for taking ſo upon him without the leave or knowledge of the Emperor, declaring how the Election of that See ought chiefly to appertain to the right of the Emperor, as it hath done for the moſt part in the time of his Predeceſſors before. But Hildebrand all ſet on wickedneſs and ambition, and alſo puft up not a little with his late Victories, not ſuffering the Ambaſſador to tell to the end, interrupted him in the middle of his tale; affirming, that if they ſhould ſtand to Law and Cuſtom, the Liberty of that Election ſhould rather belong to the Clergy than to the Emperor. To make ſhort, Otho the Ambaſſor bearing (belike) more with the Clergy than with the Emperor, was content to be perſwaded, only required this in the Emperors Name, a Council to be had, to decide the matter, whereat the Emperor ſhould be preſent himſelf; and ſo he was. In the which Council being kept at Mantua, Alexander was declared Pope, the other had his pardon granted. In this Council, amongſt many other conſiderations, it was concluded concerning Prieſts, That they ſhould have no Wives: ſuch as have Concubines to ſay no Maſs: Prieſts Children not to be ſecluded from holy Orders: no Benefices to be bought for money: Alleluja to be ſuſpended in time of Lent out of the Church, &c. This alſo was decreed (which made moſt for Hildebrands purpoſe) that no ſpiritual man, whatſoever he be, ſhould enter into any Church, by a ſecular Perſon, and that the Pope ſhould be elected only by the Cardinals, &c. Benno Cardinalis writeth thus of Alexander, that after he perceived the frauds of Hildebrand, and of other the Emperors Enemies, and underſtanding that he was ſet up and inthroniſed but only for a purpoſe; being at his Maſs, as he was preaching to the people, told them he would not ſit in the place, unleſs he had the Licence of the Emperor. Which when Hildebrand heard, he was ſtricken in ſuch a fury, that ſcarcely he could keep his hands off him, while Maſs was done. After the Maſs being finiſhed, by force of Souldiers and ſtrength of men he had him into a Chamber, and there all to be pommild Pope Alexander with his fiſts, rating and rebuking him for that he would ſeek for favour of the Emperor. Thus Alexander being kept up in cuſtody, and being ſtinted to a certain allowance, as about five grotes a day, Hilderand incroacheth all the whole Revenues of the Church to himſelf, procuring thereby much treaſure. At length Alexander, under the miſerable indurance of Hildebrand, died at eventide after eleven years and a half of his Popedom. And thus much of Romiſh matters.

Theſe things thus diſcourſed concerning the matters of Rome; now returning again to our own Country ſtory, the order thereof would require to enter again into the Reign of William Conqueror, the next King following in England. But as a certain Oration of King Edgars, which ſhould have been placed before, chanced in the mean time to come to my hands, not unworthy to be read: I thought by the way in the end of this Book to inſert the ſame (although out of order) yet better I judge it out of order, than out of the Book.

The Oration of King Edgar to the Clergy.

BEcauſe GOD hath ſhewed his great Mercy to work with us, it is meet (moſt reverend Fathers) that with worthy Works we ſhould anſwer his innumerable Benefits. For we poſſeſs not the Land by our own Sword, Pſal. 43. and our own Arm hath not ſaved us: but his right Hand and his holy Arm, becauſe he hath been delighted in us. Therefore it is meet that we ſhould ſubmit both our ſelves and our Souls to him, that hath ſubjected all theſe things under our Government: and we ought ſtoutly to labour, that they, whom he hath made ſubject to us, might be ſubject to his Laws. It belongs to me to Rule the Laypeople with the Law of Equity, to do juſt Judgment betweem a Man and his Neighbour, to puniſh Church-Robbers, to hold under Rebels, to deliver the helpleſs from the hand of the ſtronger, the needy alſo and the poor from them that rob them. It belongs alſo to my care to provide neceſſary things to the Miniſters of the Churches, to the flocks of the Monks, to the Company of Virgins, and to provide for their peace and quiet. The examining of all whoſe manners belongeth unto us; whether they live chaſtly, if they behave themſelves honeſtly toward them that be without, whether they be diligent at Gods Service, if they be earneſt to teach the people, if they be ſober in eating and drinking, if they keep meaſure in Apparel, and if they be diſcreet in judgment. If ye had regarded theſe things with a trial of them (O reverend Fathers, by your leaves I ſpeak) ſuch horrible and abominable things of the Clerks ſhould not have come unto our ears. I omit to ſpeak how their crown is not broad, nor their rounding convenient: the wantonneſs in your life, your pride in your geſture, the filthineſs in your words do declare the evil of the inward man.

Furthermore, what negligence is in Gods Service, whence ſcarce they will be preſent at the holy Vigils? And when they come to Maſs, they ſeem rather to be gathered to play and laugh than to ſing. I will tell that, that good men be ſorry for, and the evil laugh at. I will ſpeak with ſorrow (if ſo be I may expreſs it) how they be riotous in Banquetings, in Chambering, Drunkenneſs and Unſhamefac'dneſs: that now Clerks houſes may be thought to be a Stews of Harlots, and a Covent of Players. There be Dice, there is Dancing and Singing, there is watching to Midnight, with crying and ſhouting. Thus the Goods of Kings, the Alms of Princes, yea (and that is more) the price of that precious blood is not eſteemed. Have our Fathers then ſpent their Treaſure for this purpoſe? Have the Kings Coffers decayed by taking away many Revenues, for this cauſe? Hath the Kings Liberality given Lands and Poſſeſſions to Chriſts Churches for this intent, that Clerks Harlots ſhould be decked with the ſame? that riotous Feaſts might be dreſſed? that Hounds and Hawks and ſuch other toys might be gotten? The Souldiers cry

Let the relicks of holy Saints, which they deſpiſe, and the holy Altars before which they play the mad-men, move you. Let the great devotion of our Anceſtors move you, whoſe Alms the madneſs of the Clerks doth abuſe. My great Grandfather (as ye know) gave the tenth part of all his Lands to Churches and Abbies. My great great Grandfather,* Alfredus of holy memory, thought it not meet to ſpare his Treaſures, his Goods, nor Coſts, nor Rents that he might inrich the Church. My Grandfather the elder, Edward, your Fatherhood is not ignorant how great things he gave to the Churches. It becometh you to remember with what Gifts my Father and his Brothers did inrich Chriſts Altars. O Father of Fathers, Dunſtan, behold (I pray thee) the eyes of my Father looking on thee, from that bright place of Heaven: hearken to his complaining words ſounding in thine ears, thus pitifully lamenting, O Father Dunſtan, thou, thou (I ſay) gaveſt me counſel to build Abbies and Churches, thou wait my Helper and Fellow-worker in all things: I choſe thee as a Shepherd and Biſhop of my Soul, and a Keeper of my Manners. When did I not obey thee? What Treaſures did I prefer in reſpect of thy counſels? What Poſſeſſions did I not deſpiſe, if thou baddeſt me? If thou thoughteſt meet to give any thing to the poor, I was ready. If thou thougheſt meet to give any thing to Churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedſt that Monks or Clerks wanted any thing, I ſupplied. Thou ſaidſt that Alms laſted for ever, and that there was none more fruitful than that which was given to Abbies or Churches. For with that both Gods Servants are ſuſtained, and that which remaineth is given to the Poor. O worthy Alms! O worthy price of the Soul! O wholſome remedy for our ſins, which now doth ſtink in the ſweet Furrs of Prieſts Lemmans, wherewith they adorn their Ears and deck their Fingers, apparelling their delicate Bodies with ſilk and Purple! O Father, is this the fruit of my Alms, is this the effect of my deſire, and of thy promiſe? What wilt thou anſwer to this complaint of my Fathers? I know, I know: When thou didſt ſee a Thief, thou runneſt not with him, neither haſt thou put thy portion with Adulterers. Thou haſt rebuked, thou haſt exhorted, thou haſt blamed them: but words have been deſpiſed; now we muſt come to ſtripes of Correction. Thou haſt here with thee, the Worſhipful Father Edward Biſhop of Wincheſter. Thou haſt the Reverend Prelate Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter. I commit this buſineſs to you, that both by Biſhoply Correction, and the Kings Authority, the filthy Livers may be caſt out of the Churches, and they that live orderly may be brought in, &c.

The ignorance and ſuperſtition of the time of King Edgar noted.

In this Oration of King Edgar above prefixed three things are chiefly to be noted and conſidered of them that have judgment to mark and underſtand, to wit, The religious zeal and devotion of Kings, both in giving to the Church, and alſo in correcting the manners of Churchmen. Secondly, the diſſolute behaviour and wantonneſs of the Clergy, then abuſing the great Donations and Patrimonies of Princes beſtowed upon them. Thirdly, the blind Ignorance and Superſtition of that time in both States, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal, in eſteeming Chriſts Religion chiefly to conſiſt in giving to Churches, and in maintaining of Monkery; being falſely perſwaded that remiſſion of their Sins, and remedy of their Souls therein, did lie in building Monaſteries, erecting Churches and Cloyſters, and in placing Monks in the ſame, and ſuch other Alms-deeds, and Works of devotion. Wherein appeareth how ignorant that time was of the true Doctrine of Chriſts Faith, and of free Grace of the Goſpel, which promiſeth life, remedy, and juſtification, not by any devout Merits of ours, nor by any Works either of the Law of God, or of the Inventions of man, but only and freely by our Faith in Chriſt Jeſus the Son of God, in whom only conſiſteth all the Promiſes of God. Amen.

The Doctrine of Juſtification unknown.

Juſtification by Faith in Chriſt.

Now remaineth as in the former Book before, ſo in this likewiſe, to proſecute the Order and Race of Archbiſhops of Canterbury, as we have done the Race of Kings, beginning with Ethelredus, who ſucceeded next after Celnooke, the ſeventeenth Archbiſhop of that See, mentioned where we left before.

THE

THE FOURTH BOOK,

CONTAINING

Other three hundred years from William Conqueror, to the time of John Wickliffe, wherein is described the proud and mis-ordered Reign of Antichrist, beginning to stir in the Church of CHRIST.

William Conqueror.

WIlliam Duke of Normandy, surnamed Conqueror, base Son of D. Robert, the sixth Duke of Normandy, and Nephew unto King Edward, after the foresaid Victory against Harold and the English-men obtained, was received King over the Realm of England, not so much by assent, as for fear and necessity of time. For else the Londoners had promised their assistance to Edgar Etheling to the uttermost of their power. But being weakned and wasted so greatly in battels before, and the Duke coming so fast upon them, and fearing that they could not make their party good, submitted themselves. Whereupon the said William (of a Duke made a King) was Crowned upon Christmas-day in the year of our Lord, 1067. by the hands of Aldredus Archbishop of York; forasmuch as at that time Stigandus Archbishop of Canterbury was absent, or else durst not, or would not come in the presence of the King. A little before the coming in of this Duke, a terrible blazing Star was seen the space of seven days, which was the year before. In record whereof, as well of the Conquest of the Duke, as of the blazing-Star, these Verses yet remain:

A blazing Star.

Sexagenus erat sextus millesimus annus,
Cum pereunt Angli stella monstrante Cometa.

Which King thus being Crowned, did Reign over the Realm of England the space of one and twenty years, and one month, with great severity and cruelness toward the English-men, burthening them with great Tributes and Exactions; which was, to pay of every Hide of ground containing twenty Acres, six shillings. By means whereof certain parts of the Land rebelled, and specially the City of Excester. But at last William overcame them, and won the City, and punished them grievously. But, for that and for other stern deeds of William, divers of the Lords departed into Scotland: wherefore he kept the other Lords that tarried the straiter, and exalted the Normans, giving to them the chief Possessions of the Land. And forsomuch as he obtained the Kingdom by force and dint of Sword, he changed the whole state of the Governance of this Common-wealth; and Ordained new Laws at his own pleasure, profitable to himself, but grievous and hurtful to the people; abolishing the Laws of King Edward, whereunto notwithstanding he was sworn before, to observe and maintain them. For the which, great Commotions and Rebellions remained long after among the people (as Histories record) to have the said Laws of King Edward revived again.

Tribute.

Rebellion. Earl Marcarus, and Earl Edwin, Edgar Atheling, with his mother and two sisters Margaret and Christian fled into Scotland.

New King, new Laws.

King William forsworn in abolishing King Edwards Laws.

Where by the way speaking of Laws, this is memorable, that even in this Kings time the Authority of the Temporal Magistrate was distinct from that of the Church; but yet in such sort, that if need required, he should deal in Causes Ecclesiastical, and be assistant to the Bishop; whose Jurisdiction what it was, and how qualified by King William now holding the stern of Government in his hand, the words following do declare.

Turris Lond'.

Willielmus Gratia Dei Rex Anglorum, comitibus, vicecomitibus, & omnibus Francigenis & Anglis, qui in Episcopatu Remigii Episcopi terras habent, salutem. Sciatis, &c. In English thus:

William by the Grace of God King of England, to all Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and to all French-born and English, which in the Bishoprick of Remigius the Bishop have Lands, greeting. Know you all, and the rest my faithful Subjects which abide in England, that the Bishops Laws which have been not well, nor according to the Precepts of holy Canons, even to my time in the Kingdom of England; by the Common Council and the Council of mine Archbishops, and the rest of Bishops and Abbots, with all the Princes of my Kingdom I have judged to be amended. Wherefore I command, and by my Royal Authority give in Charge, That no Bishop or Archdeacon do hold any more Pleas of Law in the Hundred by the Bishops Laws, nor bring any Cause which pertaineth to the Cure of Souls unto the judgment of secular men: but whosoever, according to the Bishops Laws, about any Suit or Default be troubled, shall come to the place, which to this end the Bishop shall choose and name, and there answer his cause, and not according as in the Hundred, but according to the Canons and Laws of the Bishop they shall do right unto God and to their Bishop. And if any puffed up with pride, being called once, twice, and thrice to the Court of Pleas, refuseth to come, and will not so be drawn to amendment, let him be Excommunicate. And if need be, to correct and revenge this, let the Power and Justice of the Kings Under-Sheriff be used. And he, which being called or summoned to the Bishops Court, will not come, for every calling shall be put to his answer before the Bishop, and make amends. And this I defend, and by mine Authority forbid, that no Under-Sheriff, or Provost, or Officer of the King, nor any Lay-man meddle or make with the Laws belonging to the Bishop; nor that any Lay-man bring or sue another out of the Bishops Court of Justice unto Judgment. And as for Judgment, let it be given in no place but in the Bishops See, or in that place which in this behalf the Bishop shall appoint.

The Jurisdiction Ecclesiastical qualified and circumscribed in King Williams time.

By this evidence of Record it is manifest (as you see) that Duke William (now King) having assumed unto himself the absolute Authority Royal, endeavoured to establish a form of Government both in the Church and Common-wealth answerable to his own mind: howbeit this is to be noted, that he allowed unto the Clergy a kind of Jurisdiction of conventing persons before them, and likewise of exercising such Ecclesiastical Discipline as the quality of that age and time did use. Wherein we will not stand to debate any thing at large, but proceed in the course of our story, as the Spirit of God shall vouchsafe to direct us.

Over and besides this, the foresaid William, as he was a Warrior, so he delighting in Forts and Bulwarks, builded four strong Castles; two at York, one at Nottingham, and another at Lincoln, which Garrisons he furnished with Normans.

About the third year of his Reign, Harold and Canutus Sons of Swanus, King of Denmark, entred into the North Country. The Normans within York, fearing that the English-men would aid the Danes, fired the Suburbs of the Town. Whereof the flame was so big, and the wind so strong that it took into the City, and burnt a great part thereof, with the Minster of S. Peter, where no doubt many worthy Works and Monuments of York with the Minster of S. Peter burnt.

Books

Books were conſumed. In the time whereof the Danes by the favour of ſome of the Citizens entred the City, and ſlew more than three thouſand of the Normans. But not long after King William chaſed them out, and drave them to their Ships, and took ſuch diſpleaſure with the inhabitants of that Country, that he deſtroyed the land from York to Durham, ſo that nine years after the Province lay waſt and unmanured, only except St. Johns land of Beverly; and the people thereof were ſo ſtrictly kept in penury by the war of the King; that (as our Engliſh ſtory ſaith) they eat Rats, Cats, and Dogs, with other vermin.

The North Country waſted.

Horrible famine in the North parts of Northumberland.

Alſo in the fourth year of this King, Malcolm King of Scots entred into Northumberland, and deſtroyed the Country, and ſlew there many of the people, both of men, women and children, after a lamentable ſort, and took ſome priſoners. But within two years after, King William made ſuch war upon the Scots, that he forced Malcolm their King to do him homage.

Scots ſubdued to King William.

And thus much concerning the outward calamities of this Realm under his foreign Conquerour, which is now the fifth time that the ſaid land with the inhabitants thereof hath been ſcourged by the hand of God. Firſt, by the Romans in the time of Julius Ceſar; then by the Scots and Picts (as hath been ſhewed) afterward by the Saxons. Again, the Saxons or Engliſhmen did not enjoy the poſſeſſion of Britain with long quiet, but were brought in as much ſubjection themſelves under the Danes, as they had brought the Britains before (and that much more) inſomuch that through all England, if an Engliſhman had met a Dane upon a Bridg, he might not ſtir one foot before the Lord Dane (otherwiſe Lurdane) were paſt. And then if the Engliſhman had not given low reverence to the Dane at his coming by, he was ſure to be ſharply puniſhed (with more) as above hath been declared. And this ſubjection continued almoſt from the reign of King Ethelwolfus 230 years, till the reign of King Edward. And yet the indignation of God thus ceaſed not, but ſtirred up the Normans againſt them, who conquered and altered the whole Realm after their own purpoſe; inſomuch that beſides the innovation of the Laws, Coyns, and Poſſeſſions, there was in no Church of England almoſt any Engliſh Biſhop, but only Normans and foreigners placed through all their Dioceſs. To ſuch miſery was this land then brought, that not only of all the Engliſh Nobility not one houſe was ſtanding, but alſo it was thought reproachful to be called an Engliſhman. This puniſhment of God againſt the Engliſh Nation, Writers do aſſign diverſly to divers cauſes, (as partly before is touched) of whom ſome aſſign this to be the cauſe as followeth in the words of the ſtory: In primitiva Angliæ Eccleſia religio clariſſime ſplenduit, ita ut reges & reginæ, duces & epiſcopi, vel monachatum, vel exilium pro Dei amore appeterent: proceſſu vero temporis adeo omnis virtus in eis emarcuit, ut gentem nullam proditione & nequitia ſibi parem eſſe permitterent, &c. The meaning whereof is this: That whereas Kings and Queens, Dukes and Prelates, in the primitive time of the Engliſh Church, were ready for Religion to forſake either Liberty or Country, and give themſelves to a ſolitary life; in proceſs of time they grew to ſuch diſſoluteneſs, that they left no other Realm like unto them in iniquity, &c. Again, ſome writing of the Viſion of King Edward, a little before the Invaſion of the Normans, teſtifie how the King reporting of his own Viſion, ſhould hear that for the great enormity and misbehaviour of the head-Dukes, Biſhops and Abbots of the Realm, the Kingdom ſhould be given to the hand of their enemies after the deceaſe of him, for the ſpace of one hundred years and one day. Which ſpace was alſo ſeen by William the Conquerour, to be one hundred and fifty years; and that his progeny ſo long ſhould continue. Again, ſome Writers intreating of this ſo great wrath of God upon the Engliſh people, declare the cauſe thereof as followeth: Nam ſicut Angli Britones quos Deus diſterminare propoſuerat (peccatis ſuis exigentibus) humiliaverant, & a terra Angliæ minus juſte fugaverant: ſic ipſi duplici perſecutione, &c. Like as the Engliſhmen did ſubdue the Britains (whom God propoſed for their deſervings to exterminate) and them unjuſtly did diſpoſſeſs of their land, ſo they ſhould likewiſe be ſubdued and ſcourged with a double perſecution; firſt by the Danes, and after by the Normans, &c. Moreover to theſe injuries and iniquities done and wrought by the Engliſhmen, hitherto recited, let us add alſo the cruel villany of this Nation, in murthering and tything the innocent Normans before, who coming as ſtrangers with Alfred the lawful heir of the Crown, were deſpightfully put to death. Which ſeemeth to me no little cauſe why the Lord (whoſe doings be always juſt and right) did ſuffer the Normans ſo to prevail. By the coming in of the which Normans, and by their quarrel unto the Realm, three things we may note and learn. Firſt to conſider and learn the righteous retribution and wrath of God from Heaven upon all iniquity and unrighteous dealing of men. Secondly, we may thereby note, what it is for Princes to leave no iſſue or ſure ſucceſſion behind them. Thirdly, what dangers often do chance to Realms publickly by foreign marriage with other Princes, &c.

The continual affliction and diſquieteneſs of this Realm of England. Five Conqueſts which have been in this Realm, Romans, Scots and Picts, Saxons, Danes, Normans.

Three things in this Conqueſt to be noted.

Gods juſt judgment.

In the ſame fourth year of this King, between Eaſter and Whitſuntide was holden a ſolemn Council of the Clergy of England at Wincheſter. At the which Council were preſent two Cardinals ſent from Pope Alexander the Second, Peter and John. In this Council, the King being there himſelf preſent, were depoſed divers Biſhops, Abbots and Priors, (by the means of the King) without any evident cauſe; to the intent his Normans might be preferred to the rule of the Church, as he had preferred his Knights before to the rule of the Temporality, thereby to ſtand in more ſurety of the land. Amongſt whom alſo Stigandus Archbiſhop of Canterbury was put down for three cauſes againſt him pretended.

Divers Biſhops, Abbots and Priors depoſed in England.

Stigandus Archbiſhop of Canterbury deprived, and the cauſe why.

The firſt was for that he had holden wrongfully that Biſhoprick, while Robert the Archbiſhop (above mentioned) was living.

The ſecond was for that he had received the Pall of Benedict Biſhop of Rome, the fifth of that name. Which Benedict, for buying his Popedom had been depoſed, as is ſhewed before.

The third cauſe, for that he occupied the ſaid Pall without license and lawful authority of the Court of Rome.

Fair countenance not to be truſted.

Then Stigandus well proved the benevolence of King William. For where before the King ſeemed in friendly countenance to make much of him, and did unto him great reverence; then he changed all his mildneſs into ſternneſs, and excuſed himſelf by the Biſhop of Rome's authority. So that in the end, Stigandus was deprived of his dignity, and kept in Wincheſter as a priſoner during his life. This Stigandus is noted for a man ſo covetous and ſparing, that when he would take nothing of his own, and ſwearing that he had not a peny, yet by a key faſtened about his neck, was found great treaſure of his under the ground.

A covetous Biſhop.

Thomas made Archbiſhop of York.

At the ſame time was preferred to the Archbiſhoprick of York, Thomas a Norman, and Canon of Baion.

Lanfrancus an Italian, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

At which time alſo Lanfrancus, Abbot of Cadomenſey (a Lombard and Italian born) was ſent for, and made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, between which two Archbiſhops, about their Conſecration firſt began a contention, for giving and taking the Oath of obedience; but that contention was at that time appeaſed by the King; and Thomas was contented to ſubſcribe to the Archbiſhop of Canterburies obedience.

The Miniſter of York builded.

After this it followed within ſhort ſpace, that the ſaid Lanfrancus and Thomas Archbiſhop of York, who firſt builded the Miniſter of York, and gave poſſeſſions thereunto, came to Rome with Remigius Biſhop of Dorceſter for their Palls, as the manner was; without which no Archbiſhop nor Biſhop could be confirmed, although their Election were never ſo lawful. This Pall muſt be asked no where but of the Pope or his aſſigns, and that within three months; alſo it muſt be asked not faintly, but mightily. Diſt. 100. cap. priſca. Which as it was a chargeable thing to other Nations (eſpecially ſuch as were far from Rome) ſo it was no ſmall gain to the Romiſh See, ſo as they did order it. For although at the beginning the Pall was given without money according to the Decree, Diſt. 100. or for little, as percaſe in this time of Lanfranke; yet in proceſs of years it grew to ſuch exceſs, that where the Biſhoprick of Mentz was wont to give to Rome but ten thouſand Florens; afterward it aroſe ſo, that he which asked his Confirmation, could not obtain it without twenty thouſand. And from thence it exceeded to five and twenty thouſand, and at length to ſeven and twenty thouſand Florens; which ſum Jacobus Archbiſhop of Mentz was preſt to pay a little before the Council of Baſil; inſomuch that the ſaid Jacobus at his departing (which was within four years after) ſaid, that his death did not ſo much grieve him as to remember his poor ſubjects, which ſhould be conſtrained to pay ſo terrible a fine for the Popes Pall. Now by this, what riſeth to the Pope in whole Germany, containing in it above fifty Biſhopricks, it may be eaſily conjectured. Lanfrancus thus coming to Rome, with the other two Biſhops; he for the eſtimation of his Learning obtained of Alexander two Palls, one of honour, the other of love. Item, he obtained for the other two Biſhops alſo their Confirmation. At which time, they being there preſent before Alexander, the controverſie began firſt to be moved (or rather renewed) for the Primacy betwixt the two Metropolitans, that is, betwixt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Archbiſhop of York, whether of them ſhould have preeminence above the other. For Canterbury challenged to himſelf the Prerogative and primacy over whole Britain and Ireland; the which contention continued a long ſeaſon betwixt theſe two Churches, and was often renewed in the days of divers Kings after this; as in the reign of Henry the Firſt, betwixt Thurſtinus of York, and Radulphus of Canterbury. And again, in the ſeven and twentieth year of the ſaid King, at his ſecond Coronation. For Radulphus would not ſuffer the firſt Coronation to ſtand, becauſe it was done by the Biſhop of York, without his aſſent. Alſo in the reign of Henry the Second, where Alexander Pope made a Letter Decretal betwixt theſe two Metropolitans, for bearing the Croſs in the year 1159. Alſo another time, in the reign of the ſaid King, betwixt Richard of Canterbury, and Roger of York. Again, about the year of our Lord 1170, when Thomas Becket hearing the King to be Crowned of Roger Biſhop of York, complained thereof grievouſly to Pope Alexander the Third. Item, another time in the year 1176, betwixt Richard and the ſaid Roger, whether of them ſhould ſit on the right hand of Cardinal Hugo in his Council at London. Moreover, in the beginning of the reign of King Richard, in the year 1190, betwixt Baldwinus of Canterbury, and Godfridus of York, &c.

Eneas Silvius writeth that there be fifty Biſhopricks in Germany.

Now to proceed in the ſtory hereof: After this queſtion was brought (as is ſaid) to the Popes preſence, he (not diſpoſed to decide the matter) ſent them home into England, there to have their cauſe determined. Whereupon they ſpeeding themſelves from Rome to England in the year 1070, and in the ſixth year (as is ſaid) of this William, brought the matter before the King and the Clergy at Windſor. Whereas Lanfranke firſt alledging for himſelf, brought in from the time of Auſtin to the time of Beda (which was about 140 years) how that the Biſhop of Canterbury had ever the Primacy over the whole land of Britain and Ireland; how he kept his Councils divers times within the precincts of York; how he did call and cite the Biſhops of York thereto; whereof ſome he did conſtitute, ſome he did Excommunicate, and ſome he did remove; beſides alſo he alledged divers priviledges granted by Princes and Prelates to the Primacy of that See, &c.

To this Thomas Archbiſhop of York replieth again, and firſt beginning with the firſt original of the Britains Church, declareth in order of time how the Britains, &c.

Lucius the firſt King of Britain chriſtened.

Theonus firſt Archbiſhop of London.

Ex Chronic. Sigeberti.

5. The Britains firſt poſſeſſioners of this Kingdom of Britain, which endured from Brutus and Cadwalladar 2076 years, under an hundred and two Kings, at length received the Chriſtian Faith in the year 162, in the time of Lucius their King, Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome ſent Faganus and Damianus Preachers unto them; at which time after their converſion, they aſſigned and ordained in the Realm eight and twenty Biſhops, with two Archbiſhops, Theonus the Archbiſhop of London, and Theodoſius Archbiſhop of York. Under thoſe Biſhops and Archbiſhops the Church of Britain was governed after their converſion, almoſt three hundred years, till at length the Saxons being then Infidels, with Hengiſtus their King, ſubduing the Britains by fraudulent murther invaded their land, which was about the year of our Lord 440. After this the Britains being driven into Cambria (which we now call Wales) the Saxons over-running the land, divided themſelves into ſeven Kingdoms. And ſo being Infidels and Pagans, continued till the time that Gregory Biſhop of Rome ſent Auſtin to preach unto them; which Auſtin coming firſt to Dover, being then the head City of Kent, called in Latin, Dorobernia, and there planting himſelf, converted firſt the King of Kent, called Edelbertus, who had then ſubdued certain other Kings unto Humber. By reaſon whereof Auſtin was made Archbiſhop of Dover, by the appointment of Gregorius, who ſent him certain Palls with his Letter from Rome, as before is expreſſed. Which Letter being recited, then Thomas expounding upon the ſame, beginneth to declare for himſelf, how the meaning of Gregory in this Letter was, to reduce the new Church of Saxons or Engliſhmen to the order that was in the old time among the Britains; that is, to be under two Metropolitans, one of London, the other of York; for ſo the Church was ordered in the time of the Britains, as is before declared. Notwithſtanding he giveth to Auſtin this prerogative during his life time, to have authority and juriſdiction, not only over his twelve Biſhops, but upon all other Biſhops and Prieſts in England. And after his deceaſe then theſe two Metropolitans, London and York, to overſee the whole Clergy, as in times paſt amongſt the Britains; whom he joyneth together after the death of Auſtin, to conſtitute Biſhops, and to overſee the Church. And that he ſo meaneth London to be equal in authority with York, it appeareth by four arguments: Firſt, That he willeth London to be conſecrate by no Biſhop, but of his own Synod. Secondly, In that he willeth no diſtinction of honour to be betwixt London and York, but only according to that as each one of them is elder in time. Thirdly, For that he matcheth theſe two together in common Council, and with one agreement to conſent together in doing and diſpoſing ſuch things as they ſhall conſult upon in the zeal of Chriſt Jeſus; and that in ſuch ſort that one ſhould not diſſent nor diſcord from the other. What meaneth this, but that they ſhould govern together, whom he would not to diſſent together? Fourthly, where he writeth, that the Biſhop of York ſhould not be ſubject to the Biſhop of London; what meaneth this, but that the Biſhop of London ſhould be equivalent with the Metropolitan of York, or rather ſuperior unto him?

Dover the head-City of Kent.

This was about 150 years after the coming of the Saxons.

And thus he expounded the meaning of Gregory to be in the foreſaid Letter. To whom Lanfrancus again anſwereth, That he was not the Biſhop of London, and that the queſtion pertained not to London. Thomas replieth, having on his part many ſautors, that this priviledg was granted by Gregory to Auſtin alone, to have all other Biſhops ſubject to him; but after his deceaſe there ſhould be equality of honour betwixt London and York, without all diſtinction of priority; ſave the only priority of time ſhould make ſuperiority between them. And although Auſtin tranſlated the See from London to Kent; yet Gregory, if his mind had been to give the ſame prerogative to the Succeſſors of Auſtin (which he gave to him) would expreſly have uttered it in the words of his Epiſtle, writing thus to Auſtin: That which I give to thee Auſtin, I give alſo and grant to all thy Succeſſors after thee. But in that he maketh here no mention of his Succeſſors, it appeareth thereby, that it was not his mind ſo to do.

Lanfrancus replieth.

Thomas argueth.

To this Lanfrancus argueth again: If this authority had been given to Auſtin alone, and not to his Succeſſors it had been but a ſmall gift, proceeding from the Apoſtolick See, to his ſpecial and familiar friend; eſpecially ſeeing alſo that Auſtin in all his life did conſtitute no Biſhop of York, neither was there any ſuch Biſhop to be ſubject to him. Again, we have priviledges from the Apoſtolick See, which confirm this dignity in the Succeſſors of Auſtin, in the ſame See of Dover. Moreover, all Engliſhmen think it both right and reaſon to fetch the direction of well living from that place, where firſt they took the ſparkle of right believing. Further, whereas you ſay that Gregory might have confirmed with plain words the ſame thing to the Succeſſors of Auſtin, which he gave unto him; all that I grant: yet notwithſtanding, this is nothing prejudicial to the See of Canterbury. For, if you know your Logick, that which is true in the whole is alſo true in the part; and what is true in the more, is alſo true in the leſs. Now the Church of Rome is as the whole, to whom all other Churches be as parts thereof; and as Homo, mankind

Lanfrancus replieth.

The dignity of Canterbury confirmed by priviledges.

Well replied of an Italian.

mankind is Genus, the general in a certain reſpect to all his Individua, to all particular perſons, yet in every particular perſon lyeth the property of the general; ſo in like manner the See of Rome in a certain reſpect is the general, and the whole to other Churches, and yet in every particular Church is contained the whole fulneſs of the whole Chriſtian faith. The Church of Rome is greater than all Churches; that which is wrought in it ought to work in the leſs Churches alſo; ſo that the authority of every chief head of the Church ought to ſtand alſo in them that do ſucceed; unleſs there be any preciſe exception made by name. Wherefore like as the Lord ſaid to all Biſhops of Rome the ſame thing which he ſaid to Peter, ſo Gregory in like manner ſaid to all the Succeſſors of Auſtin, that which he ſaid to Auſtin. So thus I conclude, Likewiſe as the Biſhop of Canterbury is ſubject to Rome, becauſe he had his faith from thence; ſo York ought to be in ſubjection to Canterbury, which ſent the firſt Preachers thither. Now whereas you alledg that Gregory would Auſtin to be reſident at London, that is utterly uncertain. For how is it to be thought that ſuch a Diſciple would do contrary to the mind of ſuch a Maſter? But grant (as you ſay) that Auſtin removed to London, what is that to me, which am not Biſhop of London? Notwithſtanding all this controverſie ceaſing betwixt us, if it ſhall pleaſe you to come to ſome peaceable compoſition with me (all contention ſet apart) you ſhall find me not out of the way, ſo far as reaſon and equity ſhall extend.

If this ſimilitude were formed into a Syllogiſm, neither were the major true; and ſpecially the minor were utterly falſe.

With theſe reaſons of Lanfranke, Thomas gave over, condeſcending that the firſt of his Province ſhould begin at Humber. Whereupon it was then decreed that York from that time ſhould be ſubject to Canterbury in all matters appertaining to the Rites and Regiment of the Catholick Church; ſo that whereſoever within England Canterbury ſhould or would hold his Council, the Biſhop of York ſhould reſort thither with his Biſhops, and be obedient to his Decrees Canonical.

Order taken between Lanfrancus Biſhop of Canterbury, and Thomas Biſhop of York.

Provided moreover that when the Biſhop of Canterbury ſhould deceaſe, York ſhould repair unto Dover, there to conſecrate with others the Biſhops that ſhould be Elect. And if York ſhould deceaſe, his Succeſſor ſhould reſort to Canterbury, or elſe where the Biſhop of Canterbury ſhould appoint, there to receive his Conſecration, making his profeſſion there, with an Oath of Canonical obedience. Thomas being content withal, Lanfrancus the Italian triumpheth with no ſmall joy, and putteth the matter forthwith in writing, that the memory thereof might remain to the poſterity of his Succeſſors. But yet that Decree did not long ſtand. For ſhortly after the ſame ſcar, ſo ſuperficially cured, braſt out again. Inſomuch that in the reign of King Henry the Firſt, Anno Dom. 1121. Thurſtinus Archbiſhop of York could not be compelled to ſwear to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and yet notwithſtanding by the Letters of Calixtus the Second, was Conſecrated without any profeſſion made to the ſaid Biſhop, with much more matter of contention, all which to recite it were too long. But this I thought to commit to Hiſtory, to the intent men might ſee the lamentable decay of true Chriſtianity amongſt the Chriſtian Biſhops, who enflamed with glorious ambition, ſo contended for honour, that without meer forcement of Law no modeſty could take place.

Of ſuch like contentions among Prelates of the Clergy for ſuperiority, we read of divers in old Chronicles, as in the Hiſtory intituled Chronicon Hirſeldenſe, where is declared a bloody conflict, which twice happened in the Church of Goſlaria, between Hecelon Biſhop of Hildeſheime, and Wederatus Biſhop of Fulda, and all for the ſuperior place, who ſhould ſit next to the Emperor; the Emperor himſelf being there preſent, and looking on them, and yet not able to ſtay them.

Thus I have deſcribed the troublous contention between Lanfrancus and Thomas Metropolitan of York, in the days of Alexander, of which controverſie, and of the whole diſcourſe thereof Lanfrancus writeth to Pope Alexander, beginning thus:

A Letter of Lanfrancus ſent to Pope Alexander.

Domino totius Chriſtianæ religionis ſummo ſpeculatori Alex. Papæ. Lanfrancus ſanctæ Dorobernenſis Eccleſiæ antiſtes, debitam cum omni ſervitute obedientiam. In concilio quod Angliæ per veſtram authoritatem coactum eſt, ubi querelæ Thomæ Archiepiſcopi prolatæ & ventilatæ ſunt, allata eſt Eccleſiaſtica gentis Anglorum Hiſtoria, quam Eboracenſis Eccleſiæ Presbyter, & Anglorum doctor compoſuit: and ſo forth, in a long proceſs of words which follow. Among which in the middle of the Epiſtle, ſpeaking of Dover and Canterbury, he hath theſe words: Urbs namque quæ nunc Cantuarberia nominatur, antiquis temporibus, ab ipſis terræ incolis, Dorobernia vocabatur, &c. With many other words in the ſaid Epiſtle, which for brevity here I overpaſs.

In the ſtory before of King Egelred, was declared about the year of our Lord, 1016, how the Biſhoprick of Lindaffarne, otherwiſe named Holyland, in the flood of Tweed, was tranſlated to Durham; ſo likewiſe in the days of this Lanfrancus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Anno 1076, divers Biſhops Sees were altered and removed from Townſhips to greater Cities. As the Biſhoprick of Seleſe was removed to Chicheſter; out of Cornwal to Exceſter; from Wells to Bath; from Shireborne to Salisbury; from Dorcheſter to Lincoln; from Litchfield to Cheſter; which Biſhoprick of Cheſter, Robert being then Biſhop, reduced from Cheſter to Coventry. Likewiſe after that in the reign of William Rufus, Anno 1095, Herbert Biſhop of Thetford from thence reduced the See to Norwich, &c.

Biſhops Sees tranſlated into England.

As concerning Dover and Canterbury, whether the See was likewiſe tranſlated from the Town of Dover to the City of Canterbury in the time of Theodorus; or, whether Canterbury by old time had the name of Dorobernia (as the Letter of Lanfrancus to Pope Alexander above mentioned doth pretend) I find it not in Hiſtories expreſly defined; ſave that I read by the words of William, being yet Duke of Normandy, charging then Harold to make a Well of Water for the Kings uſe in the Caſtle of Dorobernia, that the ſaid Dorobernia then was taken for that which we now call Dover; but whether Dorobernia and the City of Canterbury be both one or divers, the matter is not great. Notwithſtanding this I read in the Epiſtle of Pope Bonifacius to King Ethelbert, as alſo to Juſtinus Archbiſhop: Item, in the Epiſtle of Pope Honorius to Biſhop Honorius: Item, of Pope Vitalianus to Theodorus; of Pope Sergius to King Ethelred, Alfred and Adulphus, and to the Biſhops of England. Likewiſe of Pope Gregory the Third to the Biſhops of England. Item, of Pope Leo to Athelard Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Of Formoſus to the Biſhops of England, and of Pope John to Dunſtan; that the name of Dorobernia and of Canterbury indifferently are taken for one matter.

Dorobernia and Canterbury taken both for one.

In this time (and by the procuring of this Lanfrancus) the ninth year of this King, a Council was holden at London, where among the Acts thereof theſe were the principal things concluded:

A Council holden at London, and what were the Acts thereof.

Firſt, For the order of ſitting, that the Archbiſhop of York ſhould ſit on the right hand, and the Biſhop of London on the left hand; or in the abſence of York, London ſhould have the right, and Wincheſter the left hand of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſitting in Council.

2. The ſecond, that Biſhops ſhould tranſlate their Sees from Villages into Cities, whereupon thoſe Sees above named were tranſlated.

3. That Monks ſhould have nothing in proper; and if any ſo had, he dying unconfeſſed ſhould not be buried in the Churchyard.

4. That no Clerk or Monk of any other Dioceſs ſhould be admitted to Orders, or retained without Letters Commendatory or Teſtimonial.

5. That none ſhould ſpeak in the Council except Biſhops and Abbots, without leave of the Arch-Metropolitans.

6. That none ſhould marry within the ſeventh degree, with any either of his own kindred, or of his wives departed.

7. That none ſhould either buy or ſell any Office within the Church.

8. That no Sorcery or any Divination ſhould be uſed or permitted in holy Church.

9. That no Biſhop nor Abbot, nor any of the Clergy ſhould be at the judgment of any mans death or diſmembring, neither ſhould be any fautor of the ſaid Judicants.

Biſhops of England about to drive out Monks, and to place Prieſts again in their ſtead.

Moreover in the days of this Lanfrancus, divers good Biſhops of the Realm began to take part with Prieſts againſt the Monks, in diſplacing theſe out of their Churches, and to reſtore the married Prieſts again; inſomuch that Walkelmus Biſhop of Wincheſter had placed above forty Canons inſtead of Monks for his part; but this godly enterprize was ſtopped by ſtout Lanfranke the Italian Lombard. This luſty Prelate ſat nineteen years, but at his latter end he was not ſo favoured of William Rufus, and died for ſorrow. Although this Italian Frank being Archbiſhop had little leiſure to write, yet ſomething he thought to do to ſet out his famous learning, and wrote a Book againſt Berengarius, intituling it Opus Scintillarum. The old Church of Canterbury he plucked down and builded up the new.

Opus Scintillarum. Lanfranci.

Hildebrandus ſeu Gregor. 7.

After the death of Pope Alexander above mentioned, next unto him followed Hildebrand, Sirnamed Gregory the ſeventh. This Hildebrand as he was a Sorcerer, ſo was he the firſt and principal cauſe of all this perturbation that is now and hath been ſince his time in the Church; by reaſon that through his example all this ambition, ſtoutneſs, and pride entred firſt into the Church of Rome, and hath ever ſince continued. For before Hildebrand came to Rome working there his feats, ſetting up and diſplacing what Biſhops he liſted, corrupting them with pernicious counſel, and ſetting them againſt Emperors, under pretence of Chaſtity deſtroying Matrimony, and under the title of liberty breaking peace, and reſiſting authority; before this (I ſay) the Church of Rome was in ſome order, and Biſhops quietly governed under Chriſtian Emperors, and alſo were defended by the ſame; as Marcellus, Meltiades, and Sylveſter were ſubdued, and under obedience to Conſtantinus, Ann. 340. Siricius to Theodoſius, Ann. 388. Gregorius to Mauricius, Ann. 600. Hilarius to Juſtinian, Ann. 528. Adrianus and Leo to Carolus Magnus, An. 801. Paſchalis and Valentius to Ludovicus Pius, Ann. 830. Sergius the nine and twentieth to Lotharius, Ann. 840. Benedictus the third, and Johannes the ninth unto Ludovicus, Son of Lotharius, Ann. 856. But againſt this obedience and ſubjection Hildebrand firſt began to ſpurn, and by his example taught all other Biſhops to do the like.

Hildebrand the cauſe of all the ſtoutneſs and pride in Prelates.

The obedience of Biſhops in ancient time to Emperors.

Inſomuch that at length they wrought and brought to paſs that it ſhould be lawful for a few Curtiſans and Cardinals (contrary to ancient Ordinance and Statutes Decretal) to chuſe what Pope they liſt, without any conſent of the Emperor at all. And whereas before it ſtood in the Emrors gift to give and to grant Biſhopricks, Archbiſhopricks, Benefices, and other Eccleſiaſtical Preferments within their own limits, to whom they liſt; now the Popes through much wreſtling, wars, and contention, have extorted all that into their own hands, and to their aſſigns; yea, have pluckt in all the riches and power of the whole world: and not content with that, have uſurped and prevailed ſo much above Emperors, that (as before) no Pope might be choſen without the confirmation of the Emperor; ſo now no Emperor may be elected without the confirmation of the Pope, taking upon them more than Princes to place or diſplace Emperors at their pleaſure for every light cauſe; to put down or ſet up when and whom they liſted; as Fredericus Primus, for holding the left Stirrup of the Popes Saddle, was perſecuted almoſt to Excommunication. The which cauſe moveth me to ſtrain more diligence here, in ſetting out the ſtory, acts and doings of this Hildebrand, from whom as the firſt Patron and founder ſprang all this ambition and contention about the liberties and dominion of the Roman Church; to the intent that ſuch as cannot read the Latin Hiſtories may underſtand in Engliſh the original of evils; how and by what occaſion they firſt began, and how long they have continued.

What Popes have done.

Popes more than Princes.

Frederick the firſt ſhent for holding the Popes left Stirrup.

And firſt how this Hildebrand hitherto had behaved himſelf, before he was Pope, I have partly declared. For though he was not yet Pope in name, yet he was then Pope indeed, and ruled the Popes and all their doings as him liſted. Item, what ways and fetches he had attempted ever ſince his firſt coming to the Court of Rome, to magnifie and maintain falſe liberty againſt true authority; what practice he wrought by Councils, what factions and conſpiracies he made, in ſtirring up Popes againſt Emperors, ſtriving for ſuperiority; and what wars followed thereof, I have alſo expreſſed. Now let us ſee further (by the help of Chriſt) the worthy vertues of this Princely Prelate, after he came to be Pope, as they remain in Hiſtories of divers and ſundry writers deſcribed.

The Tragical Hiſtory of Gregory the Seventh, otherwiſe named Hildebrand.

Gregory the ſeventh. Ex Aventino.

THE words of the Latin Hiſtory be theſe, Hactenus Pontifices Romani in comitiis curiatis calatis a ſacerdotibus, equitatu, plebe, ſenatu, &c.

In Engliſh.

Hitherto the Biſhops of Rome have been elected by voices and ſuffrages of all ſorts and degrees, as well of the Prieſts and the Clergy, as of the Nobility, people, and Senate, all conventing and aſſembling together. And this Election ſo I find to ſtand in force, if ſo be it were ratified and confirmed by the conſent of Roman Emperors who had authority to call and to aſſemble all theſe, as well as Biſhops, together unto Councils as caſe required. Under the authority and juriſdiction of theſe Emperors were contained both in Germany, France, Italy, and through the whole Dominion of Rome, all Patriarchs, Biſhops, Maſters of Churches and Monaſteries, by the Decree of Councils, according to the old cuſtom of our Anceſtors, as is declared in a certain ſtory in the life of Carolus Magnus. The holy and ancient Fathers (like as Chriſt our Lord with his Diſciples and Apoſtles both taught and did) honoured and eſteemed their Emperors as the ſupreme Poteſtate next under God on earth, ſet up, ordained, elected and crowned of God, above all other mortal men, and ſo counted them, and called them their Lords. To them they yielded tribute, and paid their ſubſidies, alſo prayed every day for their life. Such as rebelled againſt them they took as rebels and reſiſters againſt God, his Ordinance and Chriſtian pietty. The name of the Emperor then was of great Majeſty, and received as given from God. Then theſe Fathers of the Church never intermedled nor intangled themſelves with Politick affairs of the Commonweal; much leſs occupied they Martial arms and matters of Chivalry. Only in poverty and modeſty was all their contention with other Chriſtians, who ſhould be pooreſt and moſt modeſt among them. And the more humbleneſs appeared in any, the higher opinion they conceived of him. The ſharp and two edged-ſword they took, given to the Church of Chriſt, to ſave, and not to kill; to quicken, and not to deſtroy; and called it the ſword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, the life and light of men, and revoketh from death to life, making of men, gods; of mortal, immortal. Far were they from that, to thruſt out any Prince or King (though he were never ſo far out of the way, yea an Arrian) from his Kingdom, or to curſe him, to releaſe his ſubjects from their Oath and their Allegiance, to change and tranſlate Kingdoms, to ſubvert Empires, to pollute themſelves with Chriſtian blood, or to war with their Chriſtian Brethren for Rule and Principality. This was not their ſpirit and manner then, but rather they loved and obeyed their Princes. Again, Princes loved them alſo like Fathers and fellow-Princes with them of the ſouls of men. Now this Gregorius the ſeventh, otherwiſe named Hildebrandus, truſting upon the Normans, which then ruffled about Apulia, Calabria, and Campania, truſting alſo upon the power of Machtilda, a ſtout woman there about Rome; and partly again bearing himſelf bold for the diſcord among the Germans; firſt of all others (contrary to the manner of Elders) contemning the authority of the Emperor, invaded the Cathedral See of Rome, vaunting himſelf, as having both the Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal Sword committed to him by Chriſt, and that fulneſs of power was in his hand to bind and looſe what ſo he liſted. Whereupon thus he preſumed to occupy both the Regiments, to challenge all the whole Dominion, both of the Eaſt and Weſt Church, yea, and all power to himſelf alone, abiding none to be equal, much leſs ſuperior unto him, derogating from others, and arrogating to himſelf their due right and honour, ſetting at light Ceſars, Kings and Emperors, and who reigned but by his own Godamercy? Biſhops and Prelates as his Underlings he kept in awe, ſuſpending and curſing, and chopping off their heads, ſtirring up ſtrife and wars, ſowing of diſcord, making making factions, releaſing Oaths, defeating fidelity and due allegiance of ſubjects to their Princes. Yea, and if he had offended, or injured the Emperor himſelf, yet notwithſtanding he ought to be feared, as he himſelf glorieth in a certain Epiſtle, as one that could not err, and had received of Chriſt our Saviour, and of Peter, authority to bind and unbind at his will and pleaſure. Prieſts then in thoſe days had wives openly and lawfully (no Law forbidding to the contrary) as appeareth by the deed and writings of their Chapter-ſeals and Donations, which were given to Temples and Monaſteries, wherein their wives alſo be cited with them for witneſs, and were called Presbyteriſſæ. Alſo for Biſhops, Prelates, Parſons of Churches, Governours of the Clergy, Maſters of Monaſteries, and Religious Houſes; all theſe were then in thoſe times in the Emperors Ordination, to aſſign by voice or conſent to whom he would. Now theſe two things Gregorius this Pope could not abide; for the which two cauſes only was all his ſtriving and driving from his firſt beginning to aboliſh the marriage of Prieſts, and ſo tranſlate the Authority Imperial to the Clergy. For to this ſcope only tended all his labour, practiſes and devices, as appeared before in the Council of Lateran under Pope Nicholas, and alſo in the Council of Mantua under Alexander, making their marriage hereſie, and the other to be ſimony. And that which before he went about by others, now he practiſeth by himſelf, to condemn Miniſters that were married for Nicholaitans, and to receive any Spiritual Regiment of ſecular perſons for ſimony, directing forth his Letters upon the ſame to Henricus the Emperor, to Dukes, Princes, Poteſtates, Tetrarchs; namely to Berchtoldus, to Rodulphus of Swevia, to Whelpo, Adalberon, and their wives. Item, to Biſhops, Archbiſhops, Prieſts, and to all the people; in the which Letters he denounceth them to be no Prieſts, ſo many as were married, forbidding men to ſalute them, to talk, to eat, to company with them, to pay them tythes, or to obey them if they would not be obedient to him. Amongſt all others he directed ſpecial Letters to Otho Biſhop of Conſtance concerning this matter. But Otho perceiving the ungodly and unreaſonable pretence of Hildebrand, would never ſeparate them that were married from their wives, nor yet forbid them to marry which were unmarried, &c.

The Copy of the Letter of Hildebrand ſent to the Biſhop of Conſtance againſt Prieſts Marriages.

GREGORY Biſhop, Servant of Servants of God, to the Clergy and Laity, both more and leſs, within the Dioceſs of Conſtance, Salvation and Benediction. We have directed to our Brother Otho your Biſhop our Letters Exhortatory; wherein we enjoyned him, according to the neceſſity of our duty, by the authority Apoſtolical, that he ſhould utterly aboliſh out of his Church the hereſie of Simony, and alſo ſhould cauſe with all diligence to be preached the Chaſtity of Prieſts. But he neither moved with reverence of St. Peter's precept, nor yet with the regard of his duty, neglected to do theſe things, whereunto we ſo fatherly have exhorted him, incurring thereby a double offence, not only of diſobedience, but alſo of rebellion, in that he hath gone and done clean contrary to our commandment (yea rather the commandment of bleſſed St. Peter) ſo that he hath permitted his Clergy, not only ſuch as had wives, not to put them away, but alſo ſuch as had none, to take unto them. Whereupon we being truly informed thereof, and grieved therewith, have directed to him another Letter, declaring the motion of our diſpleaſure and indignation. In which Letters alſo we have cited him up to our Council at Rome, there to appear and give account of his diſobedience in the audience of the whole Synod. And now therefore we thought it beſt to ſignifie this to you (our dear children) whereby in this behalf we might the better provide for your health and ſalvation. For if your Biſhop ſhall continue ſo obſtinately to repugn and reſiſt againſt our Commandment, he is not meet to ſit over you, &c. Wherefore theſe ſhall be to command you, and all them that be obedient to God, and to bleſſed St. Peter, by our Apoſtolical authority, that if this your Biſhop ſhall perſiſt in his obſtinacy, you that be his ſubjects hereafter give to him no ſervice nor obedience. For the which thing doing, we here diſcharge you before God and your ſouls. For if your Biſhop ſhall ſeem contrary to the decreements and injunctions Apoſtolical, we through the Apoſtolical authority of St. Peter, diſcharge and abſolve you from the band of your allegiance to him. So that if you be ſworn to him, ſo long as he is a rebel againſt God and the Apoſtolick Seat, we looſe you from the peril of your Oath, that you ſhall not need to fear therein any danger, &c.

Otho cited to appear for ſuffering Prieſts with their lawful wives.

The Pope diſpenſeth for diſobedience.

Otho Biſhop of Conſtance thus being cited, whether he did appear perſonally himſelf, I do not read. Thus I read and find, that in the ſaid Council holden at Rome, Hildebrand with other Biſhops of Rome did then Enact among many others theſe three things moſt ſpecial: Firſt, That no Prieſt hereafter ſhould marry wives. Secondly, That all ſuch as were married ſhould be divorced. Thirdly, That none hereafter ſhould be admitted to the Order of Prieſthood, but ſhould ſwear perpetual Chaſtity, &c. This Council of Rome being ended, forthwith the act of Hildebrand concerning the ſingle life of Prieſts was proclaimed and publiſhed in all places, and ſtrait Commandment given to Biſhops to execute the ſame.

Three things Enacted by Hildebrand, Here cometh in the vow of Chaſtity.

The Copy of his Bull ſent into Italy and Germany was this.

GREGORY the Pope, otherwiſe Hildebrand, the Servant of the Servants of God, ſendeth the Apoſtles bleſſing to all them within the Kingdoms of Italy and Germany, that ſhew their true obedience to St. Peter. If there be any Prieſts, Deacons and Subdeacons, that ſtill will remain in the ſin of fornication, we forbid them the Churches entrance, by the omnipotent power of God, and by the authority of S. Peter, till in time they amend and repent. But if they perſevere in their ſin, we charge that none of you preſume to hear their ſervice; for their bleſſing is turned into curſing, and their prayer into ſin, as the Lord doth teſtifie to us by his Prophets, I will turn your bleſſing, &c.

The Clergy of France repugning for divorcing from their wives.

The Biſhops of France being called upon daily with the Popes Letters, were compelled to obey the Decree of the Council, but the reſidue of the Clergy manfully and ſtoutly withſtanding the Popes Decree and inforcement of their Biſhops, would not agree, but repined thereat, and ſaid, that the Council did manifeſtly repugn againſt the Word of God, and that the Pope did take from Prieſts that which both God and nature had given them; and therefore that perſon to be an heretick, and author of a wicked Doctrine, which ruled and governed not by the Spirit of God, but by Satan. The Decree and Act ſet forth to tend directly againſt the Word of God and the ſaying of Chriſt, Non omnes capiunt verbum hoc: All men have not the gift and capacity of this word. Item, to be againſt the ſound Doctrine of St. Paul writing theſe words, As concerning virginity I have no Commandment of the Lord, &c. Again, He that cannot otherwiſe live continent, let him marry. Item, that it was againſt the Canons both of the Apoſtles, and of the Nicen Council. Moreover, that it was againſt the courſe of nature which he required, that men being ſequeſtred from their natural wives and women, ſhould be coacted to live as Angels; that is, to perform that which nature doth not give. And therefore the Biſhop therein did open a pernicious window to uncleanneſs and to fornication. In ſum, giving up their anſwer, thus they concluded, That they had rather give up their Benefices than to forſake their natural and lawful wives againſt the word of Chriſt. And finally, if married Prieſts could not pleaſe them, they ſhould call down Angels from Heaven to ſerve the Churches. But Hildebrand nothing moved, neither with honeſt reaſon, nor with the authority of holy Scripture, nor with the determination of the Nicen Council, nor any thing elſe, followeth this matter, calleth upon the Biſhops ſtill, with his Letters and Legates doth ſollicite their minds, accuſeth them of negligence and daſtardneſs, threatneth them with Excommunication, unleſs they cauſe their Prieſts to obey his Decree injoyned them. Whereupon a great number of Biſhops, for fear of the Popes tyranny, laboured the matter with their Prieſts, by all means poſſible to bereave them of their accuſtomed Matrimony.

Amongſt other, the Archbiſhop of Mentz, perceiving

this act of taking away Prieſts marriage might breed him no little trouble, talketh with his Clergy gently, admoniſheth them of the Popes mind and decree, and giveth them half a years reſpite to deliberate upon the caſe; exhorting them diligently to ſhew themſelves obedient to the Pope and to him, and to grant with good will that which at length (will they nill they) needs they muſt be forced unto, and therefore of their own accord to ſtand content therewith, leſt the Pope ſhould be compelled to attempt ways of ſharper ſeverity. The time of deliberation expired, the Archbiſhop aſſembleth his Clergy at Erpsford the month of October, and there willeth them, according to the Pontifical Decree, either to abjure for ever all Matrimony, or elſe to abrenounce their Benefices and Eccleſiaſtical Livings. The Clergy again defend themſelves againſt the Popes Decree with Scriptures, with reaſon, with the Acts of General Councils, with examples of Anceſtors, by divers ſtrong arguments, declaring the Popes Decree not to be conſtant, nor ought to take effect. But the Archbiſhop ſaid he was compelled ſo of the Pope, and could not otherwiſe do, but to execute that which was injoyned him.

The Paleſts of Germany ſtout againſt the Popes unlawful proceedings

The Clergy ſeeing that no reaſon nor prayer, nor diſputation would ſerve, laid their heads together, conſulting among themſelves what was beſt to be done; ſome gave counſel not to return again to the Synod, ſome thought it good to return and to thruſt out the Archbiſhop from his See, and to give him due puniſhment of death for his deſerving, that by the example of him others may be warned hereafter never to attempt that thing any more to the prejudice of the Church, and the rightful liberty of Miniſters. After that this was ſignified to the Archbiſhop by certain ſpies that were amongſt them, what the Clergy intended to do, the Archbiſhop to prevent and ſalve the matter, ſendeth to the Prieſts as they were coming out, certain meſſengers, bidding them be of good hope, and to return again to the Metropolitan, and they ſhould have that ſhould content their minds. So being perſwaded, they come again to the Council. The Biſhop promiſeth he would do his endeavour what he could, to revoke and turn the mind of the Biſhop of Rome from that ſentence, willing them in the mean time to continue as they had done in their Cure and Miniſtry. The next year following, Hildebrand the Souldier of Satan ſendeth his Legate (a certain Biſhop called Curienſis) unto the Archbiſhop of Mentz, and aſſembled there a Council. In the which Council the Archbiſhop again propoſeth the matter, commanding all the Clergy, under pain of the Popes curſe, there perpetually either to abrenounce their wives or their livings. The Clergy defendeded their cauſe again with great conſtancy. But when no defenſion could take place, but all went by tyranny and meer extortion, it burſt in the end to an uproar and tumult, where the Legate and the Archbiſhop being in great danger, hardly eſcaped with their lives, and ſo the Council broke up. By this ſchiſm and tumult it followed, that the Churches after that in chuſing their Prieſts, would not ſend them to the Biſhops (the enemies and ſuppreſſors of Matrimony) to be confirmed and inducted, but did elect them within themſelves, and ſo put them in their office without all leave or knowledg of the Biſhops, who then agreed and were determined to admit no Prieſts, but ſuch as ſhould take an Oath of perpetual ſingleneſs, never to marry after. And thus firſt came up the Oath and profeſſion of ſingle Prieſthood. Notwithſtanding, if other Nations had followed the like conſtancy and concord of thoſe German Miniſters, the Deviliſh drift and decree of this Hildebrand (or rather Helbrand) had been fruſtrate and avoided. But this greedineſs of Livings in weak Prieſts made them to yield up their godly liberty to wicked tyranny. Yet this remaineth in theſe Germans to be noted, what concord can do in repreſſing the unordinate requeſts of evil Biſhops, if they conſtantly ſtand to the truth, and hold together. And thus much for baniſhing of Matrimony.

Single Prieſthood how it began.

Examples of concord in Prieſts and Miniſters.

Now let us proceed to the contents between wicked Hildebrand and the godly Emperor. But before, by the way of digreſſion, it ſhall not be much wide from the purpoſe to touch a little of the properties of this Pope, as we find them deſcribed in certain Epiſtles of Benno a Cardinal, writing to other Cardinals of Rome; which Benno lived in the ſame time of Hildebrand, and deteſteth the prodigious acts and doings of this monſtrous Pope.

Firſt, declaring that he was a Sorcerer moſt notable, and a Necromancer, an old companion of Sylveſter, of Laurentius and Theophylactus, called otherwiſe Benedictus Nonus. Amongſt others Benno Cardinalis writeth this Hiſtory of him: 'How upon a certain time this Gregorius 'coming from Albanus to Rome, had forgot behind him 'his familiar Book of Necromancy, which he was wont 'commonly to carry always with him. Whereupon re- 'membring himſelf, entring the Port of Lateran, he call- 'eth two of his moſt truſty familiars to fetch the Book, 'charging them at no hand to look within it. But they 'being ſo reſtrained, were the more deſirous to open it, 'and to peruſe it, and ſo did. After they had read a little 'the ſecrets of the Satanical Book, ſuddenly there came 'about them the meſſengers of Satan, the multitude and 'terrour of whom made them almoſt out of their wits. At 'length they coming to themſelves, the Spirits were inſtant 'upon them to know wherefore they were called 'up, wherefore they were vexed; quickly (ſaid 'they) tell us what ye would us to do, or elſe we will 'fall upon you, if ye retain us longer. Then ſpake one of 'the young men to them, bidding them go and pluck 'down yonder walls, pointing unto certain high walls 'there nigh to Rome, which they did in a moment. The 'young men croſſing them for fear of the Spirits (ſcarce re- 'covering themſelves) at length came to their Maſter.

Ex Benno Cardinali.

And it followeth moreover in the Epiſtle of the ſaid Benno to the Cardinals.

Pope Hildebrand forſaken of the Peers of his Cardinals.

'We have made mention to you before of divers Col- 'ledges of the Church of Rome which refuſed to Commu- 'nicate with him; as Leo then Archprieſt of the Cardi- 'nals, Benno, Ugobaldus, Johannes the Cardinal, Peter 'Chancellor and Cardinal, being all inſtituted before this 'Hildebrand. Theſe three alſo being conſecrated by him, 'that is, Natro, Innocentius, and Leo, forſook him, cur- 'ſing the deteſtable errors which he held. In like caſe Theo- 'dinus whom he conſtituted Archdeacon, and other Car- 'dals more, Johannes Sirnamed Primicerius, Petrus Ob- 'lationarius, with all that appertained to them, ſaving one 'only man. And now when this Hildebrand ſaw that 'the Biſhops alſo would forſake him, he called unto 'him the Laymen, and made them privy of his Council, 'thinking thereby to ſeparate the Biſhops, that they ſhould 'have no conference with the Cardinals. After that he 'called together thoſe Biſhops, and being guarded with 'bands of Lay-men he inforced the Biſhops partly for fear, 'and partly for his menacing words, to ſwear unto him, 'that they ſhould never diſagree unto that which he would 'have done, that they ſhould never defend the Kings quar- 'rel, and that they ſhould never favour nor obey the Pope 'that ſhould in his ſtead be inſtituted. Which thing be- 'ing done he ſent them by means of the Prince of 'Salernites into Campania, and thus did he ſeparate them 'from the company of the Cardinals, and from the City 'of Rome. And not only the Biſhops, but alſo the Prieſts 'of the City, and Clerks of inferior Orders, as alſo the 'Lay-men he bound by their Oaths, that at no time, nor 'for any cauſe they ſhould condeſcend unto the King.

Pope Hildebrand compelleth the Biſhops and Prieſts of Rome to ſwear unto him.

'As ſoon as Pope Alexander was dead, which died 'ſomewhat before night, the ſame day contrary to the 'Canons, he was choſen Pope of the Lay-men. But the 'Cardinals ſubſcribed not to his Election. For the Canons 'preſcribed (under pain of curſing) that none ſhould be 'choſen Pope before the third day after the burial of his 'Predeceſſor. But he (by ſiniſter means thus climing to 'the See) removed the Cardinals of the ſaid See from be- 'ing of the Council. But with what perſons he conſulted 'night and day, Rome well heard and ſaw. And he now 'putting the Cardinals from his Council, his life, faith, and 'doctrine, no man could accuſe or bear witneſs of; whereas 'in the Canons is commanded, that in every place where- 'ſoever the Pope is, ſhould be with him three Cardinals 'being Prieſts, and two Deacons, becauſe of his Eccleſia- 'ſtical teſtimony, and ſtile of verity; of which Canonical 'Decree loore gentle Reader before. He violently wreſted 'the Sacred Scriptures to cover his falſhood, which kind 'of Idolatry how great it is, manifeſtly throughout all the 'Scripture it appeareth. Contrary to the minds and coun- 'ſel of the Cardinals, and beſides the determinate order of 'pronouncing judgment by the Canons, he raſhly did Ex- 'communicate the Emperour, being in no Synod ſolemn- 'ly accuſed before. The ſentence of which Excommuni-

Pope Hildebrand unorderly made Pope.

The Emperor wrongfully Excommunicated.

'cation, after rehearſal of theſe preſents, ſhall alſo be manifeſted (Chriſt willing) to the which Excommunication, ſaith Benno, none of the Cardinals would ſubſcribe. As ſoon as he aroſe out of his Seat Papal, to Excommunicate the Emperor, the ſame Seat (being made but a little before with big Timber) ſuddenly by the appointment of God was rent and ſhivered in pieces; ſo that all men might plainly underſtand, what and how great and terrible Schiſms that Lubber had ſown againſt the Church of Chriſt, againſt the Seat of St. Peter, and how cruelly he had diſperſed the Chair of Chriſt, in defiling the Laws of the Church, ruling by might and auſterity in that his ſo perilous and preſumptuous Excommunication.

The Popes Chair brake under him as he roſe to excommunicate the Emperor.

'In the deſcription of the ſame Excommunication he inſerteth thoſe things wherein he himſelf erred, when he abſolved the Emperor being unjuſtly Excommunicate, and the Biſhops alſo communicating with him, and to the uttermoſt thus cutting and mangling the Unity of the Church, and thoſe that communicated with them, did as much as if him lay to make two Churches.

The Pope divideth the unity of the Church.

'Alſo the ſame bold Merchant commanded that the Cardinals ſhould faſt, to the intent that God would reveal whoſe Opinion was better (either of the Church of Rome, or of Berengarius) touching the controverſie of the Lords Body in the Sacrament. And hereby he proved himſelf to be a manifeſt Infidel, for, that in the Nicene Council it is written, he that doubteth is an Infidel.

'Further, he ſought for a Sign to eſtabliſh his Faith concerning the Article of the Lords Body; as did Gregory to confirm the Womans Faith, when the conſecrated Bread was tranſubſtantiated into the form of a fleſhly Finger. He alſo ſent two Cardinals (Attones and Cunones) unto Anaſtaſe, that with the Archprieſt of the ſame Church they ſhould begin a Faſt of three days ſpace, and that every of them (every day during thoſe three days) ſhould ſay over the Pſalter, and ſing Maſſes, that Chriſt would ſhew unto them ſome ſuch like ſign of his Body, as he did to the foreſaid Gregory; which thing they could not ſee.

Of this Miracle we read in no approved Hiſtory.

'The Emperor was wont oftentimes to go to St. Maries Church in the Mount Aventine to pray. Hildebrand, when he had by his Eſpials ſearched out and knew all the doings of the Emperor, cauſed the place where the Emperor was accuſtomed (either ſtanding or proſtrate on his face to pray) to be marked, and for Money he hired a naughty pack (like himſelf) to gather and lay together a heap of great ſtones directly over the place in the Vault of the Church, where the Emperor would ſtand, that in throwing the ſame down upon his Head, he ſhould ſlay the Emperor. About which purpoſe as the Hireling haſted, and was buſie, removing to the place a ſtone of great hugeneſs and weight, it broke the Plank whereon it lay, and the Hireling ſtanding thereupon, both together fell down from the Roof to the Pavement of the Church, and with the ſame ſtone was daſht all in pieces. And after the Romans had underſtanding of the handling of this matter, they faſtened a Rope to one of the feet of this Hireling, and cauſed him to be drawn through the Streets of the City three days together in example to others. The Emperor notwithſtanding, according to his wonted clemency, cauſed him to be buried.

The Pope hireth one to ſlay the Emperor.

'Johannes Biſhop of Portua (being one of the ſecret Council of Hildebrand) came up into the Pulpit of St. Peter, and amongſt other things in the hearing both of the Clergy and People, ſaid, Hildebrand and we have committed ſuch a fact, and ſo horrible, for the which we are all worthy to be burned alive (meaning of the Sacrament of the Body of Chriſt) which Sacrament Hildebrand, when he thereof required a Divine Anſwer againſt the Emperor, and it would not ſpeak, threw into the fire and burned it, contrary to the perſwaſion of the Cardinals that were there preſent, and would have reſiſted the ſame.

Hildebrand caſteth the Sacrament of the Lords Body in the fire, becauſe it would give him no anſwer.

'In the ſecond holy day in the Eaſter-week, when the Clergy and the People were aſſembled at S. Peter's Church to hear Maſs, after the Goſpel he ſent up into the Pulpit as he was in his Pontifical Attire, and in the preſence of divers Biſhops and Cardinals (a great company both of the Senate and the People of Rome being gathered together) openly preached (among many other words of Divination) that the King, whoſe name was Henry, ſhould die (without all peradventure) before the Feaſt of S. Peter next enſuing: or elſe at leaſtwiſe, that he ſhould be ſo dejected from his Kingdom, that he ſhould not be able any more to gather together above the number of ſix Knights. This he preached to the Biſhops and Cardinals, and all that were preſent, crying out of the Pulpit in theſe words, Never accept me for Pope any more, but pluck me from the Alar, if this Propheſie be not fulfilled by the day appointed. About the ſame time he went about by help of privy Murtherers to kill the Emperor, but God preſerved him. And many there were even at that time, which thought Pope Hildebrand to be guilty, and to be the deviſer of the Treaſon, becauſe that then he (before the deed put in execution) preſumed of the death of the King, being by him falſly propheſied of before; which words of his wounded many mens hearts. And it came to paſs that Hildebrand by his words was openly condemned in the Congregation, which (as is ſaid) gave judgment of himſelf to be no Pope, neither that he would be counted for Pope any longer, but thought to be both a Belier and a Traitor, unleſs that before the Feaſt of S. Peter next coming, the Emperor ſhould die, or elſe ſhould be deprived of all Kingly Honour, inſomuch as he ſhould not be able to make above ſix Knights on his part. And thus by the appointment of God it came to paſs, that by his own mouth he was condemned for an Heretick.

'Thus ſaith the Lord: The Prophet which of arrogancy will propheſie in my name thoſe things I have not commanded him, or elſe will propheſie in the name of other Gods, let him be ſlain. And if thou ſhalt ſay with thy ſelf, How ſhall I know what thing it is that the Lord hath not commanded to be ſpoken? This token ſhalt thou have to know it by; Whatſoever things the Prophet in the Name of God, ſhall propheſie, and the ſame come not to paſs, that mayſt thou be ſure the Lord hath not ſpoken, but the Prophet hath imagined through the haughtineſs of his own mind, and therefore thou ſhalt not be afraid of him.

'When the time was expired that Hildebrand in his Divination had ſet, and that neither the King was dead, neither the power of the Empire impaired; and fearing leſt by the words of his own mouth he ſhould be reprehended and condemned, ſubtilly he turned his Tale, ſaying, and perſwading the ignorant People, that he meant not of the Body of the King, but of his Soul; as though the Soul of the King had loſt all, ſaving ſix of his Knights or Souldiers, or elſe had been dead during that ſpace; and thus by theſe ſleights he beguiled the ignorant people. Againſt ſuch Prophets S. Gregory upon Ezekiel ſaith, Betweeen true Prophets and falſe this difference there is, that true Prophets if they ſpeak any thing upon their own mind they be ſoon rebuked; but the falſe Prophets, both they tell lies, and not having the ſpirit of truth, they perſevere in their falſity.

'Over and beſide, the ſaid Hildebrand judged to death three men before they were convict, or elſe confeſſed their crime, without the ſentence of any Secular judge, and cauſed them to be hanged upon a pair of Gallows, over againſt the Church of St. Peter in a place called Palatiolum, without any delay or adviſement, contrary to the Laws which command that every publick offender ſhould have thirty days ſpace before he be put to execution. Which thing even amongſt the Pagans is in ure and obſerved, as teacheth the authority of S. Ambroſe, and the Martyrdom of holy Marcellianus and Marcus.

Of this apprehenſion, before he was ſet at liberty, he openly forgave all the Conſpirators. Which thing afterwards, contrary to his fidelity, he brake and revenged, and cauſed Centius, to whom he had forgiven all offences, to be taken, and hanged him and nine of his Men upon the Gallows before St. Peter's Porch.

There

'There was at the apprehenſion of Pope Hildebrand a 'certain Widows Son, to whom (and others more for 'their Penance) he enjoyned a years Baniſhment. Which 'time being expleat or run out, the Widow in token of 'more ample ſatisfaction, thinking thereby to have ap-'peaſed the mind of Hildebrand, put a Halter upon her 'Sons Neck, and drawing her Son by the rope unto the 'foot of Hildebrand, ſaid, My Lord Pope, at your hands 'will I receive again my Son, which one whole year hath 'ndured baniſhment, and other Penance, by your Holineſs 'injoyned. Then the ſaid Hildebrand for that inſtant, 'becauſe of thoſe which were with him in company (diſ-'ſembling his wrath) delivered her her Son very churliſh-'ly, ſaying, Get thee hence Woman, I bid thee, and let 'me be in reſt. After this, he ſent his Officers, and ap-'prehended the Widows Son, and gave commandment to 'the Juſtices to put him to death; who all together mak-'ing anſwer, ſaid, That they could no more condemn or 'meddle with him, for that he had for his crime commit-'ted appealed once to the Pope, and abidden the baniſhment, 'and done the Penance by him injoyned. Hereupon this 'glorious Hildebrand, diſpleaſed with the Judges, cauſed 'the foot of the Widows Son to be cut off; making nei-'ther Repentance, nor the Laws and Ordinances to be 'of any eſtimation with him; and thus his foot being 'cut off, he died within three days after with the pain 'thereof. Many other wicked deeds did this Hildebrand, 'upon whom the bloud of the Church crieth vengeance, 'ſhed by the Sword (that is) the miſerable treachery of 'his tongue: for which things (and that juſtly) the 'Church refuſed to communicate with him. Hæc Benno.

The villany of the Pope in killing a widows ſon which before had done his penance.

Another Epiſtle of Benno to the Cardinals.

Another Letter of Benno.

TO the reverend Fathers of the Church of Rome, 'and to his beloved in Chriſt, and to his Brethren 'that ſhall for ever be beloved, Benno the Cardinal of the 'Church of Rome, wiſheth faithful ſervice, health, and 'communion with the ſervants of the Catholick Church. 'Of the which communion, diſcipline and power he vain-'ly braggeth, that by the preſumption of his Authority 'ſhall unjuſtly bind or looſe any manner of perſon. And 'he doth unjuſtly bind whatſoever he be, that curſeth any 'man (being willing to make ſatisfaction, and bewailing 'his boldneſs, being alſo unconvict, and not confeſſing 'the crime) but rather curſing that party in vain, he 'curſeth and condemneth himſelf turning his weapon up-'on his own perſon to his deſtruction. O ſtrange and new 'found treachery proceeding from the Sanctuary, nay ra-'ther, from him which as High-Prieſt ſeemeth to rule the 'Church, and to be a Judge over the Judges.

The deviliſh practice of Hildebrand in ſering the Biſhops againſt the Emperor.

'Hildebrand was earneſtly in hand with the Emperor, 'that he ſhould deprive thoſe Biſhops, which came in by 'Simony. The Emperor (thinking, as a zealous Prince, 'that this Commiſſion had proceeded from the Throne 'of God) without delay obeyed the ſame, and forthwith 'without any conſideration, or judicial order, deprived 'certain Biſhops, and thought that by this his obedience to 'Hildebrand he offered an acceptable Sacrifice to God; 'not knowing the crafty handling of him. But Hilde-'brand then again placed thoſe, whom the Emperor for 'Simony at his commandment had before depoſed, and 'thoſe whom by that means he made to bear a hateful 'heart to the Emperor, he reconciled again to himſelf in 'great familiarity; and by many and great Oaths taken 'of them, for their fidelity towards him, he promoted 'them above all the reſt. And thus by theſe pranks, the 'Imperial Seat of the King being ſhortly after impaired, 'and deſtitute almoſt of friends, he craftily purchaſing the 'friendſhip and favour of the greateſt Princes, the better to 'bring his matters to paſs; ſuddenly again, without any 'lawful accuſation, without any Canonical vocation, with-'out all judicial order, he excommunicated the Emperor '(ſo obedient always unto him) and ſet the Princes of the 'Empire all againſt him. And notwithſtanding (as the 'Apoſtle ſaith) that no Man ought to circumvent his 'Brother in his buſineſs, as much as in him lay, he rather 'mortified and killed him, than brotherly corrected him. 'Thus the Emperor being many ways circumvented, as ex-'communicated beſides the Canonical Order, and by the 'conſent and counſel of Hildebrand, ſpoiled of the greateſt 'part of his Imperial Honour, and overcharged with great 'Wars and Slaughters of his own Subjects, in vain deſired 'and ſued to have the Canon read and heard, cauſing him 'by force and violence at Canuſium, in the preſence of Hil-'debrand, to accuſe himſelf by his own confeſſion.

The Emperor cauſed by Hildebrand to accuſe himſelf.

'Say you now (I pray you) all ſuch as love juſtice, and 'love not to lean either upon the left hand, or elſe the right 'hand, in favour of any perſon; ſay your minds, whe-'ther that ſuch a confeſſion being forced upon never ſo 'poor a Man (much more upon an Emperor) ought at 'ſuch a time to be prejudicial or not? Or whether he, 'which extorted the ſame confeſſion is guilty of the Ca-'non? Or elſe he, which being ſo perverſly judged, ſuffer-'ed the injury of a moſt perverſe Judge? Which alſo moſt 'patiently and publickly ſuffered this violence with lament-'able affliction upon his bare feet, clothed in thin garments, 'in the ſharp Winter, which never was uſed, and was three 'days together at Canuſium made a ſpectacle both of An-'gels and Men, and a ludibrious Mocking-ſtock to that proud 'Hildebrand. Never truſt me, if that fourteen Cardinals, 'the Archdeacon himſelf, and he that is called Primicerius, 'being all wiſe and religious Men, beſides many other of 'the Clerks of Lateran (to the judgment and priviledge 'of whoſe holy ſeat the whole World is obedient) weighing 'and conſidering his intolerable Apoſtaſie, departed not 'from participating, and refuſed communicating with him.

The great Reverence of the godly Emperor.

'This glorious Hildebrand, and his affinity, by their 'new Authority, breaking the Decrees of the Chalcedon 'Council, not only in words, but alſo in publick Writings 'have agreed, that it is tolerable both to baptiſe and com-'municate being out of the Church of God: and how blind 'theſe men were, and alſo what Hereticks they be, their own 'writings do declare. What a miſchief is this (ſaith Ben-'no) they preſume to judge of the Church, which ſwarm 'themſelves in all errors, who alſo eſteem the verity but 'as a lye; and leſt their poyſoned falſhood both in words 'and writings ſhould appear, they have like ſubtil poyſoners '(the ſooner to deceive) mixed honey therewithal. A lie, ſaith St. Auguſtine, is every thing pronounced with the in-'tent of deceiving of others.

Mendacium quid.

It were too long and tedious here to recite all the deteſtable doings, and diabolical practices of Conjurings, Charms and filthy Sorceries, exerciſed between him and Laurentius, and Theophylact, otherwiſe named Pope Benedict the ninth, whereof a long narration followeth in the foreſaid Epiſtle of Benno to the Cardinals, to be ſeen, to whom the Reader may repair, whoſo hath either leiſure to read or mind to underſtand more of the abominable parts and deviliſh acts of this Hildebrand.

Pope Hildebrand a worker of Sorcery and Conjuring.

Thus having ſufficiently alledged the words and teſtimonies of Benno and Aventinus, concerning the acts and facts of this Pope; now let us proceed (in the order as followeth in his ſtory) to ſet forth the miſerable vexation which the vertuous and godly Emperor ſuſtained by that ungodly perſon.

About what time Hildebrand was made Pope, Henricus the fourth Emperor was incumbred and much vexed with civil diſſention in Germany, by reaſon of certain grievances of the Saxons againſt him and his Father Henricus the third. Whereupon the matter growing to ſedition, ſides were taken, and great Wars enſued betwixt Otho Duke of Saxony, and Henricus the Emperor. This buſie time ſeemed to Hildebrand very opportune to work his feats, whoſe ſtudy and drift was ever from the beginning to advance the Dominion of the Romiſh ſeat above all other Biſhops, and alſo to preſs down the authority of the Temporal Rulers, under the Spiritual Men of the Church. And although he went about the ſame long before by ſubtil traines and acts ſet forth concerning Simony; yet now he thought more effectuouſly to accompliſh his purpoſed intent after that he was exalted thither where he would be. And therefore now bearing himſelf the bolder, by the authority of St. Peter's Throne, firſt he began to purſue the act ſet out by his Predeceſſor, as touching Simony, curſing and excommunicating, whoſoever they were, that received any ſpiritual living or promotion at Lay mens hands, as alſo all ſuch as were the givers thereof. For this he called then Simony, that under that colour he might defeat the Temporal Poteſtates of their right,

Henricus Emperor.

Much ado made of Peters Throne, but his life they let alone.

and ſo bring the whole Clergy at length to the lure of Rome. And forſomuch as the Emperor was the Head, thinking firſt to begin with him, he ſendeth for him by Letters and Legates to appear in the Council of Lateran at Rome. But the Emperor buſied in his Wars againſt the Saxons, had no leiſure to attend to Councils. Notwithſtanding Gregorius the Pope proceedeth in his Council, rendring there the cauſe and reaſon before the Biſhops, why he had Excommunicated divers of the Clergy, as Herman Biſhop of Bamberge, Counſellor to the Emperor, and other Prieſts more for Simony. And there moreover, in the ſaid Council he threatneth to Excommunicate likewiſe the Emperor himſelf, and to depoſe him from his Regal Kingdom, unleſs he would abrenounce the Hereſie of Simony, and do Penance. The Council being ended, Guibertus Archbiſhop of Ravenna perſwaded with one Centius (a Roman, the Captains Son, whom the Pope had Excommunicated) to take the Emperors part againſt the Pope, who watching his time in the Temple of St. Mary, upon Chriſtmaſs day in the morning, taketh the Pope and putteth him faſt in a ſtrong Tower. The next day the People of Rome hearing this, harneſs themſelves with all expedition to help the Biſhop, whom when they looſed out of Priſon, they belieged the Houſe of Centius, and pluckt it down to the ground; his Family having their Noſes cut off, were caſt out of the City; Centius himſelf eſcaping, fled to the Emperor. Guibert the Archbiſhop, pretending good will to the Pope, departed from Rome, who likewiſe had wrought with Hugo Candidus Cardinal, and with Theobaldus Archbiſhop of Millain, alſo with divers other Biſhops about Italy, to forſake the Pope and take the Emperors part. Gregory the Pope called Hildebrand, hearing the Conſpiracy, layeth the ſentence of Excommunication upon them all, and depriveth them of their Dignity. The Emperor being moved (not unworthily) with the arrogant preſumption of the proud Prelate, called together a Council at Wormes. In which Council all the Biſhops not only of Saxony, but of all the whole Empire of Germans, agree and conclude upon the Depoſition of Hildebrand, and that no obedience hereafter ſhould be given to him. This being determined in the Council, Roulandus a Prieſt of Parmen, was ſent to Rome with the ſentence, who in the name of the Councill ſhould command Gregory to yield up his Seat, and alſo charge the Cardinals to reſort to the Emperor for a new Election of another Pope. The tenor of the Sentence ſent by Roulandus was this.

Hermannus Excommunicate of Hildebrand.

Hildebrand caſt in the Tower.

Guibertus Archbiſhop of Ravenna.

The Sentence of the Council of Wormes againſt Hildebrand.

The Council of Wormes againſt the Pope.

FOrſomuch as thy firſt ingreſs and coming in hath been ſo ſpotted with ſo many perjuries, and alſo the Church of God brought into no little danger through thine abuſe and new fangleneſs: moreover, becauſe thou haſt defamed thine own life and converſation, with ſo much and great diſhoneſty, that we ſee no little peril or ſlander to riſe thereof; therefore the obedience, which yet we never promiſed thee, hereafter we utterly renounce, and never intend to give thee. And as thou haſt never taken us yet for Biſhops (as thou haſt openly reported of us) ſo neither will we hereafter take thee to be Apoſtolick. Vale.

Henricus the Emperor excommunicated by Hildebrand.

Gregory the Pope, tickled with this Sentence, firſt condemneth it in his Council of Lateran with Excommunication. Secondly, depriveth Sigifridus Archbiſhop of Mentz of his Dignities and Eccleſiaſtical Livings, with all other Biſhops, Abbots and Prieſts, as many as took the Emperors part. Thirdly, accuſeth Henricus the Emperor himſelf, depriveth him of his Kingdom and Regal poſſeſſion, and releaſeth all his Subjects of their Oath of Allegeance given unto him, after this form and manner.

The Tenor of the Sentence Excommunicatory, againſt Henricus the Emperor by Pope Hildebrand.

OBleſſed St. Peter Prince of the Apoſtles, bow down thine ears I beſeech thee, and hear me thy Servant, whom thou haſt brought up even from mine infancy, and haſt delivered me until this day from the hands of the wicked, which hate and perſecute me, becauſe of my faith in thee. Thou art my witneſs, and alſo the bleſſed Mother of Jeſus Chriſt, and thy Brother St. Paul, fellow partner of thy Martyrdom, how that I entred this Function not willingly, but inforced againſt my will; not that I take it ſo as a Robbery, lawfully to aſcend into this Seat; but becauſe that I had rather paſs over my life like a pilgrim or private perſon, than for any fame or glory to climb up to it; I do acknowledge (and that worthily) all this to come of thy grace, and not of my merits, that this charge over Chriſtian people, and this power of binding and looſing is committed to me. Wherefore, truſting upon this aſſurance for the dignity and tuition of Holy Church in the Name of God Omnipotent, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, I do here depoſe Henry, the Son of Henry once the Emperor, from his Imperial Seat, and Princely Government, who hath ſo boldly and preſumptuouſly laid hands upon thy Church. And furthermore, all ſuch as heretofore have ſworn to be his Subjects, I releaſe them of their Oath, whereby all Subjects are bound to the Allegiance of their Princes. For it is meet and convenient, that he ſhould be void of Dignity, which ſeeketh to diminiſh the Majeſty of thy Church. Moreover, for that he hath contemned my monitions, tending to his health and wealth of his People; and hath ſeparate himſelf from the fellowſhip of the Church (which he, through his ſeditions, ſtudieth to deſtroy) therefore I bind him by vertue of Excommunication, truſting and knowing moſt certainly, that thou art Peter (in the Rock of whom as in the true foundation) Chriſt our King hath built his Church.

Ex Platina.

Mark this ye Papiſts, that ſay, the Pope cannot err.

The Pope threatneth kindneſs of St. Peter.

Quis tulerit Gracchos de ſeditione querentes? Juven.

The Emperor, thus aſſaulted with the Popes cenſure, ſendeth abroad his Letters through all Nations to purge himſelf, declaring how wrongfully, and againſt all right he was condemned. The Princes of Almany partly fearing the crack of the Popes Thunderclap, partly again rejoycing that occaſion was renewed to rebel againſt the Emperor, aſſembled a Commenſement, where they did conſult and ſo conclude to elect another Emperor, and ſo fall from Henry, unleſs the Pope would come to Germany, and he would there be content to ſubmit himſelf and obtain his pardon.

The Saxons take the Popes part againſt the Emperor.

Wherein is to be conſidered the lamentable affections of the Germans in thoſe days, ſo to forſake ſuch a valiant Emperor, and ſo much to repute a vile Biſhop. But this was the rudeneſs of the World then, for lack of better knowledge. The Emperor, ſeeing the chief Princes ready to forſake him, promiſeth them with an Oath, that if the Pope would repair to Germany, he would ask forgiveneſs.

Upon this the Biſhop of Triers was ſent up in Commiſſion to Rome, to intreat the Pope to come into Germany. The Biſhop (at the inſtant of the Legat and of the Princes, was content. He entred into Germany, thinking to come to Auguſta. After he was come to Vercellos (the Biſhop of that City being the Chancellor of Italy, and deſirous to diſturb peace for the old grudge he had to the Emperor) falſly perſwaded with the Pope, that he was certain the Emperor was coming with a mighty great Army againſt him, counſelling him therefore to provide betimes for his own ſafeguard in ſome ſtronger place. Whereby the Popes mind being altered, he retired back to Canuſium or Canoſſus, a City being ſubject to Matilda, a Counteſs of Italy, where he ſhould not need to fear the Emperor.

Peace diſturbed through wicked Counſels.

Henricus underſtanding the falſe fear of the Pope, and of his retire to Canuſium, incontinent (coming out of Spire with his Wife and his young Son, in the deep and ſharp of Winter) reſorteth to Canoſſus. All his Peers and Nobles had left him for fear of the Popes curſe, neither did any accompany him. Wherefore the Emperor, being not a little troubled (laying apart his Regal Ornaments)

came barefooted with his Wife and Child to the Gate of Canoſſus, where he from Morning to Night (all the day faſting) moſt humbly deſireth abſolution, craving to be let in, to the ſpeech of the Biſhop. But no ingreſs might be given him once within the Gates. Thus he continuing three days together in his petition and ſute; at length anſwer came, that the Popes Majeſty had yet no leiſure to talk with him. The Emperor nothing moved therewith, that he was not let into the City, patient and with an humble mind abideth without the Walls, with no little grievance and painful labour; for it was a ſharp Winter, and all frozen with cold. Notwithſtanding, yet through his importunate ſute at length it was granted, through the intreating of Matilda the Popes Paramour, and of Arelatus Earl of Sebaudia, and the Abbot of Cluniake, that he ſhould be admitted to the Popes ſpeech. On the fourth day being let in, for a token of his true repentance, he yieldeth to the Popes hands his Crown, with all other ornaments imperial, and confeſſed himſelf unworthy of the Empire, if ever he do againſt the Pope hereafter, as he hath done before, deſiring for that time to be abſolved and forgiven. The Pope anſwereth, he will neither forgive him, nor releaſe the bond of his Excommunication, but upon conditions. Firſt, to promiſe that he ſhall be content to ſtand to his arbitrement in the Council, and to take ſuch Penance as he ſhall injoyn him; alſo that he ſhall be preſt and ready to appear, in what place or time the Pope ſhall appoint him. Moreover, that he, being content to take the Pope Judge of his cauſe, ſhall anſwer in the ſaid Council to all objections and accuſations laid againſt him, and that he ſhall never ſeek any revengement herein. Item, that he (though he be quit and cleared therein) ſhall ſtand to the Popes mind and pleaſure, whether to have his Kingdom reſtored, or to loſe it. Finally, that before the trial of his cauſe, he ſhall neither uſe his Kingly Ornaments, Scepters or Crown, nor uſurp the authority to govern, nor to exact any Oath of Allegiance upon his Subjects, &c. Theſe things being promiſed to the Biſhop by an Oath, and put in writing, the Emperor is only releaſed of Excommunication.

Notable patience in a Noble Emperor.

Proud conditions of the Pope.

Pope both accuſer and judge.

Here the Beaſt of the Apocalyps appeareth in his colours.

Henricus the Emperor, with his wife and child waiting barefoot and bareleged, three days and three nights, at the gates of Canuſium.

The form and tenor of the Oath, which Henricus made to the Pope.

I Henricus King, after peace and agreement made to the mind and ſentence of our Lord Gregorius the Seventh, promiſe to keep all Covenants and Bonds betwixt us, and to provide that the Pope go ſafely whereſoever he will, without any danger either to him, or to his Retinue; eſpecially in all ſuch places as be ſubject to our Empire. Nor that I ſhall at any time ſtay or hinder him, but that he may do that belongeth to his Function, where and whenſoever his pleaſure ſhall be. And theſe things I bind my ſelf with an Oath to keep. Actum Canoſ. 5. Calend. Februarii, indic. 15.

Thus the matter being decided between them after the Popes own preſcribement, the Emperor taketh his journey to Papia. The Pope with his Cardinals did vaunt and triumph with no little pride, that they had ſo quailed the Emperor, and brought him on his knees to ask them forgiveneſs. Yet notwithſtanding, miſtruſting themſelves, and miſdoubting time, what might befall them hereafter if fortune ſhould turn, and God give the Emperor to enjoy a more quiet Kingdom; therefore to prevent ſuch dangers betime, they ſtudy and conſult privily with themſelves how to diſplace Henry clean from his Kingdom, and how that device might ſafely be conveied. They conclude and determine to derive the Empire unto Rodulphus, a Man of great Nobility amongſt the chiefeſt States of Germany; and alſo to incite and ſtir up all other Princes and Subjects (being yet free and diſcharged from their Oaths) againſt Henry, and ſo by force of Arms to expel the Emperor out of his Kingdom. To bring this purpoſe the better to paſs, Legates were ſent down from the Pope, Sigehardus Patriarch of Aiquilia, and Altimanus Biſhop of Padway, which ſhould perſwade through all France, that Henry the Emperor was rightfully excommunicated, and that they ſhould give to the Biſhop of Rome their conſents in chooſing Rodulphus to be Emperor. This being done, there was ſent to the ſaid Rodulphus, Duke of Suevia, a Crown from the Pope with this Verſe;

The crafty conſpiracy of the Cardinals againſt the Emperor.

Petra dedit Petro, Petrus Diadema Rodulpho. The Verſe

The Rock gave the Crown to Peter,
Peter giveth it to Rodulph.

Here by the way of digreſſion (to make a little gloſs upon this barbarous Verſe) two notable lies are to be noted. One, where he lyeth upon Chriſt, the other, where he lyeth upon St. Peter. Firſt, that Chriſt gave any Temporal Diadem to Peter, it is a moſt manifeſt lie, and and againſt the Scriptures, when as he would not take it, being given to himſelf, and ſaith, his Kingdom is not of this World. Again, where he ſaith that Peter giveth it to Rodulph, here he playeth the Poet; for neither had Peter any ſuch thing to give; and if he had, yet he would not have given it to Rodulphus from the right Heir; neither is it true that Peter did give it, becauſe Hildebrand gave it. For it is no good argument, Hildebrand did give it, Ergo, Peter did give it; except ye will ſay, Hildebrand ſtirred up great Wars and Bloudſhed in Germany; Ergo, Peter ſtirred up great Wars in Germany. So Peter neither could, nor would, nor did give it to Rodulphus, but only Hildebrand the Pope; who after he had ſo done, he gave in commandment to the Archbiſhop of Mentz, and of Cullen to elect this Rodulphus for Emperor, and to annoint him King, and alſo to defend him with all force and ſtrength they might.

The gloſs upon the Verſe of Hildebrand.

The Pope proved a double lier.

While this Conſpiracy was in hand, Henricus the Emperor was abſent, and the Popes Ambaſſadors with him alſo. In the mean ſpace Rodulphus was elected Emperor, unknown to Henry. Upon this cometh the Biſhop of Strasborough unto the Emperor, certifying him what was done. He ſuſpecting and ſeeing the ſtomach and doings of the Saxons ſo bent againſt him, muſtereth his Men with expedition, and marcheth forward to defend his right; but firſt ſendeth to Rome (truſting upon the League betwixt him and his Pope) and requireth the Biſhop to proceed with his Sentence againſt Rodulphus, for the rebellious Invaſion of his Empire. But the Biſhop, minding nothing leſs, ſendeth word again, that it was not right to condemn any perſon, his cauſe being not heard; thus under pretence of the Law, colouring his unlawful treachery. Henricus, thus diſappointed and forſaken on every ſide, with his Men about him, attempteth Battel againſt Rodulphus. In which Battel a marvellous great ſlaughter was on both ſides, but the Victory on neither part certain; ſo that both the Captains yet challenged the Empire. After the Battel, and great murther on both ſides, they both ſent to Rome, to know of the Popes determination, to whether of them two he judged the right Title of the Empire to appertain. The Biſhop commanded them both to break up their Armies, and depart the Field, promiſing that he ſhortly would call a Council where this matter ſhould be diſputed; in the mean time they ſhould ceaſe from War. But before the Meſſengers returned again (their Armies being refreſhed) they had another conflict together, but not Victory got on either part. Thus both the Captains being wearied in Wars, the Romiſh Beaſt the Biſhop, which was the cauſe thereof, perceiving whither theſe cruel Wars would tend, to the great calamity not only of the Germans, but alſo of other Nations (truſting to find another way to help Rodulphus and his adherents) ſendeth down a Commiſſion by Otho Archbiſhop of Trevers, Bernardus Deacon, and Bernardus Abbot of Maſſilia, to whom he gave in charge that they ſhould call together a Council or ſitting in Almany, and that there it ſhould be defined to whether part the Empire ſhould pertain, by moſt right and publick conſideration; promiſing that what they ſhould therein determine, he (looking upon the matter through the authority of God omnioptent, and of St. Peter and St. Paul) would ratifie the ſame. Moreover, for that no let nor impeachment ſhould happen to the Legates by the way, he giveth with them Letters to the Princes and Nations of Germany; whereof the contents be declared briefly in Platina, if any liſt to read them.

The Pope ſolitor to the Emperor.

Great Wars ſtirred up by the Pope.

But the Emperor would not ſo permit the Legates to have any Council within Germany, except they would firſt deprive Rodulphus of his Kingdom. The Legates, conſidering that to be againſt the drift and intention of the Pope, returned again from whence they came. The Pope hearing this, and ſeeing his purpoſe was ſo diſappointed by the Emperor, draweth out another Excommunication againſt him, and again bereaveth him of his Kingdom; ſending about his Letters Excommunicatory throughout all places, thinking thereby to further the part of Rodulphus the better. Platina hath in his Book the whole effect of the writing, which tendeth after this ſort:

The Copy of the ſecond Excommunication of Hildibrand againſt the Emperor.

BLeſſed St. Peter, Prince of the Apoſtles, and thou St. Paul alſo, the teacher of the Gentiles, give ear unto me I beſeech you a little, and gently hear me, for you are the diſciples and lovers of truth. The things that I ſhall ſay are true. This matter I take in hand for truth ſake, that my brethren (whoſe ſalvation I ſeek) may the more obſequiouſly obey me, and better underſtand, how that I truſting upon your defence (next to Chriſt, and his Mother the immaculate Virgin) reſiſt the wicked, and am ready to help the faithful. I did not enter this Seat of mine own accord, but much againſt my will, and with tears, for that I accounted my ſelf unworthy to occupy ſo high a Throne. And this I ſay, not that I have choſen you, but you have choſen me, and have laid this great burthen upon our ſhoulders. And now, whereas by this your aſſignment, I have aſcended up this Hill, crying to the people, and ſhewing them their faults, and to the children of the Church their iniquities; the members of Satan have riſen up againſt me, and have laid hands together to ſeek my blood. For the Kings of the Earth have riſen up againſt me, and the Princes of this World, with whom alſo have conſpired certain of the Clergy Subjects againſt the Lord, and againſt us his anointed, ſaying, Let us break aſunder their bonds, and caſt off from us their yoke. This have they done againſt me, to bring me either to death or to baniſhment. In the number of whom is Henricus, whom they call King, the Son of Henry the Emperor, which hath lift up ſo proudly his horns and heel againſt the Church of God, making Conſpiracy with divers other Biſhops, both Italians, French and Germans. Againſt the pride of whom hitherto your authority hath reſiſted; who rather being broken than amended, coming to me in Ciſalpina, made humble ſute to me for Pardon and Abſolution. I, thinking nothing elſe but true repentance in him, received him again to favour, and did reſtore him to the Communion only, from which he was Excommunicate; but to his Kingdom (from which in the Synod of Rome he was worthily expelled) I did not reſtore him, nor to the rents and fruits thereof, (that he might return to the Faith again) that I granted not to him. And that I did for this purpoſe, that if he ſhould defer to fall to agreement with certain of his Neighbours whom he hath always vexed, and to reſtore again the Goods both of the Church and otherwiſe, then he might be compelled by the Cenſures of the Church, and force of Arms thereunto. Whereby divers and ſundry Biſhops and Princes of Germany (ſuch as he had long troubled) being helped by this opportunity, Elected Rodulphus their Duke to be King in the place of Henricus, whom they for his tranſgreſſions had removed and diſpatched from his Empire. But Rodulphus, firſt in this matter uſing a Princely modeſty and integrity, ſent up his meſſengers to me, declaring how he was conſtrained (wild he, nild he) to take that Regal Government upon him, albeit he was not ſo deſirous thereof, but that he would rather ſhew himſelf obedient to us, than to the other that offered him the Kingdom; and whatſoever our arbitrement ſhould be therein, he would be under obedience both of God and of us. And for more aſſurance of his obedience, he hath ſent his own children hither for pledges. Upon this Henricus began to ſnuff, and firſt intreated us to reſtrain and inhibite Rodulphus, through the pain of our curſe, from the uſurpation of his Kingdom. I anſwered again, I would ſee whether of them had more right and title thereunto, and ſo ſend our Legates thither upon the ſame, to know the whole ſtate of the matter; and thereupon I would decide betwixt them, whether of them had the truer part. But Henricus would not ſuffer our Legates to come to take up the matter, and ſlew divers, both Secular Men, and of the Clergy, ſpoyling and prophaning Churches; and ſo by this means hath indangered himſelf in the Bonds of Excommunication. I therefore truſting in the judgment and mercy of God, and in the ſupportation of the Bleſſed Virgin, alſo upon your authority, do lay the Sentence of Curſe upon the ſaid Henricus, and all his adherents; and here again I take his Regal Government from him, charging and forbidding all Chriſtian Men that have been ſworn unto him, whom I diſcharge here of their Oath, that hereafter they obey him in nothing,

O peſtiferous hypocrite.

The more to blame Emperors to ſuffer you to be ſo faucy with them.

but that they take Rodulphus to their King, who is elected by many Princes of the Province. For ſo right it is and convenient, that as Henry for his pride and ſtubborneſs is deprived of his dignity and poſſeſſion; ſo Rodulphus, being grateful to all men for his virtue and devotion, be exalted to the imperial Throne and Dominion.

Therefore, O you bleſſed Princes of the Apoſtles, grant to this, and confirm with your authority that I have ſaid, ſo that all men may underſtand, if you have power to bind and looſe in Heaven, you have alſo power in Earth to give and take away Empires, Kingdoms, Principalities, and whatſoever here in Earth belongeth to mortal men. For if you have power to judge in ſuch matters as appertain to God: what then ſhould we think you have of theſe inferiour and prophane things? And if it be in your power to judge the Angels, ruling over proud Princes, what then ſhall it beſeem you to do upon their Servants? Therefore let the Kings underſtand by this example, and all other Princes of the World, what you be able to do in Heaven, and what you are with God; that thereby they may fear to contemn the Commandment of Holy Church. And now do you exerciſe this judgement quickly upon Henricus, *whereby all men may ſee this ſon of iniquity to fall from his Kingdom, not by any chance, but by your proviſion and only work. Confer this clauſe with the Hiſtory of the ſtory hereafter. O double Hypocrite.

Guibertus Archbiſhop deprived.

Furthermore, Hildebrand, not yet content with this, interdicteth and depoſeth alſo Guibertus Archbiſhop of Ravenna, for taking the Emperors part, commanding al Prieſts to give no manner of obedience to him, and ſendeth thither to Ravenna another Archbiſhop with full authority.

The 4. battel betwixt Henry and Rodulph. Henricus Victor.

After and upon this, Henricus and Rodulphus, to try the matter by the ſword, coped together in Battel, not without Bloudſhed, where Henricus, by the favour of God, againſt the judgement of Hildebrand, had the Victory. Rodulphus there greatly wounded in the conflict, was had out of the Army, and carried to Hyperbolis, where he commanded the Biſhops and chief doers of his conſpiracy to be brought before him. When they came, he lifted up his right hand in which he had taken his deadly wound, and ſaid, This is the Hand which gave the Oath and Sacrament unto Henricus my Prince, and which through your inſtigation ſo oft hath fought againſt him in vain; now go and perform your firſt Oath and Allegiance to your King; for I muſt to my fathers, and ſo died. Thus the Pope gave Battel, but God gave the Victory.

Rodulphus at his death repenteth. The Pope giveth War. God giveth Victory.

Henricus (after his enemy being thus ſubdued, and Wars being ceaſed in Germany) forgat not the old injuries received of Hildebrand, by whom he was twice excommunicated, and expelled from his Kingdom, and three days making humble ſute (yea and that in ſharp Winter) could find no favour with him. Belides that, he incited moreover, and aided his enemy againſt him. Wherefore he calleth together a Council or Aſſembly of divers Biſhops of Italy, Lombardy, and Germany at Brixia 1083. where he purged himſelf, and accuſed the Biſhop Hildebrand of divers crimes, to be an uſurper, perjured, a Necromancer and Sorcerer, a ſower of diſcord; complaining moreover of wrongs and injuries done by the Biſhop and Church of Rome, in that the Church of Rome preferred the Biſhop before him; when that his Father, being Emperor before him, had inthronized and ſet in divers and ſundry Biſhops there by his aſſignment, without all others Election. And now this Biſhop, contrary to his Oath and Promiſe made, thruſt in himſelf without the will and knowldge of him, being their King and Magiſtrate. For, in the time of his Father Henricus the third, this Hildebrand with other, bound themſelves with a Corporal Oath, that ſo long as the Emperor, and his Son now being King, ſhould live, they ſhould neither themſelves preſume, nor ſuffer any other to aſpire to the Papal Seat, without the aſſent and approbation of the foreſaid Emperors; which now this Hildebrand, contrary to his Corporal Oath, had done. Wherefore the foreſaid Council, with one agreement condemned this Gregory, that he ſhould be depoſed. The Tenor of which Condemnation is thus expreſſed in Abbate Uſpergenſi.

Concilium Brixienſe. {Anno 1083.}

No Biſhop of Rome can be choſen without conſent of the Emperor.

Abbas Uſpergenſis.

The Sentence of the Council of Brixia againſt Hildebrand.

BEcauſe it is not unknown, this Biſhop not to be elected of God, but to have intruded himſelf by fraud and money, who hath ſubverted all Eccleſiaſtical Order, who hath diſturbed the government of the Chriſtian Empire, menacing death of body and ſoul againſt our Catholick and peaceable King, who hath ſet up and maintained a perjured King, ſowing diſcord where concord was, cauſing debate amongſt friends, ſlanders and offences amongſt brethren, divorcements and ſeparation amongſt the married, for he took away the Marriage of Prieſts, as Henr. Mutius witneſſeth, and finally diſquieting the peaceable ſtate of all quiet life: Therefore we here in the Name and Authority of God congregate together, with the Legates and hands of nineteen Biſhops, the day of Pentecoſt at Mentz, do proceed in canonical judgement againſt Hildebrand, a man moſt wicked, preaching ſacrilege and burning, maintaining perjury and murthers, calling in queſtion the Catholick Faith of the Body and Bloud of the Lord, a follower of Divination and Dreams, a manifeſt Necromancer, a Sorcerer, and infected with a Pythonical Spirit, and therefore departed from the true faith, and we judge him to be depoſed and expelled, and unleſs he hearing this, ſhall yield and depart the Seat, to be perpetually condemned. Enacted 7. Calend. Julii, feria. 5. Indictione 3.

Note here the Pope judged and depoſed the council.

This being enacted and ſent to Rome, they elected Guibertus Archbiſhop of Ravenna in the place of Hildebrand, to govern the Church of Rome, named Clemens the third. But when Hildebrand neither would give over his hold, nor give place to Clement; the Emperor, gathering an Army to ſend to Italy, came to Rome to depoſe Gregory, and to place Clement. But Hildebrand, ſending to Matilda the Counteſs before mentioned, required her (in remiſſion of all her ſins) to withſtand Henry the Emperor, and ſo ſhe did. Notwithſtanding Henricus prevailing came to Rome, where he beſieged the City all the Lent, and after Eaſter got it, the Romans being compelled to open the Gates unto him; ſo he coming to the Temple of St. Peter, there placeth Clement in his Papacy. Hildebrand ſtraight flyeth into Adrian's Tower with his adherents, where he, being beſet round about, at length ſendeth for Robert Guiſcardus his friend, a Norman. In the mean time, while Robertus collecteth his power, the Abbot of Cluniake, conferring with Gregory exhorteth him to Crown Henricus Emperor in Lateran: Which if he would do, the other promiſeth to bring about that Henry ſhould depart with his Army into Germany; whereunto the People of Rome alſo did likewiſe move him. To whom Gregory anſwered, That he was content ſo to do, but upon condition that the Emperor would ſubmit himſelf to ask pardon, to amend his fault, and to promiſe obedience. The Emperor not agreeing to thoſe conditions, went to Senas, taking Clement, new ſtalled Pope with him.

The Pope ſeeketh ſuccour of his Paramour. The firſt example to fight for remiſſion of ſins, began in Hildebrand.

After the return of the Emperor, the foreſaid Robert Guiſcardus, approaching with his Souldiers, burſt in at one of the Gates, and ſpoileth the City. And not long after, delivereth Hildebrand out of his enemies hands, and carried him away to Campania; where he not long continuing, after died in Exile.

Platina. Naucterus. Sabellicus. Crantzius, Benno, &c.

Antonius writeth, that Hildebrand, as he did lie a dying, called to him one of his chief Cardinals, bewailing to him his fault and miſorder of his ſpiritual Miniſtery, in ſtirring up Diſcord, War and Diſſention, whereupon he deſired the Cardinal to go to the Emperor, and deſire of him forgiveneſs, abſolving from the danger of Excommunication both him and all his partakers both quick and dead.

Thus haſt thou (gentle Reader) the full Hiſtory of Pope Gregory the ſeventh, called Hildebrand; which I have laid out more at large, becauſe that from this Pope (if thou mark well) ſpringeth all the occaſions of miſchief, of pomp, pride, ſtoutneſs, preſumption and tyranny, which ſince that time hath reigned in his ſucceſſors hitherto, in the Cathedral Church of the Romiſh Clergy. For here came firſt the ſubjection of the temporal regiment under the ſpiritual juriſdiction; and Emperors, which before were their Maſters, now are made their their underlings. Alſo here came in the ſuppreſſion of Prieſts Marriage, as is ſufficiently declared. Here came in moreover the authority of both the Swords Spirittual and Secular into ſpiritual Mens hands. So that Chriſtian Magiſtrates could do nothing in Election, in giving Biſhopricks or Benefices, in calling Councils, in hearing and correcting the exceſſes of the Clergy, but only the Pope muſt do all. Yea moreover, no Biſhop nor Paſtor in his own Pariſh could excommunicate or exerciſe any diſcipline among his Flock, but only the Pope challenged that Prerogative to himſelf. Finally, here came in the firſt example to perſecute Emperors and Kings with Rebellion and Excommunication, as the Clergy themſelves hereafter do teſtifie and witneſs in proceeding againſt Paſchalis. Thus theſe Notes being well obſerved, let us (by the grace of Chriſt) now repair again to our Country Hiſtory of England.

About the death of Pope Hildebrand (or not long after) followed the death of King William the Conqueror, in the year 1090. after he had reigned in England the ſpace of one and twenty Years, and ten Months. The cauſe of his ſickneſs and death is ſaid to be this: For that Philip the French King, upon a time (jelting) ſaid, that King William lay in Child-bed, and nouriſhed his fat Belly. To this the foreſaid William, hearing thereof, anſwered again and ſaid, When he ſhould be Churched, he would offer a thouſand Candles to him in France, wherewithal the King ſhould have little joy. Whereupon King William in the Month of July (when the Corn, Fruit and Grapes were moſt flouriſhing) entred into France, and ſet on fire many Cities and Towns in the Weſt ſide of France. And laſtly, coming to the City of Meaux, where he burning a Woman being as a recluſe in a Wall incloſed (or as ſome ſay, two Men Anchorites incloſed) was ſo fervent and furious about the fire, that with the heat partly of the fire, partly of the time of the year, thereby he fell into ſickneſs, and died upon the ſame.

By the life and acts of this King it may appear true, as ſtories of him report, that he was wiſe, but guileful; rich, but covetous; a fair ſpeaker, but a great diſſembler; glorious in victory, and ſtrong in arms, but rigorous in oppreſſing whom he overcame, in levying of tasks paſſing all others. Inſomuch that he cauſed to be enrolled and numbred in his Treaſury every Hide of Land, and owner thereof, what fruit and revenues ſurmounted of every Lordſhip, of every Townſhip, Caſtle, Village, Field, River and Wood within the Realm of England. Moreover, how many Pariſh Churches, how many living Cattel there were, what and how much every Baron in the Realm could diſpend, what Fees were belonging, what Wages were taken, &c. The tenor and contents of which taskment yet remaineth in Rolls. After this tasking or numbring, which was the year before his death, followed an exceeding Murren of Cattel and barrenneſs of the ground, with much Peſtilence and hot Fevers among the People, ſo that ſuch as eſcaped the Fever were conſumed with Famine. Moreover, at the ſame ſeaſon, among certain other Cities, a great part of the City of London, with the Church of St. Pauls, was waſted with fire in the Year of our Lord 1085.

Peſtilence in England and Murren of Beaſts.

Lond.n with the Church of Pauls burnt.

In hunting and in Parks the foreſaid King had ſuch pleaſure, that in the County of Southampton, by the ſpace of 30 Miles, he caſt down Churches and Townſhips, and there made the new Foreſt; loving his Deer ſo dearly, as though he had been to them a Father, making ſharp laws for the increaſing thereof, under pain of loſing both the eies. So hard he was to Engliſhmen, and ſo favourable to his own Country, that as there was no Engliſh Biſhop remaining, but only Wolſtan of Worceſter, who being commanded of the King and Lanfrank to reſign up his Staff, partly for inability, partly for lack of the French Tongue, refuſed otherwiſe to reſign it, but only to him that gave it, and ſo went to the Tomb of King Edward, where he thought to reſign it, but was permitted to enjoy it ſtill; ſo likewiſe in his days there was almoſt no Engliſhman that bare office of honour or rule in the Land. Inſomuch that it was half a ſhame at that time to be called an Engliſhman. Notwithſtanding he ſome deal favoured the City of London, and granted unto the Citizens the firſt Charter that ever they had, written in the Saxon, with green Wax ſealed, and contained in few lines.

Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter.

Among his other conditions, this in him is noted, that ſo given he was to peace and quiet, that any Maiden being laden with Gold or Silver, might paſs through the whole Realm without harm or reſiſtance. This William in his time builded two Monaſteries, one in England at Battel in Suſſex, where he wan the Field againſt Harold, called the Abby of Battel; another beſides, named Barmondſey in his County of Normandy.

After the Life and Story of King William thus briefly deſcribed, with the acts and order of Battel between him and King Harold, (although much more might have been written of that matter, if the Book had come ſooner to my hands, which afterwards I ſaw) now remaineth in the end of this Story to deſcribe the Names of ſuch Barons and Nobles of Normandy, which entred with him into this Land, as well of them which were imbarqued with him, and ſlain alſo (as appeareth) in the Battel, as alſo of them who were planted and advanced by the ſaid Conqueror in the Lands and Poſſeſſions of Engliſh Lords, whom he expelled, or elſe beheaded. The Names of which Normans here follow under-written.

THE day after the Battel, very early in the Morning, Odo Biſhop of Bajeux ſung Maſs for thoſe that were departed. The Duke after that deſirous to know the eſtate of his Battel, and what People he had therein loſt and were ſlain, he cauſed to come unto him a Clerk that had written their Names when they were embarqued at Saint Valeries, and commanded him to call them all by their Names, who called them that had bin at the Battel, and had paſſed the Seas with Duke William. The firſt Biſhop of Salisbury. Oſmund Biſhop of Sarum. Ordinale eccleſiaſtici officii ſecundum uſum Sarum. Ex Eulogio hiſtor. lib. 3. The uſe and ordinary of Sarum, how and when it was deviſed

A little above, mention was made of the Biſhops See of Shireborne, tranſlated from thence to Salisbury. The firſt Biſhop of Salisbury was Hirmannus a Norman, who firſt began the new Church and Minſter of Salisbury. After whom ſucceeded Oſmundus, who finiſhed the work, and repleniſhed the houſe with great living, and much good linging. This Oſmundus firſt began the Ordinary which was called Secundum uſum Sarum, Anno 1076. The occaſion whereof was this, as I find in an old Story-book intituled Eulogium. A great contention chanced at Glaſtenbury between Thurſtanus the Abbot and his Convent, in the days of William the Conqueror. Which Thurſtanus the ſaid William had brought out of Normandy from the Abby of Cadonum, and placed him Abbot of Glaſtenbury. The cauſe of this contentious Battel was, for that Thurſtanus contemning their Quire-ſervice, then called the uſe of S. Gregory, compelled his Monks to the uſe of one William a Monk of Fiſcam in Normandy. Whereupon came ſtrife and contentions amongſt them, firſt in words, then from words to blows, after blows then to armour. The Abbot, with his guard of harneſt Men, fell upon the Monks, and drave them to the ſteps of the High Altar, where two were ſlain, eight were wounded with Shafts, Swords and Pikes. The Monks then driven to ſuch a ſtraight and narrow ſhift, were compelled to defend themſelves with Formes and Candleſticks, wherewith they did wound certain of the Souldiers. One Monk there was (an aged Man) who inſtead of his ſhield took an Image of the Crucifix in his Arms for his defence, which Image was wounded in the breaſt by one of the Bowmen, whereby the Monk was ſaved. My ſtory addeth more, that the ſtriker incontinent upon the ſame fell mad, which ſavoureth of ſome Monkiſh addition beſides the Text. This matter being brought before the King, the Abbot was ſent again to Cadonum, and the Monks by the commandment of the King were ſcattered in far Countries. Thus, by the occaſion hereof, Oſmundus Biſhop of Salisbury deviſed that Ordinary, which is called the uſe of Sarum, and was afterward received in a manner through all England, Ireland and Wales. And thus much for this matter, done in the time of this King William.

Which William after his death, by his Wife Matilda or Maud, left three Sons, Robert Courtſey, to whom he gave the Dutchy of Normandy; William Rufus his ſecond Son, to whom he gave the Kingdom of England; and Henry the third Son, to whom he left and gave treaſure; and warned William to be to his People loveing and liberal, Robert to be to his people ſtern and ſturdy.

Example of Gods juſt judgment upon a Biſhop, who being unmerciful to the poor, was eaten with Rats and Mice.

In the Hiſtory called Jornalenſis, it is reported of a certain great Man, who about this time of King William was compaſſed about with Mice and Rats, and flying to the midſt of a River, yet when that would not ſerve, came to the Land again, and was of them devoured. The Germans ſay that this was a Biſhop, who dwelling between Cullen and Mentz, in time of Famine and Dearth, having ſtore of Corn and Grain, would not help the poverty crying to him for relief but rather wiſhed his Corn to be eaten up of Mice and Rats. Wherefore being compaſſed with Mice and Rats (by the juſt judgment of God) to avoid the annoiance of them, he built a Tower in the midſt of the River of Rhein (which yet to this day the Dutchmen call Rats Tower) but all that would not help; for the Rats and Mice ſwam over to him in as great abundance as they did before; of whom at length he was devoured.

William Rufus.

WILLIAM Rufus, the ſecond Son of William the Conqueror, began his Reign in the year of our Lord 1088. and Reigned thirteen Years, being crowned at Weſtminſter by Lanfrancus; who, after his Coronation, releaſed out of Priſon, by the requeſt of his Father, divers Engliſh Lords, which before had bin in cuſtody. It chanced that, at the death of William the Conqueror, Robert Courtſey his eldeſt Son was abſent in Almany, who hearing of the death of his Father, and how William his younger Brother had taken upon him the Kingdom, was therewith greatly moved; inſomuch that he laid his Dukedom to pledge unto his Brother Henry, and with that good gathered unto him an Army, and ſo landed at Hampton, to the intent to have expelled his Brother from the Kingdom. But William Rufus hearing thereof ſent to him fair and gentle words, promiſing him dedition and ſubjection, as to the more worthy and elder brother; this thing only requiring, that ſeeing he was now in place and poſſeſſion, he might enjoy it during his life, paying to him yearly three thouſand Marks, with condition that which of them overlived the other ſhould enjoy the Kingdom. The occaſion of this variance between theſe brethren wrought a great diſſention between the Norman Lords and Biſhops, both in England and in Normandy. Inſomuch that all the Norman Biſhops within the Realm almoſt rebelled againſt the King, taking part with Duke Robert, except only Lanfrancus, and Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter above mentioned, an Engliſhman; who for his vertue and conſtancy was ſo well liked and favoured of his Citizens, that (emboldened with his preſence and prayer) they ſtoutly maintained the City of Worceſter againſt the Siege of their enemies, and at laſt vanquiſhed them with utter ruine. But Duke Robert at length by the advice of his Councel (hearing the words ſent unto him, and wagging his head thereat, as one conceiving ſome matter of doubt or doubleneſs) was yet content to aſſent to all that was deſired, and ſo returned ſhortly after into Normandy, leaving the Biſhops, and ſuch others, in the Briers, which were in England, taking his part againſt the King.

Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter.

This Rufus was ſo ill liked of the Normans, that between him and his Lords was oft diſſention. Wherefore (well near) all the Normans took part againſt him; ſo that he was forced of neceſſity to draw to him the Engliſhmen. Again, ſo covetous he was, and ſo immeaſurable in his tasks and takings, in ſelling Benefices, Abbies and Biſhopricks, that he was hated of all Engliſhmen.

{Anno 1091.} In the third year of this King died Lanfrancus Archbiſhop of Canterbury; from whoſe commendation and worthineſs, as I liſt not to detract any thing (being ſo greatly magnified of Polydorus his Countryman) ſo neither do I ſee any great cauſe why to add any thing thereto. This I think, unleſs that Man had brought with him leſs ſuperſtition, and more ſincere ſcience into Chriſt his Church, he might have kept him in his Country ſtill, and have confuted Berengarius at home. After the deceaſe of Lanfrank the See of Canterbury ſtood empty four years.

The death of Lanfrancus Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Remigius Biſhop of Lincoln.

After the Council of Lanfrancus above mentioned, wherein was concluded for tranſlating of Biſhops Sees from Villages into Head Cities, Remigius Biſhop of Dorcheſter (who, as ye heard, accompanied Lanfrancus unto Rome) removed his Biſhops See from Dorcheſter unto Lincoln, where he builded the Minſter there, ſcituate upon an Hill within the ſaid City of Lincoln. The Dedication of which Church Robert Archbiſhop of York did reſiſt, ſaying, that it was builded within the Ground of his Precinct. But after, it had his Romiſh Dedication by Robert Blevet, next Biſhop that followed. By the ſame Remigius alſo was founded the Cloyſter or Monaſtery of Stow, &c.

Lincoln Minſter builded.

Stow Abby builded.

{Anno 1092.} In the fourth year of this King, great Tempeſts fell in ſundry places of England, ſpecially at Winchcombe, where the Steeple was burned with Lightning, the Church wall burſt through, the head and right Leg of the Crucifix, with the Image of our Lady on the right ſide of the Crucifix, thrown down, and ſuch a ſtink left in the Church, that none might abide it. At London the force of the Weather and Tempeſt overturned ſix hundred Houſes. In which Tempeſt the Roof of Bow Church was hurled up in the Wind, and by the vehemency thereof was pitched down a great deepneſs into the ground.

Winchcomb Steeple burnt with Lightning.

Six hundred houſes blowyn down with Wind.

The roof of Bow Church overthrown.

King William (as ye have heard) an exceeding poller or rayener rather of Church Goods, after he had given the Biſhoprick of Lincoln to his Chancellor Robert Blevet above minded, began to cavil; avouching the See of Lincoln to belong to the See of York; till the Biſhop of Lincoln had pleaſed him with a great ſum of mony of five thouſand Marks, &c.

Robert Blevet paid five thouſand Marks for his Biſhoprick.

And as nothing could come in thoſe days without mony from the King, ſo Herbert Loſinga, paying to the King a piece of Mony, was made Biſhop of Thetford, as he had paid a little before to be Abbot of Ramſey. Who likewiſe, the ſame time removing his See from Thetford to the City of Norwich, there erected the Cathedral Church with the Cloyſter in the ſaid City of Norwich, where he furniſhed the Monks with ſufficient Living and Rents of his own charges, beſides the Biſhops Lands. Afterward, repenting of his open and manifeſt Simony, he went to Rome, where he reſigned into the Popes hands his Biſhoprick, but ſo, that incontinent he received it again. This Herbert was the Son of an Abbot called Robert, for whom he purchaſed of the King to be Biſhop of Wincheſter, whereof run theſe Verſes:

Herbert Loſinga Biſhop of Norwich. Loſinga Adulator.

Filius eſt Præſul, pater Abba, Simonſuterque:
Quid non ſperemus ſi nummos poſſideamus?
Omnia nummus habet, quod vult facit, addit & auferſ.
Res nimis injuſta, nummus ſit Præſul & Abba, &c.

Norwich Minſter builded by Herbert.

Ye heard a little before of the death of Pope Hildebrand, after the time of which Hildebrand the German Emperors began to loſe their authority and right in the Popes election, and in giving of Benefices. For next after this Hildebrand came Pope Victor by the ſetting up of Matilda, and the Duke of Normandy, with the faction and retinue of Hildebrand, who likewiſe ſhewed himſelf ſtout againſt the Emperor. But God gave the ſhrewd Cow ſhort hornes. For Victor being poyſoned (as ſome ſay in his Chalice) ſate but one year and a half. Notwithſtanding the ſame imitation and example of Hildebrand continued ſtill in them that followed after. And like as the Kings of Iſrael followed moſt part the ſteps of Jeroboam, till the time of their deſolation; ſo for the greateſt part all Popes followed the ſteps and proceedings of this Hildebrand their ſpiritual Jeroboam, in maintaining of falſe worſhip, and chiefly in upholding the dignity of that See, againſt all rightful authority, and the lawful Kingdom of Sion. In the time of this Victor began the Order of the Monks of Charterhouſe, through the means of one Hugo Biſhop of Gracianople, and of Bruno Biſhop of Cullen.

Pope Victor the third.

A comparſon between Hildebrand Pope of Rome, and Jeroboam K. of Iſrael.

The order of Charter Monks began.

Next to Victor ſat Urban the ſecond, by whom the acts of Hildebrand were confirmed, and alſo new Decrees enacted againſt Henry the Emperor. In this time were two Popes at Rome, Urbanus, and Clemens the third, whom the Emperor ſet up. Under Pope Urban came in the white Monks of the Ciſtercian Order, by one Stephen Harding a Monk of Shireborne, (an Engliſhman) by whom this Order had his beginning in the Wilderneſs of Ciſtery, within the Province of Burgoin, as witneſſeth Ceſtrenſis. Others write that this Harding was the ſecond Abbot of that place, and that it was firſt founded by the means of one Robert Abbot of Moliſme in Ciſtercium, a Foreſt in Burgundy, Anno 1098. perſwaded perchance by Harding; and afterwards, in the year of our Lord 1135. it was brought into England by a certain man called Eſpeke, which builded an Abby of the ſame Order called Merinale. In this Order the Monks did live by the labour of their hands; they payed no Tithes nor Offerings, they wore no Fur nor Lining, they wore red Shoes, their Cowls white, and Coats black, all ſhorn ſave a little circle, they eat no fleſh but only in their journey. Of this Order was Bernardus, &c.

Pope Urban the ſecond.

Two Popes in Rome.

The order of Ciſtercian or White Monks began.

This Urban held divers Councils; one at Rome, where he Excommunicated all ſuch Lay perſons as gave inveſtiture of any Eccleſiaſtical Benefice; alſo all ſuch of the Clergy as abjected themſelves to be underlings or ſervants to lay perſons for Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, &c.

Synodus Romana vel Placentina.

Another Council he held at Cleremount in France where among other things, the Biſhop made an Oration to the Lords being there preſent, concerning the Voyage and recovering the Holy Land from the Turks and Saracens. The cauſe of which Voyage firſt ſprang by one Peter a Monk or Hermit, who being in Jeruſalem, and ſeeing the great miſery of the Chriſtians under the Pagans, made thereof declaration to Pope Urban, and was therein a great ſollicitor to all Chriſtian Princes. By reaſon whereof, after the foreſaid Oration of Pope Urban, 30000 Men (taking on them the Sign of the Croſs for their cogniſance) made preparation for that Voyage, whoſe Captains were Godfrey Duke of Lorain, with his two brethren Euſtace and Baldwin, the Biſhop of Pody, Bohemund Duke of Puell and his Nephew Tancredus, Raimund Earl of St. Egidius, Robert Earl of Flanders, and Hugh le Grand, Brother of Philip the French King. To whom alſo was joyned Robert Curthoiſe Duke of Normandy, with divers other Noblemen, with the foreſaid Peter the Herinit, who was the chief cauſer of that Voyage.

Synodus Clermontana.

The Voyage unto the Holy Land.

The number that went.

The Captains of them which went to the holy Land.

At

At that time many of the ſaid Noblemen laid their Lands and Lordſhips to mortgage, to provide for the forenamed Voyage; as Godfrey Duke of Lorain, who ſold the Dukedom of Bullogn to the Biſhop of Eburone for a great ſumm of mony. Alſo Robert Curthoiſe Duke of Normandy laid his Dukedom to pledge to his Brother William King of England for ten thouſand pounds, &c.

Anno 1096. Thus the Chriſtians, which paſſed firſt over Boſphorus, having to their Captain Peter the Hermit (a man perchance more devout than expert to guide an Army) being trapped of their enemies, were ſlain and murthered in great numbers among the Bulgars, and near to the Town called Civitus.

The acts of the Chriſtians in their Voyage to and in Jeruſalem.

When the Nobles and the whole Army met together at Conſtantinople (where Alexius was Emperor) paſſing over by Helleſpontus going to Jeruſalem, they took the Cities of Nicea, Eracleа, Tarſis, and ſubdued the Country of Cicilia, appointing the poſſeſſion thereof to certain of their Captains.

Antioch taken by the Chriſtians.

Antioch was beſieged, and in the ninth Month of the Siege it was yielded to the Chriſtians by one Pyrrhus; about which ſeaſon were fought many ſtrong Battels, to the great ſlaughter and deſolation of the Saracens, and not without loſs of many Chriſtian Men. The governance of this City was committed to Bohemund Duke of Puel, whoſe martial Knighthood was often proved in time of the Siege thereof.

Anno 1098. The ſlaughter of the Perſian Infidels.

And not long after, Corbona maſter of the Perſians Chivalry was vanquiſhed and ſlain, with an hundred thouſand Infidels. In which diſcomfiture were taken 15000 Camels.

Jeruſalem conquered by the Chriſtians. Ex Henric. lib. 7.

Jeruſalem on the nine and thirtieth day of the Siege, was conquered by the Chriſtians. Robert alſo Duke of Normandy was elect to be King thereof. Howbeit he refuſed it, hearing of the death of King William Rufus of England; wherefore he never ſped well in all his affairs after the ſame. Then Godfrey, Captain of the Chriſtian Army, was proclaimed the firſt King of Jeruſalem. At the taking of the City was ſuch a murther of Men, that blood was congealed in the Streets the thickneſs of a foot. Then after Godfrey reigned Baldwin his Brother: After him Baldwin the ſecond, Nephew. Then Gaufridus Duke of Gaunt, and after him Gaufridus his Son, by whom many great Battels there were fought againſt the Saracens, and all the Country thereabout ſubdued, ſave Aſcalon, &c. And thus much hitherto touching the Voyage to the Holy Land. Now to our own Land again.

The King of England's judgment againſt the Pope. Ex Mat. Par.

About this time (as Matthew Pariſienſis writeth) the King of England favoured not much the See of Rome, becauſe of their impudent and unſatiable exactions which they required, neither would he ſuffer any of his Subjects to go to Rome, alledging theſe words in the Author thus expreſſed: Quod Petri non inhærent veſtigiis, præmiis inhiantes; non ejus poteſtatem retinent, cujus ſanctitatem probantur non imitari; that is, Becauſe they follow not the ſteps of Peter, hunting for rewards; neither have they the power and authority of him, whoſe holineſs they declare themſelves not to follow, &c.

Decrees of Pope Urban

By the ſame Urbanus, the ſeven hours, which we call Septem horas canonicas, were firſt inſtituted in the Church.

Item, By this Pope was decreed, no Biſhop to be made, but under the Name and Title of ſome certain place.

John Stella. Nauclerus.

Item, That Mattins and hours of the day ſhould every day be ſaid.

Alſo every Saturday to be ſaid the Maſs of our Lady, and all the Jews Sabbath to be turned to the ſervice of our Lady, as in the Council of Turon, to the which Service was appointed the Anthem Ora pro populo, interveni pro clero, intercede pro devoto fœmineo ſexu.

Diſt. 31. Eos qui 15. q. 6. Juratos.

Item, all ſuch of the Clergy as had Wives, to be deprived of their order.

Item, to be lawful for Subjects to break their Oath of Allegiance with all ſuch as were by the Pope Excommunicate.

Item, not to be lawful both for Husband and Wife to chriſten one child both together; with matters many more.

By the ſame Pope thus many Chapters ſtand written in the Canon Law, Diſt. 7. Sanctorum, diſt. 31. Eos qui 1. q. 1. Si qui diſt. 56. Presbyterorum, 11. q. 3. quibus 15. q. 6. Juratos 16. q. 7. Congregatio 19. q. 2. Statuimus, 23. q. 8. Tributum, 30. q. 4. quod autem, &c.

Example of Gods right-ful judgment in puniſhing cruel murther.

In the ſixth year of this Kings Reign, Malcolme King of Scots, which former times before had made great ſlaughter of old and young in the North parts, as is before ſhewed, burſt into Northumberland with all the power he could make, and there by the right judgment of God was ſlain, with his Son Edward, and alſo Margaret his Wife, Siſter to Edgar Adeling above minded, a vertuous and devout Lady, within three days after.

Anſelm made Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The ſame year he gave the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury (after that he had detained the ſame in his own hands four years) to Anſelm Abbot of Beck in Normandy.

This Anſelm was an Italian, in the City of Auguſta, born and brought up in the Abby of Beck in Normandy; where he was ſo ſtrict a follower of virtue, that (as the Story recordeth) he wiſhed rather to be without ſin in Hell, than in Heaven with ſin. Which ſaying and wiſh of his (if it were his) may ſeem to proceed out of a mind, neither ſpeaking orderly according to the phraſe and underſtanding of the Scripture, nor yet ſufficiently acquainted with the juſtification of a Chriſtian man. Further, they report him to be ſo far from ſingularity, that he ſhould ſay, it was the Vice which thruſt the Angels firſt out of Heaven, and Man out of Paradiſe.

The ſaying of Anſelm pondered.

The vice of ſingularity.

Anſelm ill willing to take the Archbiſhoprick. Canterbury firſt given to the Archbiſhop wholly.

Of this Anſelm it is moreover reported, that he was ſo ill willing to take the Archbiſhoprick, that the King had much ado to thruſt it upon him: and he was ſo delirous to have him take it, that the City of Canterbury (which before Lanfrancus did hold, but at the Kings good will and pleaſure) he gave now to Anſelm wholly, which was about the year of our Lord 1093. But as deſirous as the King was then to place the ſaid Anſelm, ſo much did he repent it afterward, ſeeking all manner of means to defeat him if he might. Such ſtrife and contention roſe between them two for certain matters; the ground and occaſion whereof firſt was this:

Strife and contention between the K. and Anſelm.

After that Anſelm had been thus elected to the See of Canterbury, before he was fully conſecrate, the King communed with him (aſſaying by all gentle manner of words to intreat him) that ſuch Lands and Poſſeſſions of the Church of Canterbury as the King had given and granted to his friends ſince the death of Lanfrancus, they might ſtill enjoy the ſame as their own lawful poſſeſſions through his grant and permiſſion. But to this Anſelm in no caſe would agree. Whereupon the King, conceiving great diſpleaſure againſt him, did ſtop his Conſecration a great ſeaſon, till at length in long proceſs of time the King, enforced by the daily complaints and deſires of his People and Subjects, for lack of an Archbiſhop to moderate the Church, was conſtrained to admit and authorize him unto them. Thus Anſelm with much ado taking his Conſecration, and doing his Homage to the King, went to his See of Canterbury; and not long after, the King ſayled over to Normandy.

Anſelm ſtopped from his Conſecration.

Anſelm conſecrated

Anſelm doth homage to K. William.

About this time there were two ſtriving in Rome for the Popedome, as is afore touched, Urbanus and Guibertus. Divers Realms diverſly conſenting, ſome to the one, ſome to the other. England taking part with their King, was rather inclined to Guibertus, called Clement the third; but Anſelm, did fully go with Urbanus, making ſo his exception with the King, entring to his Biſhoprick. After the King was returned again from Normandy, the Archbiſhop cometh to him, and aſketh leave to go to Rome, to fet his Pall of Pope Urban; which when he could not at firſt obtain, he maketh his appeal from the King to the Pope. Whereat the King being juſtly diſpleaſed, chargeth the Archbiſhop with breach of his Fealty, contrary to his promiſe made; that is, if he without his licence, ſhould appeal either to Urban, or to any other Pope. Anſelm anſwereth again, that it was to be referred unto ſome greater Council, where it is to be diſputed, whether this be to break a Mans Allegiance to a terrene Prince, if he appeal to the Vicar of Saint Peter. And here much arguing and contending was on both ſides. The Kings reaſon proceedeth thus: The cuſtome (ſaith he) from my fathers time hath been in England, that no perſon

Urban and Clement ſtriving for the Papacy. England favoured Clement.

Anſelm holdeth with Urban

Anſelm denied leave to go to Rome.

Anſelm appealeth from the King to the Pope.

Anſelm charged for a Traitor.

The Kings argument againſt Anſelm.

The cuſtom of England from William Conquerors time, not to appeal to the Pope.

ſhould appeal to the Pope without the Kings licence. He that breaketh the cuſtoms of the Realm, violateth the power and Crown of the Kingdom. He that violateth and taketh away my Crown, is a Traytor and Enemy againſt me, &c. To this Anſelm replieth again, The Lord (ſaith he) eaſily diſcuſſeth this queſtion, briefly teaching what Fidelity and Allegiance we ought to give unto the Vicar of Saint Peter, where he ſaith, Thou art Peter, *and upon this Rock will I build my Church, &c. And to thee will I give the Keies of the Kingdom of Heaven, and whatſoever thou ſhalt bind in Earth, it ſhall be bound in Heaven; and whatſoever thou looſeſt in Earth, ſhall be looſed in Heaven, &c. Again, to them all in general he ſaith, He that heareth you, heareth me; and whoſo deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth me. And in another place, He that toucheth you, toucheth the Apple of mine Eye. On the other ſide, what duty we owe to the King, he ſheweth alſo, Give (ſaith he) to the Emperor, what belongeth to the Emperor, and to God, that which to God belongeth. Wherefore, in ſuch things as belong to God, I will yield, and muſt yield by good right and duty, my obedience to the Vicar of S.*Peter, and in ſuch things as belong again to terrene dignities of my Prince, in thoſe I will not deny to him my faithful help and counſel, ſo far as they can extend.

Anſelm reply againſt the King.

The reaſons of Anſelm to prove the Popes authority above other Kings.

Anſelm here ignorantly calleth the Pope the Vicar of St. Peter, where the Canon law calleth him but the ſucceſſor of Peter, and Vicar of Chriſt.

Thus have ye the grounded arguments of this Prelate to ſtand ſo ſtiffly againſt his Prince, whereunto peradventure was joyned alſo ſome piece of a ſtubborn heart. But in this concluſion none of his fellow Biſhops durſt take his part, but were all againſt him; namely, William Biſhop of Dureſme; to whom Anſelm thus proteſteth, ſaying, *Whoſoever he were that would preſume to prove it any breach of Allegiance or Fealty to his Sovereign, if he appealed to the Vicar of St.*Peter, he was ready to anſwer at all times to the contrary. The Biſhop of Dureſme anſwered again, That he who would not be ruled by reaſon, muſt with force be conſtrained, &c. The King, having on his part the agreement of the Biſhops, thought to deprive the Archbiſhop both of his Paſtoral See, and to expel him out of the Realm. But he could not perform his purpoſe; for Anſelm, as he was ready to depart the Realm, he ſaid, whenſoever he went, he would take his office and authority with him, though he took nothing elſe. Whereupon that matter was deferred till a longer time. In the mean ſeaſon the King had ſent privily two Meſſengers unto Pope Urban, to intreat him to ſend his Pall to the King, for him to give it where he would. Which Meſſengers by this time were returned again, bringing with them from Rome, Gualter Biſhop of Alban, the Popes Legate, with the Pall to be given unto Anſelm. This Legate, firſt landing at Dover, from thence came privily (unknown to Anſelme) to the King, declaring and promiſing, that if Urban was received Pope in England, whatſoever the King required to be obtained, he by his priviledge from the Apoſtolical See would ratifie and confirm the ſame; ſave only that when the King required of the Legate that Anſelm might be removed, the Legate thereunto would not agree; ſaying, that it was unpoſſible to be obtained, that ſuch a man as he, being lawfully called, ſhould be expelled without manifeſt cauſe. In concluſion, ſo it followed, that although he could not obtain his requeſt of the Legate, yet the Legate ſo wrought with the King, that Urban was proclaimed lawful Pope throughout all the Realm.

All the Biſhops of the Realm ſtood of the Kings ſide againſt Anſelm.

William Biſhop of Dureſme.

Gualterus the Popes Legat cometh to England.

Anſelm could not be removed by the King.

The Pope taketh this as no fault, for a ſubject to repugne againſt his King.

Then were ſent to Anſelm certain Biſhops to move and prove his mind, declaring what charges and pains the King had been at in his behalf, to procure the Pall for him from Rome, which otherwiſe would have ſtood him in great expences, and that all this the King had done for his ſake. Wherefore it were good reaſon and convenient, that he (to gratifie the King) ſhould ſomething condeſcend to his requeſt again. But with all this Anſelm the ſtout Archbiſhop would not be moved. Wherefore the King, ſeeing none other remedy, was compelled to grant unto him the full right of his Archbiſhoprick. And ſo the day appointed, when the Pall ſhould be brought to Canterbury (being carried with all ſolemnity in a thing of Silver) the Archbiſhop, with a great concourſe of people, came forth bareſoot with his Prieſtly Veſtments, after a moſt goodly manner to meet the ſame; and ſo being brought in, it was laid upon the Altar, whiles Anſelm (ſpreading over his ſhoulders his Popiſh Veſtments) proceeded unto his Popiſh Maſs.

The ſtoutneſs of Anſelm ſtanding againſt his King.

The manner of bringing in Anſelmes Pall into Canterbury.

Thus agreement being made between the King and the Biſhop, ſo long as it would hold; it happened the year following, the King with his Army entred into Wales, to ſubdue ſuch as there rebelled againſt him. After the Victory gotten, the King returned home again with triumph; to whom Anſelm thought to have come to congratulate his proſperous ſucceſs. But the King prevented him by Meſſengers, laying to the Biſhops charge both the ſmall number and the evil ſervice of his Souldiers ſent to him at his need. At the hearing hereof, all the hope of Anſelm was daſht, who at the ſame preſent had thought to have obtained and done many great matters with the King touching the ſtate of the Church. But here all turned contrary to his expectation; inſomuch that he was charged, againſt the next Court of Parliament, to make his anſwer. But he avoided that by appealing to Rome. Wherefore he made his ſute and friends to the King for licence to go to the Pope. Unto the which ſute the King anſwered again, that he ſhould not go, neither was there any cauſe for him ſo to do; for that both he knew him to be of ſo ſound a life, that he had done no ſuch offence, whereof he needed to crave Abſolution at Rome, neither was there any ſuch lack of ſcience and knowledge, that he needed to borrow any counſel there: Inſomuch (ſaith the King) I dare ſay, Pope Urban rather hath to give place to the wiſdom of Anſelm, than Anſelm to have need of Urban. Wherefore as he hath no cauſe to go, ſo I charge him to tarry. And if he continue in his ſtubbornneſs ſtill, I ſtill aſſuredly ſeize upon his poſſeſſions, and convert his Archbiſhoprick into my Coffers, for that he tranſgreſſeth and breaketh his fidelity and obeiſance, promiſing before to obſerve all the cuſtoms of my Kingdom. Neither is it the faſhion in this Realm, that any of my Nobles ſhould go to Rome without my ſending. And therefore let him ſwear unto me, that he ſhall neither for any grievance appeal hereafter to the See of Rome, or elſe let him void my Realm.

Another quarrel of the King againſt Anſelm.

Anſelm againſt to Rome.

The Kings anſwer to Anſelm for his appealing to Rome.

The cuſtom of England.

No Prelate or Nobleman to go to Rome without the Kings ſending.

Againſt theſe words of the King, Anſelm thinking not beſt to reply again by any Meſſage, but by word of mouth, coming himſelf perſonally to the King, he placeth himſelf (after his order) on the right hand of the Prince, where he made his reply unto the Meſſage ſent to him by the King. Whereas you ſay, I ought not to go to Rome, *either in regard of any treſpaſs, or for abundance of counſel and knowledge in me (albeit I grant neither of them to be true) yet what the truth is therein, I refer it to the judgment of God. And whereas ye ſay that I promiſed to keep and obſerve your cuſtoms; that I grant, but with a condition; ſo far to keep them, and ſuch of them to obſerve, as were conſonant to the laws of God, and ruled with right and equity. Moreover, whereas ye charge me with breach of my Fidelity and Allegiance, for that contrary to your cuſtoms I appeal to the See Apoſtolick (my reverence and duty to your ſovereignty reſerved) if another would ſay it, that is untrue. For the fidelity and obeyſance that I owe to thee (O King) I have it of the faith and fidelity of God, whoſe Vicar St.*Peter is, to whoſe ſeat I do appeal. Further, whereas ye require me to ſwear, that I ſhall for no cauſe hereafter at any time appeal to Rome, *I pronounce openly that a Chriſtian Prince requireth ſuch an Oath of his Archbiſhop unjuſtly. For if I ſhould forſwear S.*Peter, I ſhould deny Chriſt. And when I ſhall at any time deny Chriſt, then ſhall I be content and ready to ſtand to the ſatisfaction of my tranſgreſſion to you, for asking licence to go to Rome. And peradventure when I am gone, the Goods of the Church ſhall not ſo ſerve your temporal deſires and commodites as ye ween for. At theſe words of the Biſhop the King and his Nobles were not a little incenſed: they defending again, that in his promiſe of obſerving the Kings Cuſtoms, there was neither condition, nor any clauſe put in, either of God or Right. No was? ſaid Anſelm. If ſo be, that in your cuſtoms was neither mention made of God nor of right, whereof was there mention then? For God forbid that any Chriſtian ſhould be bound to any Cuſtoms which go contrary to God and to right. Thus on both ſides paſſed much altercation between them.

The anſwer of Anſelm to the King.

Note the high reaſons of Anſelm.

At length the King, after many threatning words, told him he ſhould carry nothing out of the Realm with him. Well, ſaid the Biſhop, if I may neither have my horſe nor garments with me, then will I walk on foot; and ſo addreſſed addreſſed him toward his journey (all the other Biſhops forſaking him) whereof none would take his part; but if he came to them for counſel, they ſaid he was wiſe enough, and needed not their counſel, as who for his prudence knew beſt what was to be done, as alſo for his holineſs, was willing and able to perſecute the ſame that he did know. As for them, they neither durſt nor would ſtand againſt the King their Lord; whoſe favour they could not lack, for the peril that might happen both to themſelves and their kindred. But for him, becauſe he was both a ſtranger, and void of ſuch worldly corruption in him; they willed him to go forward as he had begun; their ſecret conſent he ſhould have, but their open voice they would not give him. Thus Anſelm, remaining at Dover fifteen days tarrying for Wind, at laſt ſped him toward his paſſage. But his packing being ſecretly known in the Court, the Kings Officer William Warlwaſt, prevented his purpoſe, ſearching by the Kings Commandment, all his Truſſes, Coffers, Satchels, Sleeves, Purſe, Napkin and Boſom, for Letters, and for Money, and ſo let him paſs. Who, ſailing into France, firſt reſted a while at Lions, from thence came to Rome to Pope Urban, according to the tenor and form of a certain Epiſtle of his; wherein, among many other things in the ſame Epiſtle contained, theſe words he writeth to Pope Paſchalis, the third year after his baniſhment, after the death of Urban, and a little before the death of the King.

To the Lord and reverend Father Paſchalis, High Biſhop, Anſelm ſervant of the Church of Canterbury, offereth due ſubjection from his heart, and prayers, if they can ſtand in any ſtead, Ex Epiſt. 36. Paulo poſt initium.

A fragment or portion of a Letter of Anſelm to Pope Paſchalis. Ex Legend. Anſ. aut Eadmero, ex epiſt. Anſel. 36.

I See in England many evils, whoſe correction belongeth ‘ to me, and which I could neither amend, nor ſuffer ‘ without mine own fault. The King deſireth of me, that ‘ under the name of right I ſhould conſent to his pleaſures, ‘ which were againſt the law and will of God. For he ‘ would not have the Pope received nor appealed unto in ‘ England, without his commandment; neither that I ‘ ſhould ſend a Letter unto him, or receive any from him, ‘ or that I ſhould obey his Decrees. He ſuffered not a Coun‘ cil to be kept in his Realm now theſe thirteen years, ‘ ſince he was King. In all theſe things, and ſuch like, ‘ if I asked any Counſel, all my Suffragan Biſhops of his ‘ Realm, denied to give me any counſel, but according to ‘ the Kings pleaſure. After that I ſaw theſe and ſuch other ‘ things that are done againſt the will and law of God: ‘ I asked a Licence of him to go to Rome unto the See ‘ Apoſtolical, that I might there take counſel for my ſoul, ‘ and the office committed unto me. The King ſaid, that ‘ I offended againſt him for the only asking of licence; ‘ and propounded to me, that either I ſhould make him ‘ amends for the ſame as a treſpaſs (aſſuring him never to ‘ ask his licence any more to appeal to the Pope at any ‘ time hereafter) or elſe that I ſhould quickly depart out ‘ of his Land. Wherefore chooſing rather to go out of the ‘ Land, than agree to ſo wicked a thing; I came to Rome, ‘ as you know, and declared the whole matter to the Lord ‘ Pope. The King by and by (as ſoon as I went out of ‘ England) invaded the whole Archbiſhoprick, and turned ‘ it to his own uſe, taxing the Monks only with bare ‘ Meat, Drink and Cloth. The King being wanned and ‘ deſired of the Lord Pope to amend this, contemned ‘ the ſame, and yet continueth in his purpoſe ſtill. And ‘ now is the third year ſince I came thus out of England, ‘ and more. Some men, not underſtanding, demand why ‘ I did not excommunicate the King. But the wiſer ſort, ‘ and ſuch as have underſtanding, counſel me that I do ‘ not this thing; becauſe it belongeth not unto me both to ‘ complain and to puniſh. To conclude, I was fore-warn‘ ed by my friends that are under the King, that mine Ex‘ communication (if it ſhould be done) would be laughed ‘ to ſcorn and deſpiſed, &c.

The King would not have the Pope received nor appealed unto in England.

Anſelm complaineth of the King, and of his Suffragan Biſhops.

The King contemneth the Popes warning.

By theſe here above prefixed, appeareth how Anſelm the Archbiſhop, coming unto Rome, made his complaint to Pope Urban of the King: and how the Pope writeing unto the King in the behalf of Anſelm his Letters and Commandments were deſpiſed. And now to our Story. In the mean time, while the Popes Letters were ſent to the King, Anſelm was bid to wait about the Pope to look for anſwer back. Who perceiving at length, how little the King reputed the Popes Letters, began to be weary of his office, deſiring the Pope that he might be diſcharged thereof; but the Pope in no caſe would thereto conſent, charging him upon his obedience, that whereſoever he went, he ſhould bear with him the Name and Honour of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Whereunto Anſelm again ſaid, his obedience he neither durſt nor would refuſe, as who for Gods cauſe was ready to ſuffer whatſoever ſhould happen (yea though it were death it ſelf) as he thought no leſs would follow thereof. But what ſhould we think, ſaith he, is there to be done, where juſtice not only taketh no place, but is utterly oppreſſed? And whereas my Suffragans do not only not help (for dread) the righteous cauſe, but alſo for favour do impugn the ſame? Well (ſaith the Pope) as touching theſe matters we ſhall ſufficiently provide at the next Council to be holden at Baion, whereas I will you the ſame time and place to be preſent.

Concilium Baionenſe.

When the time of the Council was come, Anſelm amongſt others was called for, who, firſt ſitting in an utter ſide of the Biſhops, afterwards was placed at the right foot of the Pope, with theſe words, Includamus hunc in orbe noſtro, tanquam alterius orbis Papam. Whereupon the ſame place after him was appointed to the Succeſſors of the See of Canterbury, in every General Council by the Decree of Pope Urban, to ſit at the right foot of the Pope. In this ſaid Council great ſtir and much reaſoning there was againſt the Grecians, concerning the matter and order of proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt. Where is to be noted, that the Greek Church hath of long time diſſented from the Latine Church in many and ſundry points, to the number of twenty, or almoſt 29. Articles, as I have them collected out of the Regiſter of the Church of Hereford: whereof like as occaſion hereafter may ſerve (God willing), for a further and more ample tractation to be made; ſo here by the way partly I mean to touch ſome. The firſt is:

Anſelm and his ſucceſſors of Canterbury, placed at the right foot of the Pope in his General Councils.

De proceſſione ſpiritus ſancti.

The difference between the Greek Church and the Latine

Wherein the Greek Church diſſereth from the Latine.

THE firſt Article wherein the Greek Church altereth from the Latine or Romiſh Church is this:

Quod ſunt extra obedientiam Romanæ Eccleſiæ, pro eo quod Eccleſia Conſtantinopolitana non eſt ſubjecta, ſed ei æqualis. Dicunt dominum Apoſtolicum non habere majorem poteſtatem, quam quatuor patriarchæ. Et quicquid fit præter ſcientiam eorum per Papam, vel ſine eorum approbatione, nullius eſt valoris, &c.

Ex regiſtro Eccleſ. Herefordenſis.

In Engliſh.

Firſt, They are not under the obedience of the Church of Rome, becauſe that the Church of Conſtantinople is not ſubject, but equal to the ſame.

The Articles and Opinions of the Greek Church, differing from the Latine Church of Rome.

2. They hold that the Biſhop of the Apoſtolick See of Rome hath not greater power than the four Patriarchs. And whatſoever the Pope doth beſide their knowledge, or without their approbation, it is of no value.

3. Item, They ſay whatſoever hath been done or concluded, ſince the ſecond General Council, it is of no full authority; becauſe from that time they recount the Latines to be in error, and to be excluded out of the Holy Church.

4. Item, Dicunt Euchariſtiam conſecratam per Romanam Eccleſiam non eſſe verum corpus Chriſti. That is, They hold the Euchariſt conſecrated by the Church of Rome not to be the very body of Chriſt. Alſo where the Romiſh Church doth conſecrate in unleavened bread, they conſecrate in bread leavened.

5. Item, They ſay that the Romiſh Church doth err in the words of Baptiſm, for ſaying, I baptiſe thee; when they ſhould ſay, Let this Creature of God be baptiſed, &c.

6. They hold more over, to be no Purgatory, nor that the Suffrages of the Church do avail the dead, either to leſſen the pain of them that be deſtinate to Hell, or to increaſe the glory of them that be ordained to ſalvation.

7. Item,

7. Item, they hold that the ſouls out of the bodies departed (whether they have done good or evil) have not their perfect pain nor glory; but are reſerved in a certain place till the day of Judgment.

8. Item, they condemn the Church of Rome for mixing cold water in their ſacrifice.

9. Item, they condemn the Church of Rome, for that as well women as Prieſts anoint children (when they baptize them) on both ſhoulders.

10. Item, Dicunt panem noſtrum panagium: That is, they call our bread panagia.

11. Item, they blame the Church of Rome for celebrating their Maſs on other days beſides Sundays, and certain other Feaſts appointed.

12. Alſo in this the Greek Church varieth from the Latin; for they have neither Cream nor Oyl, nor Sacrament of Confirmation.

13. Neither do they uſe extream unction, or annoiling after the manner of the Roman Church, expounding the place of St. James of the ſpiritual infirmity, and not corporal.

14. Item, they enjoyn no ſatisfaction for penance, but only that they ſhew themſelves to the Prieſts, anointing them with ſimple oyl in token of remiſſion of ſins.

15. Item, only on Maunday-thurſday they conſecrate for the ſick, keeping it for the whole year after, thinking it to be more holy on that day conſecrated than upon any other. Neither do they faſt any Saturday through the whole year, but only on Eaſter-eve.

16. Item, they give but only five Orders, as of Clerks, Subdeacons, Deacons, Prieſts and Biſhops; when as the Roman Church giveth nine Orders after the nine Orders of Angels.

17. Moreover the Grecians in their Orders make no vow of Chaſtity, alledging for them the fifth Canon of N. My copy here ſeemed to want ſomewhat. Ego presbyter vel diaconus, uxorem cauſa honeſtatis non rejiciam, &c. that is, I. N. Prieſt or Deacon will not forſake my wife for honeſty ſake.

18. Item, every year the Grecians uſe upon certain days to Excommunicate the Church of Rome; and all the Latins as Hereticks.

19. Item, among the ſaid Grecians they are Excommunicate that beat or ſtrike a Prieſt. Neither do their Religious men live in ſuch Prieſtly chaſtity as the Roman Prieſts do.

20. Item, their Emperor amongſt them doth ordain Patriarchs, Biſhops, and other of the Clergy, and depoſeth the ſame at his pleaſure; alſo he giveth Benefices to whom he liſteth, and retaineth the fruits of the ſame Benefices as pleaſeth him.

This Article ſeemeth not to be rightly collected out of the Grecians. 21. Item, they blame the Latin Church becauſe they eat no fleſh, Eggs and Cheeſe on Fridays, and do eat fleſh on Saturdays.

22. Item, they hold againſt the Latin men for celebrating without the conſecrated Church, either in the houſe or in the field; and faſting on the Sabbath-day; and for permitting menſtruous women to enter into the Church before their purifying; alſo for ſuffering Dogs and other beaſts to enter into the Church.

23. The Grecians uſe not to kneel in all their devotions, yea not to the body of Chriſt (as the Regiſter termeth it) but one day in the whole year; ſaying and affirming that the Latins be Goats and beaſts, for they are always proſtrating themſelves upon the ground in their prayers.

24. The Grecians moreover permit not the Latins to celebrate upon their Altars. And if it chance any Latin Prieſt to celebrate upon their Altar, by and by they waſh their Altar in token of abomination and falſe ſacrifice. And diligently they obſerve that whenſoever they do celebrate, they do but one Liturgy or Maſs upon one Altar or Table that day.

25. Item, they diſſent from the Church of Rome touching the order and manner of the proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt.

Theſe Articles wherein is declared the difference between the Eaſt and Weſt Church, of the Grecians and Romans, as I found them articulated and collected in an ancient and authentical Regiſter of the Church of Hereford, ſo I thought here to inſert them, and leave them to the conſideration of the Reader. Other four Articles more in the ſame Regiſter be there expreſſed concerning Simony, Uſury, not with them forbidden; and touching alſo their Emperor; and how they teach their children to hurt or damnifie by any manner of way the Latin Prieſts, &c. Which Articles, for that either they ſeem not truly collected out of their teachings, or elſe not greatly pertinent to the Doctrine of Religion; I overpaſs them. To the purpoſe now of our ſtory again.

When certain of theſe above prefixed were moved in the foreſaid Council to be diſcuſſed, namely concerning the affertion of proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt, and concerning leavened bread in the Miniſtration of the Lords Supper, Anſelm, as is above ſaid, was called for, who in the tractation of the ſame Articles ſo beſtirred him in that Council, that he well liked the Pope and them about him, as mine Author recordeth. Whereupon touching the matter of unleavened bread, how indifferently he ſeemed there to reaſon, and what he writeth to Waltram Biſhop of Nurenburgh, thereof ye ſhall hear by a piece of his Letter ſent to the ſaid Biſhop, the Copy whereof inſueth. Anſelm a ſtout Champion againſt the Grecians.

Anſelm, Servant to the Church of Canterbury, to Waltram Biſhop of Nurenburgh. Epiſt. 325. poſt. initium.

A Letter of Anſelm ſent to Waltram Biſhop of Nurenburgh. Ex Epiſt. Anſel. 325.

AS concerning the Sacrifice in which the Grecians think not as we do; it ſeemeth to many reaſonable Catholick men, that which they do not to be againſt the Chriſtian Faith; for both he that ſacrificeth unleavened and leavened, ſacrificeth bread. And where it is read of our Lord (when he made his body of bread) that he took bread and bleſſed; it is not added unleavened or leavened. Yet it is certain that he bleſſed unleavened bread (peradventure) not becauſe the thing that was done required that, but becauſe the Supper in which this was done did give that. And whereas in another place he calleth himſelf and his fleſh bread, becauſe that as man liveth temporally with this bread, ſo with that bread he liveth for ever. He ſaith not unleavened or leavened, becauſe both alike are bread; for unleavened and leavened differ not in ſubſtance, as ſome think; like as a new man afore ſin, and an old man rooted in the leaven of ſin, differ not in ſubſtance. For this cauſe therefore only he might be thought to call himſelf and his fleſh, bread, and made his body of bread, becauſe that this bread (unleavened or leavened) giveth a tranſitory life; and his body giveth everlaſting life, not for that it is either leavened or unleavened. Although it be a Commandment in the Law to eat unleavened bread in the Paſſover, where all things are done in a figure, that it might be declared that Chriſt whom they looked for, was pure and clean; and we that ſhould eat his body were admoniſhed to be likewiſe pure from all leaven of malice and wickedneſs. But now after we are come from the old figure to the new truth, and eat the unleavened fleſh of Chriſt, that old figure in bread (of which we make that fleſh) is not neceſſary for us. But manifeſt it is, to be better ſacrificed of unleavened, than of leavened, &c.

Bread in the Communion to be unleavened is not neceſſary.

To this Letter I have alſo adjoyned another Epiſtle of his to the ſaid Waltram, appertaining to matters not much unlike to the ſame effect; wherein is intreated touching the variety and divers uſages of the Sacraments in the Church; whereby ſuch as call and cry ſo much for Uniformity in the Church, may note peradventure in the ſame ſomething for their better underſtanding.

A piece of another Letter of Anſelm to the ſaid Waltram Biſhop of Nur.

To the Reverend Father and his Friend Waltram, by the Grace of God the Worſhipful Biſhop of Nurenburgh, Anſelm the Servant of the Church of Canterbury, Greeting, &c. Ex Epiſt. Anſel. 327.

YOUR Worſhip complaineth of the Sacraments of the Church, that they are not made every where after one ſort, but are handled in divers places after divers ſorts. And truly if they were miniſtred after one ſort and agreeing through Another Letter.

Diverſity of cuſtomes in the Church to be born with peace rather than to be condemned with offence.

through the whole Church, it were good and laudable. Yet notwithſtanding becauſe there be many diverſities which differ not in the ſum of the Sacrament in the ſtrength of it, or in the Faith, or elſe can be gathered into one cuſtom: I think that they are rather to be born with in agreement of peace, than to be condemned with offence. For we have this from the holy fathers, that if the unity of charity be kept in the Catholick faith, the diverſity of cuſtoms hurteth nothing. But if it be demanded whereof this diverſity of cuſtoms doth ſpring; I perceive no other cauſe thereof but the diverſity of mens wits, which although they differ not in ſtrength and truth of the thing, yet they agree not in the fineſs and comelineſs of the miniſtring. For that which one judgeth to be meeter, oftentimes another thinketh leſs meet; wherefore not to agree in ſuch diverſities, I think it not to ſwerve from the truth of the thing, &c.

Divers autores in the Church hurt nothing.

Excommunication denounced againſt the Grecians.

Then in the ſtory it followeth, after long debating and diſcuſſing of theſe matters in the Council, when they had given forth their determination upon the ſame, and the Pope had blaſted out his thundring Excommunications againſt the Grecians, and all that took their part: at length were brought in the complaints and accuſation againſt the King of England. Upon the hearing whereof, Pope Urban with his adherents was ready to proceed in Excommunication againſt the King. But Anſelm kneeling before the Pope, after he had firſt accuſed his King, then after obtained for him longer time to be given upon further trial.

Excommunication bent againſt K. William.

Firſt break his head, and then give him a Plaiſter.

Meſſages between the King and the Pope.

Thus the Council breaking up, the Pope returning again to Rome, directeth down his Letters to the King, commanding him that Anſelm with all his partakers (in ſpeedy wiſe) ſhould be reveſted again into his Archbiſhoprick, and all other poſſeſſions thereunto appertaining. To this the King ſendeth anſwer again by meſſengers; who coming to the Pope, declared in the Kings behalf on this wiſe, That the King their Maſter did not a little marvel what came in his mind to command Anſelm to be reveſted and reſeized again into his former Archbiſhoprick; ſeeing he told him before plainly, that if he went out of England without his leave, he would ſo do unto him. Well (ſaith the Pope) have ye no other matter againſt Anſelm but only this? No (quoth they.) And have ye taken all this travel (ſaith the Pope) to come hither ſo far to tell me this, that the Primate of your Country is therefore diſſeized and diſpoſſeſſed, becauſe he hath appealed to the See and judgment Apoſtolical? Therefore if thou loveſt thy Lord, ſpeed thee home and tell him, if he will not be Excommunicated, that he quickly reveſt Anſelm again to all that he had before. And leſt I make thee to be hanged for thy labour, look to thy term, and ſee that thou bring me anſwer again from him into this City, againſt the next Council the third week after Eaſter. The meſſenger or ſpeaker being ſomewhat aſtonied at the hearing of this ſo Tragical anſwer, thinking yet to work ſomething for his King and Maſter, came ſecretly to the Pope, ſaying that he would confer a certain myſtery from his King privately with his Holineſs between them two. What myſtery that was, or what there paſſed from the King to the Pope and the Court of Rome, mine Author doth not ſhew; but ſo cunningly that myſtery was handled, that with a full conſent both of the Pope and all the Court of Rome, a longer day was given, from Eaſter to Michaelmas, and the Popes cholerick heat ſo aſſwaged, that when the Council came (which then was holden at St. Peter's Church in Rome) albeit great complaints were then denounced againſt the King; yet ſuch favour was found that he took no harm. Only the ſentence of Excommunication was there pronounced againſt ſuch lay-perſons as gave Inveſtiture of Churches, and them that were ſo inveſted. Alſo againſt them that do conſecrate ſuch, or which gave themſelves in ſubjection to lay-men for Eccleſiaſtical livings, as is before touched, &c.

A loud crack of thunder but without a thunderbolt.

A bribing myſtery handled at Rome.

Concilium Romanum. Optimus Conſidium.

Acts of the Council of Rome.

This Council being finiſhed, the Archbiſhop ſeeing the unſtedfaſtneſs of the Pope (which pleaſed him but a little) took his journey to Lions, where he continued his abode a long time, till the death firſt of Pope Urban, then after of the King.

Of this King William many things be diverſly recorded, ſome to his commendation, and ſome to his diſcommendation; whereof this is one, which ſome will aſcribe to hardineſs, but I rather to raſhneſs in him. As this King upon a time was in his diſport of hunting, ſuddenly word came to him that Cenourona (a City in Normandy) was beſieged. The King without longer tarrying or adviſement took the ſtraight way toward the Sea-ſide, ſending to his Lords that they ſhould follow after. They being come to his preſence, adviſed him to ſtay till the time his people were aſſembled, but he would not be ſtayed, ſaying that ſuch as him loved (he knew) would follow him ſhortly, and ſo went to take Ship. The Ship-maſter ſeeing the weather ſo dark and cloudy was afraid, and counſelled the King to tarry till the wind did turn about, and the weather more favourable. But the King perſiſting in his journey, commanded him to make all the ſpeed he might for his life; ſaying, That he never heard that any King yet was ever drowned. And ſo paſſed the Sea in ſafety, and came to Normandy.

The hardineſs or rather raſhneſs of K. William.

The ſaying of K. William, how he never knew any King drowned.

The thirteenth year of his reign the ſaid King William, having the ſame time in his hand three Biſhopricks, Canterbury, Wincheſter and Sarum; alſo twelve Abbeys in farm; as he was in his diſport of hunting in the new Foreſt, by glancing of an arrow (ſhot of a Knight named Walter Tirrel) was wounded to death, and ſo ſpeechleſs was carried to Weſtminſter, and there was buried. Where alſo is to be noted, that Richard the Couſin-German of King William, and Son to Duke Robert his Brother, was likewiſe ſlain in the foreſaid Foreſt. See the juſt hand of God upon Kings uſurping wrongfully upon other mens grounds, as did William the Conqueror their Father, in making this new Foreſt, plucking down divers Churches and Townſhips, the compaſs of thirty miles about. Here therefore appeareth, that although men cannot revenge, yet God revengeth either in them, or in their poſterity, &c. This King as he always uſed Concubines, ſo left he no iſſue legitimate behind him. His life was ſuch that it is hard for a ſtory that ſhould tell the truth, to ſay whether he was more to be commended or reproved. Among other vices in him, eſpecially is to be rebuked in him unmeaſurable and unreaſonable covetouſneſs; inſomuch that he coveted (if he might) to be every mans heir. This one example of a liberal and Princely nature I find in him; that upon a time when a certain Abbot of a place was dead, there came to his Court two Monks of the ſame houſe, who before had gathered much money, and made their friends to the King, and offered large offers, either of them to be promoted to that dignity. There was alſo the third Monk of the ſame place, which of meekneſs and humility followed the other two, to the intent that upon him whom the King had admitted for Abbot, he ſhould give attendance, and as his Chaplain with him return. The King called before him the two Monks ſeverally, of whom the one out-proffered the other. As the King caſt his eye aſide, he eſpied the third Monk ſtanding by, ſuppoſing that his coming had been alſo for the like cauſe. Then the King calling him, asked what he would do, whether he would give more than his brethern had offered to be Abbot. He anſwered to the King, and ſaid, that he neither had nor would (if he might) offer any peny for it by any ſuch unlawful means.

When the King had well pondered this third Monks anſwer, he ſaid that he was beſt worthy to be Abbot, and to have the rule of ſo holy a Charge; and ſo gave unto him that Benefice without taking any peny.

Urban Excommunicated Henry the 4th. Emperor.

Urban Biſhop of Rome, who (as is ſaid) ſucceeded after Victor, ruled the Church of Rome about the ſpace of twelve years; and amongſt his other acts he Excommunicated the Emperor Henry the Fourth of that name, as a man not much deveut to that See of Rome. But yet a worthy and victorious Prince he was, in whom albeit ſome vice perchance might be noted, yet none ſuch, wherefore any Prelate or Miniſter of Chriſt ought to excite his ſubjects to rebel againſt publick Authority of God appointed. This Emperor Henry the Fourth was by four Popes ſeverally Excommunicated: firſt by Hildebrand, by Victor, Urban, and Paſchal. Which Excommunication wrought ſo in the ignorant and blind hearts of the people, that many (as well of the Nobles as of the multitude, contrary to their ſworn allegiance) rebelliouſly conſpired againſt their King and Emperor. In number of whom, amongſt the reſt was one certain Earl named Ludovicus, to whom

Henry the fourth Emperor, by four Popes Excommunicated.

Ludovicus Earl conſpiring, and rebellious againſt the Emperor.

Waltramus

Waltramus Biſhop of the Church of Mergburgh (a godly and faithful man as appeareth) doth write Letters of Fatherly admonition, exhorting and inſtructing him in the office of obedience. Unto the which Letters he likewiſe doth anſwer again by cavilling ſophiſtication, and by meer affection rather diſpoſed to diſcord, than ſeeking ſincerity of truth. And forſomuch as in theſe two Letters the argument of Chriſtian obedience on both ſides is ſo debated by proofs and reaſons, as may be profitable for the Reader to peruſe and underſtand, I thought therefore not to defraud the Engliſh Reader of the ſame, whereof peradventure ſome utility might be taken. The tenor of the Biſhops Letter to the Earl here followeth.

The Epiſtle of Waltramus Biſhop of Merghurgh, to the Earl Ludovicus, exhorting to concord and obedience.

WAltramus Dei gratia id quod eſt, Ludovico ſereniſſimo Principi, cum inſtantia orationum ſemetipſum ad omnia devotiſſimum, Omni regno utilis eſt concordia, deſiderabilis eſt juſtitia, &c.

In Engliſh.

'Waltram by the Grace of God being that he is, to 'Ludowick the noble Prince, with inſtance of prayers of'fereth himſelf ſerviceable to all things. To every Realm 'concord is a thing profitable, and juſtice much to be de'ſired. For this vertue is the mother of godlineſs, and 'the conſecration of all honeſty. Whoſoever ſeeketh after 'civil diſſention, and incenſeth others to effuſion of blood, 'he is a murtherer, and partaker with him, who ever 'gaping and thirſting for anothers blood, goeth about 'ſeeking whom he may devour. You therefore conſider-
Concord & juſt obedience neceſſary in a Commonwealth.
'with your ſelf (moſt noble Prince) how God is the God 'of peace and not of diſſention (ſo much as in you doth 'lie) have peace with all men. God is charity, the Devil 'is hatred. The whole Law and Prophets conſiſt in love 'and charity. He that hateth and maligneth his brother is 'a murtherer, and hath no part with Chriſt in the King'dom of God. This we read teſtified and proteſted both 'by him which is the truth himſelf, and by him which 'was the ſcholar of the truth; who upon the breaſt of 'the Lord (drinking a more full draught of the Goſpel) 'rejoyceth the City of God with abundance of plentiful 'floods. In like manner that worthy veſſel of Election, 'who being rapt up to the third Heaven (not by man, but 'by revelation of Jeſus Chriſt) proteſteth alſo, ſaying, Let 'every ſoul ſubmit himſelf to the higher powers: There is 'no power, ſaith he, but of God. If that be true there'fore, which certain of our friends do jangle among wo'men and the vulgar ſort, that we ought not to be ſubdu'ed to Kingly power; then is it falſe which the Apoſtle 'teacheth, that every ſoul muſt ſubmit himſelf under pow'er and ſuperiority. But can the Verity lie? Or do we 'ſeek for experiment of him who ſpake in the Apoſtle, 'Chriſt the Lord? Or do we provoke the Lord? Be we 'ſtronger than he? For what doth he but think himſelf 'ſtronger than the Lord, that reſiſteth the ordinance of 'God? For there is no power but of God. But what Diſobedience puniſhed of God.
'ſaith the Prophet? Confounded be all they that ſtrive 'againſt thee, O Lord; and the men which repugn againſt 'thee ſhall periſh. Rodolph, Hildebrand, Egbert, with 'many other Princes, reſiſted the Ordinance of God in 'Henry the Emperor. And lo even as they had never been, 'ſo are they now periſhed; and as their end was evil, ſo 'their beginning could not be good.

'Now therefore, forſomuch as they which be contrary to 'us do earneſtly ſtrive againſt us even with their own ar'guments, whereas of right (I dare refer me to your 'judgment) we ought to uſe the authority of Chriſt and 'ancient Fathers, before that which our adverſaries take out 'of their own treaſury: And becauſe I will not refuſe the 'order of Law in this behalf; let it be the end of the 'ſtrife, that either I may be openly ſhamed before the peo'ple, either elſe (the victory falling on our ſide) we may 'win you to the obedience of our Soveraign Lord the Em'peror. Alſo take you heed to this ſaying, If any man do
'preach otherwiſe than that which is preached, let him be
'of you accurſed. This curſe, I ſay, doth not proceed from 'any new prophane authority, but is thundred down from 'the third Heaven. And of them which know not the 'righteouſneſs of God, but go about to ſtabliſh their own 'righteouſneſs, and therefore be not ſubject to the righte'ouſneſs of God, I may boldly ſay, let ſuch be accurſed. So Job.
'may you well ſay, Confounded be all they that proudly 'riſe up againſt the Lord; but thy ſervant (O Lord) ſhall 'rejoyce. For as thou haſt well ſaid, Without me you can 'do nothing, ſo in judging of the wicked thou doſt not Rom.
'condemn the juſt. Who art thou that judgeſt another mans 'ſervant? to his own Lord he doth either ſtand or fall.

The Anſwer of Earl Lewis to Biſhop Waltram.

A railing Anſwer to the former Letter of Biſhop Waltram.

THE Earl Lewis to the Lord Waltram, howſoever unworthy or unmeet he be for the name. Like as a 'good man from the good treaſure of the heart bringeth 'forth good fruit, ſo doth the evil man from the evil trea'ſure of the heart bring forth evil fruit. What arrogancy 'hath ſo poſſeſt you, to provoke my diſpleaſure with ſuch 'injurious contumelies? For indeed thoſe my good Lords 'and Spiritual Fathers, which ſtrengthen me in the way of 'righteouſneſs, you (railingly) call bloody men like unto 'Satan, and the wholſome leſſons which they teach, you ſay 'they are but dreams of the common people amongſt fool'iſh women. Hath God any need of your judgment that 'you ſhould ſpeak leaſings for him? Iniquity hath taught 'your mouth to follow blaſphemous tongues; ſo that well 'may the Prophet ſay of you, He would not underſtand to 'do well, he hath deviſed wickedneſs upon his bed. Al'though therefore you being altogether froward, have only 'ſpoken froward things; yet we have determined to ſet a 'watch before our mouth, like as if a ſhameleſs perſon ſhould 'ſtand up before us; and the Word of God doth provoke 'us, ſaying, Anſwer a fool according to his own fooliſhneſs, Well ſaid, when you are not able to withſtand his wiſdom, call him a fool.
'leſt he ſhould ſeem wiſe in his own opinion. Shall folly 'ſpeak, and wiſdom hold her peace? Shall lyes be freely 'uttered, and truth compelled to keep ſilence? Shall dark'neſs cover the Earth, and ſhall not the Lord ariſe and 'ſhine? yea rather the light hath lightned the darkneſs, and 'darkneſs hath not comprehended it: In conſideration here- Note how the Earl here calleth light darkneſs, and darkneſs light.
'of our hearts have melted, and our zealous meditations 'have ſet us on fire. We therefore ſpeak and cry, and the 'little Foxes which undermine the Lords Vineyards (as 'much as in us is) we drive away, fearing the threatning 'Prophecy: You have not withſtood our adverſaries, neither 'have you made a Bulwark for the defence of the Houſe of 'Iſrael, that you might be able to ſtand in battel in the day 'of the Lord. Let them hear (I ſpeak not to you which 'have ears and hear not, eyes and ſee not, which have made He hath uttered more reaſon than you are able ever to anſwer to.
'dark the light that is in you) but let them hear, I ſay, that 'be well diſpoſed, and have ears to hear withal: as for you, 'you have no underſtanding, and if you have, you cloak it. 'Neither have you any thing to ſay or to prove, by what 'reaſon we ſhould be ſubject to the Lord Henry, whom you 'call Emperor. And yet (as it is given us to underſtand) 'you go about to perſwade, that of neceſſity we ought to 'be ſubject to him, and that by the argument of St. Paul, 'Let every ſoul be ſubdued to the higher powers, for there 'is no power but of God; he therefore that doth withſtand 'power, doth reſiſt Gods Ordinance. The which ſentence 'of the Apoſtle we ſay that you do evil conceive, and there'fore evil interpret; for if every power be of God (as you 'underſtand) what is meant by that, that the Lord doth 'ſpeak of ſome by the Prophet? They did reign and were Whether every power is to be obeyed or no.
'not made Princes by me, and I knew them not. If every 'power be of God as you take it, what is to be thought of Hoſ. 8.
'that, that the Lord doth ſay, If thine eye offend thee, pluck 'it out, and caſt it from thee? For what is power, but the 'eye? Certainly Auguſtin in the Expoſition of this ſentence 'of the Apoſtle (Let every ſoul, &c.) doth ſay, that if the 'powers do command any thing againſt God, then have 'them in contempt: but yet nevertheleſs fear them. Is 'there any iniquity with God? Is Chriſt the Miniſter of If every power which offendeth his ſubjects is to be caſt out, then hath this Earl made a fair argument.
'ſin? God forbid. What ſhall we therefore ſay? Doth the 'Apoſtle preach contrary to truth? Auguſt. ſaith, No. One 'wind filleth many Pipes of divers tunes. Therefore let us 'hear the Apoſtle agreeing and expounding himſelf, and 'deſtroying his enemy and avenger: There is (ſaith he) no 'power but of God. What followeth? He therefore, ſaith 'he,

'he, that doth reſiſt the power, &c. God forbid, doth nothing follow? But what doth follow? Thoſe powers 'which be ordained of God truly, that is it we look for. O 'crafty tongue! O heart imagining miſchief! O conſuming breath that ſhall not return! Why haſt thou lyed 'to the Holy Ghoſt?' Thine own conſcience ſhall accuſe 'thee. Behold the wicked flieth, and no man doth purſue 'him. Why would you ſuppreſs the truth to the intent to 'deceive? Why ſtole ye away the pith and effect of this 'ſentence? for if theſe words ſhould be taken away from 'the midſt of the ſentence, it ſhould lie (contrary to it ſelf) 'inconvenient and half dead. The word of the Lord is 'herein fulfilled, He that diggeth a pit for his neighbour 'ſhall fall therein himſelf. Verily you can neither excuſe 'you of theft, neither avoid the puniſhment due for the 'ſame. O unhappy man! what ſhall you anſwer to the 'Judg, when he ſhall require an account of his ſervants of 'whom he putteth you in truſt, ſeeing you ſhall be ſet be- 'fore him in the midſt, and proved a picker of your Maſters 'treaſure? Wherefore did you not fear the judgment and 'execution, when as the guiltineſs of offence doth require 'condign puniſhment? The Apoſtle through the Holy 'Ghoſt did foreſee, that you and ſuch Hereticks as you are 'ſhould ſpring in the Church, which ſhould call good evil, 'and evil good, and that ſhould put darkneſs in place of 'light, and light in place of darkneſs, which alſo ſhould 'take occaſion by the ſentences of truth to bring in error, 'when as he did ſet this before, There is no power but of 'God: to the intent he might take away the conjecture of 'falſe underſtanding. For (ſaith he) thoſe powers that be, 'are ordained of God. Give therefore an ordinary power, 'and we do not reſiſt, yea we will forthwith do our homage. 'But I do marvel (if at the leaſt there remain in you any 'one drop of blood) that you are not aſhamed to call the 'Lord Henry King, or to allow him any ordinary place.

'Is this a ſeemly order (think you) to give place to wick- 'edneſs, and to make a general confuſion in mixing good 'and evil, Gods and mans devices together? Either do you 'think this good order for man to ſin againſt his own 'body, as (Oh ſhameful wickedneſs) to make his own wife 'a common harlot, a miſchief not heard of at any time 'ſince the beginning of the world before now? Or do you 'allow this for good order, when as the Lord ſaith, De- 'fend the widows, eſpecially ſuch as require equity of ju- 'ſtice, and then them to ſend away moſt filthily defiled? 'Mad Oreſtes doth proteſt him to be out of his wit that 'will ſay theſe things to be orderly or well done. Until 'this moſt miſerable time nature hath ever loved ſecrecy; 'but your King given up to a reprobate ſenſe, hath uncovered the privities of nature, who hath not let to lay abroad all ſhamefaſtneſs. We will not ſpeak of other things 'which cannot be numbred, that is to ſay, burning of 'Churches, Robberies, firing of Houſes, Man-ſlaughters, 'Murders, and ſuch like, the number whereof he knoweth, 'and not we; for let us ſpeak chiefly of thoſe things which 'moſt grieve the Church of God. Hearken therefore to 'true and not fained things: Hearken I ſay, to mat- 'ters of earneſt, and to no trifles. Every one that doth ſell 'ſpiritual dignities is an Heretick. But the Lord Henry, 'whom they call a King, doth ſell both Biſhopricks and 'Abbacies; for truly he ſold for money the Biſhoprick of 'Conſtance, Babembarge, Mentz, and many others. The 'Biſhopricks of Ratiſbon, Auguſta, and Strausbrough, he 'ſold for a Sword, and the Abbey of Fulda for Adultery; 'and for filthy Sodomitry he ſold the Biſhoprick of Mon. A 'wickedneſs it is to ſpeak or hear of ſuch a fact. The which 'things if without ſhame ye will deny, he is to be condem- 'ned by the witneſs of Heaven and Earth; yea and of the 'ſilly poor Idiots that come from the Smiths forge. Where- 'fore the Lord Henry is an Heretick; for the which moſt 'wicked evils he is Excommunicate from the See Apoſto- 'lick, ſo that he may not exerciſe either Kingdom or pow- 'er over us which be Catholick. And whereas you burthen 'us with hatred of our Brethren, know you that we pur- 'poſe not to hate any of affection, but of a godly zeal. 'God forbid that we ſhould think Henry worthy to be ac- 'counted amongſt our Chriſtian Brethren, who indeed is 'reputed for an Ethnick and Publican, in that he refuſed to hear the Church which ſo oft hath reproved him. The 'hatred of whom we offer unto God for a great ſacrifice, 'ſaying with the Pſalmiſt, Lord ſhall not I hate them that 'hate thee? and ſhall not I triumph over thine enemies? 'I hate them with an inward hatred that be enemies to me 'for thy ſake. The truth it ſelf, commending the worthi- 'neſs of this hatred, doth ſay, If any do not hate Father 'and Mother, Brethren and Siſters for my ſake, he cannot 'be my Diſciple. We are not therefore juſtly to be repro- 'ved of hatred, which do give over our own ſoul to be in 'the way of God; who indeed are commanded to hate 'Father and Mother, and every affection which doth with- 'ſtand us for walking in the path of God. Hereof it com- 'eth, that we labour with all our ſtudy and endeavour to 'beware of the enemies of the Church, and them to hate; 'not for that they be our enemies, but Gods. Further, 'where you perſwade peace to be had with all men, you 'muſt remember what the Apoſtle doth put before, If it 'may be. But if it cannot be that we can have peace with 'them, who can be contrary to God? Who doth not know 'the Lord our Saviour not only to commend peace, when 'as he ſaith, My peace I give unto you, my peace I leave 'unto you; But that he is the peace (as ſaith the Apoſtle) 'he is the peace which made of both one; for he calleth 'him our peace, ſpeaking in commendation of the peace: 'Think not (ſaith he) that I came to ſend peace, for I came 'not to ſend peace, but the Sword. What is meant by this? 'Why is peace called a ſword? Or doth peace bid battel? 'Yea truly, to deſtroy the peace of the Devil. For the Di- 'vel hath his peace, whereof the Lord ſpeaketh, When as 'the ſtrong man keepeth his Houſe, he doth poſſeſs all his 'ſubſtance in peace. Oh how mightily doth the Devil keep 'his ſoldiers and his houſe in this time! Who with the 'ſhield of falſhood, and the helmet of untruth ſo doth de- 'fend him, that he will not ſuffer either arrow or dart of 'truth to pierce him. Nevertheleſs our Lord being more 'ſtrongly armed, and fiercely coming upon your Giant, is 'able to overcome him and to take away his weapons, 'wherein he putteth his truſt. We are not therefore to be 'blamed, if we do deteſt that peace, more cruel than any 'war, the which the truth it ſelf did reprove weeping over 'Jeruſalem, and ſaying, Truly, it grieveth me this day to 'ſee ſinners in peace; being like unto that peace whereat 'the Pſalmiſt was offended. Whereas you condemn Pope 'Gregory, King Rodulphus, and Marquis Eggebertus, as 'men that have died of an unhappy death, and do magni- 'fie your Lord, becauſe he doth over-live them; it doth 'plainly (forſooth) appear, that you remain void of all ſpi- 'ritual conſideration. Is it not better to die well, than to 'live ill? They be truly happy who ſuffer perſecution for 'righteouſneſs ſake. By the ſame reaſon may you eſteem 'Nero, Herod, and Pilat happy, in that they over-lived 'Peter, Paul, James, Apoſtles, and Jeſus Chriſt. What 'can be ſaid more fooliſh and wicked than this opinion? 'Wherefore refrain your babling tongue from this blaſ- 'phemy, leſt that you place your ſelf in the number of 'them, which ſeeing the end of the juſt to be glorious '(themſelves doing late and unfruitful penance, bewailing 'in the anguiſh of the Spirit) ſhall ſay, Theſe be they whom 'ſometimes we had in deriſion and laughed to ſcorn; we 'being out of our wits thought their lives madneſs, and 'their end to be without honour. Behold how they be al- 'lowed to be amongſt the Children of God, and their por- 'tion is amongſt the Saints. Wherefore we have erred from 'the way of truth, and the brightneſs of righteouſneſs did 'not ſhine upon us. What did our pride avail us? and what 'profit did the boaſting of our riches bring us? They are 'all vaniſhed away like a ſhadow. The which words we 'have regiſtred up into perpetual memory, and we do de- 'ſpiſe every attempt that ſhall lift up it ſelf againſt the truth 'of God; and rejoycing in troubles, we may be reproved, 'put to ſhame and rebuked, yea and finally be ſlain and 'killed, but we will neither yield, nor be overcome. And 'with great triumph will we rejoyce in our fathers doings; 'of whom you (as a beardleſs boy, and of ſmall knowledg) 'have nothing rightly conceived; who indeed deſpiſing 'Princes commandments, have deſerved everlaſting reward.

There is a certain Chronicle in old Engliſh Meeter, Ex vetuſta Chronica. which among other matters, ſpeaking of William Rufus, declareth him to be ſo ſumptuous and exceſſive in pompous Apparel, that he being not contented with a pair of Hoſe of a low price, which was three ſhillings, cauſed a pair to be bought of a mark; whereupon his Chamberlain

But Paul judged the Emperor to be an ordinary power, when he appealed to him.

This is likely, that the Emperor would make his own Wife a common Harlot.

Kings created inviſible. After the time of this King William, the name of Kings ceaſed in the Country of Wales among the Britains, ſince King Ris, who in the reign of this King, the year of our Lord 1093, was ſlain in Wales. Ex continuatione Rogeri Hoved.

King HENRY the Firſt.

{Anno 1100.} HENRY the Firſt of that name, the Third Son of William the Conqueror, ſucceeding his Brother Rufus, began his Reign in England, the year of our Lord 1100, who for his knowledg and ſcience in the Seven Liberal Arts, was Simamed Clerk or Beuclerk. In whom may well appear how Knowledg and Learning doth greatly conduce to the Government and Adminiſtration of any Realm or Country. At the beginning he reformed the ſtate and condition of the Clergy, releaſed the grievous payments, reduced again King Edward's Laws, with Emendation thereof; he reformed the old and untrue meaſures, and made a meaſure after the length of his arm; he greatly abhored exceſs of meats and drinks, many things miſuſed before his time he reformed; and uſed to vanquiſh more by counſel than by ſword. Such perſons as were nice and wanton he ſecluded from his Court. This man (as appeareth) little favoured the uſurped power of the Biſhop of Rome. Soon after he was King, he married Matild, or Maud, Daughter of Malcolm King of Scots, & of Margaret his wife, Daughter of Edward the Outlaw, as is before ſpecified, being a profeſſed Nun in Wincheſter; whom notwithſtanding (without the Popes diſpenſation) he married by the conſent of Anſelm, by the which Maud he received two Sons, William and Richard, and two Daughters, Maud and Mary, which Maud afterward was married to Henry the fifth Emperor, &c.

In the ſecond year of his Reign, Robert his Elder Brother, Duke of Normandy, being occupied in the Chriſtian Wars againſt the Turks, and being elect (as you heard) King of Jeruſalem, hearing of the death of Rufus, refuſed the Kingdom thereof; for the which (as is thought) he never ſped well after. Thus the ſaid Robert leaving off the Lords buſineſs, and returning into Normandy, made there his preparation, and came over into England with a great Hoſt to challenge the Crown; but by mediation of the Lords it was agreed upon that Robert ſhould have yearly during his life three thouſand Marks, as was likewiſe promiſed him before by King Rufus his Brother; and whether of them overlived the other, to be the others heir. And thus Robert departed again into Normandy, to the great diſcontentation of his Lords there. But in few years after, the forenamed tribute of three thouſand Marks, through the means of Queen Maud, was releaſed to the King his Brother. In proceſs of time, variance falling between King Henry and the ſaid Robert his Brother; at length Robert in his Wars was taken priſoner and brought over into England, and was put into the Caſtle of Cardiff in Wales, where he continued as priſoner while he lived.

Example, what it is to leave off the Lords buſineſs. Duke Robert taken priſoner.

In this time, as about the third year of this King, the Hoſpital of Saint Bartholomew in Smithfield was founded (by means of a Minſtrel belonging unto the King, named Rajer) and after it was finiſhed by Richard Whittington, Alderman and Mayor of London. This place or Smithfield was at that day a Laytall of all ordure or filth, and the place where the felons and other tranſgreſſors of the Kings Laws were put to execution.

The Hoſpital of Bartholomew founded. Rajer and Richard Whittington founders of St. Bartholomews in London.

Divers ſtrict Laws were by this King provided, eſpecially againſt thieves and felons; that whoſoever were taken in that fault, no money ſhould ſave them from hanging.

Item, That whoſo did counterfeit falſe Money, ſhould have both his eyes and neather parts of his body cut off.

Item, In the ſame Council was decreed an order for Prieſts to be ſequeſtred from their wives, which before were not forbidden, according as the words of mine Author do purport, whoſe words be theſe: Anſelmus prohibuit uxores ſacerdotibus Anglorum ante non prohibitas. Quod quibuſdam mundiſſimum viſum eſt, quibuſdam periculoſum, ne dum mundicias viribus majores appeterent, in immundicias horribiles ad Chriſtiani nominis ſummum dedecus inciderent, &c. Henr. Hunt. Ex H. 7. Anſ

Item, It was then decreed that Monks and Prieſts ſhould bear no rule over Lay-perſons.

Item, It was then decreed concerning broidering of hair, and wearing of garments.

Item, That the ſecret contract between a young lad and a young maid ſhould not ſtand; with other things more concerning the Excommunication of Sodomites, &c.

In the ſtory of William Rufus, before was declared how Anſelm the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, departing out of the Realm, went unto the Pope; who after the death of King William was ſent for again by the foreſaid King Henry, and ſo returned again, and was at the Council of the King at Weſtminſter; where the King in the preſence of the Lords as well Temporal as Spiritual, ordained and inveſted two Biſhops, Roger Biſhop of Salisbury, and Roger Biſhop of Hereford. During which Parliament or Council of the King, Anſelm in his Convocation depoſed and diſplaced divers Abbots and other Prelates from their rooms and dignities; either for that they lawfully came not by them, or uprightly did not adminiſter the ſame. The King ordained and inveſted Biſhops without the Pope.

After this Council, and the other before ſet forth by Anſelm, Herbert Biſhop of Norwich had much ado with the Prieſts of his Dioceſs; for they would neither leave their wives, nor yet give over their Benefices. Whereupon he wrote to Anſelm the Archbiſhop for counſel, what was to be done therein. Which Anſelm required him (as he did others more the ſame time by writing) to perſwade the people of Northfolk and Suffolk; that as they profeſſed Chriſtianity, they ſhould ſubdue them as rebels againſt the Church, and utterly drive both them and their wives out of the Country, placing Monks in their rooms, as by the Epiſtles of the ſaid Anſelm doth appear. Whereof certain parcels ſhall hereafter (by the Grace of Chriſt) enſue for the better evidence of this and the other his acts above recited. Herbert Biſhop of Norwich divorceth his Prieſts from their wives, had much ado. Anſelm cruel and fierce againſt married Prieſts. Ex Epiſtl. Anſelm.

The like buſineſs alſo had Gerard the Archbiſhop of York, in depriving the Prieſts of his Province from their wives; which thing with all his Excommunications and thundrings he could hardly bring about. Upon this ruffling of Anſelm with married Prieſts, were rimed verſes made to help the matter withal, when reaſon could not ſerve. Which verſes for the folly thereof I thought here to annex.

Contradicentem fore dicimus inſipientem:
Non ex rancore loquor hæc, potius ſed amore. Verſus male feriti, ex bulla Kanuti.

About the end of the third year of this King, which was by computation of our Lord 1103, a variance fell between King Henry and Anſelm, the occaſion whereof was this: Ye heard a little before how Henry the foreſaid King had of his own authority inveſted two Biſhops, one Roger which was Chancellor, Biſhop of Salisbury; and another Biſhop of Hereford. Beſides them divers alſo he inveſted, and divers other like things took he upon him in the Eccleſiaſtical State, which he might lawfully do, Gods Word allowing well the ſame; but becauſe he was reſtrained by the Biſhop of Rome, and forbidden ſo to do, this Anſelm ſwelled, fretted, and waxed ſo mad, that he would neither conſent to it, neither yet confirm them, nor communicate nor talk friendly with them, whom the King {Anno 1103.} A ſtrife between King Henry, and Anſelm the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

King had inſtituted and inveſted; but opprobriouſly called them abortives, or children of deſtruction, diſdainfully rebuking the gentle King as a defiler of Religion, and pollutor of their holy Ceremonies; as witneſſeth Polydorus. With this uncomly outrage the King was much diſpleaſed (as he might full well) and required Gerard the Archbiſhop of York (as he ought him allegiance) to conſecrate them: Who without delay did ſo, well performing the ſame; ſaving that one William Gifford, to whom the King had given the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, refuſed to take his conſecration by the hands of the Archbiſhop of York. For the which cauſe the King (worthily with him offended) deprived him both of Biſhoprick and goods, and baniſhed him the Realm.

Gifford Biſhop of Wincheſter refuſed to be conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of York.

Moreover, the King required of Anſelm the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to do unto him Homage, after the manner of his Anceſtors, as witneſſeth Guliel. de geſtis pontif. Anglo. Alſo it was asked of the ſaid Anſelm, whether that he would be with the King in giving inveſtitures, as Lanfrancus his Predeceſſor was with his Father. To whom Anſelm ſaid, that he promiſed not at any time, that he would enter into this Order, to keep the Law or Cuſtom of his Father, as Lanfrancus did. Moreover, as concerning Homage to be done to the King, that he refuſed; alledging the cenſures of the Popes excommunication, who, in his council of Rome a little before, had given forth open ſentence of excommunication upon all ſuch lay perſons (whatſoever they were) that ſhould from henceforth confer or give any ſpiritual promotions: Alſo upon them that received them at their hands, either yet ſhould conſecrate any ſuch receivers. Moreover he accurſed all them that for benefices or other Eccleſiaſtical promotions ſhould ſubject themſeves under the Homage or ſervice of any great man, King, Prince, Duke, or Earl of the Laity. For it was unſeemly (ſaid the Pope) and a thing very execrable, that the hands which were converted into ſo high a working, as was granted to no angel (that is, to create him with their croſſes, which created all, and to offer up the ſame before the ſight of the Father for the ſalvation of the whole World) ſhould be brought to ſuch a ſlavery, as to be ſubject to thoſe filthy hands, which both day and night are polluted with ſhameful touchings, robberies, and bloodſhed, &c. This decree of Pope Urban Anſelm alledging for himſelf, denied to ſubject himſelf to the Kings Homage, fearing (as he ſaid) the Popes excommunication. Upon this, meſſengers were ſent to Rome on both parts unto the Pope (then Paſchalis) who, ſtoutly ſtanding to the ſteps and determinations of Urban his predeceſſor, would in no caſe yield to the Kings inveſting.

In the mean time, while there was long diſputation on both ſides for inveſting, the Nobles of the Realm contended, that inveſtings did belong to the Kings dignity: Wherefore the King, calling for Anſelm again, required him either to do Homage to him, or elſe to void his Kingdom. To whom Anſelm replying again, required the Popes Letters to be brought forth, and, according to the Tenor thereof, ſo the matter to be decided. For now the meſſengers were returned from Rome, with the Popes anſwer; altogether bearing with Anſelm. Then ſaid the King: What have I to do with Popes Letters? I will not forgo the liberties of my Kingdom for any Pope. Thus the contention continued between them. Anſelm ſaith, he would not out of the Realm, but depart home to his Church: And there ſee who would offer him any violence, and ſo did. Not long after, meſſage came from the King to Anſelm, requeſting him, after a gentle ſort, to repair to the Kings preſence again, to ſet an end of the controverſie begun; Whereunto Anſelm granted and came. Then were new Ambaſſadors ſent again to the Pope, that he would ſomething qualifie and moderate (or rather aboliſh) the ſtraitneſs of the Roman decree before mentioned. On the part of Anſelm went two Monks, Baldwinus and Alexander. On the Kings behalf were ſent two Biſhops, Robert Biſhop of Lichfield, and Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, with the Kings Letters written unto the Pope, containing in form as followeth.

The King hath nothing to do with the Popes Letters.

Meſſengers ſent again to Rome.

The Letter of King Henry the firſt unto the Pope.

Patri venerabili Paſchali ſummo pontifici, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum, ſalutem. Promotioni veſtræ in ſedem ſanctæ Romanæ eccleſiæ plurimum congaudeo, petens ut amicitia quæ patri meo cum anteceſſoribus veſtris fuit, inter nos quoque illibata permaneat. Unde, ut dilectio & benignitas a me videatur ſumere initium, beneficium quod ab anteceſſoribus meis beatus Petrus habuit, vobis mitto: eoſq; honores & eam obedientiam quam tempore patris mei anteceſſores veſtri in regno Angliæ habuerunt, tempore meo ut habeatis volo, eo videlicet tenore, ut dignitatis uſus & conſuetudines, quas pater meus tempore anteceſſorum veſtrorum in regno Angliæ habuit, ego tempore veſtro in eodem regno meo integre obtineam. Notumq; habeat ſanctitas veſtra, quod me vivente (Deo auxiliante) dignitates & uſus regni Angliæ non minuentur. Et ſi ego (quod abſit) in tanta me dejectione ponerem; optimates mei (imo totius Angliæ populus) id nullo modo pateretur. Habita igitur (chariſſime pater) utiliori deliberatione, ita ſe erga nos moderatur benignitas veſtra, ne quid invitus faciam, & a veſtra me cogatis recedere obedientia.

To the Reverend Father Paſchal chief Biſhop. Henry by the Grace of God, King of England, Greeting. For this your promotion unto the See of the holy Church of Rome, as I am heartily glad; ſo my requeſt is to you, that the friendſhip and amity, which hath been tofore between my Father and your Predeceſſors in times paſt, may now alſo between us in like manner continue undiminiſhed. And that love and gentleneſs may firſt begin on my part; here I ſend to you that Gift that S. Peter had in former time of my Predeceſſors. And likewiſe the ſame honors and obedience, which your Predeceſſors have had in the Realm of England before in the time of my Father, I will you to have the ſame in my time alſo: After this form I mean and tenor, that the uſage and manner of Dignity and Cuſtomes, which my Father hath had in this Realm of England, in the time of your Anceſtors; I in like ample manner alſo now in your time may fully injoy the ſame in this the ſaid Realm of England. Thus therefore be it known to your Holineſs, that during this life of mine (God Almighty abling me to the ſame) theſe above named Dignities, Uſages, and Cuſtoms of this Realm of England, ſhall in no part be leſſened. Yea, and if that I (as God forbid I ſhould) would ſo much deject my ſelf unto ſuch cowardneſs: Yet my Nobles, Yea, the whole People of England in no caſe would ſuffer it. Wherefore (dear Father) uſing with your ſelf a better deliberation in this matter, let your gentelneſs ſo moderate it ſelf toward us, leſt ye compel me (which I ſhall do againſt my will) to recede and depart utterly from your Obedience.

Spoken like a King.

The King is at a point to leave the Popes Obedience.

At the ſame Term alſo he ſent another Letter or Epiſtle to the ſaid Pope, Craving of him the Pall for Gerardus Archbiſhop of York, the form whereof here alſo followeth.

Another Letter of King Henry the firſt, ſent to the Pope.

Reverendo & diligendo patri univerſali papæ Paſchali, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum, ſalutem. Amor quem plurimum erga vos habeo, & benignitas quæ multum veſtros actus exornat, &c.

In Engliſh.

To the Reverend and Welbeloved Father Univerſal, Pope Paſchalis, Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England, Greeting. The great love which I bear to you, and the no leſs gentleneſs in you, which not a little beautifieth your doings, miniſtreth to me boldneſs to write. And whereas I thought to have retained ſtill this Gerardus with me, and to have craved your Pall for him by Letters: Yet notwithſtanding, when his deſire could not otherwiſe be ſatisfied, but he would needs preſent himſelf before your preſence, by his own heart to crave of you the ſame, I have ſent him up unto you, deſiring your benigne Fatherhood in this behalf, that he, obtaining the Pall at your hands, may be ſent home again to me. And thus requiring the aſſiſtance of your Prayers, I pray the Lord long to conſerve your Apoſtleſhip.

This ſecond Letter of the King in ſending for the Pall was well taken of all the Court of Rome, which (as mine Author ſaith) procured ſuch favour to Gerardus Archbiſhop of York, and bringer thereof, that no complaint of his adverſaries afterwards could hurt him with the Pope. Notwithſtanding he was accuſed grievouſly for divers things, and ſpecially for not ſtanding to the conſecration of Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A place of Polydorus Virg. found faulty. Ex Gulielm. lib. 8. de pont. Ang.

Polydorus in his eleventh Book of his Engliſh Hiſtory affirmeth, that Anſelmus alſo went up to Rome with Gerardus, about the ſame cauſe. But both the premiſſes and ſequel of the ſtory argue that to be untrue, for what need the two Monks to be ſent up on Anſelms ſide, if he had gone up himſelf? Again, how could the Pope write down by the ſaid Meſſengers to Anſelm, if he had there been himſelf preſent? For ſo proceedeth the ſtory by the Narration of Malmesbury and Others.

The Pope loth to go againſt his own profit.

After the Ambaſſadors (thus on both ſides ſent unto Rome) had laboured their cauſe with inſtant ſute, one againſt the other; the Pope glad to gratifie the King (yet loath to grant his requeſt, being againſt his own profit, and therefore more inclining to Anſelms ſide) ſendeth down his Letters to the ſaid Anſelm, ſignifying that he would not repeal the Statutes of his holy Fathers for one mans Pleaſure: Charging him Moreover, not only not to yield in the cauſe of inveſting, but conſtantly to adhere to the foreſaid Decreement of Pope Urban his Predeceſſor, &c. Beſides this Letter to Anſelm, he directed alſo another to the King himſelf: Which Letter, mine Author ſaith, the King ſuppreſſed and did not ſhew, only declaring by word of Mouth, what the Ambaſſadors had ſaid unto him from the Pope. Which was, that he permitted unto him the Licence of Inveſting, upon condition that in other things he would execute the office of a good Prince, &c. To this alſo the Teſtimony of the two Biſhops above minded did accord; which made the matter more probable. But the two Monks on the other ſide Replyed again, bringing forth the Letter of Anſelm to the contrary, &c. To them was anſwered again, that more credit was to be given to the degree and Teſtimony of the Biſhops, than to theirs. And as for Monks, they had no Suffrage nor Teſtimony (ſaid they) in ſecular matters, and therefore they might hold their Peace. But this is no ſecular matter, ſaid Baldwin Abbat of Ramſey. Whereunto the Nobles again of the Kings part anſwered, ſaying, that he was a good Man, and of ſuch Demeanour as they had nothing to ſay againſt him, neither would if they might: But yet both Human and Divine reaſon taught them ſo, to yield more credit and confidence to the Teſtimony of three Biſhops, than of two Monks. Whereby may well appear, that Anſelm at that time went not with them. Then Anſelm ſeeing the King and his Peers how they were ſet, and hearing alſo the Teſtimony of the three Biſhops, againſt whom he ſaw he could not prevail; and alſo having the Popes Seal, which he ſaw to be ſo evident on the contrary ſide, made his anſwer again; that he would ſend to Rome for a more certainty of truth. Adding moreover, that he neither would, nor durſt give over his cauſe, though it ſhould coſt him his life, to do or proceed againſt the Determination of the Church of Rome, unleſs he had a perfect warrant of abſolution from thence, for his diſcharge. Then was it agreed by the King and his Nobles, that he ſhould not ſend, but go himſelf to Rome. And much intreaty was made, that he would take that journey in hand himſelf, in his own perſon, to preſent himſelf to the Pope for the peace of the Church and of his Country. And ſo at length by perſwaſion, he was content, went to Rome and ſpake with the Pope. In ſhort time after followeth alſo the Kings Ambaſſador, (William Warlwaſt) new Elect Biſhop of Exceſter, who there Pleading on the Kings ſide for the Ancient Cuſtoms of the Realm, and for the Kings Right of Inveſting, &c. Firſt declared, how England of a long continuance had ever been a Province peculiar to the Church of Rome, and how it payed duly his yearly Tribute unto the ſame. Inferring moreover how the King, as he was of nature very liberal, ſo alſo of courage a Prince ſtout and valiant. Then what a ſhame would he think it ſhould be to him (as it were indeed) if he, who in might and dignity far exceeded all his Progenitors, ſhould not defend and maintain the Liberties and Cuſtoms by them procured? Wherefore he deſired the Pope to ſee to the matter, ſo as might ſtand both with the Kings Honour, and alſo with his own profit and advantage; who otherwiſe no doubt ſhould loſe a great piece of Money out of the Realm, unleſs he did remit ſomething of the ſeverity of his Canons and Laws Decretal.

He meaneth beſide the two Biſhops, Gerardus, which made third.

Anſelm journieth again to Rome.

The effect of the Oration of William Warwaſt at the Popes Court.

With theſe and ſuch other like perſwaſions to the ſame Effect, the Court of Rome was well contented, agreeing that the Kings requeſt ought with all favour to be granted. But the Pope and Anſelm ſat ſtill marking their doings. The Ambaſſador, ſuppoſing their ſilence to be half a yielding unto him, added moreover and ſaid; that the King, no not for the Crown of his Realm, would loſe the authority of inveſting or admitting his Prelates within his Dominion. Whereunto the proud Pope anſwering again burſt out in theſe Words: Nor I (ſaid he) for the Price of this Head (as thou ſayeſt) will loſe the giving of ſpiritual Promotions in England, and confirming it with an Oath (Before God ſaith he I ſpeak it) know it for a certain, &c. Then it followeth in the ſtory of Malmesbury, With this Word of the Pope the minds of the reſt were changed, ſaying, Benedicta ſit cordis tui conſtantia, benedicta oris loquela. The Kings Attorny alſo was therewith daſhed, who notwithſtanding yet brought to paſs, that certain of the Kings, Cuſtoms, uſed before of his Father, were releaſed unto him. At the which time in the ſame Court it was decreed, that (the King only, which had Inveſted them, being excepted) the others which were Inveſted by the King, ſhould be Excommunicated: The abſolution and ſatisfaction of whom was left to Anſelm the Archbiſhop.

Excommunication abuſed.

Thus Anſelm, being diſmiſſed from Rome, took his Journey toward England. But the Ambaſſador, pretending to go to S. Nicholas, remained behind, to ſee whether he could win the Popes mind to the Kings purpoſe. Which when he ſaw it would not be, he overtaketh Anſelm by the way at Placentia, and opened him the Kings pleaſure. The King (ſaith he) giveth to you in charge and commandment, that if you will come to England, and there behave your ſelf to him, as your Predeceſſors did to his Father, you ſhould be received and retained in the Realm accordingly: If not, you are wiſe enough (ſaith he) ye know what I mean, and what will follow, &c. And ſo with theſe Words, parting from him he returned again to the King. Anſelm remained at Lions a year and a half, writing divers Letters to the King, after this Effect, and in Words as Followeth.

To his Reverend Lord, HENRY, King of England, Anſelm, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, faithful Service with Prayers. Epiſt. 224.

A Letter of Anſelm to King Henry.

ALthough you underſtand by William Warlwaſt what we have done at Rome; yet I ſhall ſhortly ſhew you that which belongeth to me. When I came to Rome, I declared the cauſe wherefore I came to the Lord Pope. He anſwered that he would not ſwarve from the Statutes of his Predeceſſors. Furthermore, he commanded me that I ſhould have no Fellowſhip with them that received Inveſtings of Churches at your hands, after the knowledge of this Prohibition, except they will do Penance, and forſake that they had received, without hope of recovery; neither that I ſhould communicate with the other Biſhops that had conſecrated ſuch men, except they would preſent themſelves to the Judgment of the Apoſtolique See. The aforeſaid William can be a witneſs of all theſe things if he will. This William, when we departed aſunder (reckoning up in your behalf, the love and liberality which you had always towards me) warned me as your Archbiſhop, that I ſhould ſhew my ſelf ſuch an one, that if I would come into England, I might be with you as my Predeceſſor was with your Father, and ye might intreat me with the ſame Honour and Liberty that your Father intreated my Predeceſſor. By which Words I underſtand, that except I ſhould ſhew my ſelf ſuch a one, you would not have me come into England. For your Love and Liberality I thank you: But that I ſhould be with you as my Predeceſſor was with your Father, I cannot do it. For I dare not do Homage to you, nor dare communicate with them that take Inveſtings of Churches at your hands: Becauſe of the foreſaid inhibition made, I my ſelf hearing it. Wherefore I deſire you to ſend me your pleaſure herein (if it pleaſe you) whether I may return into England (as I ſaid) with your Peace and Power of mine Office.

The proud ſtoutneſs of a Prelate in a wrong cauſe.

In the mean while, great buſineſs there was, and much Poſting went to and fro between the King, the Archbiſhop, and the Pope, but nothing was done: For neither would the Pope agree to the King, neither would the King condiſcend to the Archbiſhop. At laſt the Archbiſhop, biſhop, ſeeing by no means he could prevail againſt the King, thought to revenge himſelf by Excommunication, and ſo went about the ſame. The King, having word thereof by the Counteſs Adela his Siſter, deſireth her to come to him into Normandy, and bring Anſelm with her: Whereupon (through the means of the Counteſs) reconcilment was made, and the Archbiſhop was reſtored to his former poſſeſſions again. Only his return into England was deferred, becauſe he would not communicate with thoſe whom the King had Inveſted. So the King took his Paſſage over into England, and Anſelm made his abode at the Abbey of Becke.

Ex-communi-cates the King.

Reconcilement made between the King and Anſelm.

Ambaſſage to Rome.

Then were Ambaſſadors again directed unto Rome, William Warlwaſt, and Baldwin above named, Abbat of Rameſeie, who at length concluded the long controverſie between the King and the Pope upon this agreement, that the King ſhould take Homage of the Biſhops Elect, but ſhould not deal with Inveſting them by Staffe and Ring, &c. While the Ambaſſadors were thus in their ſute at Rome, divers complaints were daily brought from England to Anſelm, againſt the Prieſts and Canons, who in his abſence, contrary to the late Council holden at London, received their Wives unto their Houſes again, and ſo were permitted by the King, paying him certain Money for the ſame. Anſelm (the ſore Enemy againſt lawful marriage) grieved therewith, addreſſeth his Letters unto the King, requiring him to refrain from any more taking of ſuch Exactions, declaring moreover and affirming, that the offences of all ſuch Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters muſt be Corrected by the inſtance of Biſhops, and not of Laymen. To this the King anſwereth Gently again by Letters, tempering himſelf; how he purpoſed ſhortly to come over into Normandy, and if he had done any thing amiſs, either in theſe or other things, he would reform it by his Obedience.

Fuller. Matthew. lib. 2. de geſtis pontif.

Prieſts received their Wives again by the abſence of Anſelm.

The faults of Eccleſiaſtical miniſters belong to none but to Biſhops to correct, ſaith Anſelm.

It was not long after (the Meſſengers being now returned from Rome) but the King, as he had promiſed, ſped him into Normandy, where he, warring againſt his Brother Robert, brought both him and the Country of Normandy at the laſt under his Subjection. But firſt meeting with Anſelm at the Abbey of Becke, he covenanted and agreed with him in all ſuch points as the Archbiſhop required. As firſt, that all his Churches, which before were made tributary unto King William his Brother, now ſhould remain free from all tribute. Item, that he ſhould require nothing of the ſaid Churches or Provinces, in the time of the ſeat being vacant. Moreover, concerning ſuch Prieſts and Miniſters as had given Money to the King for their company with their Wives, it was agreed that they ſhould ſurceaſe from all Eccleſiaſtical Function, the ſpace of three years, and that the King ſhould take no more after ſuch manner. Item, that all ſuch goods, fruits and poſſeſſions, as had been taken away before from the Archbiſhoprick, ſhould be reſtored at his coming again into England, &c.

The King brought under the Archbiſhop.

Conditions granted by the King to Anſelm.

Prieſts driven again from their Wives.

This Anſelm, the ſtout Champion of Popery and Superſtition, after this Victory gotten upon the King, for the which he ſo long fought, with Joy and Triumph ſaileth into England, having all his Popiſh requeſts obtained. Where firſt he flieth like a Lion upon the married Prieſts contrary to the Word of God, divorcing and puniſhing that by mans Authority, which the Eternal and Almighty God had coupled. Next, he looketh to them, which did hold any Church by Farm under the King. Againſt Simony likewiſe, and againſt them that married within the ſeventh degree, he proceedeth with his full pontifical Authority.

Anno 1106.

Shortly after, as King Henry had finiſhed his War in Normandy, and with Victory returned again into England, about the ſixth year of his Reign, Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury (by the permiſſion of the King) aſſembled a great Council at Weſtminſter in London, of the Clergy and Prelates of England.

In the which (by the Biſhop of Romes Authority) he ſo wrought with the King, that at length (albeit, as the ſtory ſaith, not without great difficulty) it was newly confirmed and enacted, that no Temporal man after that day ſhould make Inveſtiture with Croſs or with Ring, or with Paſtoral Hook. In this Council, ſundry and divers Injunctions were given forth to Prieſts and Deacons: As divers other Synodal Acts alſo by the ſame Anſelm had been concluded in other Councils before. And becauſe here falleth in mention of the Acts Synodal concluded in the time of this Anſelm, I thought here good to Pack them all in one general Heap together, as we find them in Malmesbury, and in other ſundry Authors ſcatteringly recited.

The firſt thing, decreed by this Anſelm in his Synodal Councils, was touching the fault of Simony, whereby divers, both Biſhops and Abbats (as is aforeſaid) were at the ſame time depoſed. And Lay-men forbidden to confer any Eccleſiaſtical Promotion.

Prieſts apparel.

Alſo it was decreed, that no Biſhop ſhould bear any Office in Secular mens buſineſs or meetings. And that ſuch ſhould not go apparelled as the Lay-men did, but ſhould have their Veſtures decent and meet for Religious Perſons. And that in all places they ſhould never go without ſome to bear witneſs of their Converſation.

Archdeaconries not to be Farmed.

Item, that no Archdeaconries ſhould be let out to Farm.

Item, that no Archdeacon ſhould be under the degree of a Deacon.

Marriage of Prieſts forbidden.

Item, that no Archdeacon, Prieſt, Deacon, Subdeacon, Colligener, nor Canon, ſhould from thence marry a Wife, nor yet keep her, if he had been married to one before.

Vow of chaſtity brought in.

Item, that every Subdeacon, being under the degree of a Canon (after the profeſſion of chaſtity marrying a Wife) ſhould be ſubject to the ſame Rule.

Benefices not to go by heritage.

They ordained alſo, that a Prieſt, keeping company with his Wife, ſhould be reputed unlawful, and that he ſhould ſay no Maſs, and if he ſaid Maſs, he ſhould not be heard.

They charged that none ſhould be admitted to Orders from that time forward, from the degree of a Subdeacon, unleſs he did profeſs Chaſtity.

That Prieſts Sons ſhould not claim by Heritage the Benefices of their Fathers, as the cuſtome had always been before.

How then was Steven Gardiner Lord Chancellor in Queen Maries time?

Item, that no ſpiritual perſon ſhould ſit in any ſecular office, as to be Procurators or Judges of blood.

Item, that Prieſts ſhould not reſort to Taverns or Banquets, nor ſit drinking by the fire ſide.

That the Garments of Prieſts ſhould be of one colour, and that their ſhoes ſhould be decent.

Item, that Monks, or any other of the Clergy (if they forſook their Order) either ſhould come again, or be Excommunicated.

Prieſts Crowns.

Item, that the men of the Clergy ſhould wear broad Crowns.

Tithes.

Item, that no Tithes ſhould be given but to the Church.

Buying of Prebends.

Item, that no Churches or Prebends ſhould be bought.

Building of Chappels.

That no new Chappels ſhould be made without conſent of the Biſhop.

Every Church to find his own Prieſt.

That no Church ſhould be hallowed, before the neceſſary proviſion were made for the Prieſt, and for the Church to be maintained.

Abbats to maintain no War.

That Abbats ſhould ſet forth no men to War, and that they muſt both ſleep and eat in the ſame Houſe with their Monks; unleſs ſome great neceſſity do let.

Monks limited in giving penance.

Item, that Monks do injoyn no penance to any man without the knowledge of his Abbat. And that their Abbats may give no licence therein, but only for ſuch perſons whoſe charge they have of Soul.

Monks no godfathers, nor Nuns godmothers.

That no Monks ſhould be Godfathers, nor Nuns Godmothers.

Abby lands. Impropriation reſtrained.

That Monks ſhould have no Lordſhips to Farm.

Item, that Monks ſhould take no Churches but by the Biſhop, neither ſhould ſo ſpoil and oppreſs the Churches given unto them with their Rents, that ſufficient were not left for the Miniſters of the ſame.

Privy contracts.

That privy Contracts between man and woman without Witneſs ſhould not ſtand, but be Fruſtrate, if each Party do go from the Contract.

Rounding.

Item, that ſuch of the Clergy, as wear long hair, be ſo rounded, that part of their Ear appear, and that their Eyes be not covered.

Marriage within the ſeventh degree reſtrained.

Item, that there be no Matrimonial Copulation within the ſeventh degree of kindred, nor ſo continue if they be married: But the marriage to be broken. And if any, be privy to that Inceſt, do not detect the ſame, he to be guilty of the ſame Crime.

Burying.

Item, that no Funeral or Buryings be without their own Pariſh Church, ſo that the Prieſt thereof do loſe that which to him is due.

No holineſs to be given to ſhrines and places.

Item, that no man upon any new fangled raſhneſs do attribute any reverence or opinion of Holineſs to dead mens bodies, to Fountains, or to any other thing (as the uſe hath been in time paſt) without authority of the Biſhop.

Selling and buying of men.

Item, that no Buying and Selling be uſed hereafter in England of men, as of other Cattel.

Sodomitry.

Item, after the reſtraint of Prieſts marriage, when filthy ſodomitry began to come in the place thereof, then were they forced alſo to make an Act for that, which was this.

A flap with a Foxtail for Sodomitry.

With a grievous curſe we condemn both them that occupied the ungracious vice of Sodomitry, and them alſo that willingly aſſiſt them, or be wicked doers with them in the ſame; till ſuch time as they may deſerve abſolution by penance and confeſſion.

So that whatſoever he be that is noyſed or proved to be of this wickedneſs (if he be a religious perſon) he ſhall from thenceforth be promoted to no degree of honour, and that which he hath ſhall be taken from him.

If he be a Lay Perſon, he ſhall be deprived of all his Freedom within the Land, and be no better than a foreiner.

And becauſe it ſhall be known, the abſolution of ſuch as be ſecular to belong only to Biſhops: It was therefore inacted, that on every Sunday, in every Pariſh Church of England, the ſaid Excommunication ſhould be Publiſhed, &c.

Ranulph. Ceſtrenſis lib. 7. Note the Prepoſterous proceeding of Anſelm in ceaſing the vice of Sodomitry.

But mark in this great matter what followed. For, as Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis witneſſeth, this grievous general curſe was ſoon called back again by the ſute of certain, which perſwaded Anſelm, that the publication, or opening of that vice, gave kindlings to the ſame in the hearts of lewd Perſons, miniſtring occaſion of more boldneſs to them to do the like. And ſo to ſtop the occaſion of filthy Sodomitry, the publication thereof was taken away; but the forbidding and reſtrainment of Prieſts lawful marriage (which chiefly was the cauſe thereof) remained ſtill. And thus ever ſince horrible Sodomitry remained in the Clergy, both for lack of marriage more uſed, and for lack of publication leſs puniſhed.

Beſides all theſe Synodal Acts above comprehended, and given out by Anſelm in his Councils before, here alſo in this preſent Council at Weſtminſter, in the year of this King aforeſaid, he alſo directed other new Injunctions to the Prieſts.

Penalties and forfeits againſt Prieſts that keep their Wives.

Firſt, that they and their Wives ſhould never more meet in one houſe, neither yet have dwelling in their Territories.

Item, that the Prieſts, Deacons, and Subdeacons ſhould keep no woman in their Houſe, unleſs they were of their next kin.

Item, for ſuch as had diſſevered themſelves from the Society of their Wives, yet for ſome honeſt cauſe they had to common with them, they might, ſo it were without door, and with two or three lawful witneſſes.

In the latter days ſhall come falſe teachers, forbidding marriage and eating of meats, &c.

Item, if any of them ſhould be accuſed by two or three witneſſes, and could not purge himſelf again by ſix able men of his own order (if he be a Prieſt) or if he be a Deacon by four, or if he be a Subdeacon by two) then he ſhould be Judged a Tranſgreſſor of the Statutes, deprived of his Benefice, and be made Infamous, or be put to open reproach of all men.

Item, he that rebelled, and in contempt of this new Statute held ſtill his Wife, and preſumed to ſay Maſs, upon the eighth day after (if he made not due ſatisfaction) ſhould be ſolemnly Excommunicated.

Item, all Archdeacons and Deacons to be ſtraitly Sworn not to Wink or Diſſemble at their Meetings, nor to bear with them for Money. And if they would not be Sworn to this, then to loſe their offices without recovery.

Purification of Prieſts that had been married.

Item, ſuch Prieſts, as forſaking their Wives were willing to ſerve ſtill and remain in their holy Order, firſt muſt ceaſe forty days from their miniſtration, ſetting Vicars for them in the mean time to ſerve, and taking ſuch penance upon them, as by their Biſhop ſhould be injoyned them.

Thus have ye heard the tedious Treatiſe of the life and doings of Anſelm, how Superſtitious in his Religion, how Stub born againſt his Prince he was, what occaſion of War and Diſcord he miniſtred by his complaints (if they had been taken) what zeal without right knowledge, what fervency without cauſe he pretended, what pains without profit he took. Who if he had beſtowed that time and Travel in Preaching Chriſt at Home to his flock, which he took in Gadding to Rome, to complain of his Country, in my mind he had been better occupied. Moreover, what Violent and Tyrannical Injunctions he ſet forth of Inveſting and other things, ye have heard; but ſpecially againſt the lawful and godly marriage of Prieſts. Wherein, what a vehement Adverſary he was, here may appear with theſe Minutes or Pieces Extracted out of the Letters, which we have here Annexed; in Form and Effect as Followeth.

A Letter of Anſelm.

Anſelm Archbiſhop, to his Brethren and Deareſt Sons the Lord Prior and others at Canterbury.

King Henry permitted Prieſts to have both Churches and Wives. Ex epiſt. Anſel. 377. Pope Paſchal hath ſo decreed it at Rome. Ergo Prieſts muſt have no Wives.

AS concerning Prieſts, of whom the King commanded that they ſhould have both their Churches and their women as they had in the time of his Father, and of Lanfrancus Archbiſhop: Both becauſe the King hath Reveſted and Reſeized the whole Archbiſhoprick, and becauſe ſo curſed a marriage was forbidden in a Council in the time of his Father and of the ſaid Archbiſhop: Boldly I command by the Authority which I have by my Archbiſhoprick, not only within my Archbiſhoprick but alſo through out England, that all Prieſts, which keep women, ſhall be deprived of their Churches and Eccleſiaſtical Benefices.

A Letter of Pope Paſchalis to Anſelm.

Paſchal Biſhop, Servant of Gods Servants, to his Reverend Brother Anſelm, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Greeting and Apoſtolical Bleſſing.

Ex epiſt. Anſel. 33. If profit of the Church may come by Prieſts children what hurt then were it to the Church for Prieſts to have Wives?

WE believe your Brother-hood is not ignorant what is decreed in the Romiſh Church concerning Prieſts Children. But becauſe there is ſo great multitude of ſuch within the Realm of England, that almoſt the greater and better part of the Clerks are reckoned to be on this ſide: Therefore we commit this diſpenſation to your care. For the grant theſe to be promoted to holy Offices by reaſon of the need at this time, and for the profit of the Church (ſuch as learning and life ſhall commend among you) ſo that yet notwithſtanding the prejudice of the Eccleſiaſtical Decree be taken heed to hereafter, &c.

Another Letter of Anſelm for Inveſting.

To the Reverend Lord and loving Father Paſchal High Biſhop, Anſelm ſervant of Canterbury Church, due Subjection and continual Prayers.

King Henry and his Nobles ready to forſake the Romiſh Church.

AFter that I returned to my Biſhoprick in England I ſhewed the Apoſtolical Decree, which I being preſent heard in the Romiſh Council. 1. That no man ſhould receive Inveſting of Churches at the King's hand, or any Lay perſon, or ſhould become his man for it, and that no man ſhould preſume to conſecrate him that did offend herein. When the King and his Nobles, and the Biſhops themſelves, and others of the lower degree, heard theſe things, they took them ſo grievouſly, that they ſaid, they would in no caſe agree to the thing, and that they would drive me out of the Kingdom, and forſake the Romiſh Church, rather than keep this thing. Wherefore Reverend Father, I deſire your Counſel by your Letter, &c.

Another Letter of Anſelm.

Anſelm Archbiſhop, to the Reverend Gudulphus Biſhop, and to Arnulphus Prior, and to William Archdeacon of Canterbury, and to all in his Dioceſs, Greeting.

A letter of Anſelm againſt Prieſt receiving again their Wives.

WIlliam our Archdeacon hath written unto me, that ſome Prieſts that be under his Cuſtody (taking again their Women that were forbidden) have fallen unto the uncleanneſs from the which they were drawn by whole-

Ex epiſt. 27. Prieſts excommunicated for receiving again their Wives.

wholeſome counſel and commandment. When the Archdeacon would amend this thing, they utterly deſpiſed with wicked pride his warning and worthy commandment to be received. Then he, calling together many Religious men and obedient Prieſts, Excommunicated worthily the proud and diſobedient, that beaſtly deſpiſed the curſe, and were not afraid to defile the holy miniſtry, as much as lay in them, &c.

Unto theſe Letters above Prefixed, I have alſo adjoyned another of the ſaid Anſelm, touching a great caſe of conſcience, of a Monks whipping himſelf. Wherein may appear both the blind and lamentable ſuperſtition of thoſe Religious men, and the judgment of this Anſelm in the ſame matter.

Another Letter of Anſelm.

Anſelm Archbiſhop, to Bernard Monk of the Abby of S. Warburg, Greeting and Prayer.

A Letter of Anſelm. Ex epiſt. 255. Whether is more merit for a Monk to cauſe himſelf in the Chapter to be whipped, or to ſuffer obediently the whipping of his Abbot.

I Heard it ſaid of your Lord Abbot, that thou judgeſt it to be of greater merit, when a Monk either beaten himſelf, or deſireth himſelf to be beaten of another; than when he is beaten (not of his own will) in the Chapter, by the Commandment of the Prelacy. But it is not ſo as you think. For that judgment, that any man commandeth to himſelf, is kingly. But that, which he ſuffereth by obedience in the Chapter, is Monkiſh. The one is of his own will, the other is of obedience, and not of his own will. That which I call kingly, Kings and Rich proud men commending to be done to themſelves. But that which I call Monkiſh, they take not commanding, but obeying. The Kingly is ſo much eaſier, by how much it agreeth to the will of the ſufferer. But the Monkiſh is ſo much the grievouſer, by how much it differeth from the will of the ſufferer. In the Kingly judgment, the ſufferer is judged to be his own: In Monkiſh he is proved not to be his own. For although the King or Rich man, when he is beaten, willingly ſheweth himſelf humbly to be a ſinner; yet he would not ſubmit himſelf to this Humbleneſs at any others Commandment, but would withſtand the Commander with all his ſtrength. But when a Monk ſubmitteth himſelf to the whip humbly in the Chapter at the will of the Prelate; the truth judgeth him to be of ſo much greater merit, by how much he humbleth himſelf more and more, and more truly than the other. For he humbleth himſelf to God only, becauſe he knoweth his ſins. But this man humbleth himſelf to man for obedience. But he is lowlier that humbleth himſelf both to God and Man for Gods cauſe, than he which humbleth himſelf to God only, and not to Gods Commandment. Therefore if he that humbleth himſelf ſhall be extolled; Ergo he that more humbleth himſelf, ſhall be more exalted. And where I ſaid, that when a Monk is whipped, it differeth from his will; you muſt not ſo underſtand it, as though he would not patiently bear it with an obedient will; but becauſe by a natural appetite he would not ſuffer the ſorrow. But if ye ſay, I do not ſo much flie the open beating for the pains (which I feel alſo ſecretly) as for the ſhame: Know then that he is ſtronger that rejoyceth to bear this for obedience ſake. Therefore be thou ſure, that one whipping of a Monk by obedience is of more merit than innumerable whippings taken by his own mind. But whereas he is ſuch, that always he ought to have his Heart ready without murmuring obediently to be whipped, we ought to judge him then to be of a great merit, whether he be whipped privily or openly, &c.

The judgment or concluſion of Anſelm upon the caſe. Falſe opinion of merit.

Anno 1105.

And thus much concerning Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury; whoſe ſtout example gave no little courage to Thurſtinus and Becket his ſucceſſors, and others that followed after, to do the like againſt their Kings and Princes, as in proceſs hereafter by the grace of Chriſt ſhall appear.

About this time, 1105. two famous Archbiſhops of Mentz, being right vertuous and well diſpoſed Prelates, were cruelly and tyrannouſly dealt withall, and intreated by the Biſhop of Rome? Their names were Henry and Chriſtian. This Henry, having intelligence that he was complained of to the Pope, ſent a learned man (as ſpecial friend of his) to excuſe him, named Arnold, one for whom he had done much, and promoted to great livings and promotions. But this honeſt man Arnold, inſtead of an excuſer, became an accuſer, bribing the two chieſeſt Cardinals with good Gold; by which means he obtained of the Pope, thoſe two Cardinals, to be ſent as Inquiſitors, and only doers in that preſent caſe. The which (coming to Germany) ſummoned the ſaid Henry, and depoſed him of his Archbiſhoprick (for all he could do either by Law or juſtice) ſubſtituting in his place the foreſaid Arnold, upon hope (truly) of the Eccleſiaſtical Gold. Whereupon that vertuous and honorable Henry (as the ſtory telleth) ſpake unto thoſe his Perverſe Judges on this wiſe: If I ſhould appeal unto the Apoſtolick See for this your unjuſt Proceſs had againſt me, perhaps the Pope would attempt nothing more therein than ye have, neither ſhould I win any thing by it, but only toil of body, loſs of goods, affliction of mind, care of heart, and miſſing of his favour.

Judges Corrupted.

Wherefore I do appeal unto the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as to the moſt high and juſt Judge, and cite you before his Judgment, there to anſwer me before the high Judge. For neither juſtly nor godly (but by corruption as it pleaſeth you) you have judged. Whereunto they ſcoffingly anſwering: Go you firſt, and we will follow. Not long after (as the ſtory is) the ſaid Henry died. Whereof the ſaid two Cardinals having intelligence, ſaid one to the other jeſtingly; Behold, he is gone before, and we muſt follow according to our promiſe. And verily they ſaid truer than they aware of: For within a while they died in one day. For the one, ſitting upon a Jakes to eaſe himſelf, voyded out all his intrails into the draught, and miſerably ended ended his life. The other, gnawing off his fingers of his hands, and ſpitting them out of his mouth (all deformed in devouring himſelf) died. And in like wiſe, not long after the end of theſe men, the foreſaid Arnold (moſt horrible) in a ſedition was ſlain; and certain days (lying ſtinking above the ground unburied) lay open to the ſpoil of every Raſcal and Harlot. The Hiſtoriographer in declaring hereof crieth upon the Cardinals in this manner: O ye Cardinals, ye are the beginning and Authors hereof. Come ye hither, and heap and carry unto your Countries the Divel, and offer your ſelves to him with that Money, whereof ye have been moſt gluttonous and inſatiable.

A terrible example for corrupt judges to beware.

About the ſame time and year when King Henry began his Reign, Pope Paſchalis entred his Papacy, ſucceeding after Urbanus, about the year of our Lord 1100. nothing ſwarving from the ſteps of Hildebrand his Superior. This Paſchalis being Elected by the Cardinals, after that the people had cryed thrice, S. Peter hath choſen good Rainerus; he then putting on a purple Veſture, and a Tire upon his head, was brought upon a white Palfray into Lateran, where a Scepter was given him, and a Girdle put about him, having ſeven Keies, with ſeven Seals hanging thereupon for a recogniſance or token of his ſeven-fold power, according to the ſeven-fold Grace of the holy Ghoſt, of binding, looſing, ſhutting, opening, ſealing, reſigning, and judging, &c. After this Paſchalis was Elected Pope, Henry the ſorth, the foreſaid Emperor (of courage moſt valiant, if the time had ſerved thereto) thought to come up to Italy to Salute the new Pope. But, underſtanding the Popes mind bent againſt him, he changed his purpoſe. In the mean time, Paſchalis, to ſhew himſelf inferior to Hildebrand in no point, began firſt to depoſe all ſuch Abbats and Biſhops whom the Emperor had ſet up. Alſo he baniſhed Albertus, Theodoricus, and Maginulphus, ſtriving at the ſame time for the Papacy. I ſpake before of Guibert, whom Henry the Emperor had made Pope againſt Hildebrand. Againſt this Guibert Paſchalis made out an Army; who, being put to flight, not long after departed.

The Popes tirement.

The ſeven-fold power of the Pope.

About the ſame time, Anno 1101. the Biſhop of Florence began to Teach and to Preach of Antichriſt then to be born and to be manifeſt, as Sabellicus teſtifieth: Whereupon Paſchalis, aſſembling a Council, put to ſilence the ſaid Biſhop, and condemned his Books. In this Council at Trecas, Prieſts that were married were condemned for Nicolaitans. Item, according to the Decree of Hildebrand, all ſuch of what degree or eſtate ſoever they were (being Laymen) that gave any Eccleſiaſtical Dignities, were condemned of Simony. Furthermore, the Statute of Prieſts tithes there he renewed, counting the ſelling away thereof as a ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt. Concerning the Excommunication and other troubles, that Hildebrand wrought againſt Henricus the forth Emperor, it is declared ſufficiently before. This Excommunication Paſchalis the Pope renewed afreſh againſt the ſaid Henry. And not only that, but alſo, conventing the Princes of Germany unto a general aſſembly, ſet up his own Son againſt him, cauſing the Biſhop of Mentz, of Cullen, and of Worms to deprive him of his Imperial Crown, and to place his Son Henricus the fifth in his Fathers Kingdom, and ſo they did. Coming to the place at Hilgeſhem, firſt they required his diadem, his purple, his ring, and other ornaments pertaining to the Crown, from him. The Emperor demanded the cauſe, being then Excommunicate and void of friends. They pretending again (I cannot tell what) for ſelling of Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and other Eccleſiaſtical Dignities for money: Alſo alledging the Popes pleaſure and of other Princes. Then required he firſt of the Biſhop of Mentz (and likewiſe of the other two, whom he had preferred to their Biſhopricks before) asking them in order, if he had received of them any penny for his promoting them to their dignities. This when they could not deny to be ſo, Well (ſaith he) and do you requite me again with this? With divers other words of exhortation, admoniſhing, them to remember their Oath and Allegiance to their Prince. But the perjured Prelates, neither reverencing his Majeſty, nor moved with his benefits, nor regarding their fidelity, ceaſed not for all this, but firſt plucked from him (ſitting in his Throne) his Crown Imperial, then diſveſtured him, taking from him his Purple and his Scepter. The good Emperor, being left deſolate and in confuſion, ſaith to them: Videat Deus & judicet: That is, Let God ſee and judge. Thus leaving him, they went to his Son to confirm him in his Kingdom, and cauſed him to drive his Father out. Who then being chaſed of his Son (having but nine perſons about him) did flie by the Dukedom of Limbrugh, where the Duke being then in hunting, perceiving and hearing of him, made after to follow him. The Emperor fearing no other but preſent death (for he had diſplaced the ſame Duke before out of his Dukedom) ſubmitted himſelf, craving of him pardon, and not revengement. The Duke full of compaſſion, and pitying his eſtate, not only remitted all his diſpleaſure, but alſo received him to his Caſtle. Moreover, collecting his ſouldiers and men of War, he brought him to Cullen; and there he was well received. His Son hearing this beſiged the City of Cullen. But the Father, by night eſcaping, came to Leodium, where reſorted to him all ſuch as were men of compaſſion and conſtant heart. In ſo much that his power, being ſtrong enough, he was now able to pitch a field againſt his Enemies, and ſo did: deſiring his friends, that if he had the victory, they would ſpare his Son. In fine (the battel joyned) the Father had the victory, the Son was put to flight: many being ſlain on both ſides. But ſhortly after, the battel renewed again, the Son prevailed, the Father was overcome and taken. Who then, being utterly diſpoſſeſſed of his Kingdom, was brought to that exigent, that coming to Spire, he was fain to crave of the Biſhop there (whom he had done much for before) to have a prebend in the Church: and for that he had ſome skill of his Book, he deſired to ſerve in our Ladies quire, Yet could he not obtain ſo much at his hand, who ſwore by our Lady, he ſhould have none there. Thus the woeful Emperor (moſt unkindly handled, and repulſed on every ſide) came to Leodium, and there for ſorrow died, after he had Reigned fifty years; whoſe body Paſchalis, after his Funeral, cauſed to be taken up again, and to be brought to Shires, where it remained five years unburied. Hæc ex Helmoldo.

{Anno 1106.} The Emperor five years without burial.

After the deceaſe of this Emperor Henry the fourth, his Son Henricus the fifth Reigned the ſpace of twenty years. Who, coming to Rome to the Crown of the Pope, could not obtain it, before he would fully aſſent to have this ratified, that no Emperor ſhould have any thing to do with the Election of the Roman Biſhop, or with other Biſhopricks. Beſides that (about the ſame time) ſuch a ſtir was made in Rome by the ſaid Biſhop, that if the Emperor had not defended himſelf with his own hands, he had been ſlain. But as it happened, the Emperor having victory, amongſt many other Romans (which were partly ſlain, partly taken in the ſame skirmiſh) he taketh alſo the Pope and leadeth him out of the City: where he indenteth with him upon divers conditions, both of his coronation, and of recovering again his right and title in the Election of the Pope, and of other Biſhops: whereunto the Pope aſſenting agreed to all. So the Emperor (being Crowned of Paſchalis) returned again with the Pope of Rome.

The Pope taken priſoner.

All the conditions between the Emperor and the Pope (ſo long as the Emperor remained at Rome) ſtood firm and ratified. But as ſoon as the Emperor was returned again to Germany, forthwith the Pope, calling a Synod, not only revoked all that he had agreed to before, but alſo Excommunicated Henricus the Emperor, as he had done his Father before, reproved the former Privilegium for pravilegium. The Emperor, returning from Rome to France, there married Mathild daughter to King Henry. Who then hearing what the Pope had done (grieved not a little) with all expedition marched to Rome, and putteth the Pope to flight, and finally placeth another in his ſtead. In the mean time the Biſhops of Germany (the Popes good friends) ſlept not their buſineſs, incenſing the Saxons all that they might againſt their Ceſar: Inſomuch that a great commotion was ſtirred up, and it grew at length to a pitcht field: which was fought in the month of February, by the wood called Sylva Catularia, in the year of our Lord one thouſand one hundred and fifteen.

War raiſed by the Pope and his Popiſh.

The Emperor ſeeing no end of theſe conflicts (unleſs he would yield to the Pope) was fain to give over, and forgo his privilege, falling to a compoſition, not to meddle with matters pertaining to the Popes Election, nor with Inveſting, nor ſuch other things belonging to the Church and Churchmen. And thus was the peace between them concluded, and proclaimed to no ſmall rejoycing of both the Armies, then lying by Worms, near the River of Rhene.

Peace concluded between the Emperor and the Pope.

In the time of this Paſchalis lived Bernardus, called Abbas Claravalleníis, in the year 1108. of whom ſprang the Bernardine Monks.

All this while Henricus the Emperor had no Iſſue (having to Wife Mathildis, the daughter of Henry the firſt, King of England) and that by the juſt judgment of God, as it may appear. For as he, having a Father, perſecuted him by the Popes ſetting on, contrary to the part of a natural Son: ſo Gods providence did not ſuffer him to be the Father of any child, naturally to love him, or to ſucceed him.

Example of the Lords juſt retribution and judgment.

After the death of Paſchalis, Anno 1118. ſucceeded Pope Gelaſius, choſen by the Cardinals, but without the conſent of the Emperor, whereupon roſe no little variance in Rome. And at length another Pope was ſet up by the Emperor called Gregorius the eighth, and Gelaſius driven away into France, and there died. After whom came Calixtus the ſecond (choſen likewiſe by a few Cardinals, without the voice of the Emperor) who, coming up to Rome to injoy his ſeat, firſt ſent his Legat into Germany to Excommunicate the Emperor Henricus, who then having divers conflicts with his fellow Pope Gregorius, at length drave him out of Rome. At this time by this occaſion great diſputation and controverſie was between the Emperor and the Popes Court, whether of them in dignity ſhould excel the other: whereof reaſons and arguments on both ſides were alledged, which in the verſes here following are comprehended.

In concluſion, the Emperor being overcome ſo much with the vain reaſons of the Popes ſide, and fearing the dangerous Thunderbolt of his curſe (talking with Princes, and perſwaded by his friends) was fain to condeſcend to the unreaſonable conditions of the Pope. Firſt, to ratifie his Election, notwithſtanding the other Pope (whom the ſaid Emperor had ſet up) yet was alive. Secondly, that he ſhould reſign up his right and title in matters partaining to the Election of the Pope, and Inveſtiture of Biſhops.

Prieſts and Miniſters compelled to leave their Wives

Item, the ſame Calixtus, holding a general Council at Rhemis, decreed that Prieſts, Deacons, and Subdeacons ſhould put away their Concubines and Wives: and whoſoever was found to keep his Wife, ſhould be deprived of Benefice, and all other Eccleſiaſtical livings: whereupon a certain Engliſh Writer made theſe verſes following;

Hoc deſtruxiſti, poſtquam tu papa fuiſti, &c.

{Anno 1109.} And thus much of the Roman matters. Now to our Country ſtory again. After the death of Anſelm before mentioned, (who deceaſed the year of Chriſt 1109. after he had been in the See ſixteen years) the Church of Canterbury ſtood voyd five years; and the goods of the Church were ſpent to the Kings uſe. And when he was prayed to help the Church that was ſo long without a Paſtor, his anſwer was: pretending that as his Father and Brother had accuſtomed thereto to ſet the beſt tried and approved men that might be found, ſo to the intent that he might do the ſame (in chooſing ſuch, which either ſhould equal the former examples of them before, or at leaſt follow their footſteps as near as they could) he took therein the more time and leaſure. And ſo with ſhift of anſwer he delayed out the time, while he had filled his coffers with the commodities of that benefice. The ſame year (after the death of Anſelm) the King converted the Abbey of Ely to a Biſhoprick, which before was under the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, placing there Henry Biſhop of Bangor, the Biſhop of that See. The next year following, Rodulphus Biſhop of Rocheſter (an Engliſhman) was promoted to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Thurſtinus the Kings Chaplain was Elected Archbiſhop of York. Who being content to receive his benediction or conſecration of the See of Canterbury; yet, becauſe he refuſed to make his profeſſion of obedience to the ſame See, he was by the King deprived of his Dignity.

Diſſenſion betweeen Thruſtinus of York, and Rodulph Archbiſhop of Canterbury for ſubjection.

Then Thurſtin (by the Inſtigation of certain of his Clerks at York) took his Journey to Rome; who, there making his complaint to Pope Paſchalis, brought with him a Letter from the Pope to the King, where among other Words was contained as followeth, Audivimus electum Eboracenſis Eccleſiæ, virum ſapientem & ſtrenuum, ſine judicio ab Eboracenſi ſequeſtratum Eccleſia; quod nimirum divinæ juſtitiæ & S. patrum inſtitutionibus adverſatur. Nos quidem neque Cant. Eccleſiam minui, neque Eboracenſem volumus præjudicium pati, ſed eam conſtitutionem quæ a B. Gregorio, Anglicæ gentis Apoſtolo, inter eaſdem Eccleſias, conſtituta eſt, firman cenſemus illibatamque ſervari. Idem ergo electus, ut juſtitia exigit, ad ſuam Eccleſiam omnibus modis revocetur. Si quid autem quæſtionis inter eaſdem Eccleſias naſcitur, præſentibus utrique patribus in veſtra præſentia pertractetur, &c.

The Letter of Paſchalis to King Henry.

In Engliſh thus,

We hear and underſtand, that the Archbiſhop Elect of the Church of York (a diſcreet and induſtrious man) is ſequeſtred from the Church of York; which ſtandeth againſt both divine Juſtice, and the Inſtitution of holy Fathers. Our purpoſe is, that neither the Church of Canterbury ſhould be impaired, nor again that the Church of York ſhould ſuffer any prejudice, but that the ſame conſtitution, which was by bleſſed Gregory (the Apoſtle of the Engliſh Nation) ſet and decreed between thoſe two Churches, ſhould remain ſtill in force and effect unviolate. Wherefore, as touching the foreſaid Elect, let him be received again by any means, as right and meet it is, unto his Church. And if there be any queſtion between the foreſaid Churches, let it be handled and decided in your preſence, both the two parties being there preſent.

{Anno 1154.} Aſſembly of the Nobles at Saliſbury.

Upon occaſion of this Letter, a ſolemn aſſembly there was appointed at Saliſbury, about the hearing of this controverſie. The variance between theſe two Prelates ſtill increaſed more and more. Rodulph Archbiſhop of Canterbury in no caſe would yield or condeſcend to give impoſition of hands unto him, unleſs he would make his profeſſion of obedience. Thurſtin again ſaid, he would willingly receive and imbrace his Benediction; but as touching the profeſſion of his ſubjection, that he would not agree unto. Then the King, declaring his mind therein, ſignified unto Thurſtin, that, without his ſubjection and obedience profeſſed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhould not enjoy his conſecration to be Archbiſhop of York. Whereunto Thurſtin, nothing replying again, renounced his Archbiſhoprick, promiſing moreover to make no more claim unto it, nor to moleſt them that ſhould enjoy it.

to

Thurſtin promiſeth to renounce his Archbiſhoprick.

Shortly after this, it happened that Pope Paſchalis died: After whom, as is above rehearſed, ſucceeded Pope Gelaſius, who lived not paſt a year, and died in France. Whereupon the Cardinals (which then followed the ſaid Pope Gelaſius unto Cluniack) created another Pope of their choſing, whom they called Calixtus the ſecond. The other Cardinals which were at Rome did chooſe another Pope called Gregory, as mention before is made: about which two Popes much ſtir there was in Chriſtian Realms. As this Calixtus was remaining in France, and there calling a general Council at Rhemis, as ye heard before; Thurſtinus the Archbiſhop of York deſired Licence of the King to go to the Council, purpoſing there to open the cauſe of his Church, which eſtſoons he obtained: Firſt promiſing to the King that he ſhould there attempt nothing that ſhould be prejudicial to the Church of Canterbury. In the mean time, the King had ſent ſecret word unto the Pope, by Rodulph and other Procurators, that in no caſe he would conſecrate Thurſtinus. Yet, notwithſtanding the faithful promiſe of the Pope made to the King, ſo it fell out, that the ſaid Pope through the ſute of his Cardinals, whom Thurſtinus had won to him, was inclined to conſecrate him, and gave him the Pall. For this deed the King was ſore diſcontented with Thurſtin, and warned him the entry of this Land.

Pope Calixtus breaketh promiſe with the King.

In this Council at Rhemis (above mentioned) where were gathered 434. Prelates, theſe five principal Acts were concluded.

Acts of the Council of Rhemis.

1. That no man ſhould either buy or ſell any Biſhoprick, Abbatſhip, Deanry, Archdeaconſhip, Prieſthood, Prebendſhip, Altar, or any Eccleſiaſtical promotion, or Benefice, Orders, Conſecration, Church hallowing, ſeat or ſtall within the Quire, or any Office Eccleſiaſtical, under danger of Excommunication, if he did perſiſt.

2. That no Lay perſon ſhould give Inveſtiture or any Eccleſiaſtical poſſeſſion; and that no ſpiritual man ſhould receive any ſuch at any Lay mans hand, under pain of deprivation.

3. That no man ſhould invade, take away, or detain the goods or poſſeſſions of the Church; but that they ſhould remain firm and perpetual, under pain of perpetual curſe.

4. That no Biſhop or Prieſt ſhould leave any Eccleſiaſtical Dignity or Benefice to any, by way of inheritance. Adding moreover, that for Baptiſm, Chriſm, Annoiling, or Burial, no Money ſhould be exacted.

5. Item, that all Prieſts, Deacons, and Subdeacons, ſhould be utterly debarred and ſequeſtred from company of their Wives and Concubines, under pain of excluding from all Chriſtian Communion.

The Acts ſent to the Emperor.

The Acts thus determined were ſent eſtſoons to Henricus the Emperor, to ſee and try, before the breaking up of the Council, whether he would agree to the Canonical Elections, free conſecration, and Inveſting of ſpiritual Perſons, and to other Acts of the ſaid Council. The Emperor maketh anſwer again, that he would loſe nothing of that ancient Cuſtom which his Progenitors had given him. Notwithſtanding, becauſe of the Authority of the general Council, he was content to conſent to the reſidue, ſave only the Inveſting of Eccleſiaſtical Function to be taken from him, to that he would never agree. Upon this, at the next return of the Pope to the Council, the Emperor was appointed to be Excommunicated. Which thing, when divers of the Council did not well like, and therefore did ſeparate themſelves from the reſt; the Pope applying againſt them the multitude of the ſeventy Diſciples which were offended at the Lord, when he taught them of eating of his fleſh and blood, and therefore divided themſelves from him, declaring moreover to them, how they which gathered not with him, ſcattered, and they that were not with him, were againſt him: By theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions reduced them again to his ſide; and ſo by that Council Henricus the Emperor was Excommunicated.

The Emperor agreeth not to the Popes Inveſting.

It was not long after but the Pope came to Giſortium, where Henry King of England reſorted to him, deſiring and alſo obtaining of him, that he would ſend henceforth no Legate, nor permit any to be ſent from Rome to England, unleſs the King himſelf ſhould ſo require, by reaſon of ſome occaſion of ſtrife, which elſe could not be otherwiſe decided by his own Biſhops at home. The cauſe why the King required this of the Pope was, for that certain Roman Legates had been in England a little before (to wit) one Guido, and another Roman named Anſelmus, and another alſo called Petrus, who had ſpoyled the Realm of great Treaſure, as the accuſtomed manner of the proud Popes Legates is wont to be, Guli. de pont. lib. 1. Alſo he required of the Pope, that he might uſe and retain all the cuſtoms uſed before of his foreſathers in England and in Normandy.

Agreed that England ſhould have no other Legate from Rome, but only the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

England ſpoyled by the Popes Legats.

To theſe petitions the Pope did eaſily conſent, requiring again of the King, that he would Licence Thurſtinus, the Archbiſhop above minded, to return with favour into his Realm. But that the King utterly denied, unleſs he would profeſs ſubjection to the Church of Canterbury, as his Predeceſſors had done before; and excuſed himſelf by his Oath which he before had made. To this the Pope anſwered again, that he, by his authority Apoſtolical, both might, and would alſo eaſily diſpence with him for his promiſe or oath. Then the King ſaid, that he would talk with his Council thereof, and ſo ſend him an anſwer of his mind; which anſwer was this, That, for the love and requeſt of the Pope, he was content that Thurſtinus ſhould re-enter his Realm, and quietly enjoy his Prelateſhip, upon this condition that he would (as his Predeceſſors did) profeſs his ſubjection to the Church of Canterbury. Otherwiſe (ſaid he) ſo long as he was King, he ſhould never ſit Archbiſhop of the Church of York. And thus ended that meeting between the King of England and the Pope for that time.

The year following after that, which was, Anno 1120. the foreſaid Pope Calixtus directeth his Letters for Thurſtinus to the King, and to Rodulph Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In which Epiſtle, by his full power Apoſtolical, he doth interdict both the Church of Canterbury, and the Church of York, with all the Pariſh Churches within the ſame Cities, from all Divine ſervice, from the burial alſo of the dead, except only Baptiſing of Children, and abſolution of them that lie on dying; unleſs, within a month after the receit of the ſame, Thurſtinus (without any exaction of ſubjection made) were received and admitted to the See of York, and that the King likewiſe ſhould doubtleſs be Excommunicated, except he would conſent unto the ſame. Whereupon Thurſtinus, for fear of the Popes curſe, was immediatly ſent for and reconciled to the King, and was placed quietly in his Archiepiſcopal See of York.

It followed not long after (within two years) Rodulph Archbiſhop of Canterbury departed, in whoſe See ſucceeded after him Guliemus de Turbine. About which time (in the ſeven and twentieth year of the Kings Reign) the Gray-Friers, by procuring of the King, came firſt into England, and had their Houſe firſt at Canterbury. About the ſame ſeaſon or a little before, the King called a Council at London, where the ſpirituality of England) not knowing to what purpoſe it was required) condeſcended to the King to have the puniſhment of married Prieſts: By reaſon of which grant (whereof the ſpirituality afterwards much repented) the Prieſts, paying a certain to the King, were ſuffered to retain their Wives ſtill, whereby the King gathered no ſmall ſum of Money, *Rog. It was above touched, how Matild or Maud, Daughter to King Henry, was married to Henry the fifth Emperor; who, after the deceaſe of the ſaid Emperor her Husband, returned about this preſent time with the Imperial Crown to her Father in Normandy, bringing with her the hand of Saint James. For the joy whereof the King builded builded the Abbey of Reading, where the ſaid Hand was repoſed. This Matild was received by the ſaid Council to be next Heir to the King, her Father in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crown, for lack of Iſſue Male. And ſoon after upon the ſame, ſhe was ſent over to Normandy, to marry with Geffrey Plantaginet Earl of Anjou, of whom came Henry the Second, who (after Stephan) was King of England. And about this time alſo was founded the the Priory of Norton in the Province of Cheſter, by one William the Son of Nichelle. In the ſtory of Polychronicon, Fornal. and Polydorus is declared, how the King was troubled greatly with three ſundry viſions appearing unto him by night. The firſt was of a great multitude of Husbandmen of the Countrey, which appeared to fly upon him with their Mattocks and Inſtruments, requiring of him his debt which he did owe unto them. In the ſecond, he ſaw a great number of Souldiers and harneſſed men ro come fiercely upon him. In the third, he ſaw a company of Prelates and Church-men, threatning him with their Biſhops Staves, and fiercely aproaching upon him. Whereupon (being diſmaied) in all haſte he ran and took his Sword to defend himſelf, finding there none to ſtrike: Who afterward, asking Counſel concerning theſe Viſions, was moniſhed by one of his Phyſitians (named Grimbald) by Repentance, Almes, and amendment of life to make ſome amends to God, and to his Country whom he offended. Which three Vows thus being made, the next year after he went to England; where he, being upon the Seas in a great tempeſt with his Daughter Matild, remembred their his three Vows. And ſo coming to the land (for performance of the ſame) firſt releaſed unto the Commons the Dane-gilt which his Father and Brother before had renewed. Secondly, he went to S. Edmundsbury, where he ſhewed great benefits to the Church-men. Thirdly, he procured Juſtice to be Adminiſtred more rightly throughout his Realm, &c. Alſo he Ordained and Erected a new Biſhoprick at Carlile.

The City and Pauls Church in London burned.

After Calixtus (whoſe ſtory and time is before diſcourſed) ſucceeded Pope Honorius the Second; notwithſtanding that the Cardinals had Elected another, yet he by the means of certain Citizens obtained the Papacy, Anno 1125. About the Second year of his Induction (as is to be read in Mat. Paris) there was a certain Legat of his, called Johannes Cremenſis, ſent down to England from the Pope for the redreſs I cannot well tell whereof. But indeed the chiefeſt purpoſe of his coming, as of all others after him in thoſe days, was to fill their Pouches with Engliſh Money, as may further appear by their proceedings. This Legat coming then with the Popes Letters directed both into England and into Scotland, after he had well refreſhed himſelf in Biſhops houſes, and amongſt the Abbats, at length reſorted to London, where he aſſembled the whole Clergy together, inquired of Prieſts Concubines, otherwiſe called their Wives, and made thereupon a Statute in the ſaid Synod of London, after this Tenor, Presbyteris, diaconibus, ſubdiaconibus, & canonicis, uxorum, concubinarum, & omnium omnino fœminarum cantubernia, authoritate apoſtolica inhibemus, præter matrem aut ſororem, vel amitam, aut ejuſmodi quæ omnino careant ſuſpicione. Et qui decreti hujus violator extiterit (confeſſus vel convictus) ruinan ordinis patiatur. Inter conſanguineos ſeu affinitate propinquos, uſquead ſeptimam generationem, matrimonia contrahi prohibemus. That is, To Prieſts, Deacons, Subdeacons, and Canons, we do utterly Inhibit by Authority Apoſtolical, all manner ſociety and converſation with all kind of women, except only their Mother, Siſter, or Aunt, or ſuch whereof can riſe no ſuſpicion. And whoſoever ſhall be found to violate this Decree, being convict thereof, ſhall ſuſtain thereby the loſs of all that he hath by his Order. Moreover, amongſt kindred or ſuch as be joyned in affinity, we forbid Matrimony unto the ſeventh Generation, &c. But ſee how God worketh againſt ſuch ungodly Proceedings. The next night after it happened the ſame Cardinal (ruffling and revelling with his Concubines) to be apprehended in the ſame vice, whereof he had ſo ſtrictly given out precepts the next day before, to the no little ſlander and ſhame, as Mat. Paris doth write, of the whole Clergy.

Unto this time lived Henricus the fifth Emperor after he had Reigned twenty years, dying without Iſſue, as is before mentioned. Next after Henricus, the Imperial Crown came unto Lotharius Duke of Saxon, in the year one thouſand one hundred twenty and ſeven.

Certain Hiſtories make mention of one Arnulphus, in the time of this Pope Honorius the Second. Some ſay he was Archbiſhop of Lugdune, as Hugo, Platina, Sabellicus. Tritemius ſaith he was a Prieſt, whoſe Hiſtory, as it is ſet forth in Tritemius, I will briefly in Engliſh expreſs. About this time, ſaith he, in the days of Honorius the Second, one Arnulphus Prieſt, a man Zealous and of great Devotion, and a worthy Preacher, came to Rome, which Arnulphus in his Preaching rebuked the diſſolute and laſcivious looſeneſs, incontinency, avarice, and immoderate Pride of the Clergy, provoking all to follow Chriſt and his Apoſtles in their poverty rather, and in pureneſs of life. By reaſon whereof, this man was well accepted, and highly liked of the Nobility of Rome for a true Diſciple of Chriſt; but of the Cardinals and the Clergy he was no leſs hated than favoured of the other. In ſo much that privily in the night ſeaſon they took him and deſtroyed him. This his Martyrdom, ſaith he, was revealed to him before from God by an Angel, he being in the deſert, when he was ſent forth to Preach; whereupon he ſaid unto them publickly with theſe Words, I know (ſaith he) ye ſeek my life, and know you will make me away privily: But why? Becauſe I Preach to you in the Truth, and blame your pride, ſtoutneſs, avarice, incontinency, with your unmeaſurable greedineſs in getting and heaping up of riches, therefore you be diſpleaſed with me. I take here Heaven and Earth to witneſs, that I have Preached unto you that which I was commanded of the Lord. But you contemn me and your Creator, who by his only Son hath redeemed you. And no marvel if you ſeek my death, being a ſinful perſon, preaching unto you the truth, when as if S. Peter were here this day and rebuked your Vices, which do ſo multiply above all meaſure, you would not ſpare him neither. And as he was expreſſing this, with a loud voice he ſaid moreover: For my part I am not afraid to ſuffer death for the truth ſake; but this I ſay unto you, that God will look upon your iniquities, and will be revenged. You, being full of all unpurity, play the blind guides to the people committed unto you, leading them the way to Hell; a God he is of vengeance. Thus the hatred of the Clergy being incenſed againſt him for Preaching truth, they conſpired againſt him, and ſo, laying privy wait for him, took him and drowned him. Sabellicus and Platina ſay they hanged him.

Arnulphus Martyred at Rome.

The Hiſtory of Arnulphus.

Arnulphus Martyr.

In the ſecond Tome of the General Councils imprinted at Cullen, is mentioned a certain Book called Opus tripartitum, written, as the Author ſuppoſeth, above four hundred years ago, either of this Arnulphus, or juſt about the ſame time. In this Book, the Writer complaineth of many Enormities and abuſes in the Church. Firſt, of the number of Holy-days, declaring what occaſions of vice grew thereby, according unto the common ſaying of Whores and naughty women, which, ſay they, Vantage more in one Holy-day, than in fifty other days beſides.

In Tritemio. A book called Tripartitum, written ten 400. years ago.

Number of Holy days.

Item, he complaineth of the curious ſinging in Cathedral Churches, whereby many be occaſioned to beſtow much good time, yea, many years about the ſame which otherwiſe they might give to the learning of better Sciences.

Curious ſinging in Cathedral Churches.

Likewiſe he complaineth of the rabble and the multitude of begging Friers, and religious men and profeſſed women, ſhewing what great occaſion of idle and uncomly life cometh thereof.

The world overcharged with begging religious.

Alſo of the inconſiderate promotion of evil Prelates, and of their great negligence in correcting and reforming the evil demeanor of the people.

Promotion of evil Prelates.

Item, of the great wantonneſs and laſciviouſneſs in their ſervants and families, concerning their exceſſive wearing of Apparel.

Superfluity of apparel in Biſhops families.

Item, he complaineth alſo of the outragious and exceſſive gains that Prelates and other under them take for their ſeal, eſpecially of Officials, ſcribes, and ſuch like; which give but the ſeal they care not how, nor wherefore, ſo they may gain Money.

Biſhop Seals abuſed to get Money.

He complaineth in like manner, that Prelats be ſo ſlack and negligent in looking to the reſidents in their benefices.

Non reſidents in Benefices.

Further,

Raſh beſtowing of Benefices.

Further, he lamenteth the raſh giving of Benefices to Parſons, Vicars and Curats, not for any godlineſs or learning in them, but for favour or friendſhip, or interceſſion, or elſe for hope of ſome gain, whereof ſpringeth this great ignorance in the Church.

Waſtefol ſpending of the Church goods.

After this, he noteth in Prelats, how they waſte and expend the goods of the Church in ſuperfluities; or upon their kinſfolks, or other worſe ways, which ſhould rather be ſpent on the poor.

Old Books of councils loſt by the negligence of the Clerks.

Nextly, in the tenth Chapter he complaineth, for that through the negligence of men of the Church (eſpecially of the Church of Rome) the Books and Monuments of the old Councils, and alſo of the new, are not to be found: Which ſhould be reſerved and kept in all Cathedral Churches.

The unchaſte life of Prieſts condemned by the nature of the Storks.

Item, that many Prelates be ſo cold in doing their duties. Alſo he reproacheth, the unchaſte and voluptuous demeanour of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, by the examples of Stroks, whoſe nature is (ſaith he) that if any of their company, leaving his own mate, joyneth with any other, all the reſt flieth upon him, whether it be he or ſhe, beateth him, and plucketh his Fathers off: What then, ſaith he, ought good Prelates to do to ſuch a Perſon of their company, whoſe filthineſs and corrupt life both defileth ſo many, and ſtinketh in the whole Church?

Amendment of life ought firſt to begin with the Prieſts.

Again, for ſo much as we read in the Book of Eſdras, lib. 2. cap. 9. that he, purging Iſrael of ſtrange Women, began firſt with the Prieſts; ſo now likewiſe in the purging and correcting of all ſorts of men, firſt the Purgation ought to begin with theſe, according as it is written by the Prophet Ezechiel; begin firſt with the Sanctuary, &c.

The Realm of France interdicted.

Moreover, how that in the time of Philip King of France, the whole Realm was interdicted for that the King had but one Woman inſtead of his Wife, which was not his Wife by Law. And again, ſeeing in theſe our days the King of Portugal hath been ſequeſtred from his Dominion, by the Authority of the Church, being thought not ſufficient to Govern: What then ought be ſaid to that Prelate who abuſeth other mens Wives, Virgins, and Nuns, which alſo is found unable and inſufficient to take upon him the charge of Souls?

King of Portugal depoſed.

After Honorius, next in the ſame uſurpation ſucceeded Pope Innocentius the ſecond, Anno. 1130. But as it was with his Predeceſſors before him, that at every mutation of new Popes, came new perturbations, and commonly never a Pope was Elected, but ſome other was ſet up againſt him (ſometimes two, ſometimes three Popes together) ſo likewiſe it hapned with this Innocentius; for after he was choſen, the Romans Elected another Pope, named Anacletus. Betwixt theſe two Popes, there was much ado, and great conflicts through the partaking of Rogerius, Duke of Sicile, taking Anacletus part againſt Innocentius, until Lotharius the Emperor came; who reſcuing Innocentius, drove Rogerius out of Italy. Our ſtories record, that King Henry was one of the great helps in ſetting up and maintaining this Pope Innocentius againſt Anacletus: Ciſburnenſis.

The Popes curſe proclaimed againſt ſuch as ſtrike any Prieſt.

Amongſt many other things, this Pope decreed that whoſoever did ſtrike a Prieſt or Clerk, being ſhaven, he ſhould be Excommunicated, and not be abſolved, but only of the Pope himſelf.

About the time of doing theſe things, being the year of our Lord, 1135. King Henry being in Normandy, as ſome ſay, by taking there a fall from his Horſe, as others ſay, by taking a ſurfet in eating Lampries, fell ſick and died, after he had Reigned over the Realm of England five and thirty years and odd months; leaving for his heirs Matilda the Empreſs his Daughter, with her young Son Henry to ſucceed after him; to whom all the Prelats and Nobility of the Realm were Sworn. But, contrary to their Oath made to Maud in the preſence of her Father before, William the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Nobles of the Realm, Crowned Stephen Earl of Bologne, and Sifters Son to King Henry, upon Saint Stephens day in Chriſtmas week; which Archbiſhop the next year after dyed, being, as it was thought, juſtly puniſhed for his Perjury. And many other Lords, which did accordingly, went not quit without puniſhment. In the like juſtice of puniſhment is numbred alſo Roger, Biſhop of Sálisbury; who contrary unto his Oath, being a great doer in the Coronation of Stephen, was apprehended of the ſame King, and miſerably, but juſtly, extermined.

A certain Written Engliſh ſtory I have, which addeth more, and ſaith, that King Stephen, having many foes in divers quarters keeping their holds and caſtles againſt him, went then to Oxford, and took the Biſhop of Salisbury, and put a Rope about his neck, and ſo led him to the Caſtle of Vies, that was his, and commanded them to render up the Caſtle, or he would ſlay and hang their Biſhop. Which Caſtle being given up, the King took the ſpoyl thereof. The like alſo he did unto the Biſhop of Lincoln, named Alexander; whom in like manner he led in a Rope to a Caſtle of the Biſhops, that was upon Trent, and bad them deliver up the Caſtle, or elſe he would hang their Lord before the gate. Long it was before the Caſtle was given up; yet at length the King obtaining it, there entred and took all the Treaſure of the Biſhop, &c. Roger Hoveden and Fabian alledging a certain old Author, whom I cannot find, referreth a great cauſe of this perjury unto one Hugh Bigot, Steward ſometime with King Henry. Who, immediately after the death of the ſaid Henry, came into England, and before the ſaid Archbiſhop, and other Lords of the land, took wilfully an Oath, and Swore, that he was preſent a little before the Kings death, when King Henry admitted for his heir (to be King after him) Stephen his Nephew, for ſo much as Maud his daughter had diſcontented him. Whereunto the Archbiſhop with the other Lords, gave too haſty credence. But this Hugh, ſaith he, ſcaped not unpuniſhed, for he died miſerably in a ſhort time after. Ex Fabian. Albeit all this may be ſuppoſed rather to be wrought not without the practice of Henry, Biſhop of Winchester, and other Prelates by his ſetting on, which Henry was brother unto King Stephen, &c.

King Stephen.

{ Anno 1136. }

THus, when King Stephen, contrary unto his Oath made before to Maud the Empreſs, had taken upon him the Crown (as is above ſaid) he Swore before the Lords at Oxford, that he would not hold the Benefices that were voided, and that he would remit the Danegild with many other things, which after he little performed. Moreover, becauſe he dreaded the coming of the Empreſs, he gave licence to his Lords, every one to build upon his own ground ſtrong Caſtles or Fortreſſes, as them liked. All the time of his Reign he was vexed with Wars, but eſpecially with David, King of the Scots, with whom he was at length accorded: But yet the Scottiſh King did him no Homage, becauſe he was Sworn to Maud the Empreſs. Notwithſtanding, yet Henry the Eldeſt Son to King David, did Homage to King Stephen. But he, after repenting thereof, entred into Northumberland with a great hoſt, and burnt and ſlew the people in moſt cruel wiſe, neither ſparing man, woman, or child. Such as were with child they ript, the children they toſt upon their Spears points, and laying the Prieſts upon the Altars, they mangled and cut them all to pieces, after a moſt terrible manner. But by the manhood of the Engliſh Lords and Souldiers, and through the means of Thurſtin, Archbiſhop of York, they were met withal, and ſlain a great number of them, and David their King conſtrained to give to Henry his Son Hoſtage for ſurety of peace. In the mean time, King Stephen was occupied in the South Countries, beſieging divers Caſtles of divers Biſhops and other Lords, and took them by force, and fortified them with his Knights and Servants, to the intent to withſtand the Empreſs, whoſe coming he ever feared.

About the ſixth year of his Reign, Maud the Empreſs came into England out of Normandy, and by the aid of Robert, Earl of Gloceſter, and Ranulph of Cheſter, made ſtorng War upon King Stephen. In the end whereof the Kings party was chaſed, and himſelf taken priſoner; and ſent to Briſtow, there to be kept in ſure hold. The ſame day when King Stephen ſhould joyn his Battel, it is ſaid in a certain Old Chronicle before minded, that he being at the Maſs (which then the Biſhop of Lincoln ſaid before the King) as he went to offer up his Taper, it brake in two pieces. And when the Maſs was done, (at what time the King ſhould have been houſeled) the rope, whereby the Pix did hang, did break, and the Pix fell down upon the Altar.

After this field, the Queen, King Stephens wife, (lying then in Kent) made great labour to the Empreſs and her Council, to have the King delivered and put into ſome houſe of Religion, but could not obtain it. Alſo the Londoners made great Suit to the ſaid Empreſs, to have and to uſe again Saint Edwards Laws, and not the Laws of her Father, which were more ſtrict and ſtrange unto them than the other. Which when they could not obtain of her and her Council; the Citizens of London, being therewith diſcontented, would have taken the Empreſs: but ſhe having knowledge thereof, fled privily from London to Oxford. But then the Kentiſh-men and Londoners, taking the Kings part, joyned battel againſt the Empreſs; where the foreſaid Robert, Earl of Gloceſter, and baſe Brother to the Empreſs was taken, and ſo by exchange, both the King and the Earl Robert were delivered out of priſon. Then Stephen without delay, gathering to him a ſtrong Army, ſtraitly purſued the foreſaid Matild or Maud, with her friends, beſieging them in the Caſtle of Oxford. In the Siege whereof fell a great Snow and Froſt ſo hard, that a man well laden might paſs over the water: upon the occaſion whereof, the Empreſs bethinking her ſelf, appointed with her Friends and Retinue cloathed in white Sheets, and ſo iſſuing out by a Poſtern-Gate, went upon the Ice over Thames, and ſo eſcaped to Walingford. After this, the King (the Caſtle being gotten) when he found not the Empreſs, was much diſpleaſed, and moleſted the Country about divers ways. In concluſion, he purſued the Empreſs and her Company ſo hard, that he cauſed them to fly the Realm, which was the ſixth year of his Reign.

What it is for Princes to be hard and ſtrict to their Subjects.

King Stephen and Robert, Earl of Gloceſter delivered by exchange.

Sincerus authoris Chronico.

The ſecond year after this, which was the eighth year of his Reign, there was a Parliament kept at London, unto the which all the Biſhops of the Realm reſorted, and there denounced the King accurſed, and all them with him that did any hurt to the Church, or to any Miniſter thereof. Whereupon the King began ſomewhat to amend his conditions for a certain ſpace: but afterward (as my ſtory ſaith) was as ill as he was before; but what the cauſes were, my Author maketh no relation thereof, &c. To return again to the ſtory, the Empreſs compelled, as is ſaid, to fly the Realm, returned again into Normandy to Geoffery Plantaginet her Husband. Who, after he had valiantly won and defended the Dutchy of Normandy, againſt the puiſſance of King Stephen a long time, ended his life, leaving Henry his Son to ſucceed him in that Dukedom. In the mean while, Robert Earl of Gloceſter, and the Earl of Cheſter, who were ſtrong of people, had divers Conflicts with the King, inſomuch that at a battel at Wilton between them the King was well near taken, but yet eſcaped with much pain.

The deceaſe of Geoffery Plantaginet.

It was not long after, but Euſtace, Son to King Stephen, who had married the French Kings Siſter, made War on Duke Henry of Normandy, but prevailed not. Soon after, the ſaid Henry, Duke of Normandy, (in the quarrel of his Mother Maud) with a great puiſſance entred into England, and at the firſt won the Caſtle of Malmesbury, then the Tower of London, and afterward the Town of Nottingham, with other Holds and Caſtles, as of Wallingford, and other more. Thus between him and the King were fought many battels, to the great annoyance of the Realm. During which time, Euſtace the Kings Son departeth. Upon the occaſion whereof, the King cauſed Theobald (which ſucceeded next after William above mentioned) Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to make means to the Duke for peace, which upon this condition between them was concluded, that Stephen, during his life time, ſhould hold the Kingdom, and Henry in the mean time to be proclaimed Heir-apparent in the chief Cities throughout the Realm. Theſe things thus concluded; Duke Henry taketh his Journey into Normandy (King Stephen and his Son William bringing him on his way) where William the Kings Son taking up his horſe before his Father, had a fall, and brake his Leg, and ſo was had to Canterbury. The ſame year King Stephen, about October (as ſome ſay for ſorrow) ended his life, after he had reigned nineteen years perjuredly.

As Theobald ſucceeded after William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſo in York, after Thurſtan, ſucceeded William, which was called S. William of York, who was poyſoned in his Chalice by his Chaplains.

Saint William of York.

In the time of this King, and about the ſixteenth year of his Reign, Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Legate to the Pope, did hold a Council at London. In the which Council firſt began new found Appellations from Councils to the Pope, found out by Henry, Biſhop of Wincheſter. For as the words of mine Author do record, In Anglia namque Appellationes in uſu non erant, donec eas Henricus Wintonienſis Epiſcopus, dum Legatus eſſet, malo ſuo crudeliter intruſit. In eodem namque concilio ad Romani Pontificis audientiam ter appell atus ſt, &c. That is, For Appellations before were not in uſe in England, till Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, being then the Popes Legate, brought them cruelly in, to his own hurt. For in that Council thrice appeal was made to the Biſhop of Rome.

In the time of King Stephen died Gratianus a Monk of Bonony, who compiled the Book called The Popes Decrees. Alſo his Brother Petrus Lombardus, Biſhop of Paris, which is called the Maſter of Sentences, compiled his four Books of the Sentences. Theſe two Brethren were the greateſt doers in finding out and eſtabliſhing this blind opinion of the Sacrament, that the only ſimilitude of bread and wine remained, but not the ſubſtance of them: and this they call the Spiritual underſtanding of the myſtery. And therefore no marvel if the Sun in thoſe days were ſeen black and dim.

Some alſo affirm, that Petrus Comeſtor, Writer of the Scholaſtical Hiſtory, was the third Brother to theſe above named.

In the ſame time and Reign of the ſaid King Stephen was alſo Hugo, ſurnamed De ſancto victore. About the which time (as Polychronicon reciteth) lived and died Bernardus Clarevalienſis.

The Author of the Hiſtory, called Fornalenſis, maketh alſo mention of Hildegate the Nun and Propheteſs in Almany, to have lived in the ſame age. Concerning whoſe Propheſie againſt the Fryers, hereafter (by the Grace of Chriſt) more ſhall be ſaid, when we come to recite the order and number of Fryers and religious men crept into the Church of Chriſt.

We read moreover of one named Johannes de Temporibus, which by the affirmance of moſt of our old Hiſtories, lived 361. years (ſervant once to Carolus Magnus) and in the Reign of Stephen, King of England died, *Polychron. lib. 7. In the daies alſo of this King, and by him, was builded the Abbey of Feverſham, where his Son and he were buried. He builded the Monaſtery of Finerneis and of Fomitance, the Caſtle of Wallingford, with a number of other Caſtles more.

Mention hath been made before of certain Engliſh Councils holden in the time of this King, where it was (in one of them under Theobald the Archbiſhop of Canterbury) decreed, that Biſhops ſhould live more diſcreetly; ſhould teach their Flock more diligently; that reading of Scriptures ſhould be frequented more uſually in Abbeys; that Prieſts ſhould not be Rulers of worldly matters; and that they ſhould learn and teach the Lords Prayer and Creed in Engliſh. Malmes.

At which time alſo, Lotharius the Emperor began to do the like, in recovering again the right and priviledge taken away from Henricus his Predeceſſor; had not Bernardus given him contrary counſel.

Here came into the Church the manner of curſing with Book, Bell, and Candle, deviſed in the Council of London, holden by William, Biſhop of Wincheſter under Celeſtinus, which ſucceeded after Inuocentius, Anno 1144. Alſo Alſo Lotharius ſucceeded in the Imperial Crown Conradus, the Nephew of Henricus the fifth afore mentioned, {Anno 1138.} Anno 1138. who only amongſt many Emperors, is not found to receive the Crown at the Popes hand.

In the days of this Emperor, who reigned fifteen years, were divers Popes, as Celeſtinus the ſecond, Lucius the ſecond, Eugenius the third, at which time the Romans went about to recover their former old manner of chuſing their Conſuls and Senators. But the Popes, then being in their ruff, in no caſe would abide it; whereupon aroſe many Commotions, with much civil War amongſt them. Inſomuch that Pope Lucius (ſending for aid to the Emperor, who otherwiſe letted at that time could not come) armed his Souldiers, thinking to invade them, or elſe to deſtroy them in the Senate-houſe. But this coming to their knowledge before, the people was all in array, and ſo much ado was amongſt them. Pope Lucius being alſo amongſt them in the fight (well pelted with ſtones and blows) lived not long after. Likewiſe Pope Eugenius after him, Anno 1145. purſuing the Romans for the ſame matter, firſt did curſe them with Excommunication; after, when he ſaw that would not ſerve, he came with his Hoſt, and ſo compelled them at length to ſeek his peace, and to take his conditions, which were theſe, That they ſhould aboliſh their Conſuls, and take ſuch Senators as he by his Papal Authority ſhould aſſign them.

Then followed Anaſtaſius the fourth, and after him Adrian the fourth an Engliſhman, by his name called Breakſpeare, belonging once to S. Albans. This Adrianus kept great ſtir in like ſort with the Citizens of Rome for aboliſhing their Conſuls and Senate, curſing, excommunicating, and warring againſt them with all Power he could make, till the time he removed the Conſuls out of their Office, and brought them all under his ſubjection. The like buſineſs and rage he alſo ſtirred up againſt Apulia, and eſpecially againſt the Empire, bluſtering and thundering againſt Fredericus the Emperor, as (the Lord granting) you ſhall hear anon, after we have proſecuted ſuch matter, as neceſſarily appertaineth firſt to the continuation of our Engliſh ſtory.

King Henry the Second.

{Anno 1154.} HEnry the Second of that name, the Son of Geffery Plantaginet and of Maud the Empreſs, and Daughter of King Henry the firſt, began his Reign after King Stephen, and continued five and thirty years. The firſt year of his Reign he ſubdued Ireland; and not long after, Thomas Becket was made by him Lord Chancellor of England. This King caſt down divers Caſtles which were erected in the ſame time of King Stephen. He went into the North parts, where he ſubdued William King of Scotland, who at that time held a great part of Northumberland, unto New-Caſtle upon Tine, and joyned Scotland to his own Kingdom, from the South Ocean to the North Iſles of Orcades. Alſo he put under his Dominion the Kingdom of Wales, and there felled many great Woods, and made the ways plain. So that by his great manhood and policy, the Seigniory of England was much augmented, with the addition of Scotland, Ireland, the Iſles Orcades, Britain, Poictou, and Guien. Alſo he had in his Rule Normandy, Gaſcoin, Angeou, and Chinon: alſo Aluerne and the City of Tholous he won, and were to him ſubject. Over and beſides (by the Title of his Wife Elenor, Daughter to the Earl of Poictou) he obtained the Mount Pyrame in Spain: ſo that we read of none of his Progenitors, which had ſo many Countries under his Dominion.

{Anno 1154.} King Henry the ſecond.

Thomas Becket Chancellor of England.

{Anno 1157.} In England were ſeen in the Firmament two Suns, and (as it is in Chronico Chronicorum) in Italy appeared three Suns by the ſpace of three hours in the Weſt, and the year following appeared three Moons, whereof the middle Moon had a red Croſs overthwart the face, whereby was betokened (by the judgment of ſome) the great Schiſme that after fell among the Cardinals for the Election of the Biſhop of Rome: or elſe rather the buſineſs between Fredericus the Emperor and the Popes, whereof partly now incidently occaſion giveth us to diſcourſe after that I have firſt written of Gerhardus and Dulcinus Navarenſis; who, in their time, according to their gift, did earneſtly labour and preach againſt the Church of Rome, defending and maintaining, that Prayer was not more holy in one place than in another; that the Pope was Antichriſt; that the Clergy and Prelates of Rome were reject, and the very Whore of Babylon prefigured in the Apocalypſe, &c. Peradventure theſe had received ſome light of knowledge of the Waldenſes, who at length with a great number of their Followers were oppreſſed and ſlain by the Pope. And although ſome inconvenient Points of Doctrine and diſhoneſty in their Aſſembles be againſt them alledged of ſome, yet theſe times of ours do teach us ſufficiently what credit is to be given to ſuch Popiſh ſlanders, forged rather upon hatred of true Religion, than upon any judgment of truth. Illiricus, in his Book De teſtibus, referreth the time of theſe two to the year of our Lord, 1218. but as I find in the ſtory of Robert Guiſburne, theſe two about the year of our Lord, 1158. brought thirty with them into England, who by the King and the Prelates, were all burnt in the Forehead, and ſo driven out of the Realm, and after (as Illiricus writeth) were ſlain by the Pope.

Gerhardus and Dulcinus Preachers againſt Antichriſt of Rome.

Ex hiſtoria Giſburgenſi.

And now (according to my promiſe premiſed) the time requireth to proceed to the Hiſtory of Fredericus the firſt (called Barbaroſſa) Succeſſor unto Conradus in the Empire, who marched up to Italy, to ſubdue there certain Rebels. The Pope hearing that, came with his Clergy to meet him by the way, in a Town called Sutrium, thinking by him to find Aid againſt his Enemies. The Emperor ſeeing the Biſhop, lighteth from his Horſe to receive him, holding the ſtirrop to the Prelate on the left ſide, when he ſhould have held it on the right, whereat the Pope ſhewed himſelf ſomewhat grieved. The Emperor ſmiling, excuſed himſelf, that he was never accuſtomed to hold ſtirrops. And ſeeing it was done only of good will, and of no duty, the leſs matter was what ſide of the Horſe he held. The next day to make amends again to the Biſhop, the Emperor ſending for him, received him, holding the right ſtirrop unto the Prelate, and ſo all the matter was made whole, and he the Popes white Son again.

Fredericus Barbaroſſa Emperor.

The Pope diſpleaſed that the Emperor did not hold his right ſtirrop.

The Emperor holds the Pope ſtirrop.

After this, as they were come in and ſate together, Adrianus the Pope beginneth to declare unto him, how his Anceſtors before him, ſuch as ſought unto the See of Rome for the Crown, were wont always to leave behind them ſome ſpecial token or monument of their Benevolence for the obtaining thereof, as Carolus Magnus in ſubduing the Lombards, Otthe the Berengarians, Lotharius the Normans, &c. Wherefore he required ſome benefit to proceed likewiſe from him unto the Church of Rome, in reſtoring again the Country of Apulia to the Church of Rome. Which thing if he would do, he for his part again would do that which appertained unto him to do: meaning in giving him the Crown, for at that time the Popes had brought the Emperors to fetch their Crown at their hands.

The Pope old practiſe in getting Princes gotten by the ears.

Frederick with his Princes perceiving that, unleſs he would of his own proper Coſts and Charges fetch in again Apulia out of Duke Williams hands, he could not ſpeed of the Crown, was fain to promiſe to all that the Pope required, and ſo the next day after was Crowned.

This done, the Emperor returneth into Germany, to refreſh his Army and his other Furnitures, for the ſubduing of Apulia. In the mean while Adrianus, not thinking to be idle, firſt giveth forth Cenſures of Excommunication againſt William, Duke of Apulia. Beſides, not content with this, he ſendeth alſo to Emmanuel, Emperor of Conſtantinople, incenſing him to War againſt the foreſaid William. The Duke perceiving this, ſendeth to the Pope for peace, promiſing to reſtore to him whatſoever he would.

War ſtir up the Pope.

But the Pope, through the malignant Counſel of his Cardinals, would grant to no peace, thinking to get more by War. The Duke, ſeeing nothing but War, prepareth himſelf with all Expedition to the ſame. To be brief, making all his Power out of Sicilia, he arrived at Apulia, and there putteth the Emperor Emmanuel to flight. This done, he proceedeth to the City of Bonaventure, where the Pope with his Cardinals were looking for Victory. He planting there his Siege, ſo ſtraitly preſſed the City, that the Pope with his Cardinals were glad to intreat for peace, which they refuſed before. The Duke granted unto their peace upon certain conditions, that is, that neither neither he ſhould invade ſuch Poſſeſſions as belonged to Rome, and that the Pope ſhould make him King of both Sicilies. So the matter was concluded, and they departed. The Biſhop, coming to Rome, was no leſs troubled there about their Conſuls and Senators, inſomuch that when his Curſes and Excommunications could not prevail nor ſerve, he was fain to leave Rome, and removed to Arimi-num.

What n gainful the Pop than pe

The Pop driven t intreat f peace.

The Emperor, all this while ſitting quietly at home, began to conſider with himſelf, how the Pope had extorted from the Emperors, his Predeceſſors, the inveſting and induing of Prelates; how he had pilled and polled all Nations by his Legates, and alſo had been the Sower of Seditions through all his Empery; he began therefore to require of all the Biſhops of Germany Homage, and Oath of their Allegiance; commanding alſo the Popes Legates, if they came into Germany without his ſending for, not to be received. Charging moreover all his Subjects that none of them ſhould Appeal to Rome. Beſides this, in his Letters he ſet and annexed his Name before the Popes name: whereupon the Pope, being not a little offended, directed his Letters to the foreſaid Frederick Emperor, after this tenor and form as followeth.

The godly proceedings of Frederick the Emperor againſt the Pope.

A Letter of Pope Adrian to the Emperor Frederick.

Adrian Biſhop, Servant of the Servants of God, to Frederick Emperor, Health and Apoſtolical benediction. The Law of God as it promiſeth to them that honour Father and Mother long life, ſo it threatneth the ſentence of death to them that curſe Father and Mother. We are taught by the word of truth, that every one the which exalteth himſelf, ſhall be brought low. Wherefore (my welbeloved Son in the Lord) we marvel not a little at your Wiſdom, in that you ſeem not to ſhew that reverence to beſſed S. Peter, and to the holy Church of Rome, which you ought to ſhew. For why? In your Letters ſent to us, you prefer your own Name before ours, wherein you incur the note of Inſolency, yea rather (to ſpeak it) of Arrogancy. What ſhould I here recite unto you the Oath of your Fidelity, which you ſware to bleſſed S. Peter and to us, and how you obſerve and keep the ſame? Seeing you ſo require Homage and Allegiance of them that be gods, and all the Sons of the High God, and preſume to joyn their holy Lands with yours, working contrary to us: ſeeing alſo you exclude, not only out of your Churches, but alſo out of your Cities, our Cardinals, whom we direct as Legates from our ſide: what ſhall I ſay then unto you? Amend therefore I adviſe you, amend; for while you go about to obtain of Us your Conſecration and Crown, and to get thoſe things you have not, I fear much your Honour will loſe the things you have. Thus fare ye well.

The Anſwer of Frederick the Emperor to the Pope.

FRederick by the Grace of God, Roman Emperor, ever Auguſtus, unto Adrian Biſhop of the Roman Church, and unto all ſuch that be willing to cleave unto thoſe things which Jeſus began to work and teach, greeting. The law of Juſtice giveth to every perſon accordingly that which is his. Neither do we derogate from our Parents: of whom according as we have received this our Dignity of the Imperial Crown and Governance; ſo in the ſame Kingdom of ours, we do render their due and true honour to them again. And for ſo much as duty in all ſorts of men is to be ſought out, let us ſee firſt in the time of Conſtantine (Silveſter then being Biſhop of Rome) what Patrimony or Regality he had of his own, due to him that he might claim. Did not Conſtantine of his liberal benignity give liberty, and reſtored peace unto the Church? And whatſoever Regality or Patrimony the See of your Papacy hath, was it not by the donation of Princes given unto them? Revolve and turn over the ancient Chronicles (if either you have not read, or neglected that we do affirm) there it is to be found. Of them which be gods by adoption, and hold our Lordſhips of us; why may we not juſtly require their Homage, and their ſworn Allegiance, when as he which is both your Maſter and ours (taking nothing of any King or any man, but giving all goodneſs to all men) paid Toll and Tribute for him and Peter, unto Cæſar? giving you example to do the like. And therefore he ſaith to you and all men, Learn of me, for I am meek and humble of heart, &c. Wherefore either render again your Lordſhips and Patrimonies which ye hold of us: or elſe if ye find them ſo ſweet unto you, then give that which is due to God, unto God; and that which is due to Cæſar, unto Cæſar. As for your Cardinals, we ſhut them out both of Churches and Cities, for that we ſee them not Preachers, but Prollers; not Repairers of Peace, but Rakers for money; not Pillars and Upholders of the Church, but Pollers inſatiable of the World, and Moylers of money and gold. What time we ſhall ſee them to be other men (ſuch as the Church requireth them to be) members, and makers of peace, ſhining forth like lights to the people, aſſiſting poor and weak mens cauſes in the way of equity, &c. then ſhall they find us preſt and ready to relieve them with ſtipends, and all things neceſſary. And whereas you infer ſuch queſtions as theſe unto ſecular men (little conducing to Religion) you incur thereby no little note and blemiſh of your humility (which is keeper of all vertues) and of your manſuetude. Therefore let your Fatherhood beware and take heed, leſt in moving ſuch matters as ſeem to us unſeemly for you, ye give thereby offence to ſuch as depend of your word (giving ear to your mouth, as it were to an evening ſhowre:) for we cannot but tell you of that we hear; ſeeing now the deteſtable beaſt of Pride doth creep into the Seat of Peter, providing always as much as we may (by Gods Grace) for the peace of the Church. Fare ye well.

Upon this Adrian the Pope directeth out a Bull againſt Frederick, Excommunicating him with publick and ſolemn Ceremonies. Moreover, conſpiring with William Duke of Apulia he ſought all manner of ways to infeſt the Emperor, and to ſet all men againſt him, eſpecially the Clergy. Amongſt many other writing to Hillinus Biſhop of Trivers, to Arnulphus Biſhop of Mentz, and to Frederick Biſhop of Cullen, he ſeeketh firſt to make them of his ſide. His Epiſtle to them ſoundeth to this effect:

A ſeditious and proud Letter of the Pope to the Biſhops of Germany.

THe Empire of Rome was transferred from the Greeks to the Almans; ſo that the King of Almans could not be called Emperour, before he was crowned of the Biſhop Apoſtolical. Before his Conſecration he is a King, afterwards Emperor. Whence hath he his Empire then, but of us? By the election of his Princes he hath the Name of a King, by our Conſecration he hath the name of the Emperor, of Auguſt, or of Cæſar. Ergo by us he reigneth as Emperor. Search ancient Antiquities. Zacharias P. promoted Carolus and made him a great Name, that he was made and called Emperor: and after that, ever the King of Almans was named Emperor and Advocate to the Sea Apoſtolical: ſo that Apulia (conquered by him) was ſubdued to the Biſhop of Rome: which Apulia with the City of Rome is ours, and not the Emperors. Our Seat is at Rome; the Seat of the Emperour is at Aquis in Ardunna, which is a wood in France. The Emperor whatſoever he hath, he hath it of us. As Zacharias did tranſlate the Empire from the Greeks to the Almans; ſo we may tranſlate it again from the Almans to the Greeks. Behold it lieth in our Power to give it to whom we will, being therefore ſet up of God above Gentiles and Nations, to deſtroy and pluck up, to build and to plant, &c.

Well bragged, and like a Pope.

Scripture well wreſted.

And yet further to underſtand the ambitious preſumption of this proud See of Rome; it ſo chanced, this Emperor Frederick, at his firſt coming up to Rome, did behold there in the Palace of Lateran a certain Picture brought forth unto him, how Lotharius the ſecond Emperor was crowned of the Pope, with the inſcription of certain Verſes in Latine, declaring how the foreſaid Emperor, coming to Rome, firſt did ſwear to the City, after was made the Popes man, and ſo of him received the Crown. Fredericus, offended with this Picture, deſired the Pope it might be aboliſhed, for that it ſhould be no cauſe of any diſſenſion hereafter. The Pope underſtanding the intent of the Emperor, how loth he was to come under ſubjection to his See, deviſed by all craſty ways to bring it to paſs. And firſt taking his occaſion by the Biſhop of Laodicea (being then detained in cuſtody, I cannot tell by whom) ſent divers and ſharp Letters unto him; and yet not ſo ſharp, as proud and diſdainful. Wherein the firſt ſalutation by his Legates was this in Latine, Salutat vos beatiſſimus pater noſter papa, & univerſitas cardinalium, ille ut pater, hi ut fratres. That is, our moſt Bleſſed Father the Pope Greeteth you, and the Univerſal Company of the Cardinals, he as your Father, they as your Brethren. Meaning thereby that he ſhould underſtand himſelf to be ſubject and underling to the Pope, no leſs then the Cardinals were. Moreover in his Letters Objecting divers things againſt him, he reciteth how many and great Benefits he had received of the Church of Rome, by the which Church he had obtained the fulneſs of his Honour and Dignity, &c. The Emperor with his Princes, perceiving whereunto the Pope by his Legates did ſhoot (being a Prince of courage) could not abide ſuch intollerable preſumption of a proud meſſage whereupon much contention fell between the Legates and the Princes. And of whom then, ſay the Legates, receiveth Ceſar the Empire, if he take it not of the Pope? With the which word the German Princes were ſo much offended that had not the Emperor ſtayed them with much ado, they would have uſed violence againſt the Legates. But the Emperor, not permitting that, commanded the Legates away, ſtraightly charging them to make no turn by the way, to any perſon or perſons, but ſtraight to depart home. And he, to certifie the whole ſtate of the Empire of the truth of the matter, directeth forth theſe Letters that follow.

The Tenor of the Emperors Letter ſent through all his Empire.

FOr ſo much as the providence of God (whereof dependeth all power both in Heaven and Earth) hath committed to us, his anointed, this our regiment and Empire to be governed, and the peace of his Churches by our Imperial Arms to be protected; we cannot but lament and complain to you with great ſorrow of heart, ſeeing ſuch cauſes of diſſention the root and fountain of evils, and the infection of peſtiferous corruption thus to riſe from the holy Church, imprinted with the ſeal of Peace and Love of Chriſt.

By reaſon whereof (except God turn it away) we fear the whole body of the Church is like to be polluted, the unity thereof to be broken, and ſchiſm and diviſion to be betwixt the ſpiritual and temporal regiment. For we being of late at Biſunze, and there intreating buſily of matters pertaining as well to the honour of our Empire, as to the wealth of the Churches, there came Ambaſſadors of the Sea Apoſtolical, declaring that they brought a legacy to our Majeſty of great importance, redounding to the no ſmall commodity of our honour and Empire.

Who then, the firſt day of their coming, being brought to our preſence, and received of us (as the manner is) with honour accordingly, audience was given them to hear what they had to ſay. They forthwith burſting out of the mammon of iniquity, Hauty pride, ſtoutneſs and Arrogancy, out of the execrable preſumption of their ſwelling heart did their meſſage with Letter Apoſtolical, whereof the Tenor was this: That we ſhould always have before our eyes, how that our Sovereign Lord the Pope gave us the Imperial Crown, and that it doth not repent him, if ſo be it we have received greater Benefits at his hand. And this was the effect of that ſo ſweet and Fatherly legation, which ſhould nouriſh peace both of the Church and of the Empire, to unite them faſt together in the band of Love.

At the hearing of this ſo falſe, untrue, and moſt vain glorious perſumption of ſo proud a meſſage, not only the Emperors Majeſty conceived indignation, but alſo all the Princes (there preſent) were moved with ſuch anger and rage thereat, that if our preſence and requeſt had not ſtaied them. they would not have held their hands from theſe wicked Prieſts, or elſe would have proceeded with ſentence of death againſt them.

Furthermore, becauſe a great number of other Letters (partly written already, partly with ſeals ready ſigned, for Letters to be written according as they ſhould think good to the Churches of Germany) were found about them, whereby to work their conceived intent of iniquity here in our Churches, to ſpoil the Altars, to carry away the Jewels of the Church, and the fley off the limms and plates of golden Croſſes, &c. To the intent their avarious meaning ſhould have no further power to Reign, we gave them commandment to depart the ſame way they came. And now ſeeing our Reign and Empire ſtandeth upon the Election of Princes from God alone, who in the paſſion of his Son ſubdued the world to be governed with two Swords neceſſary; and again, ſeeing Peter the Apoſtle hath ſo informed the world with this Doctrine, Deum timete, regem honorificate: That is, Fear God, Honour your King: therefore, who ſo ſaith that we have and poſſeſs our Emperial Kingdom by the benefit of the Lord Pope is contrary both to the Ordinance of God, and to the Doctrine of Peter, and alſo ſhall be reproved for a lier.

Note here a couragious heart in a valiant Emperor.

An example for all Princes to follow.

Note.

Therefore as our endeavour hath been heretofore to help and to deliver the ſervile captivity of Churches out of the hand and from the yoke of the Egyptians, and to maintain the right of their liberties and dignities, we deſire you all with your compaſſion to lament with us this ſlanderous ignominy inferred to us and our Kingdom, truſting that your faithful good will, which hath been ever truſty to the Honour of this Empire (never yet blemiſhed from the firſt beginning of this City, and of religion) will provide, that it ſhall have no hurt through the ſtrange novelty and preſumptuous pride of ſuch. Which thing rather then it ſhould come to paſs, know you this for certain; I had rather incurr the danger of death, then ſuffer ſuch confuſion to happen in our days.

This Letter of Ceſar fretted the Pope not a little who wrote again to the Biſhops of Germany, accuſing the Emperor, and willing them to work againſt him what they could. They anſwer again with all obedience to the Pope, ſubmitting themſelves, and yet excuſing the Emperor, and blaming him rather; and exhorted him henceforth to temper his Letters and Legacies with the more gentleneſs and modeſty; which Counſel he alſo followed, perceiving otherwiſe that he could not prevail.

Much trouble had good Fredericus with this Pope; but much more with the other that followed. For this Pope continued not very long, the ſpace only of four years and odd months. About whoſe time roſe up the order of the Heremits by one William once Duke of Aquitania, and afterward a Frier. This Adrianus walking with his Cardinals abroad, to a place called Anagnia or Arignanum (as Volateran calleth it) chanced to be choked with a Fly getting into his throat, and ſo was ſtrangled; who in the later time of his Papacy was wont to ſay, that there is no more miſerable kind of life in the Earth, than to be Pope, and to come to the Papacy by Blood, that is (ſaid he) not to ſucceed Peter, but rather Romulus, who to Reign alone did ſlay his Brother.

The order of Hermits.

Anno 1159.

The ſaying and judgment of Pope Adrianus of the Papal See. The Popes rather ſucceſſors to Romulus than to Peter. Pope Alexander the third.

Although this Adrian was bad enough, yet came the next much worſe, one Alexander the third of that name; who yet was not elect alone; for beſide him the Emperor with nine Cardinals (albeit Sabelicus ſaith but with three) did ſet up another Pope, named Victor the fourth. Between theſe two Popes roſe a foul ſchiſm and great diſcord, and long continued. Inſomuch that the Emperor, being required to take up the matter, ſent for them both to appear before him, that in hearing them both he might judge their cauſe the better. Victor came, but Alexander (diſdaining that his matter ſhould come in controverſie) refuſed to appear. Whereupon the Emperor, with a full conſent of his Biſhops and Clergy about him, aſſigned and ratified the Election of Victor to ſtand, and ſo brought him into the City, there to be received and placed. Alexander flying into France, accuſed them both, ſending his Letters to all Chriſtendom againſt them, as men to be avoyded and caſt out of all Chriſtian company. Alſo to get him friends at Rome, by flattery and money he got on his ſide the greateſt part of the City, both to the favouring of him, and to the ſetting up of ſuch Conſuls as were for his purpoſe. After this, Alexander coming from France to Sicil, and from thence to Rome, was there received with much favour, through the help of Philip the French King.

Alexander curſeth the Emperor.

The Emperor, hearing this rebellion and conſpiracy in Rome, removed with great power into Italy, where he had deſtroyed divers great Cities. Coming at length

Anno 1164.

length to Rome, he required the Citizens that the cauſe betwixt the two Popes might be decided, and that he which had the beſt Right might be taken. If they would ſo do, he would reſtore again that which he took from them before. Alexander miſtruſting his part and doubting the wills of the Citizens (having Ships ready prepared for him, from William Duke of Apulia) fetcht a courſe about to Venice.

To declare here the difference in Hiſtories, between Blondus, Sabellicus, and the Venetian Chroniclers, with other Writers, concerning the order of this matter, I will over-paſs. In this moſt do agree, that the Pope being at Venice, and required to be ſent of the Venetians to the Emperor, they would not ſend him. Whereupon Fredericus the Emperor ſent thither his Son Otho, with men and ſhips well appointed, charging him not to attempt any thing before his coming. The young man more hardy than circumſpect (joyning with the Venetians) was overcome; and ſo taken, was brought into the City. Hereby the Pope took no ſmall occaſion to work his feats.

The Father, to help the captivity and miſery of his Son, was compelled to ſubmit himſelf to the Pope, and to intreat for peace. So the Emperor coming to Venice (at S. Marks Church, where the Biſhop was, there to take his Abſolution) was bid to kneel down at the Popes feet.

Holy Scripture abuſed.

The Pope treading on the Emperors neck.

The proud Pope, ſetting his foot upon the Emperors Neck, ſaid the verſe of the Pſalm, Super aſpidem & baſiliſcum ambulabis, & conculcabis Leonem & Draconem; That is, Thou ſhalt walk upon the Adder and on the Baſilisk, and ſhalt tread down the Lion and the Dragon. To whom the Emperor anſwering again, ſaid, Non tibi ſed Petro; that is, Not to thee but to Peter. The Pope again, Et mihi & Petro; Both to me and to Peter. The Emperor, fearing to give any occaſion of further quarrelling, held his peace, and ſo was abſolved, and peace made between them. The conditions whereof were theſe: Firſt, That he ſhould receive Alexander for the true Pope. Secondly, That he ſhould reſtore again to the Church of Rome all that he had taken away before. And thus the Emperor, obtaining again his Son, departed.

Volateran taken with a contradiction.

Here as I note in divers Writers a great diverſity and variety touching the order of this matter (of whom ſome ſay that the Emperor Campt in Paleſtina before he came to Venice, ſome ſay after) ſo I marvel to ſee in Volateran (ſo great a Favourer of the Pope) ſuch a contradiction; who in his two and twentieth Book ſaith, that Otho the Emperors Son was taken in this Conflict, which was the cauſe of the peace between his Father and the Pope. And in his three and twentieth Book again ſaith, That the Emperor himſelf was taken Priſoner in the ſame battel: and ſo afterwards (peace concluded) took his Journey to Aſia and Paleſtina. This Pope in the time of his Papacy (which continued one and twenty years) kept ſundry Councils both at Turo and at Lateran, where he confirmed the wicked proceedings of Hildebrand, and others his Predeceſſors; as to bind all Orders of the Clergy to the vow of Chaſtity; which were not greatly to be reprehended, if they would define Chaſtity aright. For whoſo liveth not a chaſte life (ſaith he) is not fit to be a Miniſter. But herein lieth an Error full of much blindneſs, and alſo peril, to think that Matrimony immaculate (as S. Paul calleth it) is not Chaſtity, but only a ſingle life, that they eſteem to be a chaſte life.

Concilium Lateranenſ. The clergy bound to the vow of Chaſtity. Papiſts err not ſo much in promiſing Chaſtity, as in defining Chaſtity.

Now for ſo much as our Engliſh Pope holy Martyr called Thomas Becket, happened alſo in the ſame time of this Pope Alexander, let us ſomewhat alſo ſtory of him, ſo far as the matter ſhall ſeem worthy of knowledge, and to ſtand with truth: to the end that the truth thereof being ſifted from all flattery and lyes of ſuch Popiſh Writers as paint out his ſtory, men may the better judge both of him what he was, and alſo of his cauſe.

The Life and Hiſtory of Thomas Becket, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

IF the cauſe make a Martyr (as is ſaid) I ſee not why we ſhould eſteem Thomas Becket to die a Martyr, more than any other whom the Princes Sword doth here temporally puniſh for their temporal deſerts. To die for the Church I grant is a glorious matter. But the Church (as it is a Spiritual and not a Temporal Church) ſo it ſtandeth upon Cauſes ſpiritual, and upon an heavenly Foundation, as upon Faith, Religion, true Doctrine, ſincere Diſcipline, Obedience to Gods Commandments; and not upon things pertaining to this World, as Poſſeſſions, Liberties, Exemptions, Priviledges, Dignities, Patrimonies, and Superiorities. If theſe be given to the Church, I pray God Church-men may uſe them well; but if they be not given, the Church cannot claim them; or if they be taken away, that ſtandeth in the Princes Power. To contend with Princes for the ſame, it is no matter (in my mind) material to make a Martyr, but rather a Rebellion againſt them to whom we owe ſubjection. Therefore as I ſuppoſe

Becket no Martyr.

Thomas Becket to be far from the cauſe and title of a Martyr (neither can he be excuſed from a plain Rebel againſt his Prince) ſo yet would I have wiſhed again the Law rather publickly to have found out his fault, than the Swords of men (not bidden nor ſent) to have ſmitten him, having no ſpecial Commandment either of the Prince, or of the Law ſo to do. For though the indignation of the Prince (as the wiſe Prince ſaith) is death, yet it is not for every private perſon ſtraightways to revenge the ſecret indignation of his Prince, except he be publickly authorized thereunto. And this had been (as I ſuppoſe) the better way, the Laws firſt to have executed their Juſtice upon him. Certes, it had been the ſafeſt way for the King, as it proved after; who had juſt matter enough, if he had proſecuted his Cauſe againſt him. And alſo thereby his death had been without all ſuſpition of Martyrdom, neither had there followed that ſhrining and fainting of him as there did. Albeit the ſecret Providence of God which governeth all things, did ſee this way perceaſe to be beſt, and moſt neceſſary for thoſe days. And doubtleſs (to ſay here what I think, and yet to ſpeak nothing againſt Charity) if the Emperors had done the like to the Popes contending againſt them, what time they had taken them Priſoners, that is, if they had uſed the Law of the Sword againſt them, and chopped off the heads of one or two, according to their trayterous Rebellion, they had broken the neck of much diſturbance, which long time after did trouble the Church. But for lack of that, becauſe Emperors having the Sword, and the truth on their ſide, would not uſe their Sword; but ſtanding in awe of the Popes vain curſe, and reverencing his Seat for S. Peters ſake, durſt not lay hand upon him, though he were never ſo abominable and trayterous a Malefactor; the Popes perceiving that took ſo much upon them, not as the Scripture would give, but as much as the ſuperſtitious fear of Emperors and Kings would ſuffer them to take; which was ſo much, that it paſt all order, rule, and meaſure; and all becauſe the Superior Powers either would not, or durſt not practiſe the Authority given unto them of the Lord, upon thoſe Inferiors, but ſuffered them to be their Maſters.

But as touching Thomas Becker, whatſoever is to be thought of them that did the act, the example thereof yet bringeth this profit with it, to teach all Romiſh Prelates not to be ſo ſtubborn (in ſuch matters not pertaining unto them) againſt their Prince, unto whom God hath ſubjected them.

Now to the ſtory, which if it be true that is ſet forth in Quadrilogo, by thoſe four, who took upon them to expreſs the life and proceſs of Thomas Becket, it appeareth by all conjectures, that he was a man of a ſtout nature, ſevere, and inflexible. What perſwaſion or opinion he had once conceived, from that he would in no wiſe be removed, or very hardly. Threatnings and flattering were to him both one; in this point ſingular, following no mans counſel ſo much as his own. Great helps of nature there were in him (if he could have uſed them well) rather than of learning; albeit ſomewhat skilful he was of the Civil Law, which he ſtudied at Bonony; in memory excellent good, and alſo well broken in courtly and worldly matters. Beſides this, he was of a chaſte and ſtrait life, if the Hiſtories be true; although in the firſt part of his life (being yet Archdeacon of Canterbury, and after Lord Chancellor) he was very civil, courtly, pleaſant, given much both to hunting and hawking, according to the guiſe of the Court; and highly favoured he was of his Prince, who not only had thus promoted him, but alſo had committed his Son and heir to his Inſtitution and Governance. But in this his firſt beginning he was not ſo well beloved, but afterward he was again as much hated (and deſervedly) both of the King, and alſo of the moſt part of his Subjects, ſave only of certain Monks and Prieſts, and ſuch others as were perſwaded by them, who magnified him not a little for upholding the Liberties of the Church; that is, the licentious life and exceſs of Church-men. Amongſt all others, theſe Vices he had moſt notable, and to be rebuked; full of devotion, but without all true Religion; zealous, but clean without knowledge. And therefore as he was ſtiff and ſtubborn of nature, ſo (a blind Conſcience being joyned withall) it turned to plain Rebellion. So ſuperſtitious he was to the Obedience of the Pope, that he forgot his Obedience to his natural and moſt beneficial King: and in maintaning (ſo contentiouſly) the vain Conſtitutions and Decrees of men, he neglected the Commandments of God. But herein moſt of all to be reprehended, that not only (contrary to the Kings knowledge) he ſought to convey himſelf out of the Realm (being in that place and calling) but alſo being out of the Realm ſet matter of Diſcord between the Pope and his King, and alſo between the French King and him, contrary to all honeſty, good order, natural ſubjection, and true Chriſtianity. Whereupon followed no little diſquietneſs after to the King, and damage to the Realm, as here (in proceſs and order following, by the Grace of Chriſt) we will declare; firſt beginning with the firſt riſing up of him, and ſo conſequently proſecuting in order his ſtory, as followeth:

The life of Thomas Becket. Polydorus miſtaketh the mother of Becket. Ex Roberto Crikeladenſi. Ex Florilego.

And firſt here to omit the Progeny of him and of his Mother named Roſe, whom Polyd. Virgilius falſly nameth to be a Saracen, when indeed ſhe came out of the parts bordering near to Normandy; to omit alſo the fabulous Viſion of his Mother, mentioned in Roberto Crikeladenſi, of a burning Torch iſſuing out of her body, and reaching up to Heaven: his firſt preferment was to the Church of Branfield, which he had by the gift of S. Albans. After that, he entred into the Service of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by whom he was then preferred to be his Archdeacon; and after by the ſaid Theobald was put (as a man meet for his purpoſe) to King Henry to bridle the young King, that he ſhould not be fierce againſt the Clergy; whom in proceſs of time the King made Lord Chancellor, and then he left playing the Archdeacon, and began to play the Chancellor. He faſhioned his conditions like to the Kings both in weighty matters and trifles; he would hunt with him, and watch the time when the King dined and ſlept. Furthermore, he began to love the merry jeſtings of the Court, to delight himſelf with the great laud of men, and praiſe of the people. And that I may paſs over his Houſholdſtuff, he had his Bridle of ſilver, and the boſſes of his Bridle were worth a great treaſure. At his Table and in other Expences he paſſed any Earl: ſo that on the one ſide men judged him little to conſider the Office of an Archdeacon; and on the other ſide they judged him to uſe wicked doings. He played alſo the good Souldier under the King in Gaſcoigne, and both won and kept Towns. When the King ſent Thomas being Chancellor home into England (Ambaſſador with other Nobles, after the death of the Archbiſhop) he willed Richard Lucy one of the chieſeſt) to commend in his name this Thomas to the Covent of Canterbury, that they might chooſe him Archbiſhop, which thing he did diligently. The Monks ſaid, It was not meet to chooſe a Courtier and a Souldier to be Head of ſo holy a Company; for he would ſpend (ſaid they) all that they had. Others had this ſurmiſe alſo, becauſe he was in ſo great favour with the Prince the Kings Son, and was ſo ſuddenly diſcharged of the Chancellorſhip which he had born five years: in the four and fortieth year of his age (on Saturday in Whitſonweek) he was made Prieſt, and the next day conſecrated Biſhop.

Difference in Chronicles.

As touching the Prieſthood of this man, I find the Hiſtories to vary in themſelves: for if he were beneficed, and Chaplain to Theobald, and afterwards Archdeacon (as ſome ſay) it is no other like, but that he was Prieſt before, and not (as our moſt Engliſh ſtories ſay) made Prieſt in one day, and Archbiſhop the next.

But howſoever this matter paſſeth, here is in the mean time to be ſeen, what great benefits the King had done for him, and what great love had been between them both. Now after that Becket was thus promoted, what variance and diſcord happened between them, remaineth to be ſhewed: the cauſes of which variance were divers and ſundry.

The cauſes of variance recited between the King and the Archbiſhop.

As firſt, when (according to the cuſtom) the Kings Officers gathered of every one Hide-money through the Realm, for the defence of their own Country, the King would have taken it to his Coffers. But the Biſhop ſaid, That which every man gave willingly, he ſhould not count as his proper rent.

Another cauſe was, that where a Prieſt was accuſed of Murder, and the Kings Officers and the Friends of the dead accuſed the Prieſt earneſtly before the Biſhop of Salisbury his Dioceſan to whom he was ſent, deſiring juſtice to be done on him, the Prieſt was put to his purgation.

gation. But when he was not able to defend himſelf, the Biſhop ſent to the Archbiſhop to aſk what he ſhould do. The Archbiſhop commanded he ſhould be deprived of all Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, and ſhut up in an Abbey to do perpetual Penance. After the ſame ſort were divers others handled for like cauſes, but none put to death, nor loſt joynt, nor burned in the hand, or put to the like pain.

The third cauſe was, that, where a Canon of Bruis did revile the Kings Juſtices, the King was offended with the whole Clergy. For theſe and ſuch like, the Archbiſhop (to pacifie the Kings anſwer) commanded the Canon to be whipped and deprived of his benefices for certain years. But the King was not content with this gentle puniſhment, becauſe it rather increaſed their boldneſs, and therefore he called the Archbiſhop, Biſhops, and all the Clergy to aſſemble at Weſtminſter. When they were aſſembled together; the King earneſtly commanded that ſuch wicked Clerks ſhould have no privilege of their Clergy, but be delivered to the Taylor, becauſe they paſſed ſo little of the ſpiritual correction: and this he ſaid alſo their own Canons and Laws had decreed. The Archbiſhop, counſelling with his Biſhops and learned men, anſwered probably: and in the end he deſired heartily the Kings gentleneſs (for the quietneſs of himſelf and his Realm) that under Chriſt our new King, and under the new Law of Chriſt he would bring in no new kind of puniſhment into his Realm (upon the new choſen people of the Lord) againſt the old Decrees of the holy Fathers; and oft he ſaid, That he neither ought nor could ſuffer it. The King moved therewith (and not without cauſe) alledgeth again and exacteth the old Laws and Cuſtoms of his Grandfather, obſerved and agreed upon by Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Prelates, and other priviledged Perſons, inquiring likewiſe of him whether he would agree to the ſame, or elſe now (in his Reign) would condemn that which in the Reign of his Grandfather was well allowed? To which Laws and Cuſtoms the ſaid Thomas did partly grant, and partly not grant. The Copy of the which foreſaid Laws are contained in the number of eight and twenty or nine twenty, whereof I thought here to recite certain not unworthy to be known.

The Copy of the old Laws and Cuſtoms whereunto Thomas Becket did grant.

The Kings cuſtom. 1 That no Order ſhould be given to Husbandmens Children and Bondmens Children, without the aſſent or Teſtimonial of them, which be the Lords of the Country where they were born and brought up: and if their Sons become Clerks, they ſhall not receive the Order of Prieſthood without licence of their Lords.

Out of an Engliſh Chronicle as it appeareth, drawn out of French by Earl Rivers, Lord Scales. 2. And if a man of holy Church hold any lay fee in his hand, he ſhall do therefore the King the ſervice that belongeth thereto, as upon Juries, Aſſiſe of Lands and Judgments, ſaving only at execution doing of death.

3. If any man were the Kings Traytor, and had taken the Church, that it ſhould be lawful for the King and his Officers to take him out.

4. And if any Felons goods were brought to holy Church, that there ſhould none ſuch keep there; for every Felons goods be the Kings.

5. That no Land ſhould be given to the Church, or to any Houſe of Religion, without the Kings Licence.

Theſe Articles following, Thomas agreed not unto.

1. IF that between a Clerk and a Lay-man were any ſtriving for Church-goods, they would the Plea ſhould be done in the Kings Court.

2. That there ſhould neither Biſhop nor Clerk go out of the Land without the Kings Licence, and then he ſhould ſwear upon a Book he ſhould procure no hurt againſt the King, nor none of his.

3. If any man were denounced accurſed, and were come again to amendment, the King would not that he ſhould be ſworn, but only find Sureties to ſtand to that, that holy Church ſhould award.

4. The fourth, that no man, that held of the King in chief, or in Service, ſhould be accurſed without the Kings Licence.

5. That all the Biſhopricks and Abbies, that were vacant, ſhould be in the Kings hands, until ſuch time that he ſhould chooſe a Prelate thereto, and he ſhould be choſen out of the Kings Chappels; and firſt before he were confirmed, he ſhould do his Homage to the King.

6. If any Plea were brought to the Conſiſtory, they ſhould appeal from thence to the Archdeacon, and from thence to the Biſhops Court, and from the Biſhops Court to the Archbiſhops, and from thence to the King, and no further. So that in concluſion, the Complaints of holy Church muſt come before the King, and not the Pope.

7. That debts, that were owing through troth plight, ſhould not be pleaded in Spiritual, but in Temporal Courts.

8. That the Peter-pence, which to the Pope were gathered, ſhould be taken to the King.

9. If any Clerk for Felony were taken and ſo proved, he ſhould be firſt degraded, and then through Judgment be hanged, or if he were a Traytor, be drawn.

Other Laws and Conſtitutions made at Clarendon in Normandy, and ſent to England, whereunto Becket and the Pope would not agree, he being then fled out of the Realm.

The Laws of Clarendon. 1. IF any perſon ſhall be found to bring from the Pope, or from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, any writing containing any Indict or Curſe againſt the Realm of England, the ſame man to be apprehended without delay for a Traytor, and Execution to be done upon the ſame.

2. That no Monk nor any Clerk ſhall be permitted to paſs over into England without a Paſport from the King or his Juſtices: who ſo doth the contrary, that man to be attached and impriſoned.

3. No man to be ſo bold once to appeal to the Pope, or to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury out of England.

4. That no Decree or Commandment proceeding from the Authority of the Pope, or the Biſhop of Canterbury, be received into England, under pain of taking and impriſoning.

5. In general, to forbid any man to carry over any Commandment or Precept, either of Clerk, or lay-man, to the Pope, or to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, under pain of Impriſonment.

6. If any Biſhop, Clerk, Abbot, or Lay-man ſhall do contrary to this Inhibition, or will keep the Sentence of interdicting, the ſame incontinent to be thruſt out of the Land, with all their kindred, and to leave all their goods behind them.

7. All the Poſſeſſions, Goods and Chattels of ſuch as favour the Pope or the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be ſeized and confiſcate for the King.

8. All ſuch of the Clergy as be out of the Realm, having their Rents and profits out of the Land, to be ſummoned and warned through every Shire within three months to repair home, or elſe their rents and goods to return to the King.

9. That S. Peters-pence ſhould be no more paid to the Apoſtolical See, but to be reſerved diligently in the Kings Coffers, and there to be at his Commandment. Atque hæc ex Quadrilogo.

10. That the Biſhops of Salisbury and Norwich be at the Kings mercy, and be ſummoned by the Sheriff, and Bedels, that they before the Kings Juſtices do right to the King and his Juſtices, becauſe (contrary to the Statutes of Clarendon) by Commandment they interdicted the land of Earl Hugh, and publiſhed the ſame in their Dioceſs without Licence of the Kings Juſtices.

¶ By theſe and ſuch other Laws and Decrees it may appear, that the aboliſhing of the Pope is no new thing in the Realm of England. This only difference there is, that the Pope being driven out then, could not be kept out ſo long as now he is. The cauſe is, that the time was not yet come that Antichriſt ſhould ſo fully be revealed; neither was his wickedneſs then ſo fully ripe in thoſe days, as it hath been now in our time. Now theſe premiſed, let us return where we left, to the matter between the King and Thomas Becket.

The Communication and Controverſie between the King and Thomas Becket, with his Clergy.

THe King (as is aforeſaid) conventing his Nobles and Clerks together, required to have the puniſhment of certain miſ-doers of the Clergy; but Thomas Becket not aſſenting thereunto, the King came to this point, to know whether he would conſent with his Clergy, that the cuſtoms then ſet forth in the Realm (meaning the firſt part of thoſe Decrees above ſpecified) ſhould be obſerved. To which the Archbiſhop, conſulting together with his Brethren, giveth anſwer again, That he was contented the Kings Ordinances ſhould be obſerved, adding this withall, Salvo ordine ſuo; that is, Saving his order. And ſo in like manner all the other Biſhops after, being demanded in order, anſwered with the ſame addition, Salvo ordine ſuo. Only Hilarius Biſhop of Chicheſter, perceiving the King to be exaſperate with that addition, in ſtead of Salvo ordine, agreed to obſerve them Bona fide. The King hearing them not ſimply to agree unto him, but with an exception, was mightily offended; who then turning to the Archbiſhop and the Prelates, ſaid, That he was not well contented with that Clauſe of theirs, Salvo ſuo ordine, which he ſaid was captious and deceitful, having ſome manner of venome lurking under it; and therefore required an abſolute Grant of them, without any exception, to agree to the Kings Ordinances. To this the Archbiſhop anſwered again, That they had ſworn unto him their fidelity, both life, body, and earthly honour, Salvo ordine ſuo; and that in the ſame earthly honour alſo thoſe Ordinances were comprehended, and to the obſerving of them they would bind themſelves after no other form, but as they had ſworn before. The King with this was moved, and all his Nobility not a little. As for the other Biſhops, there was no doubt but they would eaſily have relented, had not the ſtoutneſs of the Archbiſhop made them more conſtant than otherwiſe they would have been. The day being well ſpent, the King (when he could get no other anſwer of them) departed in great anger, giving no word of ſalutation to the Biſhops, and likewiſe the Biſhops every one to his own houſe departed. The Biſhop of Chicheſter (amongſt the reſt) was greatly rebuked of his Fellows for changing the exception contrary to the voice of all the others. The next day following, the King took from the Archbiſhop all ſuch Honours and Lordſhips, as he had given him before in the time that he was Chancellor; whereby appeared the great diſpleaſure of the King againſt him and the Clergy. Not long after this, the King removing from London (unknown to the Biſhops) ſailed over to Normandy, whither the Biſhop of London called Gilbert (not long after) reſorted to crave the Kings Favour, and gave him counſel withall to joyn ſome of the Biſhops on his ſide; leſt if all were againſt him, peradventure he might ſooner be overthrown. And thus the greateſt number of the Biſhops were by this means reconciled again to the King; only the Archbiſhop with a few others remained in their ſtoutneſs ſtill. The King (thinking to try all manner of ways) when he ſaw no fear nor threats could turn him, did aſſay him with gentleneſs; it would not ſerve. Many of the Nobles laboured betwixt them both, exhorting him to relent to the King; it would not be. Likewiſe the Archbiſhop of York with divers other Biſhops and Abbots, eſpecially the Biſhop of Cheſter, did the ſame. Beſides this, his own Houſhold daily called upon him, but no man could perſwade him. At length underſtanding partly by them that came to him what danger might happen not only to himſelf, but to all the other Clergy upon the Kings diſpleaſure: partly conſidering the old love and kindneſs of the King towards him in time paſt, he was content to give over to the Kings requeſt, and came to Oxford to him, reconciling himſelf about the addition, which diſpleaſed the King ſo much. Whereupon the King being ſomewhat mitigated, receiveth him with a more chearful countenance, but yet not ſo familiarly as before, ſaying, That he would have his Ordinances and Proceedings after the form confirmed in the publick Audience and open ſight of all his Biſhops and all his Nobles. After this, the King (being at Clarendon) there called all his Peers and Prelates before him, requiring to have all that performed, which they had promiſed, in conſenting to the obſerving of his Grandfathers Ordinances and Proceedings. The Archbiſhop ſuſpecting I cannot tell what in the Kings promiſe, drew backward, and now would not that he would before; at laſt with much ado he was inforced to give aſſent. Firſt, came to him the Biſhop of Salisbury and of Norwich, who (for old matters indangered to the King long before) came weeping and lamenting to the Archbiſhop, deſiring him to have ſome compaſſion of them, and to remit this pertinacy to the King, leſt if he ſo continued (through his ſtoutneſs to exaſperate the Kings diſpleaſure) happily it might redound to no ſmaller danger, not only of them which were in jeopardy already, but alſo of himſelf to be impriſoned, and the whole Clergy to be indangered. Beſides theſe two Biſhops, there went to him other two noble Peers of the Realm, labouring with him to relent and condeſcend to the Kings deſire: if not, they ſhould be inforced to uſe ſuch violence, as neither would ſtand with the Kings fame, and much leſs with his quietneſs; but yet the ſtout ſtomach of the man would not give over. After this came to him two Rulers of the Temple called Templars, one Richard de Huſt, another Coſtans de Heverio with their Company lamenting and bewailing the great peril, which they declared unto him to hang over his head: yet neither with their tears, nor with their kneelings would he be removed. At length came the laſt Meſſage from the King, ſignifying unto him with expreſs words, and alſo with tears, what he ſhould truſt to, if he would not give over to the Kings Requeſt.

By reaſon of which Meſſage, he either terrified, or elſe perſwaded, was content to ſubmit himſelf. Whereupon the King incontinent aſſembling the States together, the Archbiſhop firſt before all others beginneth to promiſe the King Obedience, and ſubmiſſion unto his cuſtom, and that Cum bona fide, leaving out his former addition, Salvo ordine, mentioned before: inſtead whereof he promiſed in verbo veritatis, to obſerve and keep the Kings Cuſtoms, and ſwear to the ſame. After him the other Biſhops likewiſe gave the like Oath; whereupon the King commanded incontinent certain Inſtruments obligatory to be drawn, of the which the King ſhould have the one, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury another, the Archbiſhop of York the third, requiring alſo the ſaid Archbiſhop to ſet to his Hand and Seal. To the which the Archbiſhop (though not denying but that he was ready ſo to do) yet deſired reſpit in the matter, while that he (being but newly come to his Biſhoprick) might better peruſe with himſelf the foreſaid Cuſtoms and Ordinances of the King. This requeſt as it ſeemed but reaſonable, ſo it was lightly granted; ſo the day being well ſpent, they departed for that ſeaſon and brake up.

Alanus, one of the four Writers of the life of this Thomas Becket, recordeth, That the Archbiſhop in his Voyage towards Wincheſter, began greatly to repent that he had done before, partly through the inſtigation of certain about him, but chiefly of his Croſs-bearer, who, going before the Archbiſhop, ſharply and earneſtly expoſtulated with him for giving over to the Kings requeſt, againſt the Priviledge and Liberties of the Church, polluting not only his fame and conſcience, but alſo giving a pernicious example to them that ſhould come after, with many like words. To make the matter ſhort, the Archbiſhop was ſo touched upon the ſame with ſuch repentance, that keeping himſelf from all company, lamenting with tears, with faſting, and with much penance macerating and afflicting himſelf, he did ſuſpend himſelf from all Divine Service, and would not receive comfort, before that (word being ſent to his holy Grandfather the Pope) he ſhould be abſoiled of him, who, tendring the tears of his dear chicken, directed to him Letters again by the ſame Meſſenger which Thomas had ſent up to him before. In which Letters not only he abſoiled him from his Treſpaſs, but alſo with words of great conſolation did incourage him to be ſtout in the quarrel he took in hand. The Copy of which Letters conſolatory, ſent from the Pope to Biſhop Becket, here followeth under written.

A Letter of Pope Alexander to Thomas Becket.

Maſs, and to abſtain from the Conſecration of the Body and Blood of the Lord; which thing to do, how dangerous it is (eſpecially in ſuch a Perſonage) and alſo what inconvenience may riſe thereof, I will you adviſedly to conſider, and diſcreetly alſo to ponder. Your wiſdom ought not to forget what difference there is between them which adviſedly and willingly do offend, and thoſe which through ignorance and for neceſſity ſake do offend. For as you read, ſo much the greater is wilful ſin, as the ſame not being voluntary is a leſſer ſin. Therefore if you remember your ſelf to have done any thing that your own conſcience doth accuſe you of, whatſoever it be, we counſel you (as a prudent and wiſe Prelate) to acknowledge the ſame. Which thing done, the merciful and pitiful God, who hath more reſpect to the heart of the doer than to the thing done, will remit and forgive you the ſame according to his accuſtomed great mercy. And we truſting in the merits of the bleſſed Apoſtles S. Peter and Paul do abſolve you from the offence committed, and by the Authority Apoſtolical we releaſe you unto your fraternity, counſelling you and commanding you, that henceforth you abſtain not (for this cauſe) from the celebration of the Maſs.

This Letter, with others more after the like ſort, the Pope then wrote to him, animating and comforting him in this quarrel ſo nearly pertaining to the Popes profit. By the occaſion whereof, Becket took no ſmall heart and conſolation: inſomuch that thereof ſeemeth to me to proceed all the occaſion that made him ſo ſtout and malepert againſt his Prince, as hereafter followeth to be ſeen by his doings. What the other Letters were that the Pope wrote unto him, ſhortly after (when we come to the Appellations made to the Pope) ſhall appear God willing. In the mean ſeaſon (as he ſat thus mourning at home) the King hearing of him, and how he denied to ſet his Seal to thoſe Sanctions, which he condeſcended to before, took no ſmall diſpleaſure againſt him: inſomuch that he (threatning to him and his baniſhment and death) began to call him to reckonings, and to burthen him with payments, that all men might underſtand that the Kings mind was ſore ſet againſt him. The Archbiſhop hereupon (whether more for the love of the Pope, or dread of his Prince) thought to make an eſcape out of the Realm, and ſo went about in the night (with two or three with him ſtealing out of his houſe) to take the Sea privily. Now amongſt others the Kings Ordinances and Sanctions, this was one, That none of the Prelacy or Nobility without the Kings Licence (or of his Juſtices) ſhould depart out of the Realm. So Becket twice attempted the Sea to flee to the See of Rome; but the weather not ſerving, he was driven home again, and his device for that time fruſtrated. After his departure began to be known and noiſed abroad, the Kings Officers came to Canterbury to ſeize upon his goods in the Kings behalf. But as it chanced, the night before their coming, Becket being returned, and found at home, they did not proceed in their purpoſe.

Becket enterpriſeth againſt the Kings Laws to fly out of the Realm.

Becket taunted of the King.

Upon this, the Archbiſhop (underſtanding the King ſore bent againſt him, and the Seas not to ſerve him) made haſte to the Court, lying then at Woodſtock; where the King received him (after a certain manner) but nothing ſo familiarly as he was wont, taunting him jeſtingly and merrily, as though one Realm were not able to hold them both. Becket (although he was permitted to go and come at his pleaſure to the Court) yet could not obtain the favour that he would, perceiving both in himſelf, and confeſſing no leſs to others, how the matter would fall out, ſo that either he ſhould be conſtrained to give over with ſhame, or ſtoutly ſtand to that which he had ſo boldly taken in hand. The Archbiſhop of York in the mean time (going betwixt the King and the Archbiſhop) laboured to make a peace and love betwixt them; but the King in no caſe would be reconciled, unleſs the other would ſubſcribe to his Laws. So the while, neither the King would otherwiſe agree, nor yet the Archbiſhop in any wiſe would ſubſcribe, there was a foul diſcord; where the fault was, let the Reader here judge between them both. The King for his regal authority thought it much that any Subject of his ſhould ſtand againſt him. The Archbiſhop again (bearing himſelf bold upon the authority, and eſpecially upon the Letters of the Pope lately written to him) thought him ſtrong enough againſt the King and all his Realm. Again ſuch was his quarrel for the maintenance of liberties and glory of the Church, that he could lack no ſetters on and favourers in that behalf, in ſo ſweet a cauſe amongſt the Clergy. Wherefore the Archbiſhop (truſting to theſe things) would give no place, but by vertue of his Apoſtolical Authority gave cenſure upon theſe Laws and Conſtitutions of the King, condemning ſome, and otherſome approving for good and Catholick, as is before declared. Beſides this, there came alſo to the King Rotrodus Archbiſhop of Rothomage (ſent from the Pope) to make peace between the King and Canterbury: whereunto the King was well content, ſo that the Pope would agree to ratifie his Ordinances. But when that could in no wiſe be obtained at the Popes hands, then the King being ſtopped and fruſtrate of his purpoſe by reaſon of Beckets Apoſtolick Legacy (being Legatus a latere) thought good to ſend up to the Pope, and ſo did, to obtain of him, that the ſame Authority of the Apoſtolick Legacy might be conferred to another after his appointment, which was the Archbiſhop of York: but the Pope denied. Notwithſtanding at the requeſt of the Kings Clergy, the Pope was content that the King ſhould be Legate himſelf; whereat the King took great indignation (as Hoveden writeth) ſo that he ſent the Pope his Letters again. Here the Pope was perplexed on both ſides.

Ex Rogero Hoved. pri. parte Hiſtoria continuatæ poſt Bedam.

The King to be the Popes Legate.

If he ſhould have denied the King, that was too hot for him: for the Pope uſeth always to hold in with Kings howſoever the world ſpeedeth. Again, if he ſhould have forſaken ſuch a Churchly Chaplain (the cauſe being ſo ſweet and ſo gainful) that ſhould have been againſt himſelf. What did he then? Here now cometh in the old practiſe of Popiſh Prelacy, to play with both hands: privily he conſpireth with the one, and openly diſſembleth with the other. Firſt he granted to the Kings Ambaſſadors their requeſt, to have the Legate removed, and to place in that Office the Archbiſhop of York, to his own contentation; and yet notwithſtanding (to render the cauſe of Thomas Becket) he addeth this promiſe withall, that the ſaid Becket ſhould receive no harm or damage thereby. Thus the Pope craftily conveying the matter between them both, gladly to further the Archbiſhop for his own advantage, and yet loath to deny the King for diſpleaſure, writeth to the King openly, and alſo ſecretly directeth another Letter to Becket: the contents whereof here follow.

The crafty diſſimulation of the Pope.

Alexander the Pope, to Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Although we, condeſcending to the Kings Requeſt, have granted the gift of our Legacy after his mind from you: yet let not your mind thereby be diſcomforted, nor brought into ſighs of deſpair. For before that we had granted that, or gave our conſent thereunto, the Kings Ambaſſadors firmly promiſed in the word of truth (ready alſo to be ſworn upon the ſame, if I would ſo have required) that their Letters alſo which he had obtained, ſhould not be delivered to the Archbiſhop of York without our knowledge and conſent therein. This is certain, and ſo perſwade your ſelf boldly without any ſcruple, doubt or miſtruſt, that it was never my mind or purpoſe, nor ever ſhall be (God willing) to ſubdue you or your Church under the obedience of any perſon, to be ſubject to any, ſave only to the Biſhop of Rome. And therefore we warn you and charge you, that if you ſhall perceive the King to deliver theſe foreſaid Letters, which we truſt he will not attempt without our knowledge to do; forthwith by ſome truſty Meſſengers or by your Letters you will give us knowledge thereof: whereby we may provide upon the ſame both for your perſon, your Church, and alſo your City committed to you, to be clearly exempt by our Authority Apoſtolical, from all power and juriſdiction of any Legacy.

The Popes ſecret Letters to Becket.

Upon theſe Letters and ſuch others (as is ſaid before) Becket ſeemed to take all his boldneſs to be ſo ſtout and ſturdy againſt his Prince, as he was. The Pope (beſide theſe) ſent ſecretly a Chaplain of his, and directed another Letter alſo unto the King, granting and permitting at his requeſt, to make the Archbiſhop of York Legate Apoſtolical.

The

The King (after he had received his Letters ſent from the Pope) began to put more ſtrength to his purpoſed proceedings againſt the Archbiſhop, firſt beginning with the Inferiors of the Clergy, ſuch as were Offendors againſt his Laws: as Felons, Robbers, Quarrellers, Breakers of peace, and eſpecially ſuch as had committed Homicide and Murthers, whereof more than an hundred at that time were proved upon the Clergy (as witneſſeth Guliel. Neuburgenſis, in his Book De geſtis Anglorum, lib. 2. cap. 16.) urging and conſtraining them to be arraigned after the order of the Law Temporal, and juſtice to be miniſtred to them according to their deſerts: as firſt to be deprived, and ſo to be committed to the ſecular hands. This ſeemed to Becket to derogate from the liberties of holy Church, that the ſecular Power ſhould paſs in Cauſes Criminal, or ſit in Judgment againſt any Eccleſiaſtical perſon. This Law, the Roiſters (then of the Clergy) had picked and forged out of Anacletus and Euariſtus, by whoſe falſly alledged and pretenſed Authority, they have deduced this their Conſtitution from the Apoſtles, which giveth immunity to all Eccleſiaſtical perſons to be free from Secular Jurisdiction. Becket therefore, like a valiant Champion (fighting for his Liberties, and having the Pope on his ſide) would not permit his Clerks infamed otherwiſe, to be convented, than before Eccleſiaſtical Judges, there to be examined and deprived for their exceſs, and no ſecular Judge to proceed againſt them: ſo that after their deprivation, if they ſhould incur the like offence again, then the Temporal Judge to take hold upon them, otherwiſe not. This obſtinate and ſtubborn rebellion of the Archbiſhop ſtirred up much anger and vexation in the King, and not only in him, but alſo in the Nobles and all the Biſhops (for the greater part) that almoſt he was alone a wonderment to all the Realm.

More than an hundred murthers done by the Clergy.

Guliel. Neuburg. lib. 2. cap. 16.

Becket cited to Northampton.

The Kings wrath daily increaſed more and more againſt him (as no marvel it was) and cauſed him to be cited up to appear by a certain day at the Town of Northampton, there to make anſwer to ſuch things as ſhould be laid to his charge. So when the day was come (all the Peers and Nobles, with the Prelates of the Realm upon the Kings Proclamation being aſſembled in the Caſtle of Northampton) great fault was found with the Archbiſhop for that he (perſonally cited to appear) came not himſelf, but ſent another for him. The cauſe why he came not, Hoveden aſſigneth to be this: for that the King had placed his Horſe and Horſe-men in the Archbiſhops lodging (which was a houſe there of Canons) wherewith he being offended, ſent word again that he would not appear, unleſs his lodging were voided of the Kings Horſe-men, &c. Whereupon (by the publick ſentence as well of all the Nobles, as of the Biſhops) all his moveables were adjudged to be confiſcate for the King, unleſs the Kings Clemency would remit the penalty. The ſtubborn Archbiſhop again (for his part) quarrelling againſt the order and form of the Judgment, complaineth, alledging for himſelf (ſeeing he is the Primate, and ſpiritual Father, not only of all other in the Realm, but alſo of the King himſelf) that it was not convenient that the Father ſhould be ſo judged of his Children, nor the Paſtor of his Flock ſo condemned, ſaying moreover, That the Ages to come ſhould know what Judgment was done, &c. But eſpecially he complaineth of his fellow-Biſhops (when they ſhould rather have taken his part) who did ſit in Judgment againſt their Metropolitan. And this was the firſt days action.

The Archbiſhop condemned in the Council of Northampton in the loſs of all moveables.

The next day following, the King laid an action againſt him in the behalf of one that was his Marſhal (called John) for certain injuries done to him, and required of the ſaid Archbiſhop the repaying again of certain money, which he (as is ſaid) had lent unto him being Chancellor, the ſum whereof came to 500 Marks. This money the Archbiſhop denied not but he had received of the King, howbeit by the way and title of Gift as he took it, though he could bring no probation thereof. Whereupon, the King required him to put in aſſurance for the payment thereof: whereat the Archbiſhop making delays (not well contented at the matter) was ſo called upon, that either he ſhould be countable to the King for the money, or elſe he ſhould incur preſent danger, the King being ſo bent againſt him. The Archbiſhop being brought to ſuch a ſtrait, and deſtitute of his own Suffragans, could here by no means have eſcaped, had not five perſons of their own accord ſtepped in, being bound for him, every man for 100 marks a piece. And this was upon the ſecond day concluded.

Becket required to give an account.

The morrow after, which was the third day of the Council, as the Archbiſhop was ſitting below in a certain Conclave with his fellow-Biſhops about him, conſulting together, the doors faſt locked to them, as the King had willed and commanded, it was propounded unto him in the behalf of the King, that he had divers Biſhopricks, and Abbaricks in his hand which were vacant, with the Fruits and Revenues thereof due unto the King for certain years, whereof he had rendred as yet no account to the King: wherfore it was demanded of him to bring in a full and clear reckoning of the ſame. This, with other ſuch like, declared to all the Council, great diſpleaſure to be in the King, and no leſs danger toward the Archbiſhop.

The advice of the Biſhops for Thomas Becket.

THus, while the Biſhops and Prelates were in Council, adviſing and deliberating what was to be done, at length it came to Voices, every man to ſay his mind, and to give ſentence what were the beſt way for their Archbiſhop to take. Firſt began Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, who then took part with Becket ſo much as he durſt for fear of the King, who ſaid, He remembred that the ſaid Archbiſhop, firſt being Archdeacon, and then Lord Chancellor, at what time as he was promoted to the Church of Canterbury, was diſcharged from all bonds and reckonings of the Temporal Court, as all the other Biſhops could not but bear record to the ſame.

The verdict of Wincheſter.

Next ſpake Gilbert, Biſhop of London, exhorting and motioning the Archbiſhop, that he ſhould call with himſelf to mind from whence the King took him, and ſet him up; what, and how great things he had done for him; alſo that he ſhould conſider with himſelf the dangers and perils of the time, and what ruine he might bring upon the whole Church (and upon them all there preſent) if he reſiſted the Kings mind in the things he required. And if it were to render up his Archbiſhoprick (although it were ten times better than it is) yet he ſhould not ſtick with the King in the matter. In ſo doing it might happen, the King ſeeing that ſubmiſſion and humility in him, would releaſe him peradventure of all the reſt. To this the Archbiſhop anſwering, Well, well (ſaith he) I perceive well enough, my Lord, whither you tend, and whither about you go. Then ſpake Wincheſter, inferring upon the ſame, This form of Counſel (ſaith he) ſeemeth to me very pernicious to the Chatholick Church, tending to our ſubverſion, and to the confuſion of us all. For if our Archbiſhop and Primate of all England do lean to this example, that every Biſhop ſhould give over his Authority and the Charge of the Flock committed to him, at commandment and threatning of the Prince, to what ſtate ſhall the Church be brought then, but that all ſhould be confounded at his pleaſure and arbitrement, and nothing ſhall ſtand certain by any order of Law, and ſo as the Prieſt is, ſo ſhall the people be?

The counſel of the Biſhop of London.

Wincheſter.

Hilary the Biſhop of Chicheſter repleth again to this, ſaying, If it were not that the inſtance and the great perturbation of time did otherwiſe require and force us, I would think this counſel here given were good to be followed. But now ſeeing the Authority of our Canon faileth, and cannot ſerve us, I judge it not beſt to go ſo ſtrictly to work, but ſo to moderate our proceedings, that diſpenſation with ſufferance may win that which ſevere correction may deſtroy. Wherefore my counſel and reaſon is, to give place to the Kings purpoſe for a time, leſt by over haſty proceeding, we exceed ſo far, that both it may redound to our ſhame, and alſo we cannot rid our ſelves out again when we would.

Chicheſter.

Moderate counſel.

Much to the ſame end ſpake Robert the Biſhop of Lincoln after this manner, Seeing (ſaith he) it is manifeſt that the life and blood of this man is ſought, one of theſe two muſt needs be choſen; that either he muſt part with his Archbiſhoprick, or elſe with his life. Now what profit he ſhall take in this matter of his Biſhoprick, his life being loſt, I do not greatly ſee.

Next followed Bartholomew Biſhop of Exceſter with his his advice, who inclining his Council to the ſtate of the time, confirmed their ſayings before, affirming how the days were evil and perillous; and if they might ſo eſcape the violence of that raging tempeſt under the cover of bearing and relenting, it were not to be refuſed. But that, he ſaid, could not be, except ſtrict ſeverity ſhould give place to tractability; and ſo the inſtance and condition of time then preſent required no leſs, eſpecially ſeeing that Perſecution was not general, but perſonal and particular; and thought it more holy and convenient, one head to run into ſome part of danger, than the whole Church of England to be ſubject and expoſed to inconvenience inevitable.

The Anſwer of Roger Biſhop of Worceſter was deviſed in a double diſpence, neither affirming the one, nor denying the other, whoſe ſaying was this, That he would give anſwer on neither part; for if I (ſaith he) ſhould ſay that the Paſtoral Function and Cure of Souls ought to be relinquiſhed at the Kings will or threatning, then my mouth ſhall ſpeak againſt my conſcience to the condemnation of mine own head. And if I ſhall give again contrary counſel to reſiſt the Kings Sentence, here be they that will hear it, and report it to his Grace, and ſo I ſhall be in danger to be thruſt out of the Synagogue, and for my part to be accounted amongſt the publick Rebels, with them to be condemned: wherefore neither do I ſay this, nor counſel that.

Becket the Archbiſhop replieth againſt the Biſhops.

And this was the Conſultation of the Biſhops in that place, aſſembled together by the Kings Commandment. Againſt theſe Voices and Cenſures of the Biſhops, Becket the Archbiſhop replieth again, expoſtulating and checking them with rebukeful words, I perceive (ſaith he) and underſtand ye go about to maintain and cheriſh but your own cowardlineſs under the colourable ſhadow of ſufferance: and under pretence of diſſembling ſoftneſs to choak the Liberty of Chriſts Church. Who hath thus bewitched you, O unſatiable Biſhops? What mean ye? Why do ye ſo, under the impudent Title of forbearing, bear a double heart, and cloak your manifeſt Iniquity? What call ye this bearing with time, to the detriment of the Church of Chriſt? Let terms ſerve the matter. Why pervert you the matter that is good with vocables and terms untrue? For that ye ſay we muſt bear with the malice of time, I grant with you: but yet we muſt not heap ſin to ſin. Is not God able to help the ſtate and condition of his Church, but with the ſinful diſſimulation of the Teachers of the Church? Certes God is diſpoſed to tempt you. And tell me (I pray you) whether ſhould the Governors of the Church put themſelves to dangers for the Church in time of Tranquility, or in time of Diſtreſs; Ye will be aſhamed to deny the contrary, but in Diſtreſs. And now then (the Church lying in ſo great diſtreſs and vexation) why ſhould not the good Paſtor put himſelf into peril therefore? For neither do I think it a greater Act or merit for the ancient Biſhops of the old time, to lay the Foundation of the Church then with their blood, than now for to ſhed our blood for the Liberties of the ſame. And to tell you plain, I think it not ſafe for you to ſwarve from an Example which you have received of your holy Elders.

A great diſtreſs grown in the Church, becauſe that Biſhops may not be above Kings and Princes.

After theſe things were ſpoken, they ſate all in ſilence a certain ſpace, being locked in together. At length (to find a ſhift to cauſe the door to be opened) I will (ſaith the Archbiſhop) ſpeak with two Earls which are about the King, and named them who they were. Who (being called) opened the door and came in with haſt, thinking to hear ſome thing which ſhould appeaſe the Kings mind. To whom the Archbiſhop ſpake in this manner; As touching and concerning the matters between the King and us, we have here conferred together. And forſomuch as we have them not preſent with us now, which knew more in the matter than we do (whoſe advice we would be glad to follow) therefore we crave ſo much reſpite as till the next day following, and then to give our Anſwer unto the King. With this Meſſage two Biſhops were ſent to the King, which was the Biſhop of London, and the Biſhop of Rocheſter.

London (to help the matter, and to ſet quietneſs, as I take it, adding ſomething more to the Meſſage) ſaid to the King, That the Archbiſhop craved a little delay of time to prepare ſuch writings and inſtruments, wherein he ſhould ſet forth and declare his mind in accompliſhing the Kings deſire, &c. Wherefore two Barons were ſent to him from the King to grant him that reſpit or ſtay; ſo that he would ratifie that which the Meſſengers had ſignified to the King. To which the Archbiſhop anſwereth, That he ſent no Meſſage as was intimate in his name: but only that the next day he would come and give anſwer to the King, in that which he had to ſay. And ſo the Convocation of the Biſhops was diſſolved and diſmiſſed home: ſo that the moſt part of them that came with the Archbiſhop and accompanied him before (for fear of the Kings diſpleaſure) ſevered themſelves from him. The Archbiſhop thus forſaken and deſtitute (as his ſtory ſaith) ſent about for the Poor, the Lame, and the Halt, to come in and furniſh his houſe, ſaying, That by them he might ſooner obtain his Victory, than by the others which had ſo ſlipt from him.

Becket deſtitute and forſaken.

On the next day following, becauſe it was Sunday, nothing was done. So the day after, which was the ſecond Fery, the Archbiſhop was cited to appear. But the night before (being taken with a Diſeaſe called Paſſio iliaca, the Colique) as that day he kept his bed, and was not able, as he ſaid, to riſe. Every man ſuppoſing this to be but a fained ſickneſs, as it ſeemed no leſs, certain of the chief Nobles were ſent to try the matter, and to cite him to the Court: namely, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, and Reginald, Earl of Devonſhire. To whom the Archbiſhop anſwered, That as that day he was ſo diſeaſed, that he could not come, yea, though he were brought in an Horſlitter. So that day paſſed over. The morrow after, certain that were about him, fearing no leſs but that ſome danger would happen to him, gave him counſel in the morning to have a Maſs in the honour of the holy Martyr S. Stephen, to keep him from the hands of his Enemies that day. When the morrow was come (being Tueſday) there came to him the Biſhops and Prelates, counſelling and perſwading him covertly by inſinuation (for apertly they durſt not) that he would ſubmit himſelf with all his goods (as alſo his Archbiſhoprick) to the will of the King, if peradventure his indignation by that means might aſſwage. Adding moreover, that unleſs he would ſo do, perjury would be laid againſt him: for that he being under the oath of fidelity to keep the Kings Laws and Ordinances, now would not obſerve them. To this Becket the Archbiſhop anſwereth again, Brethren, ye ſee and perceive well how the world is ſet againſt me, and how the Enemy riſeth and ſeeketh my confuſion. And although theſe things be dolorous and lamentable, yet the thing that grieveth me moſt of all, is this, The Sons of mine own Mother be pricks and thorns againſt me. And albeit I do hold my peace, yet the Poſterity to come will know and report how cowardly you have turned your backs, and have left your Archbiſhop and Metropolitan alone in his Conflict, and how you have ſitten in Judgment againſt me (although unguilty of Crime) now two days together, and not only in the Civil and Spiritual Court, but alſo in the Temporal Court ready to do the ſame. But in general, this I charge and command (as the vertue of pure Obedience, and in peril of your Order) that ye be preſent perſonally in Judgment againſt me. And that ye ſhall not fail ſo to do, I here appeal to our Mother (the refuge of all ſuch as be oppreſſed) the Church of Rome: and if any ſecular men ſhall lay hands upon me (as it is rumored they will) I ſtraitly injoyn and charge you in the ſame vertue of Obedience, that you exerciſe your Cenſure Eccleſiaſtical upon them, as it becometh you to do for a Father and an Archbiſhop. And this I do you to underſtand, that though the World rage, and the Enemy be fierce, and the Body trembleth (for the fleſh is weak) yet God ſo favouring me, I will neither cowardly ſhrink, nor yet vilely forſake my Flock committed to my Charge, &c.

A Maſs of S. Stephen to ſave him from his Enemies.

Becket's Anſwer to the Biſhops.

Becket appealeth to Rome.

But the Biſhop of London, contrary to this commandment of the Archbiſhop, did incontinent appeal from him. And thus the Biſhops departed from him to the Court, ſave only two, Henry of Wincheſter, and Joceline of Saliſbury, who returned with him ſecretly to his Chamber, and comforted him. This done, the Archbiſhop (which yeſterday was ſo ſore ſick that he could not ſtir out of his bed) now addreſſeth him to his Maſs of S. Stephen with all ſolemnity, as though it had been an high Feſtival-day, with his Metropolitan Pall, which was not uſed but upon the holy day to be worn, &c. The Office of the Maſs began, Sederunt Principes & adverſum

A Maſs to charm away perſecutors.

me loquebantur; that is, Princes ſate and ſpake againſt me, &c. (the Kings ſervants being alſo there and beholding the matter.) For this Maſs Gilbert Biſhop of London accuſed Becket afterward, both for that it was done, Per artem magicam, & in contemptum regis (as the words of Hoveden purport) that is, both by art of magick, and in contempt of the King, &c.

Becket carrieth with him the Sacrament going to the King.

The Maſs being ended, the Archbiſhop (putting off his Pall, his Mitre and other robes) proceedeth to the Kings Court: But yet not truſting, peradventure, ſo greatly to the ſtrength of his Maſs (to make the matter more ſure) he taketh alſo the Sacrament privily about him, thinking himſelf thereby ſufficiently defended againſt all bugs. In going to the Kings chamber (there to attend the Kings coming) as he entred the door, he taketh from Alexander his Croſier, the Croſs with the Croſs Staffe, in the ſight of all that ſtood by, and carrieth it in himſelf, the other Biſhops following him, and ſaying, he did otherwiſe than became him. Amongſt others, Robert Biſhop of Hereford, offered himſelf to bear his Croſs, rather than he ſhould ſo do, for that it was not comely; but the Archbiſhop would not ſuffer him. Then ſaid the Biſhop of London unto him; If the King ſhall ſee you come armed into his chamber, perchance he will draw out his Sword againſt you, which is ſtronger than yours, and then what ſhall this your account profit you? The Archbiſhop anſwereth again; If the Kings Sword do cut carnally, yet my Sword cutteth ſpiritually, and ſtriketh down to Hell. But you, my Lord, as you have plaid the fool in this matter, ſo you will not yet leave off your folly for any thing I can ſee; and ſo he came into the chamber. The King hearing of his coming, and of the manner thereof, tarried not long, but came where Becket was ſet in a place by himſelf with his other Biſhops about him. Firſt, the Cryer called the Prelates and all the Lords of the Temporalty together. That being done (and every one placed in his ſeat according to his degree) the King beginneth with a great complaint againſt the Archbiſhop for his manner of entring into the Court, not as (ſaith he) a ſubject into a Kings Court; but as a Traytor, ſhewing himſelf in ſuch ſort as hath not been ſeen before in any Chriſtian Kings Court, profeſſing Chriſtian faith. To this all there preſent gave witneſs with the King, affirming him always to be a vain and proud Man, and that the ſhame of his fact did not only redound againſt the Prince himſelf, but alſo againſt his whole Realm. Moreover, they ſaid that this had ſo happened to the King, for that he had done ſo much for ſuch a Beaſt, advancing him ſo highly to ſuch a place and room next under himſelf. And ſo all together with one cry, called him Traytor on every ſide, as one that refuſed to give terrene honour to the King, in keeping (as he had Sworn) his Laws and Ordinances, at whoſe hands alſo he had received ſuch honour and great preferments: And therefore he was well worthy (ſaid they) to be handled like a perjured Traytor and Rebel. Whereupon great doubt and fear was what ſhould befall him. The Archbiſhop of York, coming down to his men, ſaid, he could not abide to ſee what the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was like to ſuffer. Likewiſe, the Tipſtaves, and other Miniſters of the aſſembly, coming down with an outcry againſt him, croſſed them to ſee his Haughty ſtubbornneſs, and the buſineſs there was about him. Certain there were of his Diſciples ſitting at his feet, comforting him ſoftly, and bidding him to lay his curſe upon them. Others (contrary) bidding him not to Curſe, but to Pray and forgive them; and if he loſt his life in the quarrel of the Church and the liberty thereof, he ſhould be happy. Afterward, one of them, named Johannes Stephani, deſired to ſpeak ſomething in his ear; but could not be ſuffered by the Kings Marſhal, who forbad that any man ſhould have any talk with him. Then he (becauſe he could not otherwiſe ſpeak to him) wrought by ſigns, making a croſs, and looking up with his Eyes, and wagging his lip, meaning that he ſhould pray, and manfully ſtand to the cauſe. In the mean time cometh to him Bartholomew Biſhop of Exceſter, deſiring him to have regard and compaſſion of himſelf, and alſo of them, or elſe they were all like to periſh for the hatred of him: for there cometh out (ſaith he) a Precept from the King that he ſhall be taken, and ſuffer for an open Rebel, that hereafter taketh your part. It is ſaid moreover that Jocelinus Biſhop of Saliſbury, and William Biſhop of Norwich are to be had to the place of Execution, for their reſiſting and making interceſſion for the Biſhop of Canterbury. When he had thus ſaid, the Archbiſhop (looking upon the ſaid Biſhop of Exceſter) Avoid hence from me, ſaith he, thou underſtandeſt not, neither doſt favour thoſe things that be of God.

Hoveden referreth not this ſaying to the Biſhop of London, but to the Archbiſhop of York.

Becket called Traytor of the King and all his Nobles.

A blind Zeal for the proud liberties of the Church.

Who ſo taketh Becket's part is counted a Rebel.

The Biſhops and Prelates then going aſide by themſelves from the other Nobles, the King ſo permitting them to do, took Council together what was to be done. Here the matter ſtood in a doubtful perplexity, for either muſt they incur the dangerous Indignation of the King, or elſe with the Nobles they muſt proceed in condemnation againſt the Archbiſhop for reſiſting the Kings Sanctions; which thing they themſelves neither did favour. In this ſtrict neceſſity, they, deviſing what way to take, at length agreed upon this; that they with a common aſſent ſhould cite the Archbiſhop to the See of Rome upon perjury: and that they ſhould oblige and bind themſelves to the King with a ſure promiſe, to work their diligence in ordaining the Archbiſhop; upon this condition, that the King ſhould promiſe their ſafety, and diſcharge them from the peril of that judgment which was towards them. So all the Biſhops, obliging themſelves thus to the King, went forth to the Archbiſhop; of whom one ſpeaking for the reſt (which was Hilary Biſhop Chicheſter) had theſe words: Once you have been our Archbiſhop, and ſo long we were bound to your obedience; but now for as much as you, once ſwearing your fidelity to the King, do reſiſt him, neglecting his Injunctions and Ordinances, concerning and appertaining to his Terrene Honour and Dignity; we here pronounce you perjured, neither be we bound to give obedience to an Archbiſhop thus being perjured; but, putting our ſelves and all ours in the Popes Protection, we do cite you up to his preſence. And upon the ſame, they aſſigned him his day and time to appear. The Archbiſhop anſwering again, ſaid, he heard him well enough, and upon this ſendeth up to Rome in all haſte to the Pope, ſignifying to him by Letters, the whole matter, how, and wherefore, and by whom he was cited, To whom the Pope directed again his Letters of comfort (as he had done divers before) the Copy whereof here enſueth.

Becket cited to Rome upon perjury by the Biſhops.

Becket cited to Rome.

Pope Alexander to Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

YOur Brotherly Letters, which you directed to us, and ſuch other matters which your meſſenger by word of mouth hath ſignified unto us, we have diligently heard the reading thereof: and thereby fully underſtand the grievous vexations and dolorous griefs wherewith your mind is daily incumbred: By reaſon whereof, we, hearing and underſtanding, are not a little diſquieted in our Spirit for your ſake: In whoſe Proſperities we do both gladly rejoyce, and no leſs do ſorrow in your adverſities as for our moſt dear Brother. You therefore (as a conſtant and wiſe man) remember with your ſelf that which is written: The Apoſtles departed away (rejoycing) from the face of the Council, &c. With like patience do you alſo ſuſtain that mans moleſtations, and let not your Spirit be troubled therein more than needeth, but receive in your ſelf conſolation: That we alſo together with you may be comforted in the Lord, who hath preſerved you to the corroboration of his Catholique and Chriſtian verity, in this diſtreſs of neceſſity: and from whom alſo it hath pleaſed him to wipe away the blot of ſuch things which have been unorderly of you committed, and here to puniſh the ſame through ſundry afflictions: whereby (in the ſtrict judgment of God) they might not be called to account hereafter. But henceforth let not this much grieve you: neither let your heart be ſo deject or timorous in the matter (for that you are cited up to the Apoſtolick See) which to us is both grateful and accepted. And this we will you, that if they which have cited you ſhall chance to come; draw not you back, but follow the appeal, if you pleaſe, and ſpare not, all doubt and delay ſet apart: for the Authority of the Church, tendering this your conſtancy, may not do that which may put you in fear, or doubt. But our diligence ſhall be, with all labour and ſtudy, to conſerve the Right and Preheminence, God willing of that Church committed to you, ſo much as in us lyeth (ſaving our juſtice and equity) as to one whom, in working for the Church, we find to be both a conſtant and a valiant Champion. Further, this I brotherly require you, to repair unto the Church of Canterbury: and retaining but a few Clerks about you (ſuch only as ſerve your neceſſity) make no excurſes out (as little as you can) in that Country. But in this eſpecially I thought to premoniſh you, that in no caſe, neither for fear, or any adverſity, whatſoever may happen, you be brought to renounce and give up the right and dignity of your Church. Written at Sene, the ſeventh before the Kalends of November.

As the Archbiſhop was thus cited up to Rome, ſitting with his Croſs waiting in the Court, neither given place to the Kings requeſt, nor abaſhed with the clamour of the whole Court againſt him, calling him Traytor on every ſide, neither following the advertiſement of his fellow-Biſhops, at length the King by certain Earls and Barons, ſent commandment to him (Robert Earl of Leiceſter doing the Meſſage) that he ſhould without delay come and render a full account of all things that he had received, as the Profits and Revenues of the Realm, in the time he was Chancellor, and ſpecially for the 30000 marks, for the which he was accountable to the King. To whom the Archbiſhop anſwereth again, The King knew how oft he had made his reckoning of thoſe things which now were required of him. Further and beſides, Henry his Son and Heir of his Realm, with all his Barons, and alſo Richard Lucy, chief Juſtice of England told him, That he was free and quit to God, and to holy Church from all Receits and Computations, and from all ſecular Exactions on the Kings behalf. And ſo he, taking thus his Diſcharge at their hands, entred into his Office; and therefore other account beſides this he would make none. When this word was brought to the King, he required his Barons to do the Law upon him; who, ſo doing, judged him to be apprehended and laid in priſon. This done, the King ſendeth to him Reginald, Earl of Cornwal and Devonſhire, and Robert, Earl of Leiceſter, to declare to him what was his judgment. To whom the Archbiſhop anſwereth, Hear, my Son, and good Earl, what I ſay unto you: how much more precious the Soul is than the Body, ſo much more ought you to obey me in the Lord, rather than your terren King. Neither doth any Law or Reaſon permit the Children to judge and condemn their Father. Wherefore, to avoid both, the judgment of the King, of you, and all others, I put my ſelf only to the arbitrement of the Pope, under God alone to be judged of him, and of no other; to whoſe preſence here before you all I do appeal, committing the ordering of the Church of Canterbury, my Dignity, with all other things appertaining to the ſame, under the Protection of God and him. And as for you, my Brethren and fellow-Biſhops, which rather obey Man than God, you alſo I call and cite to the Audience and Judgment of the Pope, and depart henceforth from you, as from the Enemies of the Catholick Church, and of the Authority of the Apoſtolick See.

Becket called to a full account.

Becket judged to be laid in priſon.

Ex quadripartita Hiſt. lib. 1. ca. 38.

Becket appeareth to the Pope.

Becket thinketh not the protection of God ſufficient without the Pope.

While the Barons returned with this Anſwer to the King, the Archbiſhop, paſſing through the throng, taketh unto him his paltry, holding his Croſs in one hand, and his Bridle in the other, the Courtiers following after, and crying, Traytor, Traytor, tarry and hear thy Judgment. But he paſſed on till he came to the uttermoſt Gate of the Court, which being faſt locked, there he had been ſtaid, had not one of his Servants called Peter, ſurnamed Demunctorio, finding there a bunch of Keys hanging by, firſt proved one Key, then another, till at laſt, finding the true Key, he had opened the Gate, and let him out. The Archbiſhop went ſtraight to the Houſe of Canons, where he did lie, calling unto him the poor, where they could be found. When Supper was done, making as though he would go to bed, which he cauſed to be made between two Altars, privily while the King was at Supper, he prepareth his Journey ſecretly to eſcape away; and changing his Garment and his Name, being called Derman, firſt went to Lincoln, from thence to Sandwich, where he took Ship, and ſailed into Flanders, and from thence journyed into France, as Hovedenus ſaith. Albeit Alanus; differing ſomething in the order of his flight, ſaith, That he departed not that night; but at ſupper-time came to him the Biſhops of London and Chicheſter, declaring to him, that if he would ſurrender up to the King his two Manors of Otford and Wingcham, there were hope to recover the Kings favour, and to have all remitted. But when the Archbiſhop would not agree thereunto, forſomuch as thoſe Manors were belonging to the Church of Canterbury, the King hearing thereof, great diſpleaſure was taken, inſomuch that the next day Becket was fain to ſend to the King two Biſhops and his Chaplain for leave to depart the Realm. To the which Meſſage the King anſwered, That he would take pauſe thereof till the next day, and then he ſhould have an Anſwer. But Becket not tarrying his anſwer, the ſame day conveyed himſelf away ſecretly, as is aforeſaid, to Ludovicus the French King. But before he came to the King, Gilbert the Biſhop of London, and William the Earl of Arundel, ſent from the King of England to France, Prevented him: requiring the ſaid French King in the behalf of the King of England, that he would not receive, nor retain in his Dominion the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Moreover, that at his inſtance he would be a means to the Pope, not to ſhew any familiarity unto him. But the King of England in this point ſeemed to have more confidence in the French King, than knowledge of his diſpoſition. For thinking that the French King would have been a good Neighbour to him, in truſting him too much he was deceived. Neither conſidered he with himſelf enough the manner and nature of the Frenchmen at that time againſt the Realm of England; who then were glad to ſeek and take all manner of occaſions to do ſome Act againſt England.

Becket flyeth out of the Court.

Becket changeth his name, and is called Derman. Hiſtories differ ſomething in the order of his flight.

The French King ſupporteth Becket againſt the King of England.

And therefore Ludovick the French King, underſtanding the matter, and thinking (per-caſe) thereby to have ſome vantage againſt the King and Realm of England, by the occaſion hereof, contrary to the Kings Letters and Requeſt, not only harboureth and cheriſheth this Derman, but alſo (writing to the Pope by his Almoner and Brother) intreateth him (upon all loves, as ever he would have his favour) to tender the cauſe of the Archbiſhop Becket. Thus the Kings Ambaſſadors repulſed of the French King, returned; at what time he ſent another Ambaſſage (upon the like cauſe) to Alexander the Pope, then being at Sene in France. The Ambaſſadors ſent on this Meſſage were Roger Archbiſhop of York, Gilbert Biſhop of London, Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, Hilary Biſhop of Chicheſter, Bartholomew Biſhop of Exceſter, with other Doctors and Clerks: alſo William Earl of Arundel, with certain more Lords and Barons, who coming to the Popes Court were friendly accepted of certain of the Cardinals; amongſt the which Cardinals roſe alſo diſſention about the ſame cauſe. Some judging that the Biſhop of Canterbury in the defence of the Liberties of the Church (as in a good cauſe) was to be maintained. Some thinking again, that he (being a Perturber of Peace and Unity) was rather to be bridled for his preſumption, than to be foſtered and incouraged therein. But the Pope partly bearing with his cauſe (which only tended to his Exaltation and Magnificence) partly again incenſed with the Letters of the French King, did wholly incline to Becket, as no marvel was. Wherefore the next day following, the Pope ſitting in conſiſtory with his Cardinals, the Ambaſſadors were called for to the hearing of Beckets matter; and firſt beginneth the Biſhop of London; next, the Archbiſhop of York; then Exceſter; and the other Biſhops every one in their order to ſpeak. Whoſe Orations being not well accepted of the Pope, and ſome of them alſo diſdained; the Earl of Arundel perceiving that (and ſomewhat to qualifie and temper the matter to the Popes ears) began after this manner:

Ambaſſadors ſent to the Pope.

The Oration of the Earl of Arundel to the Pope.

Although to me it is unknown (ſaith he) which am both unlettered and ignorant, what is that theſe Biſhops here have ſaid, neither am I in that Tongue ſo able to expreſs my mind as they have done: yet being ſent and charged thereunto of my Prince, neither can nor ought I but to declare (as well as I may) what the cauſe is of our ſending hither: not (truly) to contend or ſtrive with any perſon, nor to offer any injury or harm unto any man (eſpecially in this place) and in the preſence here of ſuch an one unto whoſe Beck and Authority all the World doth ſtoop and yield. But for this time is our Legacy hither directed, to preſent here before you, and in the preſence of the whole Church of Rome, the devotion and love of our King and Maſter, which ever he hath had, and yet hath ſtill toward you. And that the ſame might the better appear to your Excellency, he hath aſſigned and appointed to the furniture of this Legacy, not the leaſt, but the greateſt, not the worſt, but the beſt and chiefeſt of all his Subjects; both Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, with other Potentates more, of ſuch worthineſs and Parentage, that if he could have found greater in all his Realm, he would have ſent them, both for the Reverence of your Perſon, and of the holy Church of Rome. Over and beſide this, I might add more (which your Sanctitude hath ſufficiently tried and proved already) the true and hearty Fidelity of this our King and Soveraign toward you (in his firſt entrance to his Kingdom) wholly ſubmitted himſelf, with all that is his beſides, to your will and pleaſure. And truly, to teſtifie of his Majeſty how he is diſpoſed to the unity of the Catholick Faith: we believe there is none more faithful in Chriſt than he, nor more devout to God, nor yet more moderate in keeping the unity of peace whereunto he is called. And as I may be bold this to proteſt for our King and Maſter, ſo neither do I affirm the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to be a man deſtitute or unfurniſhed with Gifts and Ornaments in his kind of calling, but to be a man both ſage and diſcreet in ſuch things as to him appertain, ſave only that he ſeemeth to ſome more quick and ſharp than needeth. This blot alone if it were not, and if the breach between our King and him had not ſo happened, both the Regiments together (of the Temporalty and Spiritualty) might quietly have flouriſhed one with the other in much peace and concord, both under a Prince ſo worthy, and a Paſtor ſo virtuous. Wherefore (the caſe ſo ſtanding as it doth) our Meſſage hither, and our ſupplication to your vigilant prudence is, that (through your favour and wiſdom) the neck of this diſſenſion may be broken, and that Reformation of unity and love (by ſome good means) may be ſought.

yet

℄ This Oration of his, although it was liked of them for the ſoftneſs and moderation thereof, yet it could not ſo perſwade the Romiſh Biſhop to condeſcend to their ſuit and requeſt: which ſuit was, to have two Legates or Arbitrers to be ſent from his Popiſh ſide into England, to examine and take up the Controverſie between the King and the Archbiſhop. But the Pope, inceníed as is ſaid before, would not grant to their petition: forſomuch as it ſhould be (ſaith he) prejudicial and tending to the oppreſſion of the Archbiſhop to grant unto it, he being not preſent. And therefore he willed them to tarry his coming up; otherwiſe he being abſent, he would not (he ſaid) in any caſe proceed againſt him. But they, alledging again their time to be expired, appointed unto them of the King, having beſides other lets and cauſes as they alledged, ſaid, That they could not there wait for the coming of Becket, but return back, their cauſe fruſtrated, without the Popes bleſſing to the King. Within four days after Becket cometh to the Popes Court, where he proſtrating himſelf at his feet, brought out of his boſome a Scroll containing the Cuſtoms and Ordinances of the King, before mentioned. The Pope receiving the foreſaid Scroll, and reading it in the open hearing of his Cardinals, condemned and accurſed the moſt part of the ſaid Decrees of the King, which he called Conſuetudines avitas; that is, his Grandfathers Ordinances. Beſides this, the Pope moreover blameth Becket, for that he ſo much yielded to them at the beginning, as he did: yet notwithſtanding (becauſe he was repentant for his unadviſed Fact) he was content to abſolve him for the ſame, and the rather, becauſe of his great Troubles, which he for the Liberties of holy Church did ſuſtain; and ſo with great favour for that day diſmiſſed him.

The Pope tendereth Beckets cauſe againſt the Kings.

Becket complaineth of the King to the Pope.

Repentance for his well-doing.

The next day (Alexander the Pope aſſembling his Cardinals together in his ſecret Chamber) appeareth before them Archbiſhop Becket, having this Oration to the Pope and his Popelings, which here I thought to ſet out in our vulgar Engliſh-Tongue (tranſlated out of Latine) to the intent that the Poſterity hereafter may underſtand either the vain Superſtition or vile ſlavery of the Church-men in thoſe days, who, being not contented with their own natural Prince and King given them of God, muſt ſeek further to the Pope; thinking no Eccleſiaſtical Living to be given, which is not taken at his hands. The words of his Oration be ſtoried rightly thus.

The Oration of Becket reſigning his Biſhoprick to the Pope.

FAthers and Lords, I ought not to lie in any place, much leſs before God, and in your preſence here. Wherefore, with much ſighing and ſorrow of heart, I grant and confeſs, that theſe Perturbations of the Church of England be raiſed through my miſerable fault. For I entred into the Fold of Chriſt, but not by the door of Chriſt; for that, not the Canonical Election did call me lawfully thereunto, but terror of publick power drove me in. And albeit I againſt my will took this burthen upon me; yet not the will of God, but mans pleaſure placed me in the room. And therefore no marvel though all things have gone contrary and backward with me. And as for the reſigning up again thereof; if I had ſo done, and given up into their hands the priviledge of my Biſhoply Authority, which I had granted to me at the Commandment of the King (ſo as my fellow-Biſhops did inſtantly call upon me to do) then had I left a pernicious and dangerous Example to the whole Catholick Church. By reaſon whereof I thought to defer that unto your preſence. And now there (recogniſing with my ſelf my ingreſs not to be Canonical, and therefore fearing it to have the worſe end; and again pondering my ſtrength and ability not to be ſufficient for ſuch a Charge) leſt I ſhould be found to ſuſtain that room to the ruine of the Flock, to whom I was appointed a Paſtor unworthy; I render up to your fatherly hands the Archbiſhoprick here of Canterbury, &c. ℄ And ſo putting off his Ring from his finger, and offering it to the Pope, he deſired a Biſhop for the Church of Canterbury to be provided: ſeeing he thought not himſelf meet to fulfil the ſame, and ſo (with tears, as the ſtory ſaith) he ended his Oration.

Becket argument: the Pope brought him not in but the King, Erg God brought him not in.

And why might ye not (M. Becket) reſign it as well to his hands of whom ye took it?

This done, the Archbiſhop was bid to ſtand apart. The Pope conferring upon this with his Cardinals, about the reſignation of Becket, what was beſt to be done: Some thought it beſt to take the occaſion offered, thinking thereby the Kings wrath might eaſily be aſſwaged, if the Church of Canterbury were aſſigned to ſome other perſon; and yet the ſaid Becket otherwiſe to be provided for notwithſtanding. Contrary, others again thought otherwiſe, whoſe reaſon was; If he (which for the Liberties of the Church, had ventured not only his Goods, Dignity and Authority, but alſo his Life) ſhould now at the Kings pleaſure be deprived; like as it might be a Preſident hereafter to others in reſiſting their King in like ſort, if this cauſe were maintained; ſo contrariwiſe, if it quailed, it ſhould be an example to all others hereafter, none to reſiſt his Prince in the like caſe. And ſo might it redound not only to the weakning of the ſtate of the Catholick Church, but alſo to the derogation of the Popes Authority. Briefly, this ſentence at length prevailed: and ſo Becket receiveth his Paſtoral Office of the Popes hand again, with commendation and much favour. But for ſo much as he could not be well placed in England; in the mean while the Pope ſendeth him with a Monks habit into the Abbey of Pontiniack in France, where he remained two years; from thence he removed to Senon, where he abode five years. So the time of his exile continued ſeven years in all, &c.

A conſultation between the Pope and the Cardinals about Beckets matter.

Upon this, the King being certified by his Ambaſſadors of the Popes Anſwer, how his favour inclined more to Becket than to him, was moved (and worthily) with wrathful diſpleaſure. Who, upon the ſame ſailing from England unto Normandy, directed over certain Injunctions againſt the Pope, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as were recited afore. The Contents whereof were declared to be theſe:

If any perſon ſhould be found to bring from the Pope, or from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, &c.

Of theſe, and ſuch other Injunctions, Becket ſpecifieth partly in a certain Letter, writing to a Friend of his in this manner:

THomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to his well beloved Friend, &c. Be it known to your brotherly goodneſs, that we, with all ours here (by Gods Grace) are ſafe and in good health. Having a good hope and truſt to your faithful Amity, I charge you and require you, that either either by the bringer hereof, or by ſome other, (whom ye know faithful and truſty to our Church of Canterbury, and to us) you write with all ſpeed what is done. As touching the Kings decrees here ſet out, theſe they be: That all Havens and Ports ſhould be diligently kept, that no Letters of the Popes Interdict or Curſe be brought in. And if Religious Men bring them in, they ſhall have their feet cut off; if he be a Prieſt or Clerk, he ſhall loſe his Privy Members; if he be a Lay-man, let him be hanged; if he be a Leper, let him be burned. And if any Biſhop, for fear of the Popes Interdict, will depart; beſides his ſtaff only in his hand let him have nothing elſe. Alſo the Kings will is, that all Scholars and Students beyond the Seas ſhall repair home; or elſe loſe their Benifices. And if they yet ſhall remain ſtill, they ſhall loſe the liberty of all returning. Further, if any ſuch Prieſts ſhall be found, that for the Popes ſuſpence or Interdict will refuſe to Sing, they ſhall loſe their Privy Members. In ſumme, all ſuch Prieſts as ſhew themſelves Rebels to the King, let them be deprived of their Benifices, &c.

Beſides theſe and ſuch like Injunctions, it was alſo ſet forth by the Kings Proclamation, An. 1166. That all manner of perſons, both Men and Women, whoſoever were found of the kindred of Thomas Becket, ſhould be exiled, without taking any part of their Goods with them, and ſent to him where he was: which was no little vexation to Becket to behold them. Moreover, for ſo much as he then was lying with Gwarine Abbat of Pontiniack, to whom the Pope, as is aforeſaid, had commended him; therefore the King writing to the ſame Abbat, required him not to retain the Archbiſhop of Canterbury in his Houſe: for if he did, he would drive out of his Realm all the Monks of his Order. Whereupon Becket was inforced to remove from thence, and went to Lewis the French King; by whom he was placed at Senon, and there found of him the ſpace of five years as is above mentioned.

Becket's kindred baniſhed.

* Theſe Monks were of the Ciſtertian order.

In the mean time, Meſſengers went daily with Letters between the King and the Pope, between the Pope again and him, and ſo between the Archbiſhop and others. Whereof if the Reader (peradventure) ſhall be deſirous to ſee the Copies; I thought here to expreſs certain of them, to ſatisfie his deſire; firſt beginning with the Epiſtle of Becket, complaining of his Prince to the Pope, in manner and form as followeth.

Becket complaineth of his Prince to the Pope.

The Copy of an Epiſtle ſent of Thomas Becket to Pope Alexander.

"TO your preſence and audience I flie, moſt holy "Father, that you, who hath bought the liberty "of the Church with your ſo great danger, might the rather attend to the ſame (either being the only or chiefeſt "cauſe of my perſecution) uſing and following therein the "example of you. It grieveth me that the ſtate of the "Church ſhould fall to any decay, and that the liberties "thereof ſhould be infringed through the avarice of Princes. "For the which cauſe I thought to reſiſt betime that inconvenience beginning ſo to grow. And the more I thought "my ſelf obliged to the ſame, my Prince (unto whom next "under God I am moſt chiefly bound) the more boldneſs I "took to me, to withſtand his unrightful attempts; till "ſuch as were on the contrary part, my adverſaries, prevailed, working my diſquietneſs, and incenſing him againſt "me. Whereupon, as the manner is amongſt Princes, they "raiſed up againſt me citations and ſlanders, to the occaſion of my perſecution: but I had rather to be proſcribed, "than to ſubſcribe. Beſides this, I was alſo called to judgment, and cited before the King to make anſwer there "as a Lay perſon, to ſecular accounts: whereas they whom "I moſt truſted did moſt forſake me. For I ſaw my fellow Brethren the Biſhops, through the inſtigation of ſome, "ready to my condemnation. Whereupon all being ſet "againſt me, and I thus oppreſſed on every ſide, I took "my refuge to appeal unto your goodneſs, which caſteth off "none in their extremities; being ready to make my declaration before you, that I ought neither to be judged "there in that place, nor yet of them. For what were "that (Father) but to uſurpe to themſelves your right, and "to bring the ſpirituality under the temporality? Which "thing (once begun) may breed an example to many. And "therefore ſo much the more ſtout I thought to be in withſtanding this matter, how much more prone and proclive I ſaw the way to hurt, if they might once ſee us to "be faint and weak in the ſame. But they will ſay to me "here again: Give to Cæſar that which belongs to Cæſar, "&c. But to anſwer again thereunto, albeit we are bound "to obey our King in moſt things, yet not in ſuch manner "of things, whereby he is made to be no King: neither "were they then things belonging to Cæſar, but to a Tyrant. Concerning the which points, theſe Biſhops ſhould "not for me only, but for themſelves, have reſiſted the "King. For if the extream judgment be referred to him "which is able to judge both body and ſoul: is it not then "extream pride for Men there to judge, which judge but "by themſelves? If the cauſe of the Biſhops and of the "Clergy, which I maintain, be right: why be they ſet "againſt me? why do they reprehend me? For if that I "appealed to him, before whom either it was not lawful, "or elſe not expedient for me to do: what ſeem they by "this, but either to blame me cauſeleſs, or elſe to diſtruſt "your equity? For me to be convicted before your Holineſs, it had been a double confuſion. Or wherein have "I deſerved to be perſecuted of them, for whoſe cauſe I "have ſet my ſelf to ſtand in their behalf? And if they had "willed, I had prevailed; but it is ill with the head, when "he is left of his members and forſaken: as if the eyes "ſhould take the tongue to ſpeak againſt the head. If they "had had eyes to have fore-ſeen the matter, they might "underſtand themſelves to ſpeak their own deſtruction, "and that the Princes did uſe their help but to their own "ſervitude. And what ſo great cauſe of hatred had they "againſt me, to procure their own undoing in undoing "of me? So while they neglected Spiritual things inſtead "of Temporal, they have loſt them both. What ſhould "I ſpeak more of this, that I repugning them and appealing to your audience; yet notwithſtanding they durſt "preſume to ſtand in judgment and condemnation againſt "me, as Children againſt their Father? Yea, and not "againſt me only, but againſt the univerſal Church of "God, conſpiring together with the Prince being with me "offended. And this ſuſpection might alſo as well pertain "to you, holy Father. But to this they will ſay, That "they owe their duty and ſervice unto the King, as their "Lord, to whom they are bound upon their allegiance. "To whom I anſwer, That to him they ſtand bound bodily, to me ſpiritually. But to whom ought they rather "to ſtand bound, than to themſelves? And were it not "better to ſuſtain the loſs of corporal, than of ſpiritual "things? But here they will ſay again: At this time the "Prince was not to be provoked. How ſubtilly do theſe "Men diſpute for their own boudage? Yea, they themſelves provoke him by their own exceſs, miniſtring wings "unto him to fight againſt them; for he would have reſted, if they had reſiſted. And when is conſtancy more "to be required, than in perſecution? Be not a Mans chief "Friends moſt tried in perſecution? If they give over ſtill, "how ſhall they obtain the victory? Sometimes they muſt "needs reſiſt. Condeſcend not therefore (holy Father) to "my exile and perſecution. And remember, that I alſo "once was a great Man, in the time when it was; and "now, for your ſake thus injuriouſly I am intreated. Uſe "your rigour and reſtrain them, by whoſe inſtigation the "name of this perſecution began. And let none of theſe "things be imputed to the King, who rather is to be counted the repairer than the author of this buſineſs.

To keep under the pride of Prelats is no cauſe ſufficient to unking a Prince.

If ye mean by ſpiritual things ſuch as pertain to the ſpiritual part of man, I grant; but your liberties be not ſuch as which pertain to the inward or ſpiritual man, but rather are things more corporal. Perſecution trieth a true friend, but every cauſe maketh not a true perſecution.

Beſides this Epiſtle ſent unto the Pope, he writeth alſo another Letter, ſent to the King in Latine; the tenor whereof he that is diſpoſed to read, may peruſe in our former Edition, with the Notes adjoyned withal.

Beſides which Epiſtle to the King in Latine, he ſent alſo one or two more to the ſaid King Henry the Second, much after the like rate and ſort: the one thus beginning: Loqui de Deo, liberæ mentis eſt & valde quietæ. Inde eſt quod loquar ad Dominum meum, & utinam ad omnes pacificum, &c. Which Epiſtle, for that I would not overcharge the Volume of theſe Hiſtories with too much matter ſuperfluous, I thought here to omit. The other he ſent afwards, whereof the words be theſe.

Another Letter of Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſent to the King.

" TO his Lord and Friend Henry, by the grace of God, " King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aqui- " tain, Earl of Anjou : Thomas by the ſame grace, hum- " ble Miniſter of the Church of Canterbury (ſometime his " temporally, but now more his in the Lord) health and " true repentance with amendment. I have long looked, " that the Lord would look upon you, and that you would " convert and repent, departing from your perverſe way ; " and cut off from you your wicked and preverſe Counſellors, " by whoſe inſtinction, as it is thought, you are fallen in- " to that deep, whereof the Pſalm ſpeaketh, A ſinner when " he cometh to the depth of miſchiefs, is without care or " fear. And albeit we have hitherto quietly ſuffered and " born, conſidering and earneſtly looking if there would " any meſſenger come that would ſay ; Your Soveraign " Lord the King which now a long time hath erred and " been deceived, and led even to the deſtruction of the " Church, through Gods mercy with abundant humility " doth now again make ſpeed for the deliverance of the " Church, and to make ſatisfaction and amendment : Yet " notwithſtanding, we ceaſe not, day by day, continually " to call upon Almighty God with moſt humble devotion : " That, that which we have long deſired for you, and by you, " we may ſpeedily obtain with abundant effect. And this is " one point ; that the care of the Church of Canterbury, " whereunto God hath preſently appointed us (albeit unwor- " thy) you being King, doth ſpecially conſtrain me (in that as " yet we are detained in exile) to write unto your Majeſty " Letters Commonitory, Exhortatory, and of Correction. " But I would to God they were fully able to correct, leſt " that I be too great a cloker of your outrages (if there be " any) as indeed there are : for the which we are not a lit- " tle ſorry. I mean ſpecially of them which are done by " you in every place about the Church of God and the Ec- " cleſiaſtical perſons, without any reverence either of digni- " ty or perſon ; and leſt alſo that I appear negligent to the " great danger of my ſoul : for without doubt he beareth " the offence of him which doth commit any offence, who " neglecteth to correct that, which another ought to amend. " For it is written, Not only they which do commit evil, " but alſo they that conſent thereunto are counted partakers " of the ſame. For they verily do conſent, which, when " they both might and ought, do not reſiſt, or at the leaſt " reprove. For the error which is not reſiſted is allowed, " and the truth when it is not defended is oppreſſed : nei- " ther doth it lack a privy note of ſociety in him, which " ceaſeth to withſtand a manifeſt miſchief. (2) For like " as, moſt noble Prince, a ſmall City doth not miniſh the " prerogative of ſo mighty a Kingdom as yours is : ſo your " Royal power ought not to oppreſs or change the meaſure " of the Religious diſpenſation. For it is provided always " by the Laws, that all judgments againſt Prieſts ſhould " proceed by the determination of Prieſts. For whatſo- " ever Biſhops they are, albeit that they do err as other men " do (not exceeding in any point contrary to the Religion " of Faith) they (3) ought not, nor can in any caſe be " judged of the ſecular power. Truly, it is the part of a " good and religious Prince to repair the ruinous Churches, " to build new, to honour the Prieſts, and with great re- " verence to defend them, after the example of the godly " Prince of moſt happy memory (4) Conſtantinus, which " ſaid, when a complaint of the Clergy was brought to " him, You (ſaid he) can be judged by no ſecular Judge, " which are reſerved to the only judgment of God. And " for ſo much as we do read that the holy Apoſtles and their " ſucceſſors, appointed by the teſtimony of God, command- " ed that no perſecution nor troubles ought to be made, nor " to envy thoſe which labour in the field of the Lord, and " that the ſtewards of the Eternal King ſhould not be ex- " pelled and put out of their ſeats : who then doubteth, " but that the Prieſts of Chriſt ought to be called the Fa- " thers and Maſters of all other faithful Princes ? Is it not a " miſerable madneſs then, if the Son ſhould go about to " bring the (5) Father under obedience ; or the Scholer " his Maſter ? and by (6) wicked bonds to bring him in " ſubjection, by whom he ought to believe that he may be " bound and looſed, not only in Earth, but alſo in Hea- " ven ? If you be a good and Catholick King, and will be " ſuch a one as we hope, or rather deſire you ſhould be, (if " it be ſpoken under your licence) you are the Child of the " Church, and not the ruler of the Church. You ought " to learn of the Prieſts, and not to teach them ; you " ought to (7) follow the Prieſts in Eccleſiaſtical matters, " and not to go before them ; having the priviledge of " your power given you of God to make publick Laws, " that by his benefit you ſhould not be unthankful againſt " the diſpenſation of the heavenly order, and that you " ſhould uſurpe nothing, but uſe them with a wholeſome " diſpoſition.

" Wherefore in thoſe things, which, contrary unto that " you have, through your malicious counſel rather than by " your own mind, wickedly uſurped ; with all humility " and ſatisfaction ſpeedily give place, that the hand of the " moſt High be not ſtretched out againſt you, as an arrow " againſt the mark. For the moſt High hath bended his " bow openly to ſhoot againſt him, that will not confeſs " his offences. Be not aſhamed (whatſoever wicked Men " ſay unto you, or that Traytors do whiſper in your ear) " to humble your ſelf under the mighty hand of God. For " it is he which exalteth the humble, and throweth down " the proud ; which alſo revengeth himſelf upon Princes : " he is terrible, and who ſhall reſiſt him ? You ought not " to have let ſlip out of your memory, in what ſtate God " did find you ; how he hath preferred, honoured, and " exalted you ; bleſſed you with Children, inlarged your " Kingdom, and eſtabliſhed the ſame in deſpight of your " enemies. In ſo much that hitherto, in a manner, all " men have ſaid with great admiration, that this is he whom " God hath choſen. And how will you reward, or can " you reward him for all theſe things which he hath done " unto you ? Will you, at the provocation and inſtance of " thoſe which are about you, that (8) perſecute the Church " and the Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters, and always have accord- " ing to their power perſecuted them, rendring evil for " good, bringing oppreſſions, tribulations, injuries, and " afflictions upon the Church and Church-men, do the like ? " Are not theſe they of whom the Lord ſpeaketh : he that " heareth you, heareth me ; he that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth " me ; and he that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of " mine eye ? Verily forſaking all that thou haſt, take up " thy croſs, that thou mayeſt follow thy God our Lord Je- " ſus Chriſt. Yet will it ſcarcely be, or not at all, that " thou ſhalt appear a thankful recompencer of the benefits " received at his hand. Search the Scriptures with ſuch as " are learned, and you ſhall underſtand, that (9) Saul, " albeit he was the Elect of the Lord, periſhed with his " whole houſe, becauſe he departed from the ways of the " Lord.

" Ozias alſo King of Judah, whoſe name is ſpoken of " and ſpread over all, through the manifold victories given " him of God, his heart was ſo puffed up to his deſtruction, " becauſe the Lord did help and ſtrengthen him in every " place, that he, contemning the fear and reverence of the " Lord, would uſurp unto himſelf that which was not his " office, that is to ſay, the Prieſthood, and to offer Incenſe " upon the Altar of the Lord ; for the which he was ſtrick- " en with a Leproſie, and caſt out of the Houſe of the " Lord. Many other Kings and holy Men of great ſub- " ſtance, becauſe they have walked above their eſtate in the " marvels of the world, preſuming to rebel againſt God in " his Miniſteries, have periſhed : and at the laſt, they have " found nothing of their ſubſtance in their power. Alſo " King Abaz, becauſe he did uſurp the office of Prieſt- " hood, was likewiſe ſtricken with a Leproſie by God.

" Oza alſo, albeit he was not King, yet for ſo much as he " touched the Ark and held it, when it would have fallen " by the unruline ſs of the Oxen, which thing pertained " not unto him, but unto the Miniſters of the Church, he " was ſtricken by the wrath of God and fell down by the " Ark. O King, it is a famous Proverb : That a Man, " forwarned by another Mans miſfortune, will take the " better heed unto himſelf. For every Man hath his own " buſineſs in hand, when his neighbours Houſe is on fire.

" Dearly beloved King, God would have the diſpoſing " of thoſe things, which pertain unto the Church, to be- " long only unto Prieſts, and not unto the ſecular power.

Do

" Do not challenge unto thy ſelf therefore another Mans
" right, neither ſtrive againſt him by whom all things are " ordained; leſt thou ſeem to ſtrive againſt his benefits,
" of whom thou haſt received thy power. For by the com-
(10) " mon (10) Laws, and not by the ſecular power, and by
" the Biſhops and Prieſts, Almighty God would have the " Clergy of the Chriſtian Religion to be ordered and ruled.
" And Chriſtian Kings ought to ſubmit all their doings un-
" to Eccleſiaſtical Rulers, and not to prefer themſelves:
" for it is written, That none ought to judge the Biſhops
" but only the Church, neither doth it pertain unto Mans
" Law to give ſentence upon any ſuch. Chriſtian Princes are
" accuſtomed to be obedient unto the Statutes and Ordi-
" nances of the Church, and not to prefer their own pow" er. A Prince ought to ſubmit himſelf unto the Biſhops,
" and not to judge the Biſhops: for there are two things
" wherewith the world is chiefly governed, (that is to ſay)
" the Sacred Authority of Biſhops, and Royal Power.
(11) " (11) in the which, the Biſhops charge is ſo much the " more weighty, in that they ſhall at the later Judgment
" render account even of the Kings themſelves. Truly you " ought to underſtand, That you depend upon their judg" ment, and cannot reduce them unto your own will:
" for many Biſhops have excommunicated both Kings and " Emperors. And if you require an eſpecial example there-
" of, Innocentius the Pope did Excommunicate Arcadius
" the Emperor, becauſe he did conſent that John Cryſoſtom
" ſhould be expulſed from his ſeat; And Saint Ambroſe al-(12) " ſo did Excommunicate (12) Theodoſius the great Em" peror for a fault (which ſeemed not ſo weighty unto o" ther Prieſts) and ſhut him out of the Church: who after" wards by condign ſatisfaction was abſolved.

" There are many other like Examples. For David,
" when he had Committed Adultery and Murther, the Pro-
" phet Nathan was ſent unto him by God to reprove him,
" and he was ſoon corrected: And the King (laying aſide
" his Scepter and Diadem, and ſetting apart all Princely
" Majeſty) was not aſhamed to humble himſelf before the " face of the Prophet, to confeſs his fault, and to require
" forgiveneſs for his offence. What will you more? He " being ſtricken with Repentance asked mercy, and obtain" ed forgiveneſs. So likewiſe you (moſt beloved King and " Reverend Lord) after the example of this good King Da-
" vid, of whom it is ſaid, I have found a Man after mine
" own heart; with a contrite and humble heart turn to " the Lord your God, and take hold of Repentance for your " tranſgreſſions. For you have fallen and erred in many " things, which yet I keep in ſtore ſtill, if (peradventute)
" God ſhall inſpire you to ſay with the Prophet; Have " mercy on me, O God, according to thy great mercy, for
" I have ſinned much againſt thee, and done ill in thy ſight.
" Thus much I have thought good to write to you my dear
" Lord at this preſent, paſſing other things in ſilence, till I
" may ſee whether my words take place in you, and bring " forth fruits worthy of Repentance; and that I may hear
" and rejoyce with them that ſhall bring me word and ſay;
" O King, thy Son was dead, and is alive again; was loſt,
" and is found again. But if you will not hear me, look
" where I was wont * before the Majeſty of the Body of
" Chriſt to pray for you in abundance of tears and ſighs;
" there in the ſame place I will cry againſt you, and ſay,
" Riſe up Lord and judge my cauſe, forget not the rebukes
" and injuries which the King of England doth to thee and " thine; forget not the ignominy of thy Church, which " thou haſt builded in thy blood. Revenge the blood of " thy Saints which is ſpilt; revenge, O Lord, the afflictions
" of thy ſervants of whom there is an infinite number. For " the pride of them which hate and perſecute thee is gone
" up ſo high, that we are not able to bear them any longer.
" Whatſoever your ſervants ſhall do, all thoſe things ſhall
" be required at your hands: for he ſeemeth to have " done the harm, which hath given the cauſe thereof.
" Doubtleſs, the Son of the Moſt High, except you amend
" and ceaſe from the oppreſſing of the Church and Clergy,
" and keep your hand from troubling of them, will come
" in the rod of his fury, at the voyces of ſuch as cry to him,
" and at the ſighs of them that be in bands; when the time
" ſhall come for him to judge the unrighteouſnes of Men in " equity and ſeverity of the Holy Ghoſt. For he knoweth
" how to take away the breath of Princes, and is terrible a" mong Kings of the Earth. Your dear and loving Grace I
" wiſh well to fare. Thus fare ye well again and ever.

* Note the judgement of God againſt this Becket, who was ſlain at his Maſs making the body of Chriſt.

Certain Notes or Elenchs upon this Epiſtle: which by the figures you may find out, and their places.

1. THE ſcope of this Epiſtle is this, To prove that Biſhops and Prieſts ought not to come under the covert and controlement of Temporal power.

2. This ſimilitude holdeth not. For, though the ſmalneſs of a City blemiſheth not the Prerogative of a Kingdom, yet the evilneſs and rebellion of a City doth worthily blemiſh his own prerogative.

3. So ſaith the Popes Decree, Diſt. 10. but the Scripture of God importeth otherwiſe. Abiathar the Prieſt was depoſed of King Solomon, not for any Hereſie, but for other cauſes, 3. Reg. 12. Jonathas took his Prieſthood of King Alexander: and Simon of Demetrius, 1 Macch. 7. Chriſt offered Tribute to Cæſar for him and for Peter. Alſo Peter ſaith, Be ye ſubject to every humane creature; and it followeth, whether it be to the King as to the chief, &c. Item Pope Leo ſubmitted himſelf to Ludovicus the Emperor with theſe words: And if we do any thing incompetently, and do ſwerve from the path of Righteouſneſs, we will ſtand to your Reformation, or of them whom you ſhall ſend, Quæſt. 2. Hoſ. 7.

4. Notwithſtanding, the ſaid Conſtantinus, writing to the Biſhops Congregated at Tyrus, firſt chideth them, then commandeth them to reſort unto his preſence, to have their cauſe judged and decided, Trip. hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 7.

5. The Father under obedience, &c. If Fatherhood go by age, I ſuppoſe that King Henry was elder than Becket. If Fatherhood conſiſt in Authority, I judge the Authority of a King to be above the Authority of an Archbiſhop. If the See of Canterbury make the Fatherhood, yet had Becket no cauſe to claim Fatherhood over the King, ſeeing the Son ordained the Father (that is) ſeeing the King made him his Archbiſhop, and he made not him his King.

6. By wicked bonds. All is wicked with the Papiſts, that bringeth them in ſubjection to their Princes.

7. Eccleſiaſtical matters be ſuch, as properly belong to doctrine and divine knowledge, for the inſtitution of the Soul, and information of Conſcience. In which both Princes and Subjects ought to follow the Paſtor, ſo long as they go truly before them without error, or elſe not. But what maketh this for the Lands and Liberties of Church-men?

8. Puniſhment due to Malefactors and Rebels is not to be called Perſecution, but due Correction.

9. Saul brake the commandment of God and was rejected. Ozias contrary to the commandment of God took the Office of a Prieſt, and was ſtricken. Oza againſt the expreſs word of the Law put his hand to the Ark, and was puniſhed. But what expreſs word had King Henry, why he ſhould not correct and puniſh rebellious Biſhops, and wicked Prieſts within his own Realm? wherefore theſe ſimilitudes accord not. As for Achas, he was not ſo much puniſhed for taking the Prieſts Office, as for ſpoiling the Temple of the Lord, and offering to Idols.

10. Common Laws. S. Auſtin writing to Boniface, ſaith thus; Whoſoever obeyeth not the Laws of the Emperor, being made for the verity of God, procureth to himſelf great puniſhment. For in the time of the Prophets, all the Kings which did not forbid and ſubvert all ſuch things as were uſed of the people againſt the Law of God, are rebuked. And ſuch as did withſtand them, are commended above the reſt. Auguſt.

11. Iſidorus hath theſe words: Let Temporal Princes know that they muſt render account to God for the Church, which they have at the hands of God to govern, &c.

12. The caſe of Arcadius, Theodoſius, David, and of this King, as touching this matter, hath no ſimilitude. In them was murther: this King doth nothing but claim that which is his due. And though by the ſpiritual ſword thoſe Kings were reſiſted: yet it agreeth not therefore, that the perſons of them which have the uſe of the ſpiritual ſword are above the perſons of them which have the temporal ſword.

Beſides theſe Letters of the Archbiſhop ſent to the King, the Pope alſo in the ſame cauſe writeth to the King, beginning after this ſort: Alexander Papa ad Henricum regem.

Et naturali ratione, & forma juris dictante, providentiam tuam credimus edoctam fuiſſe, quod quanto quis ab eliquo majora ſuſcepiſſe dignoſcitur, tanto ei obnoxior, & magis obligatus tenetur, &c. The whole tenor of the Letter as he wrote it to the King I would here expreſs, but for protracting of the time and ſtraitneſs of room, having ſo many things elſe in this ſtory (by the Grace of Chriſt) to be comprehended. But the Letter tendeth to this effect: to exhort and charge the King to ſhew favour to Thomas Becket. Where, in the proceſs of the Epiſtle, it followeth in theſe words: Ea propter ſeveritatem tuam per Apoſtolica ſcripta rogamus, monemus, & exhortamur in Domino; necnon in remiſſionem peccatorum ex parte Dei omnipotentis, & beati Petri principis Apoſtolorum, authoritate noſtra injungimus, ut memoratum Archiepiſcopum pro Deo & Eccleſia ſua, & honore tuo, necnon & totius regni tui, in gratiam & favorum tuum recipias, &c. That is, Therefore we do deſire, moniſh, and exhort your honour by theſe our Apoſtolical writings, and alſo injoyn you upon the remiſſion of your ſins, in the behalf of Almighty God, and of St. Peter, Prince of the Apoſtles, by our authority, that you will receive again the foreſaid Archbiſhop into your favour and grace, for the honour of God, his Church, and of your own Realm, &c. Thus have you heard the Popes intreating Letter. Now here is another Letter ſent unto the foreſaid King, wherein he doth menace him, as in the tenor thereof here followeth.

Biſhop Alexander, ſervant of the ſervants of God, to King Henry, King of England, health and bleſſing Apoſtolical.

HOW fatherly and gently we have oft-times intreated and exhorted both by Legats and Letters your princely honour, to be reconciled again with our reverend Brother Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſo that he and his may be reſtored again to their Churches and other poſſeſſions to them appertaining, your wiſdom is not ignorant, ſeeing it is notified and ſpread almoſt throughout all Chriſtendom. Forſomuch therefore as hitherto we could not prevail with you, neither move nor ſtir your mind with fair and gentle words, it lamenteth us not a little, ſo to be fruſtrate and deceived of the hope and expectation which we had conceived of you. Eſpecially ſeeing we love you ſo dearly, as our own dearly beloved Son in the Lord, and underſtand ſo great jeopardy to hang over you.

But forſomuch as it is written; Cry out and ceaſe not, lift up thy voice like a Trumpet, and declare to my people their wickedneſs, and their ſins to the houſe of Jacob: Alſo forſomuch as it is in Solomon commanded, That the ſluggiſh perſon ſhould be ſtoned with the dung of Oxen: we have thought good therefore, not to forbear or ſupport your ſtubbornneſs any longer againſt juſtice and ſalvation. Neither that the mouth of the foreſaid Archbiſhop ſhould be ſtopped from henceforth any more; but that he may freely proſecute the charge of his office and duty, and revenge with the ſword of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, the injuries both of himſelf, and of his Church committed to his charge.

And here I have ſent unto you two Legates, Petrus de ponte Dei, and Bernardus de Corilio, to admoniſh you of the ſame. But if ye will neither by us be advertiſed, nor give ear unto them in obeying: it is to be feared (doubtleſs) leſt ſuch things as they ſhall declare to you from us in our behalf may happen and fall upon you. Dated at Benevent, the ninth day before the Kalends of June.

To anſwer theſe Letters again, there was another certain writing drawn out and directed to the Pope, made by ſome of the Clergy, as it ſeemeth: but not without conſent of the King, as by the title may appear, inveighing and diſproving the misbehaviour of the Archbiſhop. The tenour whereof here followeth, and beginneth thus:

An Anſwer to the Pope.

Answer to the Popes Letter.

TIme now requireth more to ſeek help than to make complaints. For ſo it is now, that the holy mother Church (our ſins deſerving the ſame) lieth in a dangerous caſe of great decay, which is like to inſue, except the preſent mercy of the Lord ſupport her.

Such is the wickedneſs now of Schiſmaticks, that the Father of Fathers Pope Alexander (for the defence of his Faith and for the love of Righteouſneſs) is baniſhed out of his Country: not able to keep free reſidence in his own proper See, by reaſon of the indurate heart of Frederick the Pharaoh.

Further and beſides, the Church alſo of Canterbury is miſerably impaired and blemiſhed; as well in the Spiritual as in the Temporal eſtate: much like to the Ship in the Sea, being deſtitute of her guide toſſed in the floods, and wreſtling with the winds, while the Paſtor being abſent from his Province, dare not there remain through the power of the King. Who being over wiſe (to the jeopardy of himſelf, his Church, and us alſo) hath brought and intangled us likewiſe with himſelf in the ſame partaking of his puniſhments and labours, not conſidering how we ought to forbear, and not to reſiſt ſuperiour powers. And alſo he ſheweth himſelf to us unkind, which with all our affections bear the burthen with him of his afflictions, not ceaſing yet to perſecute us which ſtand in the ſame condemnation with him. For, betwixt him and our Soveraign Prince, the King of England, aroſe a certain matter of contention, whereupon they were both agreed, that a day ſhould be appointed, to have the controverſie diſcuſſed by equity and juſtice.

Frederic falſely compared to Pharaoh, but this was to claw the Pope with.

The day being come, the King commanded all the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates of the Church to be called in a great ſolemn frequency: ſo that the greater and more general this Council was, the more manifeſt the detection of this ſtubborn malice ſhould appear and be eſpied.

At the day therefore above mentioned this troubler of the Realm and of the Church preſenteth himſelf in the ſight of our Catholick King: who, not truſting the quality and condition of his cauſe, armeth him with the armour of the croſs, as one which ſhould be brought to the preſence of a Tyrant. By reaſon whereof, the Kings Majeſty being ſomewhat agrieved (yet becauſe he would be delivered from all ſuſpition) committeth the matter to the hearing of the Biſhops. This done, it reſteth in the Biſhops to decide and ceaſe this contention, and to ſet agreement between them, removing all occaſion of diſſention. Which thing they going about, this foreſaid Archbiſhop cometh in, forbidding and commanding, that no Man proceed in any ſentence of him before the King.

This being ſignified to the Kings hearing, his mind was grievouſly provoked thereby to anger: whoſe anger yet notwithſtanding had been eaſily aſſwaged, if the other would have ſubmitted himſelf, and acknowledged his default. But he adding ſtubbornneſs to his treſpaſs, through the quantity and greatneſs of his exceſs was the author of his own puniſhment, which now by the Law Civil he ſuſtaineth, and yet ſhameth to crave pardon for his deſert at the Kings hand; whoſe anger he feareth not to ſtir up, in ſuch a troubleſome time of the perſecution of the Church, greatly againſt the profit of the ſame; augmenting and increaſing thereby the perſecution which now the Church lyeth under. Much better it had been for him to have tempered himſelf with the bridle of moderation, in the higheſt eſtate of his dignity; leſt in exceeding too far in ſtraining the ſtrict points of things by overmuch preſumption, peradventure through his preſumption, being not in mean and tolerable things, he might fall from higher. And if the detriments of the Church would not move him: yet the great benefits and preferments of riches and honours ought to perſwade him not to be ſo ſtubborn againſt the King. But here peradventure his friend and our adverſary will object, That his bearing and ſubmitting to the King, in this behalf were prejudicial againſt the authority and See Apoſtolical. As though he did not or might not underſtand, that although the dignity of the Church ſhould ſuffer a little detriment in that judgment: yet he might and ought to have diſſembled (for the time) to obtain peace unto the Church. He will object again, alledging the name of Father, That it ſoundeth like a point of arrogancy, for Children to proceed in judgment of condemnation againſt the Father; which thing is not convenient. But he muſt underſtand again, That it was neceſſary that the obedienc and humility of the Children ſhould temper the pride of the Father; leſt afterward, the hatred of the Father might redound upon the Children. Wherefore by theſe premiſes your Fatherhood may underſtand, ſtand, that the action of this our adverſary ought to fall down, as void, and of none effect, who only upon the affection of malice hath proceeded thus againſt us, having no juſt cauſe nor reaſon to ground upon.

And forſomuch as the care and charge of all Churches (as ye know) lyeth upon us, it ſtandeth us upon to provide concerning the ſtate of the Church of Canterbury, by our diligence and circumſpection: ſo that the ſaid Church of Canterbury, by the exceſs of his Paſtor, be not driven to ruine or decay.

¶ By this Epiſtle it may appear to the Reader thereof, that Becket (being abſent from England) went about to work ſome trouble againſt certain of the Clergy and the Laity (belike) in Excommunicating ſuch as he took to be his evil willers.

Now to underſtand further what his working was, or who they were whom he did Excommunicate, this Letter, ſent to William Biſhop of Norwich, ſhall better declare the matter.

A Letter of Becket to the Biſhop of Norwich.

A Letter of Becket to the Biſhop of Norwich.

He bindeth himſelf to the penalty of the crime, whoſoever receiving power and authority of God, uſeth and exerciſeth not the ſame with due ſeverity, in puniſhing vice: but winking and diſſembling, doth miniſter boldneſs to wicked doers, maintaining them in their ſin. For the blood of the wicked is required at the hand of the Prieſt, which is negligent or diſſembleth. And as the Scripture ſaith, Thorns and Brambles grow in the hands of the idle Drunkard. Wherefore, leſt (through our too much ſufferance and diſſembling) the tranſgreſſions of manifeſt evildoers ſhould alſo be laid to our charge, and redound to the deſtruction of the Church through our guilty ſilence; we therefore following the authority of the Popes commandment, have laid our Sentence of Curſe and Excommunication upon the Earl Hugo: commanding you throughout all your Dioceſs publickly to denounce the ſaid Earl as accurſed, ſo that, according to the diſcipline of the Church, he be ſequeſtred from the fellowſhip of all faithful people. Alſo, it is not unknown to your brotherhood, how long we have born with the tranſgreſſions of the Biſhop of London; who, amongſt other his facts, I would to God were not a great doer, and fautour of this Schiſm, and ſubverter of the Rites and Liberties of Holy Church. Wherefore we, being ſupported with the authority of Apoſtolick See, have alſo Excommunicated him; beſides alſo the Biſhop of Salisbury, becauſe of his diſobedience and contempt: and others likewiſe, upon divers and ſundry cauſes, whoſe names here follow ſubſcribed: Hugo Bernards Son, Rodulph of Brock, Robert of Brock a Clerk, Hugo de S. Cleare, and Ictardus a Clerk of Norfolk, Nigellus of Scacavil, and Richard Chaplin, William of Haſting, and the Frier which poſſeſſeth my Church of Monchot. We therefore charge and command you by the Authority Apoſtolical and ours, and in the vertue of obedience, and in the peril of Salvation, and of your Order; that ye cauſe theſe openly to be proclaimed Excommunicate, throughout all your Dioceſs, and to command all the faithful to avoid their company. Fare ye well in the Lord. Let not your heart be troubled, nor fear: for we ſtand ſure through the aſſiſtance of the Apoſtolick See, God being our borow againſt the pretenſed ſhifts of the malignant ſort, and againſt all their appellations. Furthermore, all ſuch as have been ſolemnly cited of us ſhall ſuſtain the like ſentence of Excommunication, if God will, on the Aſcenſion-day: unleſs they ſhall otherwiſe agree with me. That is, to wit, Geoffrey Archdeacon of Canterbury, and Robert his Vicar, Rice of Wilceſter, Richard of Lucy, William Giffard, Adam of Cherings, with ſuch others more: which either at the commandment of the King, or upon their own proper temerity, have invaded the goods and poſſeſſions either appertaining to us, or to our Clerks about us. With theſe alſo we do Excommunicate all ſuch as be known, either with aid or counſel, to have incenſed or ſet forward the proceeding of our King againſt the liberties of the Church, and exiling of the innocents. And ſuch alſo as be known to impeach or let by any manner of way the meſſengers (ſent either from the Pope, or from us) for the neceſſities of the Church. Fare you well again, and ever.

The Biſhop of London Excommunicated.

This Biſhop was Excommunicated becauſe he ſet in the Dean of Salisbury without the licence of him, being then beyond the Seas.

Hitherto haſt thou ſeen (gentle Reader) divers and ſundry Letters of Thomas Becket, whereby thou mayſt collect a ſufficient Hiſtory of his doings and demeanor, though nothing elſe were ſaid further of him, concerning his luſty and haughty ſtomach, about that which beſeemed either his degree or cauſe which he took in hand. And here peradventure I may ſeem in the ſtory of this one Man to tarry too long, having to write of ſo many others better than it: yet for the weaker ſort, which have counted him, and yet do count him for a Saint, having in themſelves little underſtanding to judge or diſcern in the cauſes of Men, I thought to add this Letter more, wherein he complaineth of his King to a Foreign power; doing what in him did lie, to ſtir for his own cauſe mortal War to the deſtruction of many. For ſuppoſe wrong had been offered him of his Prince, was it not enough for him to flie? What cauſe had he, for his own private revenge, ſo ſet Potentates in publick diſcord? Now having no juſt cauſe, but rather offering injury in a falſe quarel, ſo to complain of his Prince; what is to be ſaid of this, let every Man judge which ſeeth this Letter.

An Epiſtle of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury to Pope Alexander.

Amantiſſimo Patri & D. Alexandro, Dei gratia ſummo Pont. Thomas Cant. Eccleſiæ humilis miniſter, debitam & devotam obedientiam, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

A ſeditious complaint of Becket to the Pope againſt his King.

"To our moſt loving Father and Lord, Alexander by "the Grace of God Biſhop, Thomas the humble Miniſter "and Servant of the Church of Canterbury due and reve-"rend obedience. Long enough and too long moſt loving "Father have I forborn, ſtill looking after the amend-"ment of the King of England, but no fruit have I reap-"ed of this my long patience: nay rather, whileſt that un-"wiſely I do thus forbear, I augment and procure the de-"triment and diminiſhing of mine authority, as alſo of the "Church of God: For oftentimes have I by devout and "Religious Meſſengers invited him to make condign ſa-"tisfaction, as alſo by my Letters (the copies whereof I "have ſent you) intimated and pronounced Gods ſeverity "and vengeance againſt him, unleſs he repent and amend. "But he (that notwithſtanding) groweth from evil to worſe, "oppreſſing and conculcating the Church and Sanctuary "of God; perſecuting both me and thoſe which take part "with me: inſomuch that with fearful threatning words "his purpoſe is to terrifie ſuch, as (for Gods cauſe and mine "own) ſeek any way to relieve and help me. He wrote alſo "Letters unto the Abbat of the Ciſtercian Order, That as he "favoured the Abbacy of that his Order (which was in his "power, ſaid he) he would not accept me into the Fellow-"ſhip thereof, nor do any thing elſe for me. What ſhould "I uſe many words? So much hath the rigor and ſeverity "as well of the King as of his Officers, under our pati-"ence and ſufferance, ſhewed it ſelf; that if a great num-"ber of Men, yea, and that of the moſt Religious ſort, "ſhould ſhew unto you the matter as it is indeed (and that "upon their oath taken) I partly doubt whether your holi-"neſs would give credit unto them or not. With heavi-"neſs of mind therefore I conſidering theſe things, and be-"holding as well the peril of the King as of our ſelf, have "publickly condemned not only thoſe pernicious cuſtoms, "but all thoſe perverſities and wicked doings whereby the "Church of England is diſturbed and brought to confuſion; "as alſo the writing whereby they were confirmed; Ex-"communicating generally as well the obſervers and exact-"ers thereof, as alſo the inventers and patrons of the ſame, "with their favourers, counſellours, and coadjutors what-"ever, either of the Clergy or Laity, abſolving alſo our "Biſhops from their oath, whereby they were ſo ſtrictly in "joyned to the obſervation of the ſame. Theſe are the "Articles which in that writing I have principally condem-"ned, Firſt, That it is inhibited to appeal unto the See "Apoſtolical for any cauſe, but by the Kings Licence. That "a Biſhop may not puniſh any Man for perjury, or for "breaking of his troth. That a Biſhop may not Excom-"municate any Man that holdeth of the King In capite, or "elſe interdict either their Lands or Offices without the Godly Articles condemned by Becket.

" Kings licence. That Clerks and Religious Men may be " taken from us to ſecular judgment. That the King or any " other Judge may hear and decide the Cauſes of the Church " and Tithes. That it ſhall not be lawful for any Archbiſhop " or Biſhop to go out of the Realm, and to come at the " Popes call without the Kings licence; and divers others " ſuch as theſe. Namely alſo I have Excommunicated John " of Oxenford, who hath communicated with the Schiſ- " matick and Excommunicate perſon (Reginald Colonien- " ſis) the which alſo, contrary to the commandment of " the Lord Pope and ours, hath uſurped the Deanry of the " Church of Salisbury, and hath (to renew his Schiſm) " taken an oath in the Emperors Court. Alſo I have de- " nounced and excommunicated Richard of Worceſter, be- " cauſe he is fallen into the ſame damnable Hereſie, and " communicated with that famous Schiſmatick of Cullen; " deviſing and forging all miſchief poſſible, with the Schiſ- " maticks and Flemings, to the deſtruction of the Church " of God, and eſpecially of the Church of Rome, by com- " poſition made by the King of England and them. Alſo " Richard de Lucy, and Jocelin de Baliol, which have " furthered the favours of the Kings Tyranny and workers " of their Hereſies. Alſo Ranulph de Broc, and Hugo de " Sancto Claro, and Thomas the Son of Bernard, which " have uſurped the poſſeſſions and goods of the Church of " Canterbury without our licence and conſent. We have " alſo Excommunicated all thoſe, which without our li- " cence do ſtretch out their hands to the poſſeſſions and " goods of the Church of Canterbury. The King him- " ſelf we have not yet Excommunicated perſonally, ſtill " waiting for his amendment: whom (notwithſtanding) " we will not defer to Excommunicate, unleſs he quickly " amend, and be warned by that he hath done. And there- " fore that the Authority of the See Apoſtolick, and the " liberty of the Church of God, which in theſe parts are al- " moſt utterly loſt, may be by ſome means reſtored, it is " meet and very neceſſary that what we have herein done " the ſame be of your Holineſs ratified, and by your Letters " confirmed. Thus I wiſh your Holineſs long to proſper " and flouriſh.

Becket reprehended for complaining of his King.

By this Epiſtle, he that liſteth to underſtand of the doings and quarrels of Becket, may partly judge what is to be thought thereof. Which his doings although in ſome part they may be imputed either to ignorance of mind, or blindneſs of zeal, or humane frailty; yet in this point, ſo vilely to complain of his natural Prince, for the zeal of the Pope, he can by no wiſe be defended. But ſuch was the blindneſs then of the Prelates in thoſe days, who meaſured and eſteemed the dignity and liberties of Chriſts Church by no other thing, than only by goods and poſſeſſions flowing and abounding in the Clergy; and thought no greater point of Religion to be in the Church, than to maintain the ſame. For the which cauſe they did moſt abominably abuſe Chriſtian Diſcipline and Excommunication of the Church at that time; as by this aforeſaid Epiſtle may appear. And what marvel if the acts and doings of this Archbiſhop ſeem now to us in theſe days both fond and ſtrange: ſeeing the Suffragans of his own Church and Clergy, writing to him, could not but reprehend him, as in this their Epiſtle tranſlated out of Latine into Engliſh may be ſeen.

Excommunication abuſed in private revenge about lands and poſſeſſions.

An effectual and pithy Letter, full of reaſon and perſwaſion, ſent from all the Suffragans of the Church of Canterbury to Thomas Becket their Archbiſhop.

QUÆ veſtro (pater) in longinquo diſceſſu inopinata rei ipſius novitate turbata ſunt; veſtra ſperabamus humilitate, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

The Letters of the Biſhops to Becket.

" Such troubles and perturbations as happned through " the ſtrangeneſs of your departure out of the Realm, we " hoped by your humility and prudence ſhould have been " reduced again (Gods Grace working withal) into a peace- " able tranquility. And it was no little joy to us, to hear " ſo of you in thoſe parts where you are converſant, how " humbly you there behaved your ſelf, nothing vaunting " your ſelf againſt your Prince and King, and that you at- " tempt no riſings or wreſtlings againſt his Kingdom, but " that you bear with much patience the burthen of poverty, " and gave your ſelf to Reading and Prayer, and to redeem " the loſs of your time ſpent, with faſting, watchings, " and tears; and ſo, being occupied with ſpiritual ſtudies, " to tend and riſe up to the perfection of Vertue, &c. But " now, through the ſecret relation of certain, we hear (that " we are are ſorry of) that you have ſent unto him a " threatning Letter, wherein there is no ſalvation premiſed. " In the which alſo ye pretend no intreating nor prayers for " the obtaining of favour, neither do uſe any friendly man- " ner in declaring what you write, but menacing with much " auſterity, threaten to interdict him, and to cut him from " the ſociety of the Church. Which thing if you ſhall ac- " compliſh with like ſeverity, as the words ye threaten to " do, you ſhall not only put us out of all hope of any peace, " but alſo put us in fear of hatred and diſcord without mea- " ſure, and without all redreſs amongſt us. But wiſdom will " conſider before the end of things, labouring and indea- " vouring to finiſh that which ſhe wiſely beginneth. There- " fore your diſcretion ſhall do well diligently to forecaſt " and conſider whereto ye tend; what end may enſue there- " of, and whereabout ye go. Certes we (for our parts) " hearing that we do hear, are diſcouraged from that we " hoped for, which, before having ſome good comfort of " tranquility to come, are caſt from hope to deſpair: ſo " that while one is drawn thus againſt another, almoſt " there is no hope nor place left to make intreaty or ſuppli- " cation. Wherefore writing to your Fatherhood, we " exhort and counſel you by way of Charity, That you " add not trouble to trouble, and heap injury upon injury: " but that you ſo behave your ſelf, that all menaces ſet a- " ſide, ye rather give your ſelf to Patience and Humility, " and to yield your cauſe to the Clemency of God, and to " the mercy of your Prince; and in ſo doing you ſhall heap " coals of Charity upon the heads of many. Thus Charity " ſhall be kindled, and that which menacings cannot do " (by Gods help and good Mens counſel) pity peradven- " ture and godlineſs ſhall obtain. Better it were to ſuſtain " Poverty with praiſe, than in great promotions to be a " common note to all Men. It is right well known unto all " Men, how beneficial the King hath been unto you, from " what baſeneſs to what dignity he hath advanced you, " and alſo into his own familiarity hath ſo much preferred " you, that from the North Ocean to the Mount Perineus " he hath ſubdued all things to your authority: in ſo much " that they were amongſt all other accounted for Men right " fortunate, whoſoever could find any favour with you.

" And furthermore, leſt that your eſtimation ſhould be " over matched by any Nobility, he (againſt the mind of " his Mother, and of his Realm) hath placed and ratified " you ſubſtantially in Eccleſiaſtical Dignity, and advanced " you to this honour wherein ye ſtand: truſting through " your help and counſel to Reign more ſafely and proſpe- " rouſly. Now, if he ſhall find diſquietneſs, wherein he " truſted to have quietneſs; what ſhall all Men ſay or think " of you? What recompence or retribution ſhall this be " thought to be for ſo many and great benefits taken? " Therefore (if it ſhall pleaſe you) ye ſhall do well to fa- " vour and ſpare your fame and eſtimation, and to overcome " your Lord and Soveraign with Humility and Charity. " Whereunto if our advertiſement cannot move you; yet " the love and fidelity you bear to the Biſhop and Holy " Church of Rome ought to incline you thereunto, and " not to attempt any ſuch thing, whereby the troubles of " the Church our Mother may increaſe, or whereby her " dolor may be augmented in the loſs of them, whoſe diſ- " obedience now ſhe doth bewail: For what if it ſo hap- " pen through provocation, that the King (whom all his " Subjects and Kingdoms obey) ſhould relinquiſh the Pope, " which God forbid, and ſhould deny all obedience to " him, as he denieth to the King help or aid againſt you? " what inconvenience would grow thereof? And think you, " he hath not great inſtigations, ſupplications, gifts, and " many fair promiſes ſo to do? Yet he (notwithſtanding) " abideth firm hitherto in the rock, deſpiſing with a vali- " ant mind all that the world can offer. This one thing " feareth us, leſt his mind (whom no worldly offers can " aſſail, no glory, riches, not treaſure can overturn) only " through indignation of unkindneſs be ſubverted. Which " thing if it chance to happen through you, then may you ſit

" ſit down and ſing the Song of the Lamentation of Jere-
" my and weep your belly full.

" Conſider therefore, if it pleaſe you, and foreſee well
" with your ſelf, this purpoſe of yours, if it proceed, how " hurtful and perilous it will be; not only to the Pope,
" and to the Holy Church of Rome, but alſo to your ſelf
" moſt eſpecially. But ſome peradventure about you, of " haughty and high minded ſtoutneſs, more ſtout percaſe
" than wiſe, will not ſuffer you to take this way, but will " give you contrary counſel, to prove rather and declare
" what ye are able to do againſt your Lord and Prince,
" and to practiſe againſt him and all his the uttermoſt of " your power and authority, which power and authority
" of yours, to him that offendeth, is fearful; and to him
" that will not amend, terrible. Such counſel as this,

" withſtanding to be without fault we do not affirm: but yet
" always, that he is ready to amend and make ſatisfaction,
" that we ſpeak confidently and proteſt in his behalf.

The commendation of King Henry the Second, for his meekneſs and moderation.

" The King, appointed for the Lords annointed, provi-
" deth for the peace of his Subjects all that he is able: and " therefore to the intent he may conſerve this peace in his
" Churches and amongſt his Subjects committed to him;
" he willeth and requireth ſuch Ordinances due to Kings,
" and exhibited to them before time, alſo to be exhibited
" to him. Wherein if there hath any contradiction ſprung
" betwixt him and us, he being thereupon convented, and " admoniſhed from the Pope by the Reverend Biſhops of " London and Hereford, braſt not out into any defiance,
" but meekly and humbly anſwered, That wherein ſoever
" the Church or any Eccleſiaſtical perſon can ſhew himſelf

" this is the only and common Petition of us all, that your " Fatherly care will diligently provide for your flock and
" ſheep committed to you, ſo that they miſcarry not, or " run to any ruine through any inconſiderate or too much
" heady counſel in you: but rather, through your ſoftneſs
" and ſufferance, they may obtain life, peace and ſecurity.
" It doth move us all, that we hear of late to be done to " you againſt the Biſhop of Salisbury, and the Dean of the " ſame Church, proſperouſly, as ſome Men ſuppoſe; a-
" gainſt whom you have given out the Sentence of Ex-
" communication and Condemnation, before any queſtion
" of their crime was; following therein, as ſeemeth more
" the heat of haſtineſs than the path of Righteouſneſs. This " is a new order of judgment, unheard of yet to this day
" in our Laws and Canons, firſt to condemn a Man, and " after to inquire of the fact committed. Which order

" ner againſt our Soveraign and King, or againſt us and " our Churches, and Pariſhes committed to us, to the " detriment of the Pope, and the Holy Church of Rome,
" and to the no little confuſion of us all; therefore we lay
" here againſt you, for our ſelves, the remedy of appellati-
" on. And as before, openly in the publick face of the " Church with lively voyce we appealed to the Pope for " certain perils that might have happened: ſo now again
" in writing we appeal to the ſame, aſſigning the term of " our appellation the day of the Lords Aſcenſion. Moſt

" you, taking a better way with you in this matter, will " let your cauſe fall, ſparing herein both the labours and " charges, as well of your ſelf, as ours alſo. And thus we " wiſh you right well to fare, Reverend in the Lord.

The Reſcript or Anſwer again of Thomas Becket to all his Suffragans, not obeying but confuting the counſel ſent.

FRaternitatis veſtræ Scriptum (quod tamen prudentiæ veſtræ communi Concilio non facile credimus emanaſſe) nuper ex inſperato ſuſcipimus, &c.

Your brotherly Letters ſent, albeit not by the whole aſſent of your wiſdoms written, as I ſuppoſe, of late I received upon a ſudden: the Contents whereof ſeem to contain more ſharpneſs than ſolace. And would to God they proceeded more of ſincere zeal of godlineſs, or affection of charity, than of diſobedience or froward wilfulneſs. For charity ſeeketh not the things that be her own, but which appertain to Jeſus Chriſt. It had been your duty (if there be truth in the Goſpel, as moſt undoubtedly there is) and if you would faithfully have accomplihed his buſineſs whoſe perſon you repreſent, rather to have feared him, which can caſt both body and ſoul to Hell; than him whoſe power extendeth no further than to the body; rather to have obeyed God than Man, rather your Father than your Maſter or Lord, after the example of him who was to his Father obedient unto the death; which died for us, leaving us example to follow his ſteps. Let us die therefore with him, and lay down our lives for the deliverance of his Church out of the yoke of bondage, and tribulation of the oppreſſor. Which Church he hath founded, and whoſe liberty he hath procured with his own proper blood: leſt if we ſhall do otherwiſe, it may happly fall upon us which is written in the Goſpel; Whoſo loveth his own life more than me, is not worthy of me. This ye ought to know, That if it be right which your Captain commandeth, your duty requireth to obey his will; if not, ye ought then rather to obey God than Men.

Scriptures in words rightly alledged, but falſly applied.

I deny your minor, M. Becket.

One thing I will ſay (if I may be ſo bold to tell it unto you) I have now ſuffered and abſtained a long ſpace, waiting if the Lord had given you to take a better heart unto you, which have turned cowardly your backs in the day of battel; or if any of you would have returned again to ſtand like a wall for the Houſe of Iſrael; at leaſt if he had but ſhewed himſelf in the field, making but the countenance of a Warrior againſt them, which ceaſe not daily to inſeſt the Lamb of God, I waited, and none came; I ſuffered, and none roſe up; I held my peace, and none would ſpeak; I diſſembled, and none would ſtand with me in like ſemblance: wherefore ſeeing I ſee no better towardneſs in you, this remaineth only, to enter action of complaint againſt you, and to cry againſt mine Enemies; Riſe up, O Lord, and judge my cauſe, revenge the blood of the Chuch which is waſted and oppreſſed. The pride of them which hate his liberty riſeth up ever, neither is there any that doth good, no not one. Would God, Brethren beloved, there were in you any mind or affection to defend the liberty of the Church; for ſhe is builded upon a ſure Rock, that although ſhe be ſhaken, yet ſhe cannot be overthrown. And why then ſeek ye to to confound me? Nay rather your ſelves in me, than me in you? A Man which hath taken upon me all the peril, have ſuſtained all the rebukes, have ſuſtained all the injuries, have ſuffered alſo for you all, to very baniſhment.

The Church of Chriſt cannot be be overthrown: Ergo, Becket ought not to be reſiſted.

And ſo it was expedient, one to ſuffer for that Church, that thereby it might be releaſed out of ſervitude. Theſe things diſcuſs you ſimply with your ſelves, and weigh the the matter. Attend I ſay diligently in your minds for your parts, that God for his part removing from your eyes all Majeſty of Rule and Impery, as he is no accepter of perſons, may take from your hearts the veil, that ye may underſtand and ſee what ye have done, what ye intend to do, and what ye ought to do. Tell me which of you all can ſay, I have taken from him, ſince the time of my promotion, either Ox or Aſs. If I have defrauded him of any peny, if I have miſ-judged the cauſe of any Man wrongfully, or if by the detriment of any perſon I have ſought mine own gain, let him complain, and I will reſtore him fourfold. And if I have not offended you, what then is the cauſe that ye thus leave and forſake me in the cauſe of God? Why bend ye ſo your ſelves againſt me in ſuch a cauſe, that there is none more ſpecial belonging to the Church?

Servitude and liberty of the Church wrongfully defined.

The words of holy Scripture clearly applied.

Brethren, ſeek not to confound your ſelves and the Church of God (ſo much as in you is) but turn to me, and you Turn to thee? Nay turn thou to the Lord and thou ſhalt be ſaved.

you ſhall be ſafe. For the Lord ſaith, I will not the death of a ſinner, but rather he ſhould convert and live. Stand with me manfully in the War, take your armor and your ſhield to defend me. Take the ſword of the word of the mighty God, that we altogether may withſtand more valiantly the malignant enemies, ſuch as go about to take away the ſoul of the Church, which is her liberty: without which liberty ſhe hath no power againſt them that ſeek to incroach to their inheritance, the poſſeſſion of Gods Sanctuary. If ye will hear and follow me, know ye that the Lord will be with you, and with us all in the defence of the liberty of his Church. Otherwiſe if ye will not, the Lord judge betwixt me and you, and require the confuſion of his Church at your hands. Which Church, whether the world will or no, ſtandeth firmly in the word of the Lord, whereupon ſhe is builded, and ever ſhall, till the hour come that ſhe ſhall paſs from this world to the Father; for the Lord ever doth ſupport her with his hand.

Wherefore to return to the matter: Brethren, remember well with your ſelves (which thing ye ought not to forget) what danger I was brought unto, and the Church of God alſo while I was in England, at my departing out of England, and after my departure from thence alſo; in what danger it ſtandeth at this preſent day; but eſpecially at that time, when as at Northampton Chriſt was judged again in my perſon, before the Judgment-ſeat of the high Preſident. Whoever heard the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (being troubled for injuries done to him and to his Church, and appealing to the Pope of Rome) to be judged, condemned, appealed, and put to his Sureties, and that of his own Suffragans? Where is this Law ſeen, or the Authority (nay rather perverſity) of this Canon heard off? And why yet ſhame ye not at this your enormity? Why are ye not confounded? Or why doth not this confuſion work in you repentance, and repentance drive you to due ſatisfaction before God and Men? For theſe and ſuch other injuries done to God and to his Church, and to me for Gods cauſe (which with a good Conſcience I ought to ſuffer, becauſe that without danger of ſoul I ought not to diſſemble them) I chuſe rather to abſent my ſelf for a ſeaſon, and to dwell quietly in the Houſe of my Lord, than in the Tabernacle of ſinners, until the time that (their iniquity being compleat) the hearts of the wicked, and the cogitations of the ſame ſhall be opened. And theſe injuries were the cauſe both of my appeal from the King, and of my departure from thence, which ye do term to be ſudden. But if ye will ſpeak the truth which ye know, it ought no leſs than to be ſudden: leſt (being fore-known) it might have been prevented and ſtopped. And as God turned the matter, it happned for the beſt, both for the honour of the King, and better ſafety of them, which (ſeeking my harm) ſhould have brought ſlander to the King. If ſuch troubles followed upon my departing as ye ſay, let them be imputed to him which gave cauſe, the fault is in the worker, not in the departer; in him that purſueth, not in him that avoideth injuries. What would ye more? I preſented my ſelf to the Court, declaring both the cauſes of my coming and of my Appeal, declaring alſo the wrongs and injuries done to me and to my Church, and yet could have no anſwer: neither was there any that laid any thing againſt me, before we came to the King. Thus while we ſtood waiting in the Court, whether any would come againſt me or not, they ſent to my Officials; charging them not to obey me in my Temporalities, nor to owe any ſervice to me or to any of mine. After my appellation made in the Court, my Church was ſpoiled; we and they about us deprived of our goods, Outlawed both of the Clergy and of the Laity, Men, Women, and Infants; the goods of the Church, that is, the patrimony of the Crucifix, confiſcate, and part of the money turned to the Kings uſe, part to your own Coffers. Brother Biſhop of London, if this be be true that we hear of you, and that to the uſe of your own Church ye convert this mony; we charge you and require you forthwith by vertue of obedience, that within forty days after the ſight of theſe Letters, all delay and excuſe ſet aſide, ye reſtore again within the time aforeſaid, all ſuch goods and parcels as you have taken away: for it is unmeet and contrary to all Law, one Church to be inriched with the ſpoil of another Church. If ye ſtand upon the authority that ſet you a work, you muſt underſtand, that in matters concerning the Church goods, he can give no lawful authority, which committeth violent injury, &c.

Unbeſeeming words of high preſumption. Chriſt is not judged in the perſon of any traytor.

Conſcience made where is none.

But he leaveth out here the manner of his coming to the Court and the forwardneſs of his behavior.

What authority and what Scripture giveth this Prerogative to Princes upon Church goods, which you would attribute to them? What? will they lay for them the remedy of Appeal? God forbid. It were evil with the Church of God, if when the Sacriligious extortioner hath violently invaded other Mens goods (eſpecially the goods of the Church) he ſhould after defend him with the title of Appeal, &c.

Becket ſeemeth here more skilful on his Mark-Book than of the Book of holy Scripture, otherwiſe he might ſee it no new thing in the old Law for Kings to deprive Prieſts and to place whom they would. Kings in the old Law did not intermeddle with the Prieſts Office in ſome things that were forbidden: but yet Kings were Officers over Prieſts to correct them when they did amiſs. If ye meant of Achaz and Oze in the Old Teſtament, then we deny your minor.

Do not Brethren ſo confound altogether the right of the Church and of the Temporal Regiment: for theſe two are much different, one borrowing his authority of the other. Read the Scriptures, and you ſhall find what and how many Kings have periſhed for taking upon them the Prieſtly Office. Therefore let your diſcretion provide, leſt for this your doing Gods puniſhment light upon you; which if it come, it will be hard for you very eaſily to eſcape. Provide alſo and ſee to your King, whoſe favour ye prefer before the wealth and profit of the Church; leſt it happen (which God forbid) that he doth periſh with all his Houſe, after the example of them which for the like crime were plagued. And if you ceaſe not off from that ye begin, with what Conſcience can I diſſemble or forbear, but muſt needs puniſh you? Let him diſſemble with you who liſt (having authority ſo to do, truly I will not) there ſhall be no diſſimulation found in me. And where you write in your Letters concerning my promotion, that it was againſt the voyce of the whole Realm, and that the Church did reclaim againſt it; what ſhould I ſay to you, but that which ye know right well, The lie, which the mouth doth willingly ſpeak, killeth the ſoul? but eſpecially the words of a Prieſts mouth ought ever to go with verity. As touching this matter, I appeal to your own Conſcience whether the form of my Election ſtood not fully with the conſent of them all to whom the Election belonged, having alſo the aſſent of the Prince by his Son, and of them which were ſent thereto. And if there were ſome that repugned the ſame, he that was troubled and is guilty, let him ſpeak.

Ye ſay moreover, That I was exalted and promoted from a baſe and low degree to this dignity by him. I grant that I came of no Royal or Kingly blood: yet notwithſtanding I had rather be in the number of them, whom vertue of mind than of birth maketh noble. Peradventure I was born in a poor Cottage, of poor Parentage; and yet through Gods clemency, which knoweth how to work mercy with his ſervants, and which cheriſheth the humble and low things, to confound the high and mighty, in this my poor and low eſtate, before I came to the Kings ſervice, I had abundantly and wealthily to live withal (as ye know) amongſt my Neighbors and Friends. And David even from the Sheepfold was taken up and made a King; Peter of a Fiſher was made a Prince of the Church; who, for his blood being ſhed for the name of Chriſt, deſerved to have in Heaven a Crown, and in Earth name and renown: would to God we could do the like! We be the ſucceſſors of Peter, and not of Kings and Emperors.

They be the ſucceſſors and ſons of Saints, not that hold the places of Saints, but that do the works of Saints. Hieron.

And where ye ſeem to charge me (by inſinuation) with ingratitude: Thus I anſwer, There is no offence capital or infamous, unleſs it proceed from the heart and intention. As if a Man commit a murther unwillingly, although he be called a Murtherer, yet he is not thereby puniſhable: and ſo, although I owe my duty and ſervice with reverence to my King, yet I have forborn him as my Lord, if I have warned him, and talked with him Fatherly and gently as with a Son, and in talking with him could not be heard: if therefore, I ſay, being inforced thereunto, and againſt my will, I do exerciſe upon him the cenſure of due ſeverity, in ſo doing I ſuppoſe I make rather with him than againſt him, and rather deſerve at his hand thanks for my correction, than note or ſuſpition of unkindneſs or puniſhment for the fact. Sometimes a Man againſt his will receiveth a benefit. As when neceſſity cauſeth a Man to be reſtrained from doing that which he ought not to do: he that doth ſo reſtrain him, though he ſtop him, doth not hurt him, but rather profiteth him for his ſouls health. Another thing, that defendeth us from ingratitude, is our Father and Patron Chriſt, which in that he is our Father, to whom we as Children owe obedience, then are we bound as Children by neceſſity to obey his commandment, in warning the evil-doer, in correcting the diſobedient, and in bridling the obſtinate: which if we do not, we run into danger to have his blood required at our hands. Ye ſet forth likewiſe and ſhew, what loſs we thereby may ſuſtain of our temporalities. But ye ſpeak no word of the loſs of our ſouls.

Moreover,

If the King had been an Adulterer & Tyrant againſt the true doctrine or preaching of Chriſt, then might this reaſon ſerve, and God more to be obeyed than man. Now where did Becket learn that the King in his Temporal right was not to be obeyed? Take heed ye mate all, if ye open that door.

Moreover, as concerning the departure of the King from the homage of the Church of Rome which in your Letters ye ſeem to pretend, or rather threaten: God forbid, I ſay, that the Devotion or Faith of our King ſhould ever ſwarve away from the obedience and reverence of the Church of Rome, for any temporal commodity or incommodity: which thing to do is very damnable in any private Subject, much more in the Prince which draweth many other with him: therefore God forbid, that ever any faithful Man ſhould once think ſo hainous a deed. And you according to your direction take heed leſt the words of your mouth infect any perſon or perſons therein, occaſioning them by your words to ſuch dangers and damnable matter, like to the golden Cup which is called the Cup of Babylon, which for the outward gold no Man will refuſe to drink of, but after they have drunk thereof, they are poyſoned.

This John was called a Schiſmatick, becauſe he took part with Reginald Archbiſhop of Cullen and the Emperor againſt Alexander the Pope.

And where ye lay to my charge for the ſuſpending of the Reverend Father the Biſhop of Salisbury, and for Excommunicating of John Dean of the ſame Church for a Schiſmatick, (by knowledge and proceſs had of the matter) to this I anſwer: That both theſe are juſtly and condignly Excommunicate, and if ye underſtand perfectly the condition of the matter, and the right order of judgments, ye will ſay no leſs. For this ſtandeth with good authority (as ye know) that in manifeſt and notorious crimes, this knowledge and order of proceeding is not requiſite. Perpend with your ſelves diligently, what the Biſhop of Salisbury did concerning the Deanery, after that he was prohibited of the Pope and of us, under pain of Excommunication: and then ſhall you better underſtand, that upon ſo manifeſt diſobedience, ſuſpenſion did rightly follow, as ye read in the Decree of S. Clement, ſaying, If they do not obey their Prelates, all manner of perſons of what order ſo ever they be, whether they ſhall be Princes of high or low degree, and all other people, ſhall not only be infamed, but alſo baniſhed from the Kingdom of God, and the fellowſhip of the faithful. As concerning John of Oxford, this we ſay, That Excommunication cometh divers ways. Some are Excommunicate by the Law denouncing them Excommunicate. Some by the ſentence of the Prelate. Some by communicating with them which are Excommunicated. Now he that hath fallen into this damnable Hereſie, in participating with Schiſmaticks, whom the Pope hath Excommunicate, he draweth to himſelf the ſpot and leproſie of like Excommunication. Wherefore, ſeeing he (contrary to the Popes expreſs commandment and ours, being charged under pain of Excommunication to the contrary) took upon him the Deanery of Salisbury, we have denounced him, and hold him Excommunicate, and all his doings we diſannul by the authority of the eighth Synod, ſaying, If any Man either privily or apartly ſhall ſpeak, or communicate with him that is Excommunicated, he draweth unto himſelf the puniſhment of like Excommunication. And now forſomuch as you, Brother, (Biſhop of London) which ought to know that ſaying of Gregory the Seventh; If any Biſhop ſhall conſent to the Fornication of Prieſts, Deacons, &c. within his Precinct, for reward, favour, or petition, or doth not by authority of his Office correct the vice, let him be ſuſpended from his Office. And again, that ſaying of Pope Leo, which is this; If any Biſhop ſhall inſtitute or conſecrate ſuch a Prieſt as ſhall be unmeet and unconvenient, if he ſcape with the loſs of his own proper dignity, yet he ſhall loſe the power of inſtituting any more, &c.

Clements Decree.

Divers ways of Excommunication.

The Council ſpeaketh of ſuch which be worthily Excommunicated.

This Gregory otherwiſe called Hildebrand was he that firſt took away Prieſts marriage, condemning all Prieſts for Fornicators which had Wives.

Therefore, forſomuch, I ſay, as you, knowing this, have double wiſe offended againſt the Sentence of theſe Canons, we command you, and in the vertue of obedience injoyn you, that if it be ſo, within three months after the receipt hereof, you will ſubmit and offer your ſelf to due correction and ſatisfaction to the council of our fellow Biſhops, for theſe your ſo great exceſſes; leſt others through your example run into the like offence, and we be conſtrained to proceed againſt you with ſeverer ſentence.

Finally (in cloſing up your Letter) where ye bring in for your appellation againſt me, a ſafegard for you, which rather indeed is an hinderance to you, that we ſhould not proceed againſt the invaders of the Church goods, nor againſt the King in like cenſure, as we have done againſt the Biſhop of Salisbury (as ye ſay) and his Dean. To this I Anſwer, God forbid that we have, or elſe ſhould hereafter proceed or do any thing againſt the King or his Land, or againſt you or your Churches, inordinately or otherwiſe than is convenient. But what if you ſhall exceed in the ſame or like tranſgreſſion, as the Biſhop of Salisbury hath done? Think ye then your appellation ſhall help you from the diſcipline of our ſeverity, that ye ſhall not be ſuſpended? Mark ye diligently whether this be a lawful appeal, and what is the form thereof. We know that every one that appealeth, either doth it in his own name, or in the name of another: if in his own, either it is for ſome grievance inferred already, or elſe for that he feared after to be inferred againſt him. Now concerning the firſt, I am ſure there is no grievance that you can complain of as yet (God be thanked) that you have received at my hand, for the which you ſhould appeal from me: neither have you (I truſt) any cauſe ſpecial againſt me ſo to do. If ye do it for fear of any thing that is to come, leſt I ſhould trouble you and your Churches: conſider whether this be the fear that ought to fall in conſtant Men, or whether this be the Appeal which ought to ſuſpend or ſtay our power and authority that we have upon you and your Churches. It is thought therefore of wiſe Men (and we alſo judge no leſs) your Appeal to be of no force.

Diſcuſſing of a true appellation.

Firſt, for that it hath not the right form of a perfect appellation, and alſo becauſe it is not conſonant to reaſon, and lacketh order and help of the Law.

Furthermore, if your appellation be in another Mans name, either it is for the King (as moſt like it is) or for ſome other. If it be for the King, then you ought firſt to underſtand, that appellations are wont to be made to repel, and not to inferr injury: or to releaſe ſuch as be oppreſſed, that they ſhould not be opreſſed any more.

The form of a true appellation.

Wherefore if any Man ſhall enter any appellation (not truſting to the ſurety of his cauſe, but to delay the time, that ſentence be not given upon him) that appellation is not be received. For what ſtate will there be of the Church, if the liberty thereof being taken away, the goods of the Church ſpoiled, the Biſhops driven from their places, or at leaſt not received with full reſtitution of their goods, the invaders and ſpoilers thereof may defend themſelves by appealing, thereby to ſave themſelves from the penalty of their deſert?

What a ruine of the Church will this be? See what ye have done, and what ye ſay. Be you not the Vicars of Chriſt repreſenting him in Earth? Is it not your Office to correct and bridle ill-doers, whereby they may ceaſe to perſecute the Church? And is it not enough for them to be fierce and to rage againſt the Church, but that you ſhould take their part, ſetting your ſelves againſt us, to the deſtruction of the Church? Who ever heard of ſo monſtrous doings? Thus it ſhall be heard and ſaid of all Nations and Countries, That the ſuffragans of the Church of Canterbury (which ought to ſtand with their Metropolitan unto death in defence of the Church) now go about by the Kings commandment, ſo much as in them doth lie, to ſuſpend his authority, leſt he ſhould exerciſe his diſcipline of correction upon them that rebel againſt the Church. This one thing I know, that you cannot ſuſtain two ſorts of perſons at once, both to be the Appeal makers, and to be appealed up your ſelves. You be they which have made the appellation, you be they againſt whom the appellation is made. Is there any more Churches then one, and the body of the ſame? And how meet were it than, that you, being the members of the Church, ſhould hold together with the head thereof? I am afraid, Brethren, leſt it may be ſaid of us; Theſe be the Prieſts which have ſaid, Where is the Lord? And having the Law do not know the Law. Furthermore, this I ſuppoſe you (being diſcreet Men) are not ignorant of, that ſuch as enter any appellation there, are not wont to be heard, unleſs the matter of their appellation either belongeth to themſelves, or except ſpecial commandment force them thereunto, or elſe unleſs they take another Mans cauſe upon them. Firſt, That it belongeth nothing unto you, it is plain, forſomuch as the contrary rather pertaineth unto your duty; that is, to puniſh and to correct all ſuch as rebel againſt the Church. And if he which ſubverteth the liberty of the Church, and invadeth the goods thereof (converting them to his own uſe) be not heard appealing for his own defence, much leſs is another to be heard appealing for him. Wherefore, as in this caſe neither he can appeal for himſelf, nor yet command you ſo to do; ſo neither may you receive the commandment to appeal for him.

One perſon cannot both be the appeal-maker and the party appealed.

Thirdly,

Thirdly, as touching the taking of another Mans cauſe or buſineſs upon you: to this I ſay and affirm, That ye ought in no manner of wiſe ſo to do, ſpecially ſeeing the matter pertaineth to the oppreſſion of the Church, and whereupon inſueth great damage to the ſame.

Wherefore ſeeing it neither appertaineth to you, neither ought ye to receive any ſuch commandment, nor yet to take upon you any ſuch cauſe as that is, your appeal is neither to be heard, nor ſtandeth with any Law. Is this the devotion and conſolation of brotherly love which you exhibit to your Metropolitan, being for you in exile? God forgive you this clemency. And how now? Will ye look for your Letters and Meſſengers to be gently received here of us? Neither do I ſpeak this, as though there were any thing in hand betwixt your part and ours, or that we have done any thing inordinately againſt the perſon of the King, or againſt his Land, or againſt the perſons of the Church, or intend (by Gods mercy) ſo to do. And therefore we ſay briefly and affirm conſtantly, That our Lord the King cannot complain of any wrong or injury to be done unto him, if he (being often called upon by Letters and Meſſengers to acknowledge his fault, neither will confeſs his treſpaſs, nor yet come to any ſatisfaction for the ſame) have the cenſure of ſeverity by the Pope and us laid upon him: for no Man can ſay that he is unjuſtly intreated, whom the Law doth juſtly puniſh. And briefly to conclude, know you this for certain, That Extortioners, invaders, detainers of the Church Goods, and ſubverters of the liberties thereof, neither have any authority of the Law to maintain them, neither doth their appealing defend them, &c.

Though the Popes Law will not defend them, yet the Law of the Scripture will and doth.

A brief Cenſure upon the former Reſcript of Becket to his Suffragans, in the page before, with a general reſolution of the reaſons therein contained.

IF the King of England had been an Idolater, Covetous, and Adulterer, an Inceſtuous perſon, a murtherer, with ſuch like; then the zeal of this Archbiſhop (threatning the King and ſuch as took his part) had deſerved praiſe in this Epiſtle, and the Scripture would have born him out therein. For theſe and ſuch cauſes ſhould Biſhops proſecute the authority of the Goſpel againſt all perſons. But the matter ſtanding only upon Church Goods, liberty (or rather licenciouſneſs of Prieſts) making of Deans, Titles of Churches, ſuperiority of Crowning the King, with ſuch other: to ſtand ſo ſtiff in theſe, is not to defend the Church, but to rebel againſt the King. Again, if the principles, which he here groundeth upon, were true; to wit, that the Pope were to be obeyed before Princes, that the liberty of the Church ſtandeth upon the immunity of Prieſts exempted from Princes Laws, or upon ample poſſeſſions of the Church: or that the Popes Law ought to prevail in all foreign Countries, and to bind all Princes in their own Dominions, or that the ſentence of the Pope and his Popelings (how or by what affection ſoever it is pronounced) may ſtand by the undoubted ſentence of God: then all the arguments of this Epiſtle do proceed and conclude well. But if they ſtand not ratified upon Gods Word, but tottering upon Mans traditions; then whatſoever he inferreth or includeth thereupon (his aſſumption being falſe) cannot be true, according to the School ſaying: One inconveniency being granted in the beginning, innumerable follow thereupon. So in this Epiſtle it happeneth, as is above noted, that the major of this Man is true, but the minor is clean falſe, and to be denied.

The Letter of Matild the Empereſs, and Mother of the King, to Thomas Becket.

The Letter of the Empreſs to Becket.

MY Lord the Pope commanded me, and upon the forgivneſs of my ſins injoyned me, That I ſhould be a mediator and means of peace and concord between my Son and you, by reconciling of your ſelf to him, whereunto (as you know) you requeſted me. Wherefore the earneſter and with more affection (as well for the divine honour as for holy Church) I took the enterpriſe upon me. But this by the way, I aſſure you, that the King, his Barons, and Council, taketh it grievouſly, that you, whom he intirely loved, honoured and made chiefeſt in all this Realm, to the intent to have more comfort and better truſt in you, ſhould thus (as the report is) rebel, and ſtir his people againſt him. Yea and further, that as much as in you lyeth, you went about to diſinherit him, and deprive him of his Crown. Upon the occaſion whereof, I ſent unto you our truſty and familiar ſervant Lawrence Arch-deacon, by whom I pray you that I may underſtand your mind herein, and good will toward my Son, and how you mean to behave your ſelf (if my Prayer and Petition may be heard of him in your behalf) toward his Grace. But this one thing I aſſure you of, that unleſs it be through your great humility and moderation, evidently in you appearing, you cannot obtain the favour of the King. Herein what you mean to do, I pray you ſend me word by your proper Letters and Meſſengers.

But to proceed further in the order of the Hiſtory. After theſe Letters ſent to and fro, the year of our Lord 1169. which was the fifteenth year of the Reign of King Henry the Second, the King miſdoubting and fearing with himſelf, that the Archbiſhop would proceed (or exceed rather) in his Excommunication againſt his own perſon (to prevent the miſchief) made his appeal to the preſence of the Pope, requiring to have certain Legates ſent down from Rome from the Popes ſide, to take up the matter between the Archbiſhop and him; requiring moreover that they might alſo be abſolved that were interdicted. Whereupon two Cardinals, being ſent from Alexander the Pope with Letters to the King, came to Normandy: where they appointed the Archbiſhop to meet them before the King upon Saint Martyns day. But the Archbiſhop, neither agreeing with the day nor the place, delayed his coming till the eighth day after, neither would go any further than to Griſortium, where the two Cardinals and the Archbiſhop, with other Biſhops conventing together, had a certain intreaty of peace and reconciliation: but it came to no concluſion. The contents of which Intreaty or Action, becauſe it is ſufficiently contained in the Cardinals Letters, who were called Gulielmus and Otho, written to the Pope, it ſhall require no further labour, but to ſhew out the words of the Letter, where the ſumm of the whole may appear: The words of the Letter be theſe.

The Copy of the Epiſtle written and ſent by two Cardinals to the Pope, concerning the matter of the Archbiſhop Becket.

WIlliam and Otho, Cardinals of the Church of Rome, to Alexander the Pope, &c. Coming to the Land of the King of England, we found the Controverſie betwixt him and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury more ſharp and vehement than we would. For the King, and the greater part of them about him, ſaid, That the Archbiſhop had ſtirred up the French King grievouſly againſt him; and alſo the Earl of Flanders his Kinſman (who bare no diſpleaſure to him before) he made his open adverſary, ready to war againſt him, as is by diverſe evidences moſt certain. Thus when we came to Cadomus firſt to the Kings ſpeech, we gave the Letters of your Fatherhoo to his hands: which after that he had received and conſi dered (bringing forth withal other Letters received from yo before, ſomething divers and altering from theſe whic he received of us) he was moved and ſtirred with no lit tle indignation; ſaying, That the Archbiſhop, after ou departure from you, had received of you other contrary Let ters, by the vertue whereof he was exempted from our judg ment, ſo that he ſhould not be compelled to anſwer us Moreover, the ſaid King to us added and affirmed, and ſ did the Biſhops there preſent, teſtifying the ſame, Tha concerning the old and antient cuſtoms of his Progeni tors (whereof complaint was made to you) all that ſo the moſt part was falſe and untrue which was intimat to you; offering further to us, That if there were an ſuch cuſtoms or Laws in his time, that ſeemed prejudicia or diſagreeable to the Statutes of the Church he woul willingly be content to revoke and diſannul the ſam Whereupon we with other Archbiſhops, Biſhops an Abbots of the Land hearing the King ſo reaſonable laborec laboured by all the means we might, that the King ſhould not utterly break from us, but rather ſhould incline to us to have the matter brought before us betwixt him and the forenamed Archbiſhop. By reaſon whereof, we directed out our own Chaplains with Letters unto him, appointing him both time and place where ſafely he might meet with us in the Feaſt of Saint Martin. Nevertheleſs he, pretending certain excuſes; made his Dilatories, driving off the time from the day of Saint Martin to the Octaves following, which thing ſtirred the Kings heart more than is to be thought.

Becket ſtirring up the French King againſt the King of England.

A communication between Becket and the Cardinals.

Thus although we offered to the Archbiſhop ſafe coming, yet when he refuſed to meet us in the borders of the King, we, to ſatisfie his mind, condeſcended to meet him within the Land of the French King, in the place where he himſelf appointed, becauſe there ſhould be no let in us, whereby to ſtop his profit. After we had entred communication, we began to exhort him, all that we could, to ſubmit and humble himſelf to his Soveraign and King, who had heaped him with ſuch benefits and dignities; whereby matter might be given us to further occaſion of reconciling them together. He, being thus moved and exhorted by us, departed aſide to conſult with his council upon the matter. At length after counſel taken, he cometh again, anſwering in this manner: that he would ſubmit and humble himſelf to the King, Salvo honore Dei, & Eccleſiæ libertate, ſalva etiam honeſtate perſonæ ſuæ & poſſeſſionibus Eccleſiarum: & amplius, ſua & ſuorum in omnibus ſalva juſtitia, &c. That is, Saving the honour of God, and liberty of the Church, ſaving alſo the honeſty of his perſon, and poſſeſſions of Churches: and moreover, ſaving the juſtice of him and of all his in all things, &c. After which communication had amongſt us, we moved and required him more inſtantly, that he would come to the ſpecialities, when as yet he had brought nothing in, either which was certain or particular. Likewiſe we demanded of him, if he would, in all ſuch things contained and comprehended in our Letters, ſtand and ſubmit himſelf to our Letters, ſo as the King and the Biſhops before were contented to do. To the which he anſwering again, ſaid, That he had received from you a commandment, not to anſwer before he and all his were reſtored full to all their poſſeſſions; and then he would ſo proceed in the matter, according as he ſhould receive commandment from the Sea Apoſtolical.

Becket's addition.

Thus we breaking off communication, ſeeing that he neither would ſtand to judgment, nor come to conformity, thought to make relation thereof to the King, and ſo did: declaring that which he had expreſſed to us; yet not uttering all, but keeping back a great part of that which we had heard and ſeen. Which when the King and his Nobles had underſtanding of, he affirmed to us again; that he therein was cleared ſo much the more, for that the Archbiſhop would not ſtand to their judgment, nor abide their trial. After much heavineſs and lamentation of the King, the Archbiſhop, Biſhops and Abbats of the Realm requiring of us, whether we had any ſuch power, by vertue of our commiſſion, to withſtand him and proceed againſt him; and perceiving that our authority would not ſerve thereunto, and fearing leſt the foreſaid Archbiſhop, refuſing all order of judgment, would work again diſquietneſs to ſome Noble perſonages of the Realm: and ſeeing our authority could not extend ſo far to help them againſt him (taking a conſultation among themſelves) agreed together with one aſſent, to make their appellation to your audience, prefixing accordingly the term of their Appeal.

Becket would neither ſtand to judgment nor trial.

¶ And this is the Epiſtle of theſe two Cardinals ſent to the Pope: wherein may ſufficiently appear all the diſcourſe and manner of that aſſembly (although particularly every thing be not expreſſed) concerning the talk betwixt the Cardinals and the Archbiſhop. As when that William (who of the two Cardinals was the more eloquent) amongſt other communication had reaſoned long with him as concerning the peace of the Church: which Becket ſaid he preferred above all things. Well then (ſaith the Cardinal) ſeeing all this contention between the King and you riſeth upon certain Laws and cuſtoms to be abrogate, and that you regard the peace of the Church ſo much: then what ſay you? Will you renounce your Biſhoprick, and the King ſhall renounce his cuſtoms? The peace of the Church now lyeth in your hands, either to retain or to let go; what ſay you? To whom he anſwereth again, That the proportion was not like. For I, ſaith he (ſaving the honour of my Church and my perſon) cannot renounce my Biſhoprick. Contrary, it ſtandeth the King upon, for his ſouls health and honour to renounce theſe his ordinances and cuſtoms. Which thing he thus proved; becauſe the Pope had condemned thoſe cuſtoms, and he likewiſe with the Church of Rome had done the ſame, &c.

Becket loveth better his Biſhoprick than the peace of the Church, for all his gay talk.

The talk between the French King, the King of England, and Becket.

AFter the Cardinals were returned, the French King ſeeing the King of England diſquieted and ſollicitous to have peace (or at leaſt wiſe pretending to ſet an agreement between them) brought the matter to a communication among them. In which communication the French King made himſelf as umpire between them. The King of England, hearing that the Archbiſhop would commit himſelf to his arbitrement, was the more willing to admit his preſence. Whereupon, many being there preſent, the Archbiſhop, proſtrating himſelf at the Kings feet, declared unto him kneeling upon his knees, that he would commit the whole cauſe, whereof the diſſention roſe between them, unto his own arbitrement; adding thereto (as he did before) Salvo honore Dei; That is, Saving the honour of God. The King (as is ſaid before) being greatly offended at this word, hearing and ſeeing the ſtiffneſs of the Man ſticking ſo much to this word, Salvo honore, &c. was highly therewith diſpleaſed, rebuking him with many grievous words, as a Man proud and ſtubborn, and alſo charging him with ſundry and great benefits beſtowed upon him, as a perſon unkind, and forgetting what he had ſo gently done and beſtowed upon him.

Becket charged with unkindneſs.

And ſpeaking to the French King there preſent: See, Sir, (if it pleaſe you, ſaith the King of England) whatſoever diſpleaſeth this Man, that he ſaith to be contrary to the honour of God. And ſo by this means he will vindicate and challenge to himſelf both that is his and mine alſo. And yet notwithſtanding, for that I will not ſeem to do any thing contrary or prejudicial to Gods honour, this I offer him: There have been Kings in England before, both of greater and leſs puiſſance than I am; Likewiſe there have been Biſhops of Canterbury many both great and holy Men: What the greateſt and moſt holy of all his predeceſſors before him hath done to the leaſt of my progenitors and predeceſſors before me, let him do the ſame to me and I am content. They that ſtood by, hearing theſe words of the King, cried all with one voice, The King hath debaſed himſelf enough to the Biſhop. The Archbiſhop ſtaying a little at this with ſilence, What, ſaith the French King to him, my Lord Archbiſhop, will you be better than thoſe holy Men? will ye be greater than Peter? What ſtand you doubting? Here now have you peace and quietneſs put in your own hands, if ye will take it. To this the Archbiſhop anſwered again: Truth it is (ſaith he) my predeceſſors before me were much both better and greater than I, and of them every one for his time (although he did not extirpe and cut off all) yet ſomething they did pluck up and correct, which ſeemed adverſe and repugnant againſt Gods honour. For if they had taken all together away, no ſuch occaſion then had been left for any Man to raiſe up this fire of temptation now againſt us, as is here raiſed to prove us withal; that we, being ſo proved with them, might alſo be crowned with them, being likewiſe partakers of praiſe and reward, as we are of their labour and travel. And though ſome of them have been ſlack, or exceeded in their duty doing, in that we are not bound to follow their example.

The Kings offer to Becket both charitable and reaſonable.

The words of the French King.

Peter, when he denyed Chriſt, we therefore rebuke him; but when he reſiſted the rage of Nero, therein we commend him. And therefore becauſe he could not find in his conſcience to conſent unto that he ought in no wiſe to diſſemble, neither did he; by reaſon thereof he loſt his life. By ſuch like oppreſſions the Church hath always grown. Our fore-fathers and predeceſſors, becauſe they would not diſſemble the name and honour of Chriſt, therefore they ſuffered. And ſhall I, to have the favour of one Man, ſuffer the honour of Chriſt to be ſuppreſt? The

This major, if it had been joyned with a good minor, had made a good argument.

Nobles

Nobles ſtanding by (hearing him thus ſpeak) were greatly grieved with him, noting in him both arrogancy and wilfulneſs, in perturbing and refuſing ſuch an honeſt offer of agreement. But ſpecially one among the reſt was moſt grieved, who there openly proteſted; that ſeeing the Archbiſhop ſo refuſed the counſel and requeſt of both the Kingdoms, he was not worthy to have the help of either of them; but as the Kingdom of England had rejected him, ſo the Realm of France ſhould not receive him.

Ex Quadrilogo.

Alanus Herbertus, and certain other of his Chaplains that committed to ſtory the doings of Becket, do record (whether truly or no I cannot ſay) That the French King ſending for him, as one much ſorrowing and lamenting the words that he had ſpoken, at the coming of Becket did proſtrate himſelf at his feet, confeſſing his fault, in giving counſel to him in ſuch a cauſe (pertaining to the honour of God) to relent therein and to yield to the pleaſure of Man: wherefore, declaring his repentance, he deſired to be abſolved thereof. So that after this, the French King and Becket were great friends together; inſomuch that King Henry ſending to the King to intreat him, and deſire him that he would not ſupport nor maintain his enemy within his Realm, the French King utterly denied the Kings requeſt, taking part rather with the Archbiſhop than with him.

Beſides theſe quarrels and grudges betwixt the King and the Archbiſhop above mentioned, there followed yet moreover another, which was this: Shortly after this communication recited between the King and Becket, the King of England returning again from Normandy into England (which was the year of our Lord 1170. and the ſixteenth year of his Reign) about Midſummer, kept his Court of Parliament at Weſtminſter; in the which Parliament he (through the aſſent both of the Clergy and the Lords Temporal) cauſed his Son Henry to be crowned King. Which Coronation was done by the hands of Robert Archbiſhop of York, with the aſſiſtance of other Biſhops miniſtring to the ſame, as Gilbert of London, Joſelin of Salisbury, Hugo of Dureſme, and Walter of Rocheſter. By reaſon whereof Becket of Canterbury, being there neither mentioned nor called to it, took no little diſpleaſure; and ſo did Lodowick the French King, hearing that Margaret his Daughter was not alſo Crowned with her Huſband: whereupon he, gathering a great Army, forthwith marched into Normandy. But the matter was ſoon compoſed by the King of England, who ſending his Son unto him in Normandy, intreated there and concluded peace with him, promiſing that his Son ſhould be Crowned again, and then his Daughter ſhould be Crowned alſo. But the Archbiſhop not ceaſing his diſpleaſure and emulation, ſent unto the Pope, complaining of theſe four Biſhops, eſpecially of the Archbiſhop of York; who durſt be ſo bold in his abſence, and without knowledge of his licence, to intermeddle to Crown the King, being a matter proper and peculiar to his juriſdiction. At the inſtance of whom, the Pope ſent down the ſentence of Excommunication againſt the Biſhop of London. The other three Biſhops with the Archbiſhop of York he ſuſpended, whoſe Sentence and Letters thereof, for avoiding prolixity, I here omit.

The Biſhop of London Excommunicated, with four other Biſhops ſuſpended.

Beſides theſe foreſaid Biſhops Excommunicated, divers other Clerks alſo of the Court he cited to appear before him, by vertue of his large Commiſſion which he gat from the Pope, to whom they were bound to obey, by reaſon of their benefices. And ſome he commanded in vertue of obedience to appear, in pain of forfeiting their Orders and Benefices. Of which when neither ſort would appear, he curſed them openly. And alſo ſome Lay-men of the Court and the Kings familiars (as intruders and violent with-holders of Church goods) he accurſed; as Richard Lucy, and Joſelin Balliot, and Ralph Brock which took the Bells and goods that belonged to the Church of Canterbury; and Hugh Sentclear, and Thomas the Son of Bernard, and all that ſhould hereafter take any Church goods without his conſent; ſo that almoſt all the Court was accurſed either by name, or as partakers.

This being done, the Archbiſhop of York with the foreſaid Biſhops reſorted to the King with a grievous complaint, declaring how miſerably their caſe ſtood, and what they had ſuſtained for fulfilling his commandment. The King, hearing this, was highly moved, as no marvel was. But what remedy? The time of the ruine of the Pope was not yet come; and what Prince then might withſtand the injurious violence of that Romiſh Poteſtate?

The cauſe of the Kings wrath againſt Becket.

In the mean ſeaſon the French King for his part, his Clergy and Courtiers likewiſe ſlack no occaſion to incite and ſollicit Alexander the Pope againſt the King of England to Excommunicate him alſo: ſeeing thereby and thinking to have ſome vantage againſt the Realm. Neither was the King ignorant of this, which made him more ready to apply ſome agreement of reconciliation. At length came down from the Pope two Legates (the Archbiſhop of Rothomage and the Biſhop of Navern) with direction and full commiſſion either to drive the King to be reconciled, or to be interdicted by the Popes cenſures out of the Church. The King underſtanding himſelf to be in greater ſtraits than he could avoid (at length through the mediation of the French King and of other Prelates and great Princes) was content to yield to peace and reconciliation with the Archbiſhop, whom he received both to his favour, and alſo permitted and granted him free return to his Church again. Concerning his poſſeſſions and Lands of the Church of Canterbury, although Becket made great labour therefore, yet the King (being then in Normandy) would not grant him them, before he ſhould repair to England, to ſee how he would there agree with his Subjects.

Thus peace after a ſort concluded between the King and him, the Archbiſhop, after ſix years of his baniſhment, returned to England, where he was right joyfully received of the Church of Canterbury; albeit of Henry the young King, he was not ſo greatly welcomed. In ſo much that coming up to London to the King, he was returned back to Canterbury, and there bid to keep his Houſe. Roger Hoveden maketh mention in his Chronicle, That the Archbiſhop (upon Chriſtmas-day) did Excommunicate Robert de Brooke for cutting of the tail of a certain Horſe of his the day before. In the mean time the four Biſhops before mentioned, whom the Archbiſhop had Excommunicate, ſent to him, humbly deſiring to be releaſed of their cenſure. To whom when the Archbiſhop would not grant clearly and ſimply without cautels and exceptions, they went over to the King, declaring unto him and complaining of their miſerable ſtate and uncourteous handling of the Archbiſhop. Whereupon the King conceived great ſorrow in his mind, and diſpleaſure toward the party. Inſomuch that he lamented oft and ſundry times to them about him that (amongſt ſo many that he had done for) there was none that would revenge him of his enemy. By occaſion of which words, certain that were about the King (to the number of four) hearing him thus to complain and lament, addreſſed themſelves in great heat of haſte to ſatisfie the grieved mind and quarel of their Prince: who within four days after the ſaid Chriſtmas-day (ſailing over into England, and having a forward and proſperous wind in their journey, being in the deep of Winter) came to Canterbury, where Becket was commanded to keep. After certain adviſements and conſultations had among themſelves: they preſſed at length into the Palace where the Archbiſhop was ſitting with his company about him: firſt to aſſay him with words, to ſee whether he would relent to the Kings mind, and come to ſome conformity. They brought to him (ſaid they) commandment from the King, which whether he had rather openly there in preſence, or ſecretly to be declared to him, they bad him chuſe. Then the company being bid to avoid, as he ſat alone, they ſaid, You are commanded from the King beyond the Sea, to repair to the King his Son here, and to do your duty to him, ſwearing to him your fidelity for your Baronage and other things, and to amend thoſe things wherein you have treſpaſſed againſt him. Whereupon the Archbiſhop denying to ſwear, and perceiving their intent, called in his company again, and in multiplying of words to and fro, at length they came to the Biſhops which were Excommunicate for the Coronation of the King, whom they commanded in the Kings name he ſhould abſolve and ſet free again. The Archbiſhop anſwered, That he neither Suſpended nor Excommunicated them, but the Pope; wherefore, if that were the matter that grieved them, they ſhould reſort to the Pope, he had nothing to do with the matter.

Becket returneth out of baniſhment.

Ex Rogero Hoveden

The words of the King which were the cauſe of Becket's death.

If the Popes will needs meaſure the ſucceſs of things by ſeaſons and weather, then muſt they by that reaſon [illegible] demn [illegible] cauſe. Becket his adverſaries having ſuch forwardneſs of weather in doing their feat.

The talk tween the four Souldiers and Thomas Becket.

Then ſaid Reginald one of the four; Although you in your own perſon did not Excommunicate them, yet through your inſtigation it was done. To whom the Archbiſhop ſaid

ſaid again, And if the Pope (ſaid he) tendring the injuries done unto me and my Church, wrought this revenge for me, I confeſs it offendeth me nothing. Thus then (ſaid they) it appeareth well by your own words, that it pleaſeth you right well (in contempt and contumely of the Kings Majeſty) to ſequeſter his Biſhops from their miniſtery, who at the commandment of the King did ſervice in the Coronation of his Son. And ſeeing you have ſo preſumed thus to ſtand againſt the exaltation of this our Sovereign, our new King, it ſeemeth likely that you aſpired to take his Crown from him, and to be exalted King your ſelf. I aſpire not (ſaid he) to the Crown and Name of the King, but rather if I had four Crowns (to give him more) I would ſet them all upon him; ſuch good will I do bear him, that only his Father the King excepted, there is none, whoſe honour I more tender and love. And as concerning the ſequeſtring of thoſe Biſhops, this I give you to underſtand, that nothing was done in that behalf without the knowledge and aſſent of the King himſelf; to whom when I had made my complaint at the Feaſt of Mary Magdalene, of the wrong and injury done to me and my Church therein; he gave me his good leave to obtain at the Popes hand ſuch remedy as I could, promiſing moreover his help to me in the ſame. What is this, quoth they, that thou ſayſt? Makeſt thou the King a Traitor, and a betrayer of the King his own Son? that when he had commanded the Biſhops to crown his Son, he would give thee leave afterward to ſuſpend them for ſo doing? Certes, it had been better for you not to have accuſed ſo the King of this prodition. The Archbiſhop ſaid to Reginald, that he was there preſent at that time, and heard it himſelf. But that he denied, and ſwore it was not ſo. And think you (ſaid they) that we the Kings Subjects will or ought to ſuffer this? And ſo approaching nearer him, they ſaid he had ſpoken enough againſt his own head; whereupon followed great exclamation and many threatning words. Then ſaid the Archbiſhop, I have ſince my coming over ſuſtained many injuries and rebukes, concerning both my ſelf, my Men, my Cattel, my Wives, and all other Goods; notwithſtanding the King, writing over to his Son, required him that I ſhould live in ſafety and peace, and now, beſide all others, you come hither to threaten me. To this Reginald anſwering again, ſaid, If there be any that worketh you any injury otherwiſe than right is, the Law is open, why do you not complain? To whom, ſaid Becket, ſhould I complain? To the young King, ſaid they. Then ſaid Becket, I have complained enough if that would help, and have ſought for remedy at the Kings hands, ſo long as I could be ſuffered to come to his ſpeech: but now ſeeing that I am ſtopt from that, neither can find redreſs of ſo great vexations and injuries as I have and do daily ſuſtain, nor can have the benefit of the law or reaſon; ſuch right and law, as an Archbiſhop may have, that will I exerciſe, and let for no man. At theſe words one of them, burſting out in exclamation, cried, He threatneth, he threatneth, What? will he interdict the whole Realm and us altogether? Nay, that he ſhall not, ſaith another, he hath interdicted too many already. And drawing more near to him, they proteſted and denounced him to have ſpoken words to the jeopardy of his own head. And ſo departing in great fury, and with many high words, they ruſhed out of the doors; who, by the way returning to the Monks, charged them in the Kings Name, to keep him forth-coming, that he ſhould not eſcape away. What, quoth the Archbiſhop. think ye, I will flee away? Nay, neither for the King, nor any man alive, will I ſtir one foot from you. No, ſay they, thou ſhalt not avoid though thou would'ſt. And ſo they departing with many words, the Archbiſhop followeth them out of the Chamber-door, crying after them, Here, here, here ſhall you find me, laying his hand upon his Crown.

The Names of theſe four ſouldiers above mentioned were theſe, the firſt Reginald Bereſon, the ſecond Hugh Mortevil, the third William Thracy, and the fourth Richard Brito; who, going to harneſs themſelves, returned the ſame day again: but finding the Hall-door of the Palace of Canterbury ſhut againſt them, they went to an inward back Door leading into the Orchard; there brake they up a Window, and opened the Door, and ſo iſſued into the place. The Monks (being about Even-ſong time) had got the Archbiſhop into the Church; who being perſwaded by them, cauſed his Croſs to be born before him, and through the Cloiſter, by a Door which was broken up for him, he proceeded into the Quire. The Harneſs men following after, at length came to the Church-door, which door the Monks would have ſhut againſt them; but, as the ſtory ſaith, the Archbiſhop would not ſuffer them. So they approaching into the Church, and the Archbiſhop meeting them upon the Stairs, there he was ſlain; every one of the four Souldiers ſtriking him with his Sword into the Head; who afterward flying into the North, and at length, with much ado, obtained their Pardon of the Pope by the Kings procurement, as ſome ſtories record, went to Jeruſalem.

The death of Thomas Becket.

¶ Thus you have heard the Life and Death of this Thomas Becket, of whom what is to be judged, let his own acts and facts declare. And albeit the Scripture ought to be the only rule to us to judge all things by, yet if any ſhall require further teſtimony, partly to ſatisfie their minds therein, ye ſhall hear the judgments of certain men, in years and times almoſt as ancient as himſelf, what they write and affirm of him.

What is to be thought or judged of T. Becket.

And firſt to begin with the teſtimony of one of his own Religion, and alſo not far (as it appeareth) from his own time, who, writing of his Martyrdom and Miracles, thus teſtifieth of the judgment and ſentence of divers concerning his promotion and behaviour. The Chronicle being written in Latine, and having the name of the Author cut out, thus beginneth; Quoniam vero multi, &c. And in the firſt Book and eighth Chapter it followeth in this manner: Nonnullis tamen idcirco promotionem ejus viſum eſt fuiſſe minus canonicam, quod ad eam magis operata eſt regis inſtantia, quam cleri vel populi voto. Præſumptionis quoque vel indiſcretionis fuiſſe notatum eſt, quod qui rerum tenere vix idoneus videbatur, primum gubernaculi locum ſuſcepit, &c. Et mox, magis etiam ſecularia tum ſapiens, tum ſanctum tantæ dignitatis faſtigium non horrens tenuiſſe, ſed ultroneus aſcendiſſe creditus. Aliter Dei amicus, Moſes, &c. With much more, as in Latin inſueth, which for the Engliſh Reader here followeth tranſlated. 'Divers notwithſtanding there be, which as touch-'ing his promotion, ſuppoſe the ſame not to be Canonical. 'For that it was wrought rather by the inſtance of the 'King (thinking him to be a man ready and inclinable to 'his utility) than by the aſſent either of the Clergy, or of the 'People. Further, it is noted in him for a point of pre-'ſumption, and lack of diſcretion, for that he, being ſcarce 'worthy to take the Oar in hand and play the Boatſwain, 'would take upon him to ſit at Helm, and guide the Ship; 'namely, in that Church, where the Covent, being in ge-'ſture and veſture religious, he wont to have their Prelate 'taken out of the ſame profeſſion. Whereas he, ſcant bear-'ing the habit of a Clerk, and going in his changes and 'ſoft apparel, is more converſant among the delicate ruffliers 'in the Court, favouring rather of worldly things, not re-'fuſing moreover, without any dread, to climb up to the 'high preferment of ſuch an holy dignity, but rather will-'ingly of his own accord to aſpire to it. Moſes we read did 'otherwiſe, who being the friend of God, and ſent of him 'to conduct his people Iſrael out of Egypt, trembled at the 'Meſſage, and ſaid, Who am I Lord, that I ſhould go to Pha-'raoh, and bring thy people Iſrael out of Egypt? And again, 'I pray thee (ſaith he) O Lord, I am nothing eloquent, ſend 'him whom thou wilt ſend. Likewiſe Jeremias alſo, being 'ſent of the Lord to propheſie againſt Jeruſalem, was a-'baſhed to take the office upon him, anſwering again with 'much dread of heart, A, a, a, Lord, I cannot utter my mind, 'for I am a child.

What is to be thought, whether Tho. Becket died a Saint or not?

The promotion of Becket judged not Canonical.

Becket charged with preſumption and lack of diſcretion.

Ambition noted in Becket, in not refuſing but taking his promotion.

After like manner we read of the Saints of the New Teſtament, whereof many were preferred oftentimes to their Biſhopricks and Functions of the Church, by meer forcement and compulſion of others rather than by their own wills. So was bleſſed Gregory, after his flight and going away, brought back again, and placed in the See and Chair of Rome. Likewiſe Saint Ambroſe ſore againſt his mind; who alſo, of purpoſe accuſing and confeſſing his own defects, becauſe he would be repealed: yet by the commandment of Valentinian the Emperor was inforced to take the burthen upon him, which he could by no wiſe ſhake off. S. Martin in like ſort, not knowing of any ſuch matter, was circumvented by a certain godly train, and wile of the Citizens, before he could be brought to his Conſecration; which he did not ſo much take, as he was thruſt into it with much penſiveneſs and ſorrow of heart. By theſe and ſuch other examples this Chancellor likewiſe ſhould have rather excuſed himſelf as unworthy and unmeet for that room, ſhewing himſelf more willing to refuſe than to take it. To the which this Archbiſhop is judged to do clean contrary, &c. Hæc ex chronico, cui Titulus, De paſſione & miraculis beati Thomæ.

And although ſcarcely any teſtimony is to be taken of that Age (being all blinded and corrupted with ſuperſtition) yet let us hear what Neuburgenſis an ancient Hiſtiographer ſaith, who, in the days of the Son of this King Henry the ſecond, proſecuting his Hiſtory unto King Richard the firſt, hath theſe words, writing of Thomas Becket: Sane cum plerique ſoleant in his quos amant & laudant affectu quodam propenſiori, ſed prudentia parciori, quicquid ab eis geritur approbare: plane ego in viro illo venerabili, ea quæ ita ab ipſo acta ſunt, quum nulla exinde proveniret utilitas, ſed fervor tantum accenderetur regius, ex quo tot mala poſtmodum pullulaſſe noſcuntur, laudanda nequaquam cenſuerim, licet ex laudabili zelo proceſſerint: ſicut in beatiſſimo apoſtolorum principe, quod gentes ſuo exemplo judaizare coegit; in quo eum doctor gentium reprehenſibilem declarat fuiſſe, licet eum conſtet laudabili hoc pietate feciſſe, &c.

Whereas many be wont, in them whom they love our praiſe (judging them more by affection than prudence) to allow and approve whatſoever they do, yet for me to judge upon this reverend man, verily I think not his doings and acts to be praiſe-worthy, or to be allowed, for ſo much as thereof came no utility, but only the anger and ſtirring up of the King: whereupon afterward ſprung ſo great miſchiefs (although the thing that he did might proceed of a certain laudable zeal:) like as in the bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles, in that he taught the Gentiles by his example to play the Jews, Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles did declare him therein to be rebukeable, albeit it cannot be denied, but that he did it of a good affection, &c.

And in the ſame Author, in another place it followeth to the like effect, in theſe words: Literas has in Angliam ad ſuſpenſionem Epiſcoporum præmiſſas ipſe ſequebatur, zelo juſtitiæ fervidus; verum an plene ſecundum ſcientiam novit Deus. Noſtræ enim parvitati nequaquam conceditur, de tanti viri actibus temere judicare. Puto enim quod in molli adhuc teneraque regis concordia minus provide egiſſet, & ea quæ ſine fidei Chriſtianæ periculo tolerari potuiſſent, ratione temporis & compenſatione pacis diſſimulanda dixiſſet, juxta illud propheticum: Prudens in tempore illo tacebit, quia tempus malum eſt. Itaque quod a venerabili Pontifice tunc actum eſt, nec laudandum eſſe judico, nec vituperare præſumo: ſed dico, ſi vel modice in hujuſmodi a ſancto viro per zeli, immoderatiorem impetum eſſe, exceſſum, hoc ipſum eſt ſacræ, quæ conſecuta noſcitur, igne paſſionis excoctum. Ita quippe ſancti viri vel amandi vel laudandi ſunt a nobis, qui nos illis longe impares eſſe cognoſcimus, ut ea, in quibus homines fuerunt, vel fuiſſe noſcuntur, nequaquam vel amemus vel laudemus: ſed ea tantum, in quibus eos ſine ſcrupulo imitari debemus. Quis enim eos dicat in omnibus, quæ ab ipſis fiant, eſſe imitabliles? Non igitur in omnibus, quæ faciunt, ſed ſapienter & caute debent laudari, ut ſua Deo prærogativa ſervetur, in cujus utique laudibus nemo poteſt eſſe nimius, quantumcunque laudare conetur, &c.

The Letters which were ſent before for the ſuſpending of the Biſhops, he purſued with burning zeal of juſtice; but whether according to knowledge God knoweth it. It is not for my rude and ſlender wit to judge of the doings of ſuch a perſon. But yet this I ſuppoſe, that he did not behave himſelf ſo circumſpectly as he ought, conſidering the time; and that the concord between him and the King as yet was but ſoft and tender. Who for the conſideration of the time, and for the recompence of peace might have forborne or diſſembled ſuch things, which without any peril of Chriſtian Religion might be tolerate well enough, according to the prophetical ſaying, A wiſe man in that time will keep ſilence, becauſe the time will not ſerve him. Wherefore, as the doings of that reverend Prelate I judge in that behalf not to be commended, ſo neither do I preſume to diſcommend them. But this I ſay, that if that holy Man, through immoderate violence of zeal, did exceed in a part therein, the ſame was excocted again, and purged by the fire of his ſuffering, which afterward inſued. And ſo far holy Men are to be loved or praiſed of us, which know our ſelves much inferiour to their virtues; that in ſuch things wherein they have been Men, and alſo known to be men, therein we neither hold with them, nor commend them; but only in ſuch things wherein without all danger or ſcruple we ought to imitate them. For who is able to ſay, that they are to be imitated in all that they do? And therefore are not to be eſteemed and praiſed in all things generally whatſoever they do, but conſiderately and with adviſement, wherein they deſerve praiſe, ſo that the only prerogative in this behalf be reſerved to God, in whoſe praiſe no man can exceed, how fervent ſoever he be in his praiſing, &c.

And hear yet more what the ſaid Author writeth in the ſame cauſe of the Kings wrath and Beckets faults: Pluſquam centum homicidia a clericis commiſſa ſub Henrico ſecundo dicuntur. In quibus plectendis Rex aliquanto vehementior. Sed hujus immoderationis regiæ, noſtri temporis Epiſcopos tantum reſpicit culpa, quantum ab eis præceſſit & cauſa. Cum enim ſacri præcipiunt canones, clericos non ſolum facinoroſos & gravioribus irretitos criminibus, verumetiam leviorum criminum reos degradari, & tot millia talium, tanquam innumera inter pauca grana paleas Eccleſia Anglicana contineat, tamen quam paucos a multis retro annis clericos in Anglia contigit officio privari. Nempe Epiſcopi dum defendendis magis clericorum libertatibus vel dignitatibus, quam eorum vitiis corrigendis reſecandiſque invigilant, arbitrantur obſequium ſe præſtare Deo & Eccleſiæ, ſi facinoroſos clericos, quos pro officii debito canonicæ vigore cenſuræ coercere debeant, contra publicam tueantur diſciplinam. Unde clerici, qui in ſortem Domini vocati, tanquam ſtellæ in firmamento cœli poſitæ, vita & verbo lucere deberent ſuper terram, habentes pre impunitate agendi quodcunque libuerit, licentiam & libertatem, neq; Deum, cujus judicium tardare videtur, neque homines poteſtatem habentes reverentur, cum & Epiſcopalis circa eos ſolicitudo ſit languida, & ſeculari eos juriſdictione ſacri eximat ordinis prærogativa.

More than an hundred Murthers are ſaid to be committed by the Clergy under King Henry the ſecond: in puniſhing of whom the King was ſomewhat too vehement. But the fault, ſaith he, of this immoderate dealing of the King reſteth moſt in the Biſhops of our time, for ſo much as the cauſe thereof proceedeth of them. For where it is decreed and commanded by the Canon Law (concerning the ſpiritual Men of the Clergy) that not only ſuch as be notorious, but ſuch as be ſpotted with lighter crimes ſhould be degraded, whereof we have ſo many thouſands, and whole ſwarmes of ſuch now in England, as innumerable chaff among the little good Grain; yet how few do we ſee theſe many years in England, deprived of their office? For why? The Biſhops while they labour more to maintain the liberties and dignities of Churchmen, than to correct their Vices, think they do God and the Church great ſervice, if they reſcue and defend the enormities of the Church-men againſt publick diſcipline, whom they ought rather to puniſh by the vertue of the cenſure Eccleſiaſtical. Whereupon the Churchmen, ſuch as be ſorted peculiarly to the Lord, and ought like Stars to ſhine in Earth by word and example, taking licence and liberty to do what they luſt, neither reverence God (whoſe judgment ſeemeth to tarry) neither Men ſet in Authority; when as both the Biſhops are ſlack in their charge doing, and alſo the prerogative of their order exempteth them from the ſecular juriſdiction, &c. And thus much out of of Neuburgenſis.

To this matter alſo pertain the words of Ceſarius the Monk in his eighth Book of Dialogues and ſixty ninth Chapter, about the eight and forſieth year after the death of Thomas Becket, which was the year of God 1230. whoſe words in ſumm come to this effect: Quæſtio Pariſiis inter magiſtros ventilata fuit, utrum damnatus an ſalvatus eſſet ille Tho. Dixerat Rogerius tunc Normannus, fuiſſe illum mortu ac damnatione dignum, quod contumax eſſet in Dei miniſtrum regem. Protulit contra Petrus Cantor Pariſienſis, quod ſigna ſalvationis & magnæ ſanctitatis eſſent ejus miracula: & quod Martyrium probaſſet Eccleſiæ cauſa, pro qua mortem ſubierat, &c.

If God in theſe latter days giveth no Miracles to glorifie his own Son: much leſs will he give Miracles to glorifie Thomas Becket.

There was a queſtion moved among the Maſters of Paris, whether Thomas Becket was ſaved or damned? To this queſtion anſwereth Roger a Norman, that he was worthy death and damnation, for that he was ſo obſtinate againſt Gods Miniſter his King. Contrary, Peter Cantor a Parilian diſputed, ſaying and affirming, that his Miracles were great ſigns and tokens of ſalvation, and alſo of great holineſs in that Man: affirming moreover, that the cauſe of the Church did allow and confirm his Martyrdome, for the which Church he died, &c.

And thus have ye the judgment and cenſure of the School of Paris touching this queſtion, for the ſanctifying of Thomas Becket. In which judgment for ſo much as the greateſt argument reſteth in the Miracles wrought by him after his death; let us therefore pauſe a little upon the ſame, to try and examine theſe his Miracles. In the trial whereof we ſhall find one of theſe two to be true; that either if they were true, they were wrought not by God, but by a contrary ſpirit, of whom Chriſt our Lord giveth us warning in his Goſpel, ſaying, Whoſe coming ſhall be with lying ſigns and wonders, to deceive, if it were poſſible, the elect, Matth. 24. or elſe we ſhall find that no ſuch were ever wrought at all, but feigned and forged of idle Monks, and religious bellies, for the exaltation of their Churches, and profit of their pouches; which thing indeed ſeemeth rather to be true, and no leſs may appear by the Miracles themſelves, ſet forth by one of his own Monks, and of his own time; who in five ſolemn Books hath comprehended all the Revelations, Vertues and Miracles of the Archbiſhop; the which Books (as yet remaining in the hands of William Stephenſon Citizen of London) I have ſeen and peruſed; wherein is contained the whole ſumm of all his Miracles, to the number of 270. being ſo far off from all truth and reaſon, ſome ridiculous, ſome monſtrous, vain, abſurd, ſome alſo blaſphemous, and ſome ſo impudent, that not only they deſerve no credit, (altogether ſavouring of meer forgery) but alſo for very ſhame will abaſh an honeſt Pen to write of them. Firſt, if Miracles ſerve for neceſſity and for Infidels, what cauſe or neceſſity was there (in a Chriſtian Realm having the Word of God) for God to work ſuch Miracles after his death, who never wrought any in all his life? Then to conſider the end of theſe Miracles, whither do they tend, but only to bring Men to Canterbury, with their Vows and Offerings to enrich the Covent?

Miracles of Becket conſidered.

Beſide the number of theſe Miracles, which be ſaid to be ſo many, that they loſe their own credit; what diſeaſe is there belonging to Man or Woman in the curing whereof ſome Miracle hath not bin wrought by this παμπάθρος, as Fevers, Fiſtula, the Gout, Toothach, Palſie, Conſumption, Falling-ſickneſs, Leproſie, Head-ach, broken Arms, maimed Legs, ſwelling Throats, the raiſing up of the dead which have been two days departed; with infinite others. And as all theſe have been healed (for the moſt part) by one kind of ſalve (as a certain Panacea) which was, with the water only of Canterbury, like as a cunning Smith, which would open with one Key all manner of Locks; ſo again, in reading of the ſtory of theſe Miracles, ye ſhall find the matter ſo conveied, that the power of this dead Saint was never twice ſhewed on any one Diſeaſe, but every divers Diſeaſe had a divers Miracle.

Aqua Cantuarienſis

To recite in order all theſe prodigious Revelations and fantaſtical Miracles, falſly imagined and aſcribed to this Archbiſhop, were nothing elſe but to write a Legend of lies, and to occupy the People with trifles. Which becauſe it pertaineth rather to the idle profeſſion of ſuch dreaming Monks and Cloiſterers, that have nothing elſe to maintain that Religion withal; I will not take their profeſſion out of their hands. Wherefore to omit all ſuch vain and lying Apparitions and Miracles, as how this angry Saint (three days after his death) appeared by Viſion at the Altar in his Pontificalibus, commanding the Quire not to ſing, but to ſay this office of his Maſs, Exurge, quare obdormis Domine, &c.. Which Viſion the Author himſelf of the Book doth ſay he did ſee. To omit alſo the blaſphemous lie, how in another Viſion the ſaid Archbiſhop ſhould ſay, that his bloud did cry out of the earth to God, more than the bloud of juſt Abel. Item, in another Viſion it was ſhewed to a Monk of Lewis, how Saint Thomas had his place in Heaven appointed with the Apoſtles, above Stephen, Laurence, Vincent, and all other Martyrs. Whereof this cauſe is rendred, for that St. Stephen, Laurence, and ſuch others, ſuffered only for their own cauſe; but this Thomas ſuffered for the Univerſal Church. Item, how it was ſhewed to a certain young Man (Ormus by name) twelve years before the death of this Becket, that among the Apoſtles and Martyrs in Heaven there was a vacant place left for a certain Prieſt, as he ſaid, of England; which was credibly ſuppoſed to be this Thomas Becket. Item, How a certain Knights Son, being two days dead, was revived again ſo ſoon as he had the water of Canterbury put in his Mouth, and had by his Parents four pieces of Silver bended, to be offered in Canterbury in the Childs behalf. All theſe, I ſay, with ſuch other like to omit (the number whereof cometh to an infinite variety) only this one ſtory, or another that followeth, ſhall ſuffice to expreſs the vanity and impudent forgery of all the reſt.

Singing at the Maſs forbidden by T. Becket after his death.

A blaſphemous lie.

Becket above the Martyrs in Heaven.

A place prepared in Heaven for Becket 12 years before his death.

In the fourth Book of this fabulous Author, and in the third Chapter, a Miracle is there contained of a certain Countryman of Bedfordſhire in Kings Weſton, whoſe name was Eilwardus; which Eilwardus, in his drunkenneſs, burſting into another Mans Houſe which was his Debtor, took out of his Houſe a great Whetſtone, and a pair of Hedging-gloves. The other party ſeeing this value not ſufficient for his condemnation (by the counſel of the Town-Clerk) entred an Action of Felony againſt him for other things beſides, as for ſtealing his Wimble, his Axe, his Net, and other Cloths. Whereupon Eilwardus being had to the Gaol of Bedford, and afterward condemned for the ſame, was judged to have both his eies put out, and alſo thoſe Members cut off, which Nature with ſecret ſhame hath covered. Which puniſhment by the malice of his adverſary being executed upon him, he, lying in great danger of death by bleeding, was counſelled to make his prayer to this Thomas, of Canterbury. Which done (ſaith the Miracle) there appeared one to him by Night, in white Apparel, bidding him to watch and pray, and put his truſt in God and our Lady, and holy St. Thomas. In concluſion, the Miracle thus fell out: The next day at Evening, the Man rubbing his Eye-lids, began to feel his Eies to be reſtored again; firſt in a little, after in a greater meaſure, ſo that one was of a gray colour, the other was of black; and here was one Miracle rung. After this followed another Miracle alſo upon the ſame perſon; for going but the ſpace of four miles, when his eies were reſtored, he chanced (in like manner) to rub the place where his ſecret parts were cut off, and immediately on the ſame his Pendula (to uſe the words of my ſtory) were to him reſtored, Principio parva quidem valde, ſed in majus proficientia, which he permitted every one to feel that would, and ſhamed not to deny. Inſomuch that he, coming up to S. Thomas, firſt at London, was received with joy of the Biſhop of Durham; who, then ſending to the Burgers of Bedford for the truth of the matter, received from them again Letters Teſtimonial, wherein the Citizens there (ſaith this fabulous Feſtival) confirmed firſt to the Biſhop, then to the Covent of Canterbury, the relation of this to be as hath been told. This one Miracle (gentle Reader) ſo ſhameleſs and impudent, I thought here to expreſs, that by this one thou mightſt judge of all the reſidue of his Miracles; and by the reſidue thereof mightſt judge moreover of all the filthy wickedneſs of all theſe lying Monks and Cloiſterers, which count it a light ſport ſo impudently to deceive the ſimple ſouls of Chriſts Church with trifling lies and dreaming fables. Wherefore (as I ſaid) if the holy ſainting of Thomas Becket ſtandeth upon no other thing but upon his Miracles, what credit is to be given thereto? and upon what a weak ground his Shrine ſo long hath ſtood, by this may eaſily be ſeen. Furthermore, another fable as notable as this, and no leſs worthy of the Whetſtone, we read in the ſtory of Gervaſius: That Thomas Becket appearing to a certain

An impudent and a lying Miracle.

Ex hiſtoria Monachi Cant. de miraculis B. Thomæ.

A blaſphemous viſion

A falſe and impudent Miracle.

Prieſt, named Thomas, declared to him, that he had ſo brought to paſs, that all the Names of the Monks of the Church of Canterbury, with the Names of the Prieſts and Clerks, and with the Families belonging to that City and Church of Canterbury, were written in the Book of Life. Ex Gervaſ. fol.6.

But whatſoever is to be thought of his Miracles, or howſoever the teſtimony of the School of Paris, or of theſe ancient times, went with him or againſt him; certain it is, that this Antheme or Collect, lately collected and primered in his praiſe, is blaſphemous, and derogateth from the praiſe of him, to whom only all praiſe and honour is due, where it is ſaid;

The blaſphemous Anthem of Thomas Becket.

Tu per Thomæ ſanguinem, quem pro te impendit,
Fac nos Chriſte ſcandere, quo Thomas aſcendit.
That is:
For the bloud of Thomas,
Which he for thee did ſpend,
Grant us (Chriſt) to climb,
Where Thomas did aſcend.

Wherein is a double lie contained; firſt, that he died for Chriſt; ſecondly, that if he had ſo done, yet that his bloud could purchaſe Heaven. Which thing neither Paul nor any of the Apoſtles durſt ever challenge to themſelves: for if any Mans bloud could bring us to Heaven, then the bloud of Chriſt was ſhed in vain.

And thus much touching the teſtimony or cenſure of certain ancient times concerning the cauſe of Thomas Becket. In the explication of whoſe Hiſtory I have now ſtood the longer (exceeding peradventure in over-much prolixity) to the intent that his cauſe being fully opened to the world, and duely weighed on every part, mens minds (thereby long deceived by ignorance) might come unto the more perfect certainty of the truth thereof, and thereby judge more ſurely what is to be received, and what to be refuſed. Where by the way is to be noted out of the teſtimony of Rob. Crikeladenſis, which in him I find; that the Peers and Nobles of this Land, near about the King, gave out in ſtraight charge upon pain of death, and confiſcating of all their Goods, that no Man ſhould be ſo hardy as to name Thomas Becket to be a Martyr, or to preach of his Miracles, &c. Ex Crikeladenſi.

After the death of Thomas Becket, the King fearing the Popes wrath and curſe to be laid upon him (whereunto Ludovike the French King alſo helped what he could to ſet the matter forward) ſent to Rome the Archbiſhop of Rothomage, with certain other Biſhops and Archdeacons unto the Pope with his excuſe, which the Pope could in no wiſe hear. And after other Meſſengers being ſent (whom ſome of the Cardinals received) it was ſhewed to them that on Goodfriday (being then near at hand) the Pope of cuſtom was uſed to aſſoil or to curſe, and that it was noiſed, how the King of England with his Biſhops ſhould be curſed, and his Land interdicted, and that they ſhould be put in Priſon. After this, certain of the Cardinals ſhewed the Pope, that the Meſſengers had power to ſwear to the Pope, that the King ſhould obey his puniſhment and Penance; which was taken both for the King and the Archbiſhop of York. So that in the ſame day the Pope curſed the deed doers, with ſuch as were of their conſent, that either aided or harboured them. Concerning theſe deed doers, it is touched briefly before, how they lying in Gnaſborough fled into Yorkſhire; who, after having in Penance to go in their linnen Clothes barefoot (in faſting and prayer) to Jeruſalem, by reaſon of this hard Penance are ſaid to die in few years after.

The K. ſendeth to Rome.

Ex libro annotationum hiſtoricarum manuſcripto. J. Skeni.

The penance of the four Knights.

The Kings Embaſſadors lying, as is ſaid, in Rome, could find no grace nor favour a long time at the Popes hands. At length with much ado it was agreed, that two Cardinals ſhould be ſent down to inquire out the matter concerning them that were conſenting to Becket's death. The King perceiving what was preparing at Rome, neither being yet certain whereto the intent of the Pope and coming down of the Cardinals would tend; in the mean time addreſſed himſelf with a great power to enter into Ireland, giving in charge and commandment, as Hoveden writeth, that no bringer of any Brief or Letter ſhould come over into England, or paſs out of the Realm (of what degree or condition ſoever he were) without ſpecial licence, and aſſurance that he would bring nothing that ſhould be prejudicial to the Realm.

Ex Hoveden.

This order being ſet and ordained, the King with 400 great Ships taketh his journey to Ireland, where he ſubdued in ſhort time the whole Land unto him, which at that time was governed under divers Kings to the number of five; of whom four ſubmitted themſelves unto the ſaid King Henry, only the fifth, who was the King of Tonacta, denied to be ſubdued, keeping him in Woods and Marſhes.

Ireland firſt ſubdued to England.

In the mean ſeaſon, while the King was thus occupied in Ireland, the two Cardinals that were ſent from the Pope (Theodinus and Albertus) were come to Normandy. Unto whom the King the next year following reſorted about the Month of October, in the year 1172. But before (during the time of the Kings being in Ireland) the Biſhop of London, and Joſeline Biſhop of Saliſbury had ſent to Rome, and procured their abſolution from the Pope. The King returning out of Ireland, by Wales, into England, and from thence to Normandy, there made his purgation before the Popes Legates, as touching the death of the foreſaid Becket; to the which he ſware he was neither aiding nor conſenting, but only that he ſpake rigorous words againſt him, for that his Knights would not avenge him againſt the ſaid Thomas; for the which cauſe this Penance was injoyned him under his Oath.

Anno 1172.

First, that he ſhould ſend ſo much into the holy Land, as would find two hundred Knights or Souldiers for the defence of that Land.

The Kings Penance for the death of Becket.

Alſo, That from Chriſtmaſs day next following, he ſhould ſet forth in his own perſon to fight for the Holy Land, the ſpace of three years together, unleſs he ſhould be otherwiſe diſpenſed withal by the Pope.

Item, That if he would make his journey into Spain (as his preſent neceſſity did require) there he ſhould fight againſt the Saracens, and as long time as he ſhould there abide, ſo long ſpace might he take in prolonging his journeys toward Jeruſalem.

Item, That he ſhould not hinder, nor cauſe to be hindred by him, any appellations made to the Pope of Rome.

Item, That neither he nor his Son ſhould depart or diſſever from Pope Alexander, or from his Catholick Succeſſors, ſo long as they ſhould recount him or his Son for Kings Catholick.

Item, That the Goods and poſſeſſions taken from the Church of Canterbury ſhould be reſtored again (fully and amply) as they ſtood the year before Thomas Becket departed the Realm; and that free liberty ſhould be granted to all ſuch as were outlawed for Becket's cauſe to return again.

Item, That the foreſaid Cuſtoms and Decrees, by him eſtabliſhed againſt the Church, ſhould be extinct and repealed (ſuch only except that concerned his own perſon, &c.) beſides other ſecret faſtings and almes enjoyned him.

All theſe former conditions the King with his Son did both agree unto, debaſing himſelf in ſuch ſort of ſubmiſſion before the two Cardinals, by the occaſion whereof, the Cardinal took no little glory, uſing this Verſe of the Pſalm, Qui reſpicit terram, & facit eam tremere; qui tangit montes & fumigant: That is, Which looketh upon the earth, and maketh it to tremble, which toucheth the hills, and they ſmoke, &c. Moreover, it is mentioned in Hiſtories of the ſaid King, that a little after, William King of Scots with his Army had made a Rode into the Realm, he, returning out of Normandy into England, came firſt to Canterbury; who by the way (ſo ſoon as he came to the ſight of Becket's Church) lighting off his Horſe, and putting off his Shoes, went barefoot to his Tomb, whoſe ſteps were found bloudy through the roughneſs of the ſtones. And not only that, but alſo he received further Penance, by every Monk of the Cloiſter, certain diſcipline of a rod. By which ſo great dejection of the King (if it were true) thou mayſt ſee the blind and lamentable ſuperſtition and ignorance of thoſe days. If it were pretenſed (as might ſo be in time of war, to get the hearts of the people) yet mayſt thou, learned Reader, ſee what ſlavery Kings and Princes were brought into at that time under the Popes Clergy.

The next year enſuing, which was 1175. a Convocation of Biſhops was holden at Weſtminſter by Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury. In which Conventicle all the Biſhops and Abbots of the Province of Canterbury and of York being preſent, determined (as it had done a little before in the days of King Henry the firſt, Anno 1113.) about the obedience that York ſhould do to Canterbury; that is, whether the Archbiſhop of York might bear his Croſs in the Dioceſs of Canterbury or not, whereof ſomething was touched before in the former proceſs of this Hiſtory. Alſo about the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, of Chicheſter, of Worceſter, and of Hereford, whether theſe Churches were under the juriſdiction of the See of York or not, &c. Upon theſe and other like matters roſe ſuch controverſie between theſe two Sees, that the one appealed the other to the preſence of the Biſhop of Rome.

Archbiſhop of York appealed the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to the Biſhop of Rome.

In theſe and ſuch like cauſes, how much better had it been if the Supremacy had remained more near in the Kings hands at home. Whereby not only much labour and travel had been ſaved, but alſo the great and waſtful expences beſtowed at Rome might with much more fruit and thank have been converted to their Cures and Flocks committed unto them, and alſo perceſe their cauſe no leſs indifferently heard, at leaſt more ſpeedily might have been decided. But to the purpoſe again. In this Controverſie divers of the Biſhops of York's Clergy, ſuch as were of Gloceſter, belonging to the Church of Saint Oſwald, were excommunicate by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, becauſe they, being ſummoned, refuſed to appear before him, &c. At length the ſame year, which was 1175. there was a Cardinal ſent down from Rome by the Kings procurement, who ſtudied to ſet a peace between the two Archbiſhops. Whereupon this way of agreement was taken (by the means of the King) at Wincheſter, that as touching the Church of Saint Oſwald at Gloceſter, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould ceaſe his claim thereof, moleſting the See of York no more therein; alſo ſhould abſolve again the Clerks thereof whom he had excommunicated before. And as concerning the bearing of the Croſs and all other matters, it was referred to the Archbiſhop of Rothomage, and of other Biſhops in France, ſo that for five years a league or truce was taken betwixt them, till they ſhould have a full determination of their cauſe.

The Clerks of S. Oſwald in Gloceſter excommunicated.

Agreement between the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and York.

Anno 1176. Juſtices of Aſſiſe divided into ſix Circuits.

The next year following, the foreſaid King Henry the ſecond (dividing the Realm of England into ſix parts) ordained upon every part three Juſtices of Aſſiſe. The Circuit or Limitation of which Juſtices was thus diſpoſed. The firſt upon Norfolk, Suffolk, Cantebridgeſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Eſſex, Hertfordſhire. Two upon Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Darbyſhire, Stamfordſhire, Warwickſhire, Northamptonſhire, Leiceſterſhire. Three upon Kent, Surry, Southamptonſhire, Southſex, Barkſhire, Oxfordſhire. Four upon Hereforſhire, Gloceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, Salopſhire. Five upon Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Devonſhire, Cornwal. Six upon Everikeſhire, Richmondſhire, Lancaſter, Copland, Weſtmerland, Northumberland, Cumberland.

Matth. Par. & aliarum hiſtoriarum.

In the which Year alſo Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury made three Archdeacons in his Dioceſs, where- as before there was but one. About which time alſo it was granted by the King to the Popes Legate, that a Clerk ſhould not be called before a Temporal Judge, except for offence in the Foreſt, or for his Lay fee that he holdeth.

Item, That no Archbiſhoprick, Biſhoprick, or Abby ſhould remain in the Kings hands over one year without great cauſe. It chanced the ſame year that this was done, there was at Canterbury one elected to be Abbot in the Houſe of St. Auſtine, named Albert, who made great labour and ſute unto the Archbiſhop that he would come to his Church, and there conſecrate him Abbot of St. Auſtins. To whom the Archbiſhop ſent word again, that he was not bound to come to him, but rather the other ſhould repair to the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury, there to receive his Conſecration. Whereupon (controverſie riſing between them) the foreſaid new elect appealed up to the audience of the Pope, and ſo laboured up himſelf to Rome. Where he ſo handled the matter (by what means I cannot tell, unleſs with his Golden Bottel, wherewith he quenched the Popes thirſty ſoul, for Abbots never travel lightly without fat Purſes to Rome) that with ſhort diſpatch he procured Letters from Alexander the Pope, to Roger Biſhop of Worceſter; ſignifying to him, that he had given in charge and commandment to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (in the behalf of his dear ſon Albert) that he ſhould conſecrate him within his own Monaſtery, which Monaſtery properly and ſolely without mediation belonged to the juriſdiction of Rome, and ſo likewiſe ſhould do to his ſucceſſors after him, without any exaction of obedience of them. Which thing, further he ſaid, if the Archbiſhop would refuſe to do within the term appointed, that then he the foreſaid Biſhop of Worceſter ſhould (by the authority committed unto him) execute the ſame, all manner of appellation or other decree, whatſoever ſhould come, notwithſtanding. This Letter being obtained, the Abbot that would be, returneth home, ſuppoſing with himſelf all things to be ſure. The Archbiſhop underſtanding the cauſe, and ſeeing himſelf to be ſo ſtraitly charged, and yet loth to yield and ſtoop to the Abbot, took to him policy where authority would not ſerve; and both to ſave himſelf, and yet to diſappoint the Abbot, he watched a time when the Abbot was about buſineſs of his houſe. And coming the ſame time to the Monaſtery, as he was commanded to do, with all things appointed, that to ſuch a buſineſs appertained, he called for the Abbot, pretending no leſs than to give him his Conſecration. The Abbot, being called for, was not at home; the Archbiſhop, feigning himſelf not a little grieved at his labour and good will ſo loſt, departed: as one in whom no ready diligence was lacking, if in caſe that the Abbot had been at home. Whereupon the Abbot being thus diſappointed, was feign to fill his Silver Flagons afreſh, and make a new courſe to Rome to his Father the Pope, of whom he received his Conſecration, and ſo came home again, with as much wit as he went forth, but not with ſo much mony peradventure as he went withal.

A frivolous contention between the Archbiſhop and the Abbot of Canterbury.

Where was here the precept of the Goſpel, He that will be greateſt amongſt you, let him be an underling to others?

The tenor of the Popes Letter to the biſhop of Worceſter.

We have declared a little afore touching the acts and doings of this Pope Alexander the third, how he had brought the Emperors head under his foot in Saint Mark's Church at Venice, at which time and place peace was concluded, and a compoſition made between the Pope and the ſaid Frederick the Emperor. Which pacification Rogerus Hovedenus, and Gualterus Gisburgenſis, refer to this time, being the year of our Lord 1177. bringing in two ſeveral Letters ſent from the ſaid Pope Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to Roger Archbiſhop of York, and Hugh Biſhop of Dureſme. Out of the which Letters, ſo much as ſerveth to our purpoſe, I have taken and here inſerted.

Hovedenus Guburgenſis Anno 1177.

The Letter of Pope Alexander, ſent to Roger Archpiſhop of York, and to the Biſhop of Dureſme.

A Lexander ſervant of the ſervants of God, to his reverend brethren Roger Archbiſhop of York, and Hugh Biſhop of Dureſme, greeting and Apoſtolical bleſſing. The obſequy and ſervice of your kind devotion, which hitherto you are known to have given both devoutly and laudably to us and to the Church, requireth that we ſhould deſcribe to you, as to our ſpecial friends, the proſperous ſucceſs of the Church, and to let you know, as ſpiritual children of the Church, what hath happened to the ſame. For meet it is, convenient, and alſo honeſt, that you, whom we have had ſo firm and ſure in our devotion, ſhould now be cheriſhed and made joyous in the proſperity of us and of the Church. And about the end of the Epiſtle it followeth thus:

A meek Emperor, and a proud Pope.

The next day following, which was the Feaſt of Saint James (the ſaid Emperor ſo requeſting) we came to the foreſaid Church of St. Mark, there to celebrate our ſolemn Maſs; where (as we were coming in the way) the ſaid Emperor met us without the Church, and placing us again on his right hand, he brought us ſo into the Church. After the Maſs was done, placing us again on his right hand, he brought us to the Church Door. And moreover, when we ſhould take our Palfrie, he held our Stirrup, exhibiting to us ſuch honour and reverence, as his Progenitors were wont to exhibite to our Predeceſſors. Wherefore theſe ſhall be to incite your diligence and ſtudy towards us, that you rejoyce with us and the Church in theſe our proſperous ſucceſſes, and alſo that you ſhall open the ſame effect of peace to other devout children of the Church: that ſuch as be touched with the zeal of the houſe of the Lord, may congratulate and rejoyce alſo in the Lord for the great working of peace which he hath given. Given at Venice in the deep River, the 26 of July.

The Emperor holdeth the Popes Stirrup.

This Year the contention revived again, ſpoken of a little before, between the two Archbiſhops of York and Canterbury, the occaſion whereof was this; The manner and practice of the Pope is, when he beginneth to lack Mony, he ſendeth ſome limiting Cardinal abroad to fetch his Harveſt in. So there came this year into England (as lightly few years were without them) a certain Cardinal from Rome, called Hugo, or as Hovedenus nameth him, Hugezim, who would needs keep a Council at Weſtminſter. To this Council reſorted a great confluence (about middle of Lent) of Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, Doctors, and ſuch others of the Clergy. As every one was there placed in his order, and after his degree, firſt cometh the Archbiſhop of York named Roger, who (thinking to prevent the other Archbiſhop) came ſomething ſooner, and ſtraightway placed himſelf on the right hand of the Cardinal. Richard the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, following ſhortly after, and ſeeing the firſt place taken up, refuſeth to take the ſecond, complaining of the Archbiſhop of York, as one prejudicial to his See. So while the one would not riſe, and the other part not ſit down, there roſe no ſmall contention between them two. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury claimed the upper ſeat by the preheminence of his Church. Contrary, the Archbiſhop of York alledged for him the old Decree of Gregory, whereof mention is made before. By which this order was taken between the two Metropolitans of Canterbury and York, that which of them two ſhould be firſt in election, he ſhould have the preheminence in dignity to go before the other. Thus they contending to and fro, waxed ſo warm in words, that at laſt they turned to hot blows. How ſtrong the Archbiſhop of York was in reaſon and argument, I cannot tell; but the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſtronger at the arms end; whoſe ſervants being more in number (like valiant Men) not ſuffering their Maſter to take ſuch a foile, ſo prevailed againſt York (ſitting on the right hand of the Cardinal) that they pluckt him down from the hand to the foot of the Cardinal upon the ground, treading and trampling upon him with their feet, that marvel it was he eſcaped with life. His Caſule, Chimer and Rochet were all to be rent and torn from his Back. Here no reaſon would take place, no debating would ſerve, no praying could be heard, ſuch clamour and tumult was there in the Houſe among them, much like to the tumult which Virgil deſcribeth:

Contention between two Archbiſhops who ſhould ſit on the right hand of the Cardinal.

Ac veluti in magno populo, cum ſæpe coorta eſt
Seditio, ſævitque animis ignobile vulgus,
Jamque faces & ſaxa volant, furor arma miniſtrat.

Now as the firſt part of this deſcription doth well agree, ſo ſome peradventure will look again, that according to the latter part alſo of the ſame, my Lord Cardinal with ſageneſs and gravity (after the manner of the old Romans ſtanding up) ſhould have ceaſed and allayed the diſturbance, according to that which followeth in the Poet,

Tum pietate gravem meritis ſi forte virum quem
Conſpexere, ſilent, arrectiſque auribus aſtant:
Ille regit mentes dictis, & pectora mulcet, &c.

But what did the noble Roman Cardinal? Like a prety man of his hands (but a pretier man of his feet) ſtanding up in the midſt, and ſeeing the houſe in ſuch a broile, committed himſelf to flight, and (as Hovedenus writeth) Abſcondit ſe a facie illorum. The next day the Archbiſhop of York bringeth to the Cardinal his Rochet, to bear witneſs what injury and violence he had ſuſtained; appealing and citing up the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with certain of his men to the Biſhop of Rome. And thus the holy Council (the ſame day it was begun) brake up and was diſſolved.

Under the Reign of this King Henry the ſecond, the Dominion and Crown of England extended ſo far as hath not been ſeen in this Realm before him; whom Hiſtories record to poſſeſs under his rule and juriſdiction, firſt, Scotland, to whom William King of Scots, with all the Lords Temporal and Spiritual, did Homage both for them and for their ſucceſſors (the Seal whereof remaineth in the Kings Treaſury) as alſo Ireland, England, Normandy, Aquitan, Gant, &c. To the Mountains of Pirency, which be in the uttermoſt part of the great Ocean in the Britiſh Sea, being alſo Protector of France; to whom Philip the French King yielded both himſelf and his Realm wholly to his governance, in the year of our Lord 1181. Moreover, he was offered alſo to be the King of Jeruſalem, by the Patriarch and Maſter of the Hoſpital there; who, then being diſtreſſed by the Soldan, brought him the Keies of their City, deſiring his aid againſt the Infidels; which offer he then refuſed, alledging the great charge which he had at home, and the rebellion of his Sons, which might happen in his abſence.

The large dominion of K. Henry the Second.

Homage of Scotland in pain of interdiction.

K. Henry the ſecond Protector of France.

K. Henry choſen King of Jeruſalem and refuſed it.

¶ And here the old Hiſtories find a great fault with the King for his refuſal; declaring that to be the cauſe of Gods Plagues, which after inſued upon him by his Children, as the Patriach in his Oration (being offended with the King) propheſied ſhould ſo happen to him for the ſame cauſe. Which ſtory, if it be true, it may be a leſſon to good Princes, not to deny their neceſſary help to their diſtreſſed neighbours, eſpecially the cauſe appertaining unto God.

Aid not to be denied to our neighbours, the cauſe being godly. Ex Polychro. Ex Giraldo. Cambrenſi.

The wiſdom, diſcretion, manhood and riches of this Prince was ſo ſpread and renowned from all Quarters, that Meſſages came from Emmanuel Emperor of Conſtantinople, Frederick Emperor of Rome, and William Archbiſhop of Trevers in Almain, the Duke of Saxon, and from the Earl of Flanders, and alſo from the French King, (upon determination of great queſtions and ſtrifes) to ask counſel and determination thereof of this King Henry, as of one moſt wiſe, and Schoolmaſter of all wiſdom and juſtice, to have ſolution of their queſtions and doubts. Moreover, Alphonſus King of Caſtile, and Sancius King of Navarre, being in ſtrife for certain Caſtles and other poſſeſſions, ſubmitted them (of their free accord, and by their Oaths) to abide the award of this King Henry; who made award and pleaſed them both; whereby it is to be preſuppoſed, that this King, to whom other Princes did ſo reſort, as to their arbitrer and deciſer, did not attend either to any ſloth or vicious living. Wherefore it may ſeem that the acts of this Prince were not ſo vicious as ſome Monkiſh Writers do deſcribe.

K. Henry choſen arbitrer by two Kings.

Among many other things in this King memorable, this one is to be noted (follow it who can) that he reigned five and thirty years, and having ſuch Wars with his enemies, yet never upon his Subjects put any Tribute or Tax, nor yet upon the Spiritualty, firſt fruits and appropriations of Benefices. Belike they were not known, or elſe not uſed. And yet his Treaſure after his death (weighed by King Richard his Son) amounted to above nine hundred thouſand pounds, beſides Jewels, precious Stones, and houſhold furniture. Of the which ſubſtance eleven thouſand pounds came to him by the death of Roger Archbiſhop of York, who had procured a Bull of the Pope, that if any Prieſt died within his Province without Teſtament, then he ſhould have all his Goods. And ſhortly after the Archbiſhop died, and the King had all his Goods, which extended (as is ſaid) to eleven thouſand pounds beſides Plate, in the year of our Lord God 1181.

The treaſure of K. Henry the ſecond.

A covetous Archbiſhop.

But as there is no felicity or wealth in this mortal World ſo perfect, which is not darkened with ſome cloud of incumbrance and adverſity; ſo it happened to this King, that among his other Princely ſucceſſors, this incommodity followed him withal, that his Sons rebelled and ſtood in armour againſt him, taking the part of the French King againſt their Father. Firſt, at the Coronation of Henry his Son, whom the Father joyned with him as King, he being both Father and King, took upon him (that notwithſtanding) but as a Steward, and ſet down the firſt Diſh as Sewer unto his Son, renouncing the name of a King. At what time the foreſaid Archbiſhop of York, ſitting on the right hand of the young King, ſaid, Sir, ye have great cauſe this day to joy, for there is no Prince in the World that

Pride deſtroyeth all.

that hath ſuch an Officer this day, &c. And the young King diſdaining his words, ſaid, My Father is not diſhonoured in this doing, for I am a King and a Queens Son, and ſo is not he. And not only this, but after he alſo perſecuted his Father; and ſo in his youth when he had reigned but a few years died; teaching us what is the price and reward of breaking the juſt Commandment of God.

King Henry the ſecond perſecuted by his Sons.

After him likewiſe Richard his Son (who was called Richard Ceur de Lion) rebelled againſt his Father, and alſo John his youngeſt Son did not much degenerate from the ſteps of his Brethren. Inſomuch that this foreſaid Richard (like an unkind child) perſecuting and taking part againſt his Father, brought him to ſuch diſtreſs of body and mind, that for thought of heart he fell into an Ague, and within four days departed, after he had reigned five and thirty years; whoſe Corpſe as it was carried to be buried, Richard his Son coming by the way and meeting it, and beginning for compaſſion to weep, the blood braſt incontinent out of the Noſe of the King at the coming of his Son; giving thereby a certain demonſtration how he was the only Author of his death.

The death of K. Henry the ſecond. How the King being dead, bled at the coming of his Son.

After the death and reign of which King, his Children after him (worthily rewarded for their unnaturalneſs againſt their Father) lacking the ſucceſs which their Father had, loſt all beyond the Sea that their Father had got before.

And thus much concerning the Reign of Henry the Second, and the death of Thomas Becket; whoſe death (as is aforeſaid) happened in the days of Pope Alexander the Third; which Pope uſurping the Keys of Eccleſiaſtical Regiment one and twenty years (or as Gisburnenſis writeth, three and twenty years) governed the Church with much tumult; ſtriving and contending with Frederick the Emperor, not ſhaming like a moſt proud Lucifer, to tread with his foot upon the neck of the ſaid Emperor, as is above deſcribed.

Anno 1179.

This Pope among many other his acts had certain Councils (as is partly before touched) ſome in France, ſome at Rome in Laterân; by whom it was decreed, that no Archbiſhop ſhould receive the Pall, unleſs he ſhould firſt ſwear. Concerning the ſolemnity of which Pall, for the order and manner of giving and taking the ſame with obedience to the Pope, as it is contained in their own words; I thought it good to ſet it forth unto thee, that thou mayeſt well conſider and underſtand their doings therein.

The form and manner how and by what words the Pope is wont to give the Pall unto the Archbiſhop.

Giving of the Pall.

AD honorem omnipotentis Dei, & beatæ Mariæ Virginis, & beatorum Petri & Pauli, & domini noſtri N. Papæ, & ſanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ, necnon N. Eccleſiæ tibi commiſſæ, tradimus tibi pallium de corpore beati Petri ſumptum, plenitudinem Pontificalis officii, ut utaris eo infra Eccleſiam tuam certis diebus, qui exprimuntur in privilegiis tibi ab Apoſtolica ſede conceſſis.

That is in Engliſh:

To the honour of Almighty God, and of Bleſſed Mary the Virgin, and of Bleſſed Saint Peter and Paul, and of our Lord Pope N. and of the holy Church of Rome, and alſo of the Church of N. committed to your charge, we give to you the Pall taken from the body of St. Peter, as a fulneſs of the office Pontifical, which you may wear within your own Church upon certain days, which be expreſſed in the privileges of the ſaid Church, granted by the Sea Apoſtolick.

Notes upon the ſame.

§ 'To the honour, &c. With what confidence durſt the 'Pope couple the honour of Almighty God, and the ho'nour of Mary, of Saint Peter, and of the Pope, and of 'the Romiſh Church all together, if he had not been a 'preſumptuous Lucifer, equalling himſelf not only with 'ſuch Saints, but alſo even with him which is God alone, 'to be bleſſed for ever?

'Taken from the body, &c. If St. Peter's body be not 'all conſumed, let him ſhew it if he can. If he cannot 'ſhew it, how then is this Pall taken from the body of St. 'Peter? Or if he mean it to be of St. Peter's own wear'ing, then belike St. Peter had a goodly Wardrobe of 'Palls, when every Archbiſhop in all Chriſtendom recei'veth from the Pope a divers Pall.

'As a fulneſs of the office, &c. Rather he might ſay the 'fulneſs of his own Purſe, when as Archbiſhops paid ſo 'ſweetly for it. Inſomuch that Jacobus the Archbiſhop of 'Mentz, as is above touched a little before in the Council 'of Baſil, where the price was wont to be but a thouſand 'Florens, could not obtain it without ſix and twenty thou'ſand Florens.

'Upon certain days, &c. This difference there was be- Ex libro gravaminum Nationis Germanicæ.
'tween the Pope and other Archbiſhops: for the Pope 'might wear the Pall at all times, and in all places at his 'pleaſure. Archbiſhops might not wear it but upon certain 'days, and in their Church only within their Province. 'Moreover this Pall ſhould not be asked but with great in'ſtance, and within three months, without which Pall he 'is not to be named Archbiſhop, but may be depoſed, 'having it not after three months: and the ſame Pall muſt 'alſo be buried with him when he dieth; and when it is 'given, ſome priviledg muſt be given withal, or the old 'renewed.

In like manner proceedeth the Oath of every Biſhop ſwearing obedience to the Pope in like words as followeth.

The ſolemn Oath of Biſhops made to the Pope.

EGO N. Epiſcopus N. ab hac hora in antea fidelis & obediens ero beato Petro, ſanctæque Apoſtolicæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ, & domino meo D. N. Papæ, ſuiſque ſucceſſoribus canonice intrantibus. Non ero in conſilio, ſeu auxilio, conſenſu, vel facto, ut vitam perdant aut membrum, ſeu capiantur mala captione. Conſilium vero quod mihi crediturî ſunt, per ſe aut per nuncium, ſeu literas eorum, me ſciente nemini pandam. Papatum Romanum & regalia S. Petri adjutor eis ero ad retinendum & defendendum ſalvo meo ordine, contra omnem hominem. Legatum Apoſtolicæ ſedis in eundo & redeundo honorifice tractabo, & in ſuis neceſſitatibus adjuvabo. Vocatus ad Synodum veniam, niſi præpeditus fuero canonica præpeditione. Apoſtolorum limina ſingulis triennîs viſitabo, aut per per me, aut per meum nuncium, niſi Apoſtolica abſolvar licentia. Poſſeſſiones vero ad menſam mei Epiſcopatus pertinentes non vendam, neque donabo, neque oppignorabo, neque de novo infeudabo, nec aliquo modo alienabo inconſulto Rom. Pontifice: ſic me Deus adjuvet, & ſancta Dei Evangelia.

Salvo meo ord.

This was the clauſe that made Becket to be baniſhed & to be ſlain.

That is in Engliſh:

I. N. Biſhop of N. from this hour henceforth, will be faithful and obedient to bleſſed St. Peter, and to the holy Apoſtolick Church of Rome, and to my Lord N. the Pope. I ſhall be in no Council, nor help either with my conſent or deed, whereby either of them, or any member of them may be impaired, or whereby they may be taken with any evil taking. The Council which they ſhall commit to me either by themſelves, or by meſſenger, or by their Letters wittingly or willingly I ſhall utter to none to their hinderance and damage. To the retaining and maintaining the Papacy of Rome, and the Regalities of St. Peter, I ſhall be an aider (ſo mine order be ſaved) againſt all perſons. The Legate of the Apoſtolick See both in going and coming I ſhall honourably intreat and help in all neceſſities. Being called to a Synod I ſhall be ready to come, unleſs I be let by ſome lawful and Canonical impeachment. The Palace of the Apoſtles every third year I ſhall viſit either by my ſelf or my meſſenger, except otherwiſe being licenſed by the See Apoſtolick. All ſuch poſſeſſions as belong to the Table and Diet of my Biſhoprick, I ſhall neither ſell, nor give, nor lay to mortgage, nor leaſe out, nor remove away by any manner of means without the conſent and knowledg of the Biſhop of Rome: ſo God help me and the holy Goſpels of God.

And how be not thoſe Biſhops then perjured, which at the death of Q. Mary, ſet and let out a great part of their poſſeſſions from their ſucceſſors.

A Note upon the ſame.

§ 'Hereby thou haſt by the way (gentle Reader) to 'note and conſider, among other things which here may 'be underſtood, that ſince the time the Oath began to be 'laid and thruſt upon Biſhops, all General Councils began 'to loſe their liberty. For how could any freedom remain 'for men to ſpeak their knowledg in redreſs of things, be- 'ing by their Oath ſo bound to the Pope to ſpeak nothing 'but on his ſide, to maintain the Papacy, and the Church 'of Rome in all times and places? Conjecture by thy ſelf '(Chriſtian Reader) what is more hereby to be conſi- 'dered.

BEſides this it was alſo decreed in the ſaid Council at Rome of 310 Biſhops, by Pope Alexander, that no man ſhould have any Spiritual Promotion, except he were of lawful age, and born in Wedlock. That no Pariſh Church ſhould be void above ſix Months. That none within Orders ſhould meddle with Temporal buſineſs. That Prieſts ſhould have but one Benefice, and that the Biſhop ſhould be charged to find the Prieſt a Living till he be promoted.

That open Uſurers ſhould not communicate at Eaſter, nor be buried within the Church-yard.

That nothing ſhould be taken for miniſtring Sacraments or Burying.

Item, That every Cathedral Church ſhould have a Maſter to teach Children freely, without taking any thing for the ſame.

The Vow of Chaſtity laid upon Prieſts.

In this Council the Vow of Chaſtity was obtruded and laid upon Prieſts. Thomas Becket alſo and Bernard were Canonized for Saints.

During the reign and time of this King Henry the Second, the City of Norwich was deſtroyed and burnt by the men of Flanders. Alſo the Town of Leiceſter. Nottingham waſted, and the Burgeſſes ſlain by the Earl of Ferrers. The Town of Barwick deſtroyed by the Scots. The King of Scots was taken in war by Engliſhmen in the year of our Lord 1174. The Town of Huntington taken and burned. The Town of Canterbury by caſualty of fire burnt with all the Churches, ſpecially with the Trinity Church where Becket was worſhipped, An. eod. The year of our Lord 1170. William King of Scots, with David his Brother, and all the Barons of the Realm, did homage to the King of England. Ireland made ſubject to England. Decreed in a Council in Normandy, that no Boys or Children ſhould poſſeſs any Benefice. A Council of Lateran was holden at Rome, where were three and thirty Articles concluded, Anno 1179. The French King came in Pilgrimage to Thomas Becket, the King of England meeting him by the way, An. 1184. After the death of Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who followed after Thomas Becket, ſucceeded Baldwinus; who of a Ciſtercian Monk being made a Biſhop, is ſaid never to eat fleſh in his life. Whom a certain poor woman bare and lean, meeting him in the ſtreet, deſired to know of him whether it were true that was ſaid of him, that he never did eat fleſh. Which thing when he had affirmed to be true: Nay (ſaith ſhe) that is falſe, for you have eaten my fleſh unto the bone, for I had but one Cow wherewith I was ſuſtained, and that have your Deans taken from me. True, true, ſaid the Biſhop, and thou ſhalt have another Cow as good as that, &c. Fornalenſ.

Baldwinus Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Moreover in the reign of the ſaid King Henry, about the year of our Lord 1178, I find in the Story of Roger Hoveden and others, that in the City of Tholouſe was a great multitude of men and women whom the Popes Commiſſioners, to wit, Peter Cardinal of St. Chryſogon, and the Popes Legate, with the Archbiſhops of Narbon and Biturienſis, Reginald Biſhop of Bath, John Biſhop of Pictavia, Henry Abbot Clarevallenſis, &c. did perſecute and condemn for Hereticks; of whom ſome were ſcourged naked, ſome chaſed away, ſome compelled to abjure. Concerning whoſe articles and opinions I have no firm ground to make any certain relation, forſomuch as I ſee the Papiſts many times ſo falſe in their quarreling accuſations, untruly collected mens ſayings, not as they meant, and meaning not as they ſaid, but wreſting and depraving ſimple mens aſſertions after ſuch a ſubtil ſort as they liſt themſelves to take them. But this I find, how one of the ſaid Commiſſioners or Inquiſitors (Henry the Abbot) in a certain Letter of his wrote thus of them: Nam & panem ſanctum vitæ æternæ, ſacerdotis miniſterio in verbo Domini conſecratum, non eſſe corpus Domini, novo dogmate contendebat aſſerere. That is, after a new opinion he affirmed that the holy bread of eternal life, conſecrated by the Miniſtry of the Prieſt, was not the body of the Lord, &c.

In the time of this Alexander ſprang up the Doctrine and name of them which were then called Pauperes de Lugduno, which of one Waldus a chief Senator in Lions, were named Waldenſes; Item Leoniſtæ & Inſabbatati; about the year of our Lord 1109, or (as Laziardus writeth) Anno 1170.

Waldenſes ſeu pauperes de Lugduno. Leoniſtæ. Sabbatati.

Four Archpillars of proud Papiſtry.

Not long before this time (as is expreſſed above) roſe up Gratianus Maſter of the Decrees, and Petrus Lombardus Maſter of the Sentences, both Archpillars of all Papiſtry; after whom followed alſo two as evil, or worſe than they, Franciſcus and Dominicus, maintaining blind hypocriſie no leſs than the other maintained proud Prelacy. As theſe laboured one way by ſuperſtition and worldly advancement to corrupt the ſincerity of Chriſtian Religion, ſo it pleaſed Chriſt the contrary way, labouring againſt theſe, to raiſe up therefore the ſaid Waldenſes againſt the pride and hypocriſie of the others.

Thus we never ſee any great corruption in the Church, but that ſome ſparkle of the true and clear light of the Goſpel yet by Gods Providence doth remain; whatſoever Doctor Auguſtinus, Reinerius, Sylvius, Cranzius, with others in their Popiſh Hiſtories do write of them (defaming them through miſreport) and accuſing them to Magiſtrates, as diſobedient to Orders, rebels to the Catholick Church, and contemners of the Virgin Mary; yet they that carry judgment indifferent, rather truſting truth than wavering with times, in weighing their articles, ſhall find it otherwiſe; and that they maintained nothing elſe but the ſame Doctrine which is now defended in the Church. And yet I ſuppoſe not contrary, but as the Papiſts did with the Articles of Wickliff and Hus, ſo they did in like manner with their Articles alſo, in gathering and wreſting them otherwiſe than they were meant.

The Hiſtory of the Waldenſes concerning their Original and Doctrine, with their Perſecutions.

The Hiſtory of Waldenſes, or Albigenſes.

THE firſt original of theſe Waldenſes came of one Waldus, a man both of great ſubſtance, and no leſs calling in the City of Lions; the occaſion whereof is declared of divers Writers thus to come: About the year of our Lord 1160, it chanced that divers of the beſt and chiefeſt heads of the City of Lions talking and walking in a certain place after their old accuſtomed manner, eſpecially in the Summer-time, conferred and conſulted together upon matters, either to paſs over time, or to debate things to be done. Amongſt whom it chanced one (the reſt looking upon) to fall down by ſudden death. In the number of whom this foreſaid Waldus, there being amongſt them was one; who beholding the matter more earneſtly than the other, and terrified with ſo heavy an example, being (as is ſaid) a rich man, and Gods holy Spirit working withal, was ſtricken with a deep and inward repentance, whereupon followed a new alteration with a careful ſtudy to reform his former life. Inſomuch that firſt he began to miniſter large alms of his goods to ſuch as needed. Secondly, to inſtruct himſelf and his family with the true knowledg of Gods word. Thirdly, to admoniſh all that reſorted to him by any occaſion, to repentance and vertuous amendment of life. Whereby partly through his large giving to the poor, partly through his diligent teaching and wholeſome admonitions, more reſort of people daily frequented about him; whom when he did ſee ready and diligent to learn, he began to give out to them certain rudiments of the Scripture, which he had tranſlated himſelf into the French Tongue: for as he was a man wealthy in riches, ſo he was alſo not unlearned.

Although Laziardus, Volateranus, with others, note him utterly unlearned, and charge him with ignorance, as who ſhould procure others to write and tranſlate for him: by others, that have ſeen his doings yet remaining in old Parchment Monuments, it appeareth he was both able to declare and tranſlate the Books of Scripture, and alſo did collect the Doctors mind upon the ſame.

But whatſoever he was (lettered or unlettered) the Biſhops and Prelates ſeeing him ſo to intermeddle with Scriptures, and to have ſuch reſort about him, albeit it was but in his own houſe under private conference, could not abide, either that the Scriptures ſhould be declared of any other, neither would they take the pains to declare it themſelves. So being moved with great malice againſt the Man, they threatned to excommunicate him if he did not leave ſo to do. Waldus ſeeing his doing to be but godly, and their malice ſtirred up upon no juſt nor godly cauſe, neglecting the threatnings and frettings of the wicked, ſaid, that God muſt be obeyed more then Man. To be brief, the more diligent he was in ſetting forth the true Doctrine of Chriſt againſt the errors of Antichriſt, the more maliciouſly their fierceneſs increaſed. Inſomuch that when they did ſee their Excommunication to be deſpiſed, and would not ſerve, they ceaſed not with Priſon, with Sword and Baniſhment to perſecute, till at length they had driven both Waldus and all the favourers of his true preaching out of the City.

The true nature of Antichriſt, neither himſelf to further the Word, nor ſuffer other men to do it

Whereupon came firſt their Name, that they were called Waldenſes, or Pauperes de Lugduno, not becauſe they would have all things common amongſt them, or that they, profeſſing any wilful poverty, would imitate to live as the Apoſtles did (as Sylvius did falſly bely them) but becauſe they, being thruſt out both of Country and Goods, were compelled to live poorly whether they would or no. And thus much touching the firſt occaſion and beginning of theſe Men, and of the reſtoring and maintaining of the true Doctrine of Chriſts Goſpel, againſt the proud proceedings of Popiſh errors. Now concerning their Articles, which I find in order and in number to be theſe:

The Articles of the Waldenſes.

SOlis ſacris literis credendum eſſe in iis quæ ad ſalutem, &c. That is, Only the holy Scripture is to be believed in matters pertaining to Salvation, and no mans writing, or man beſides.

2. All things to be contained in Holy Scripture neceſſary to Salvation, and nothing to be admitted in Religion, but what only is commanded in the Word of God.

3. To be one only Mediator; other Saints in no wiſe to be made Mediators, or to be invocated.

4. To be no Purgatory, but that all Men either by Chriſt are juſtified to life, or without Chriſt be condemned; and beſides theſe two neither any third or fourth place to be.

5. That all Maſſes, namely ſuch as be ſung for the dead, be wicked and to be abrogate.

6. All Mens Traditions to be rejected, at leaſt not to be reputed as neceſſary to ſalvation, and therefore this ſinging and ſuperfluous chanting in the Chancel to be left; conſtrained and prefixed faſts bound to days and times, difference of Meats, ſuch variety of degrees and orders of Prieſts, Friers, Monks and Nuns, ſuperfluous Holy-days, ſo many ſundry benedictions and hallowing of creatures, Vows, Peregrinations, with all the Rabblement of Rites and Ceremonies brought in by Man, to be aboliſhed.

7. The Supremacy of the Pope uſurping above all Churches, and eſpecially above all politick Realms and Governments, or for him to occupy or uſurp the juriſdiction of both the Swords, to be denied; neither that any degree is to be received in the Church, but only Prieſts, Deacons and Biſhops.

8. The Communion under both kinds to be neceſſary to all People, according to the inſtitution of Chriſt.

9. Item, The Church of Rome to be the very Babylon ſpoken of in the Apocalyps; and the Pope to be the fountain of all error, and the very Antichriſt.

10. * The Popes Pardons and Indulgences they reject.

11. The Marriage of Prieſts, and of Eccleſiaſtical perſons, to be godly, and alſo neceſſary in the Church.

12. Such as hear the Word of God, and have a right Faith, to be the right Church of Chriſt. And to this Church the Keies of the Church are to be given, to drive away Wolves, and to inſtitute true Paſtors, and to preach the Word, and to miniſter the Sacraments.

* This Article ſeemeth to be given of them in Bohemia not long after, for Indulgences came not in before Boniface the 8.

Theſe be the moſt principal Articles of the Waldenſes, albeit ſome there be that add more to them; ſome again divide the ſame into more parts, but theſe be the principal to which the reſt be reduced.

The ſame Waldenſes, at length exiled, were diſperſed in divers and ſundry places, of whom many remained long in Bohemia; which writing to their King Uladiſlaus, to purge themſelves againſt the ſlanderous accuſations of one Doctor Auſtin, gave up their confeſſion with an Apology of their Chriſtian Profeſſion; defending with ſtrong and learned arguments the ſame which now is received in moſt reformed Churches, both concerning Grace, Faith, Charity, Hope, Repentance and works of mercy.

As for Purgatory, they ſay that Thomas Aquinas is the Author thereof. The Aquine firſt finder of Purgatory.

Concerning the Supper of the Lord, their Faith was, that it was ordained to be eaten, not to be ſhewed and worſhipped; for a Memorial, not for a Sacrifice; to ſerve for the preſent miniſtration, and not for reſervation; to be received at the Table, not to be carried out of the doors; according to the ancient uſe of the Primitive Church, when they uſed to communicate ſitting. And this they prove both by an old Chronicle called Chronica geſtorum, as alſo by ancient Origen upon the third Book of Moſes, bringing in his words, which be theſe, proving that this Sacramental Bread ought not to be reſerved: Quicunque hunc panem cœna Chriſti ſecunda vel tertia die ſumpſerit, non benedicitur anima ejus, ſed inquinabitur. Propterea Gabaonitæ, quia antiquos panes, &c. That is, Whoſoever receiveth this Bread of the Supper of Chriſt upon the ſecond or third day after, his ſoul ſhall not be bleſſed, but polluted. Therefore the Gabaonites, becauſe they brought old bread to the children of Iſrael, it was injoyned them to carry wood and water, &c. Ex Orthuino Gratio. Chronica geſtorum. Origen ſuper ter ſum libum Moſis. The Sacramental bread ought not to be kept or reſerved.

Doctor Auſtin (of whom mention is made before) diſputing againſt them about this matter of the Holy Euchariſt, urgeth them with this interrogation; whether it be the ſame Chriſt (preſent in the Sacrament) which is preſent at the right hand of the Father? If it be not the ſame Chriſt, how is it true in the Scripture, Una Fides, unus Dominus noſter Ieſus Chriſtus, One Faith, one Lord Jeſus Chriſt? If it be the ſame Chriſt, then how is he not to be honoured and worſhipped here as well as there? Part of the diſputation between Doctor Auſtin and the Waldenſes. Dilemma 2. That is, a captious queſtion in conferring on both ſides an inconvenience

To this the Waldenſes anſwer again, and grant that Chriſt is one and the ſame with his natural body, in the Sacrament which he is at the right hand of his Father, but not after the ſame exiſtence of his body. For the exiſtence of his body in Heaven is perſonal and local, to be apprehended by the Faith and Spirit of Men. In the Sacrament the exiſtence of the body is not perſonal or local, to be apprehended or received of our bodies, after a perſonal or corporal manner, but after a Sacramental manner; that is, where our bodys receive the ſign, and our ſpirit the thing ſignified. Moreover, in Heaven the exiſtence of his body is dimenſive and compleat with the full proportion and quantity of the ſame body wherewith he aſcended. Here, the exiſtence of his compleat body with the full proportion, meaſure and ſtature thereof, doth not, neither can ſtand in the Sacrament. Briefly, the exiſtence of his body in Heaven is Natural, not Sacramental; that is, to be ſeen, and not remembred: Here it is Sacramental, not Natural; that is, to be remembred, not to be ſeen. The anſwer of the Waldenſes. What it is to receive after a Sacramental manner. Natural. Sacramental.

That Anſwer being made to the captious Propoſition of Doctor Auſtin, the Waldenſes (retorting the like interrogation to him again) demand of him to anſwer them in the like objection; Whether it be all one Chriſt ſubſtantially and naturally, which ſitteth in Heaven, and which is under the forms of Bread and Wine, and in the receivers of the Sacrament? If he grant it to be; then they bid him ſay, ſeeing Chriſt is as well in the Sacrament as in Heaven, and as well in the receiver as in the Sacrament, and all one Chriſt in ſubſtance and nature; why then is not the ſame Chriſt as well in the breaſt of the receiver to be worſhipped, as under the forms of Bread and Wine in the Sacrament; ſeeing he is there after a more perfect manner in Man, than in the Sacrament? for in the Sacrament he is but for a time, and not for the Sacraments ſake, but for the Mans cauſe: In Man he is not for the Sacraments cauſe, but for his own; and that not for a ſeaſon, but for Another Dilemma againſt Tranſubſtantiation.

ever,

ever, as it is written; Qui manducat hunc panem vivet in æternum. That is, He that eateth this bread ſhall live for ever, &c.

Moreover and beſides, ſeeing Tranſubſtantiation is the going of one ſubſtance into another; they queſtion again with him, whether the forms of Bread and Wine remaining, the ſubſtance thereof be changed into the whole perſon of our Lord Chriſt Jeſus; that is, both into his body, ſoul and Divinity, or not into the whole Chriſt? If he grant the whole; then ſay they, that is impoſſible (concerning the Divinity) both to nature and to our faith, that any creature can be changed into the Creator. If he ſay, the Bread is changed into the Body and Soul of Chriſt, not to his Divinity, then he ſeparateth the Natures in Chriſt. If he ſay, into the Body alone, and not the Soul, then he ſeparateth the Natures of the true Manhood, &c. and ſo it cannot be the ſame Chriſt that was betrayed for us; for that he had both Body and Soul. To conclude, to what part ſoever he would anſwer, this Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation cannot be deſcended without great inconvenience of all ſides.

Eneas Sylvius Bohemica hiſtoria de Waldenſium dogmatibus.

Over and beſides, Eneas Sylvius writing of their Doctrine and Aſſertions (perchance as he found them, perchance making worſe of them than they taught or meant) reporteth them after this manner, which I thought here to ſet out as it is in the Latine.

Romanum Præſulem reliquis Epiſcopis parem eſſe. Inter ſacerdotes nullam diſcrimen. Presbyterum non dignitatem ſed vitæ meritum efficere potiorem.

In Engliſh:

The Biſhop of Rome to be equal with other Biſhops. Amongſt Prieſts to be no difference of degree. No Prieſt to be reputed for any dignity of his order, but for the worthineſs of his life.

The ſouls of Men departed either to enter into pain everlaſting, or everlaſting joy. No fire of Purgatory to be found. To pray for the dead to be vain, and a thing only found out for the lucre of Prieſts.

The images of God (as of the Trinity) and of Saints to be aboliſhed. The hallowing of water and palmes to be a meer ridicle. The Religion of Begging-Friers to be found out by the Devil. That Prieſts ſhould not incroach riches in this World, but rather follow poverty, being content with their Tithes, and Mens devotion. The preaching of the Word to be free to all Men called thereunto.

That no deadly ſin is to be tolerated, for whatſoever reſpect of a greater commodity to enſue thereupon. The confirmation which Biſhops exercife with Oyl, and extream Unction, are not to be counted among the Sacraments of the Church. Auricular Confeſſion to be but a toy; to ſuffice for every Man to confeſs himſelf in his Chamber to God. Baptiſm ought to be miniſtred only with pure water, without any mixture of hallowed oyl. The Temple of the Lord to be the wide World. The Majeſty of God not to be reſtrained more within the Walls of Temples, Monaſteries and Chappels, ſo that his grace is rather to be found in one place than in another.

The Temple of the Lord, that is, the proper habitation wherein God moſt properly dwelleth & worketh. That is, the very place maketh not the miniſtration of holy things either more or leſs holy.

Prieſts Apparel, Ornaments of the High Altar, Veſtiments, Corporaces, Chalices, Patins, and other Church-plate, to ſerve in no ſtead. For the difference and reſpect of the very place, to make no matter, where the Prieſt doth conſecrate, or doth miniſter to them which do require. To be ſufficient to uſe only the Sacramental words without all other ſuperfluous ceremonies.

The ſuffrages of Saints, reigning with Chriſt in Heaven, to be craved in vain; they being not able to help us. In ſaying or ſinging the Hours and Matins of the day, the time to be but loſt. A man ought to ceaſe from his labour no day, but only upon the Sunday.

The Feaſts and Feſtivals of Saints ought to be rejected. Item, ſuch Faſts as be coacted, and enjoyned by the Church have no merit in them.

The Aſſertions of the Waldenſes being thus articuled out by Eneas Sylvius, I thought to give them abroad in Engliſh as they are in Latine: to the intent that as they are the leſs to be doubted, being ſet out of a Popes Pen; ſo we may the better know both them hereby what they were, and alſo underſtand how this Doctrine, now preached and taught in the Church, is no new Doctrine which here we ſee both taught and perſecuted almoſt 400 years ago. And as I have ſpoken hitherto ſufficiently concerning their Doctrine; ſo now we will briefly ſomewhat touch of the order of their life and converſation, as we find it regiſtred in a certain old written Book of Inquiſition.

Ex inquiſitoria quodam libello.

De modo & inſtitutione Waldenſium.

Modus autem Waldenſium talis eſt, &c. The whole proceſs cometh to this effect in Engliſh. The manner of the Waldenſes is this, They, kneeling upon their knees, leaning to ſome bank or ſtay, do continue in their prayers with ſilence ſo long as a man may ſay thirty or forty times Pater noſter. And this they do every day with great reverence, being amongſt themſelves, and ſuch as be of their own Religion, and no ſtrangers with them, both before Dinner and after; likewiſe before Suppers and after; alſo what time they go to Bed, and in the morning when they riſe, and at certain other times alſo, as well in the day as in the night. Item, They uſe no other prayer but the prayer of the Lord, and that without any Ave Maria, and the Creed, which they affirm not to be put in for any prayer by Chriſt, but only by the Church of Rome. Albeit they have and uſe the ſeven Articles of Faith concerning the Divinity, and ſeven Articles concerning the Humanity, and the Ten Commandments, and ſeven works of Mercy, which they have compiled together in a compendious Book, glorying much in the ſame, and thereby offer themſelves ready to anſwer any man for their faith.

Their manner of grace before meat.

Before they go to meat they have their Grace, Benedicite, Kyrie eleyſon, Chriſte eleyſon, Kyrie eleyſon, Pater noſter. Which being ſaid, then the elder amongſt them beginneth thus in their own tongue: God which bleſſed the five Barley loaves, and two Fiſhes in the deſert before his Diſciples, bleſs this Table, and that is ſet upon it, or ſhall be ſet upon it: In the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, Amen. And likewiſe again, when they riſe from Meat, the ſenior giveth thanks, ſaying the words of the Apocalypſe, Bleſſing, and worſhip, and wiſdom, and thankſgiving, honour, vertue, and ſtrength to God alone for ever and ever, Amen. And addeth moreover, God reward them in their boſomes, and be beneficial to all them that be beneficial to us, and bleſs us. And the God which hath given us corporal feeding, grant us his ſpiritual life and God be with us, and we always with him. To which they anſwer again, Amen. And thus ſaying grace, they hold their hands upward, looking up to Heaven. After their Meat and grace ſaid, they teach and exhort amongſt themſelves, conferring together upon their Doctrine, &c.

Their Grace after meat.

In their Doctrine and teaching they were ſo diligent and painful, that Reinerius a Writer about their time (an extream enemy againſt them) in a long proceſs, wherein he deſcribeth their Doctrine and teaching, teſtifieth, that he heard of one which did know the party, that a certain Heretick (ſaith he) only to turn a certain perſon away from our faith, and to bring him to his (in the night, and in the Winter time) ſwam over the River called Ibis, to come to him, and to teach him. Moreover, ſo perfect they were then in the Scriptures, that the ſaid Reinerius ſaith, he did hear and ſee a man of the Country unlettered, which could recite over the whole Book of Job word by word, without book, with divers others which had the whole New Teſtament perfectly by heart.

And although ſome of them rather merrily than unskilfully expounded the words of 1 John Sui non receperunt eum, Swine did not receive him; yet were they not ſo ignorant and void of learning, nor yet ſo few in number, but that they did mightily prevail, inſomuch that Reinerius hath theſe words; Non erat qui eos impedire auderet propter potentiam & multitudinem fautorum ſuorum. Inquiſitioni & examinationi ſæpe interfui, & computatæ ſunt 40 Eccleſiæ, quæ hæreſi infectæ fuerunt, ac in una Parochia Cammach fuerunt decem eorum Scholæ, &c. That is, There was none durſt ſtop them for the power and multitude of their favourers. I have often been at their inquiſition and examination, and there were numbred forty Churches infected with their Hereſie, inſomuch that in one Pariſh of Cammach, were ten open Schools of them, &c. Hæc ille.

The power and multitude of Waldenſes.

And

Waldenſes in all points found, but only for holding against the Church of Rome. Ex Gribuino Gratio.

And the ſaid Reinerius, when he hath ſaid all he can in depraving and impugning them, yet is driven to confeſs this of them, where he doth diſtinct their Sect from other Sects, and hath theſe words: Hæc vero Leoniſtarum Secta magnam habet ſpeciem pietatis, eo quod coram hominibus juſte vivant, & bene omnia de Deo credant, & omnes articulos, qui in ſymbolo continentur; ſolam Romanam Eccleſiam blaſphemant, & oderunt: That is, This Sect of Leoniſts hath a great ſhew of holineſs, in that both they live juſtly before men, and believe all things well of God, and hold all the articles contained in the Creed; only they do blaſpheme the Romiſh Church, and hate it, &c.

Now to touch ſomewhat their Perſecutions: After they were driven out of Lions, they were ſcattered into divers and ſundry places (the Providence of God ſo diſpoſing) that the ſound of their Doctrine might be heard abroad in the world. Some, as I ſaid, went to Bohemia, many did flee into their Provinces of France, ſome into Lombardy, others into other places, &c. But as the Croſs commonly followeth the verity and ſincere preaching of Gods Word, ſo neither could theſe be ſuffered to live in reſt. There are yet to be ſeen the conſultations of Lawyers, Archbiſhops and Biſhops of France, as Narbonenſis, Arelatenſis, Aquenſis, and Albanenſis, deviſed amongſt themſelves, which yet remain in writing, for the aboliſhing and extirping of theſe Waldenſes, written above three hundred years ago; whereby it appeareth that there was a great number of them in France.

The Croſs commonly followeth the Word.

Waldenſes perſecuted more than 300 years ago by Antichriſt.

Beſides, there was a whole Council kept in Tholouſe about three hundred fifty and five years before, and all againſt theſe Waldenſes, the which alſo were condemned in another Council at Rome before that.

What great Perſecutions were raiſed up againſt them in France by theſe four Archbiſhops before mentioned, it appeareth by their writings; whereof I will recite ſome of their words, which towards the end be theſe: Quis enim eſt iſtius ille peregrinus, qui condemnationem hæreticorum Waldenſium ignoret a longe retro annis factam, tam famoſam, tam publicam, tot & tantis laboribus, expenſis & ſudoribus fidelium inſecutam, & tot mortibus ipſorum infidelium ſolenniter damnatorum, publiceque punitorum tam fortiter ſigillatum? &c. That is, Who is ſuch a ſtranger that knoweth not the condemnation of Waldenſes the Hereticks done and paſt ſo many years ago, ſo famous, ſo publick, followed upon with ſo great labours, expences, and travel of the faithful, and ſealed with ſo many deaths of theſe Infidels, ſo ſolemnly being condemned and openly puniſhed? Whereby we may ſee Perſecution to be no new thing in the Church of Chriſt, when Antichriſt ſo long before (even 300 years) began to rage againſt theſe Waldenſes. In Bohemia likewiſe after that, the ſame called by the name of Thaborits (as Sylvius recordeth) ſuffered no little trouble. But never Perſecution was ſtirred up againſt them, or any other people more terrible than was in theſe later years in France by the French King, in the year of our Lord 1545, which lamentable Story is deſcribed in Sleidan, and hereafter in the proceſs of this Book, as we come to the order of years, ſhall be ſet forth (by the Grace of Chriſt) more at large. In the which Perſecution is declared in one Town Cabriera to be ſlain by the Captain of Sathan Sinorius, 800 perſons at once, without reſpect of Women or Children of any age; of whom forty Women, and moſt of them great with child, thruſt into a Barn, and the Windows kept with Pikes, and ſo fire ſet to them, were all conſumed. Beſides, in a Cave not far from the Town Muſſium, to the number of five and twenty perſons, with ſmoke and fire were the ſame time deſtroyed. At Merindolum the ſame Tyrant (ſeeing all the reſt were fled away) finding one young man, cauſed him to be tyed to an Olive-tree, and to be deſtroyed with torments moſt cruelly; with much other Perſecution, as ſhall appear hereafter in the Hiſtory tranſlated out of Sleidan into Engliſh.

Antichriſt with whom he firſt began his perſecution.

An horrible murther of Chriſts holy Martyrs.

Minerius an horrible Perſecutor.

But to return again to higher times, from whence we digreſſed. Beſides that Reinerius above mentioned, ſpeaketh of one in the Town of Chiron, a Glover which was brought in this time to examination, and ſuffered. There is alſo an old Monument of Proceſs, wherein appeareth 443 to be brought to examination in Pomerania, Marchia, and places thereabouts, about the year of our Lord 1391.

A Glover ſuffered Martyrdom in Chiron.

443 brought to Examination.

And thus much touching the Origine, Doctrine, and the lamentable Perſecutions of the Waldenſes, who as is declared, firſt began about the time of this King Henry the Second of that name.

Other Incidences happening in the Reign of this Henry the Second.

Incidences in the reign of K. Henry the Second.

COncerning the firſt Origine of the Waldenſes, ſpringing in the days of this King, is ſufficiently hitherto declared. Now remaineth in the like order of time to ſtory alſo ſuch other Incidences as chanced under the Reign of the ſaid King, not unworthy to be obſerved, keeping the order of the time ſo near as we may, and as Authors do give unto us.

Mary the Daughter of King Stephen, being the Abbeſs of Ramſey, was married in this Kings days to Matthew Earl of Bullen; which marriage Thomas Becket did work againſt, and did diſſolve, by reaſon whereof he procured himſelf great diſpleaſure with the ſaid Earl, &c. An. 1161. Ex Chronico Bibliothecæ Carienſis.

Becket a diſſolver of Marriages.

The ſame year a certain Child was Crucified of the Jews in the Town of Glouceſter, An. 1161. Fornalenſ. After the ſame manner the wicked Jews had Crucified another Child before in the City of Norwich, in the days of King Stephen, in the year of our Lord 1145.

Two Children Crucified by the Jews.

A Collection was gathered through all England and France, two pence of every pound, for the ſuccour of the Eaſt Chriſtians againſt the Turks, in the year of our Lord 1167. Ex eodem.

Babylon was taken and deſtroyed, and never ſince repaired, by Almaricus King of Hieruſalem, Ann. 1170. Ex vetuſto Manuſcripto exemplari Hiſtoriæ Carienſis.

Babylon utterly deſtroyed.

In the year 1173, almoſt all England was diſeaſed with the Cough, Ex vetuſto Chron. Acephalo. About which year alſo William King of Scots was taken in battel and impriſoned in England.

Great War happened in Paleſtina, wherein the City of Jeruſalem, with the Croſs and King of the City, and others of the Temple, was taken of the Saracens, and moſt part of the Chriſtians there either ſlain or taken. Cruel murther and ſlaugher there was uſed by the Turk, who cauſed all the chief of the Chriſtians to be brought forth and beheaded before his face. Inſomuch that Pope Urbanus the Third for ſorrow died, and Gregory the Eighth, next Pope after him, lived not two months. Then in the days of Pope Clement the Third, news and ſorrow growing daily for the loſs of Paleſtina, and deſtruction of the Chriſtians; King Henry of England, and Philip the French King, the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Flanders, the Earl of Campania, with divers other Chriſtian Princes with a general conſent upon St. Georges day, took the mark of the Croſs upon them, promiſing together to take their voyage into the Holy Land. At which time the Stories ſay, the King of England received firſt the Red Croſs, the French King took the White Croſs, the Earl of Flanders took the Green Croſs; and ſo likewiſe other Princes diverſly divers Colours, thereby to be diſcerned every one by his proper Croſs. But King Henry (after the three years were expired, in which he promiſed to perform his voyage) ſent to the Pope for further delay of his promiſe, offering for the ſame to erect three Monaſteries. Which thing he thus performed: In the Church of Waltham he thruſt out the Secular Prieſts, and ſet in Monks for them. Secondly, he repaired again and brought in the Nuns of Amesbury, which before were excluded for their incontinent life. And thus performed he his promiſe made before to the Pope, Anno 1173.

Under the Reign of the ſaid King Henry, about the five and twentieth year of his Reign, Ludovicus the French King, by the Viſion of Thomas Becket appearing unto him in his dream, and promiſing to him the recovery of his Son, if he would reſort unto him at Canterbury, made his journey into England to viſit St. Thomas at Canterbury, with Philip Earl of Flanders; where he offered a rich Cup of Gold, with other precious Jewels, and one hundred veſſels of wine yearly to be given to the Covent of the Church of Canterbury; notwithſtanding the ſaid Philip in his return from England, taking his journey to Paris to viſit St. Dennis, in the ſame his Pilgrimage was ſtricken with ſuch cold, that he fell into a Palſie, and was benummed of the right ſide of his body, Anno 1178, Fornalenſis, & alii.

In the year 1180, there came to the Council of Pope Alexander one Piſanus Burgundio, a man very cunning both in Greek and Latin, which brought and preſented to the Council the Homilies of Chryſoſtom upon the Goſpel of St. John, tranſlated out of Greek into Latin, and ſaid that he tranſlated likewiſe a great part of his Expoſition upon Geneſis; ſaying moreover, that the ſaid Chryſoſtom had made Expoſitions in Greek upon the whole Old Teſtament, and alſo the new in the year 1180.

In the year 1181, Richard Pech Biſhop of Coventry, before his death renounced his Biſhoprick, and became a Canon in the Church of St. Thomas by Stafford, Ex Chronico pervetuſto, cui initium, in diebus ſanctiſ. regis, &c.

About the later time of this King Henry, one Hugo, whom men were wont to call St. Hugh of Lincoln, born in Burgundy, and Prior of the Monks of Charterhouſe, was preferred by the King to the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, who after his death is ſaid to do great Miracles, and therefore was counted a Saint, Anno 1186. *Flores. Baldwinus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, began the building of his new houſe and Church of Lambeth; but by the Letters of Clement the Third, he was forbidden to proceed in the building thereof. An. 1187. Trivet.

I do find likewiſe in the foreſaid written Chronicle remaining in the hands of one William Carie Citizen of London, that this forenamed King Henry the Second, gave to the Court and Church of Rome for the death of Thomas Becket, forty thouſand Marks of Silver, and five thouſand Marks of Gold, in the year of our Lord 1187.

Mention was made a little above of Almarick King of Jeruſalem, which deſtroyed Babylon, ſo that it was never after to this day reſtored, but lyeth waſt and deſolate; wherein was fulfilled that which in the Prophets in ſo many places was threatned to Babylon before. This Almarick had a Son named Baldwin, and a Daughter called Sybilla. Baldwin from the beginning of his reign was a Leper, and had the Falling-ſickneſs, being not able for feebleneſs of body (although valiant in heart and ſtomack) to ſatisfie that function.

Sibylla his ſiſter was firſt married to one Willermus, Marqueſs of Mount Ferrat, by whom ſhe had a Son called alſo Baldwinus. After him ſhe was married to another Husband named Guido de Liziniaco Earl of Joppe, and of Aſcalon. Upon this it befell that the foreſaid Baldwin the Leper, ſon of Almaricus, being thus feeble and infirm, as is ſaid, called his Nobles together, with his Mother and the Patriarck, declaring to them his inability, and by the conſents of them committed the Under-government of the City unto Guido the Husband of Sibylla his ſiſter. But he being found inſufficient, or elſe not lucky in the Government thereof, the Office was tranſlated to another named Raimundus Earl of Tripolis. In the mean time the Soldan with his Saracens mightily prevailed againſt the Chriſtians, and over-ran the Country of Paleſtina; in which mean time, Baldwin the King departed. Whereby the Kingdom fell next to Baldwinus, the Son of Sibylla by her firſt Husband Willermus; the which Baldwinus, being but five years old, was put to the cuſtody of Raimundus aforeſaid. Who alſo in his Minority, before he came to his Crown died, whereby the next Succeſſion by deſcent fell to Sibylla the wife of Guido above mentioned. The Peers and Nobles joyning together in Council, offered unto the ſaid Sibylla as to the lawfull heir to the Crown, that ſhe ſhould be their Queen, with this condition, that ſhe ſhould ſequeſter from her by ſolemn divorcement the foreſaid her Husband Guido her Husband; but ſhe refuſed the Kingdom offered to her on that condition, till at laſt the Magiſtrates with the Nobles in general, granted unto her, and by the Oaths confirmed the ſame, that whomſoever ſhe would chuſe to be her Husband, all they would take and obey as their King. Alſo Guido her Husband with like petition among the reſt, humbly requeſted her that the Kingdom for his ſake, or for his private loſs, might not be deſtitute of Government. At length ſhe with tears conſenting to their intreaty, was contented, and ſolemnly was Crowned their Queen, who after the manner again received their fidelity by their Oath. Whereupon Guido without all hope both of Wife and Kingdom, departed home quietly to his own. This done, the Queen aſſembling her States and Prelates together, enterd talk with them about the chuſing of the King, according to that which they had promiſed, and ſworn unto her, and to obey him as their King, whom ſhe would name to be her Husband. Thus whileſt they were all in great expectation, waiting every man whom ſhe would nominate, the Queen with a loud voice ſaid to Guido that ſtood amongſt them : Guido my Lord, I chuſe thee for my Husband, and yielding my ſelf and my Kingdom unto you, openly I proteſt you to be the King. At theſe words all the Aſſembly being amazed, wondred that one ſimple woman ſo wiſely had beguiled ſo many wiſe men. And worthy was ſhe no doubt, to be commended and extolled for her ſingular vertue, both of faithful chaſtity and high prudence : ſo tempering the matter, that both ſhe obtained to her Husband the Kingdom, and retained to her ſelf again her Husband, whom ſhe ſo faithfully loved. Anno 1186. Ex Hiſtoria manuſcripta, cui initium, Rex Pictorum ; ex Bibliotheca Carienſi mutuata.

As I have hitherto deſcribed the publick Acts of King Henry, ſo now I mean to touch ſomething of his private conditions. He was of mean ſtature, eloquent and learned, manly and bold in Chivalry, fearful of the mutability and chance of War, more lamenting the death of his Souldiers dead, than loving them alive; none more courteous and liberal for the obtaining of his purpoſe; in peace and tranquillity none more rough; ſtubborn againſt the ſtubborn, ſometimes merciful to thoſe whom he had vanquiſhed, ſtrict to his houſhold-ſervants, but liberal to ſtrangers; publickly of publick things liberal, ſparing of his own; whom once he took a diſpleaſure againſt, hardly or never would he receive again to favour; ſomewhat laviſh of his tongue, a willing breaker of his promiſe, a lover of his eaſe, but an oppreſſor of his Nobility, a ſevere revenger and furtherer of juſtice, variable of word, and crafty in his talk, an open adulterer, a nouriſher of diſcord amongſt his children; moreover the Papiſts bearing him (for Thomas Beckets quarrel, and ſuch like, as may be gathered) no good will, term him to be an adverſary of the Faith, the Mall and Beetle of the Church.

Alſo in the Chronicle intituled Scala mundi, I find of him, that he followed the ſteps, manners and conditions of Henry the firſt his Grandfather, in every point. He preſerved firm peace, and executed ſtrict juſtice through all his Dominions. He loved marvelous well his Foreſts; and again, thoſe that were tranſgreſſors either to his Crown or Perſon, he moſt ſeverely puniſhed.

Moreover, in a certain Hiſtory intituled De Regibus Angliæ, I find that this King was ſundry times admoniſhed to reform and amend his life, and firſt by one that was an old man in the Caſtle of Cardif in Wales, at that time of the year called Dominica in albis, the 8th day after Eaſter; where alſo after that he heard Maſs, and was going to take his Horſe, there ſtood a certain man by him, ſomewhat yellowiſh (his hair being rounded, lean and ill favoured) having on a white Coat, and being bare-foot, who looked upon the King, and ſpake on this wiſe, Good old King, (that done, thus he proceedeth) the King ſaluteth you and his bleſſed Mother, John Baptiſt and Peter ſtraitly charge you, that upon the Sundays throughout all your Dominions, there be no buying and ſelling, or other ſervile buſineſs (thoſe only except which appertain to the preparation of meat and drink) which thing if thou ſhalt obſerve, whatſoever thou takeſt in hand, thou ſhalt happily finiſh and bring to paſs. Then ſpake the King in French unto the Knight that held his Horſe by the Bridle: Ask of this Churl whether he dream'd this or not. And in the mean while that the Knight ſhould have interpreted the Kings words and meſſage, he ſpake before and ſaid, Whether this be a Dream or not, mark well what day this is; for unleſs that thou do theſe things and amend thy life, ſuch news ſhalt thou hear within theſe twelve months, that will make thee lament and mourn till thy dying day. And when theſe words were ſpoken, the man vaniſhed out of his ſight; and within one year next after, Henry, Gaufrid, and Richard his Sons, forſook him their Father, and took part with the French King. The King of Scots, the Earl of Cheſter, and Earl of Leiceſter, made an inſurrection againſt the King. Many other premonitions were given alſo to the King, but all theſe did he little eſteem. The ſecond, which did admoniſh him, was a certain Iriſhman, giving him certain ſecret ſigns. And thirdly, a certain Knight of Findeſey, named Philip de Eaſterby, ſaying with him over into France, declared unto the King in Normandy ſeven Articles which he ſhould amend. Which thing if he would do, he ſhould Reign ſeven years moſt honourably, and ſhould take the holy Croſs from his enemies; or elſe he, in the fourth year, ſhould die in a great ignominy. The three firſt things were theſe, which he at his Coronation ſware to obſerve, that is, to defend the Church, to maintain good Laws, and to condemn no man to death without judgment. The fourth was for the reſtoring of inheritance wrongfully taken; the fifth was in doing juſtice without reward; the ſixth, was of Miniſters and Officers Wages and Stipends; the ſeventh was of expelling the Jews, leaving them ſome mony to depart withal. But the King not amending his life, there roſe up againſt him three ſtrong enemies, that is to ſay, his three Sons with the French King. But, after that the King forſooth had gone on Pilgrimage to the Martyrs Tomb barefoot, William King of Scots, and the Earls of Cheſter and Leiceſter were taken at Alnewike.

In the five and thirty year of his Regn, being in the Caſtle of Chiven in Normandy, he died; at whoſe death thoſe that were preſent, were ſo greedy of the ſpoil, that they left the body of the King naked, and not ſo much could be found as a Cloth to cover it, till that a Page coming in, and ſeeing the King ſo ignominiouſly to lie, threw his Cloak upon his nether parts; wherein, ſaith the Author, was verified the ſirname which from his youth he bare, being called Henry Curt Mantil.

King RICHARD.

Anno 1189. K. Richard crowned.

IN this year of our Lord above recited, which was 1189. King Richard the eldeſt Son of Henry the Second, ſucceeding his Father, entred his Crown; at which time Pope Clement ſate at Rome, ſucceeding after Gregory, which died a little before with ſorrow for the loſs of the Holy-Croſs.

During the time of whoſe Coronation it befell, that notwithſtanding the King, the day before his Coronation, by publick Edict commanded both the Jews and their Wives, not to preſume either to enter the Church, or elſe his Palace, during the ſolemnization of his Coronation, amongſt his Nobles and Barons, yet (whileſt the King was at Dinner) the Chieftain of the Jews, with divers other of his Jewiſh affinity and ſuperſtitious Sect, againſt the King his prohibition, together with other preſs, entred the Court Gates. Whereat a Chriſtian man being offended, ſtruck one of them with his hand or fiſt, and bade him ſtand further from the Court Gate, as the King had given in commandment; whoſe example others alſo following, being diſpleaſed againſt the Jews, offered them the like contumely. Others alſo, ſuppoſing that the King had ſo commanded indeed, as uſing the authority of the King, fell upon all the Jews that ſtood by without the Court Gate. And firſt they beat them with their fiſts, but afterwards they took up ſtones and ſuch other things as they could get, and threw at them from the Court Gates, ſome of them they wounded, ſome they ſlew, and ſome they left for dead.

The Kings reſtraint, that no Jew ſhould enter the Palace nor Church, during his Coronation.

There was amongſt this number of the Jews, one which was called the bleſſed Jew of York, which was ſo ſore wounded and beaten with the reſt, that, for fear of his life, he ſaid, he would become a Chriſtian, and was indeed of William the Prior of the Church of St. Mary of York baptiſed; whereby he eſcaped the peril of death he was in, and the perſecutors hands. In the mean while, there was a great rumor ſpread throughout all the City of London, that the King had commanded to deſtroy all the Jews. Whereupon as well the Citizens, as innumerable people more, being aſſembled to ſee the Kings Coronation, armed themſelves and came together. The Jews thus being for the moſt part ſlain, the reſt fled into their houſes, where for a time, through the ſtrong and ſure building of them, they were defended. But at length their houſes were ſet on fire, and they deſtroyed therein.

A Jew through fear was baptiſed.

The Jews in London ſlain, and their houſes ſet on fire.

Theſe things being declared to the King, whilſt he with his Nobles and Barons were at Dinner, he ſendeth immediately Ranulfe de Glanvile, the Lord High Steward of England, with divers other Noblemen to accompany him, that they might ſtay and reſrain theſe ſo bold enterpriſes of the Londoners, but all was in vain: for in this ſo great a tumult, none there was that either regarded what the Nobility ſaid, or elſe any whit reverenced their perſonages, but rather with ſtern looks and threatning words adviſed them (and that quickly) to depart. Whereupon they, with good deliberation, thinking it the beſt ſo to do, departed; the tumult and inſurrection continuing till the next day. At which time alſo the King, ſending certain of his Officers into the City, gave them in commandment to apprehend and preſent ſome ſuch as were the chiefeſt of the malefactors: of the which, three were condemned to be hanged, and ſo were; the one, for that he had robbed a Chriſtians houſe in this tumult, and the other two for that they fired the Houſes, to the great danger of the City. After this, the King ſent for him, that from a Jew was converted to Chriſtianity, and in the preſence of thoſe that ſaw where he was baptiſed, the King asked him whether he was become a Chriſtian or not? He anſwering the King, ſaid, No, but to the intent he might eſcape death, he promiſed to do whatſoever the Chriſtians would have him. Then the King asked the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (other Archbiſhops and Biſhops being preſent) what were beſt to be done with him? Who unadviſedly anſwering, ſaid; If he will not be a Man of God, let him be a Man of the Devil: and ſo revolted he again to Judaiſm.

The ſmall regard of Nobility had in tumults and inſurrections.

A new Chriſtian revolteth to an old Jew.

An unadviſed anſwer of an Archbiſhop.

Then the King ſent his Writs to the Sheriffs of every County, to inquire for the authors and ſtirrers of this outrage. Of whom three were hanged, divers were impriſoned. So great was then the hatred of Engliſhmen againſt the Jews, that as ſoon as they began to be repulſed in the Court, the Londoners taking example thereof, fell upon them, ſet their Houſes on fire, and ſpoiled their goods. The Country again, following the example of the Londoners, ſemblably did the like. And thus the year, which the Jews took to be their Jubile, was to them a year of confuſion; inſomuch, as in the City of York, the Jews obtaining the occupying of a certain Caſtle for their preſervation, and afterward, not willing to reſtore it unto the Chriſtians again, when they ſaw no other remedy, but by force to be vanquiſhed, firſt they offered much Mony for their lives; when that would not be taken, by the counſel of an old Jew amongſt them, every one with a ſharp Razor, cut anothers Throat, whereby a thouſand and five hundred of them were at that preſent deſtroyed. Neither was this Plague of theirs undeſerved; for every year commonly their cuſtom was, to get ſome Chriſtian mans child from the Parents, and on Goodfriday to crucifie him in deſpite of our Religion. Ex Chron. Weſtm.

A miſerable and deſerved deſtruction of the Jews.

{Anno 1189.} King Richard, after the death of his Father, coming unto remembrance of himſelf, and of his Rebellion againſt his Father, ſought for abſolution of his treſpaſs, and, in part of ſatisfaction for the ſame, agreed with Philip the French King, about Eaſter next enſuing, to take his Voyage with him for the recovery of Chriſts Patrimony, which they called the Holy Land. Whereupon the ſaid King Richard immediately after his Coronation, to prepare himſelf the better towards his journey, ſet to ſale divers of his Manors, whereof Godfrey Lucy then Biſhop of Wincheſter, bought a couple for two thouſand Marks; to wit, Wergrave and Melenge. The Abbot of Bury bought another for a thouſand Marks, called Middleſay. Hugh Puſaz Biſhop of Durham bought the Lordſhip of Seggesfield, or Sedberga with the Wapentake, and all the appurtenances thereto belonging; he bought alſo the Earldom of Northumberland, whom when the King ſhould ſolemnize after the manner of Secular Earls, merrily with a mocking jeſt Lo (ſaid he) of an old Biſhop I have made a young Earl. And becauſe the ſaid Biſhop had profeſſed before by a ſolemn Vow, to viſit the Holy-Land, to be releaſed of his Vow, he compounded with the Pope for a great ſum of mony therefore; and moreover, gave to the King a thouſand Marks to remain at home, as the Chief Juſtice of England. Over and beſides, the King ſet out all that he had to ſale, Woods, Caſtles, Townſhips, Lordſhips, Earldoms, Baronages, ordaining alſo divers new Biſhops, and not without ſome advantage (as appeared) to his Purſe, feigning moreover, his old Seal to be loſt, that they which had Lands to hold, might be driven to renew their Writings again by the new Seal, whereby great ſubſtance of mony was gained.

The covetous greedineſs of Biſhops noted in buying great Lordſhips.

Sleights to get Mony.

Above all this, by the commandment of Pope Clement the third, a Tenth alſo was exacted of the whole Realm, in ſuch ſort, as the Chriſtians ſhould make to the King 70000 Pounds, the Jews 60000. Ex Gerv. fol. 134. King Richard, after his Coronation, ſent certain Earls and Barons unto Philip the French King in the time of his Parliament at S. Denis, deſiring him to remember his promiſe made for the recovery of Chriſt his holy Patrimony out of the Saracens hands. Unto whom he ſent word again in the Month of December, certifying him how he had bound himſelf by ſolemn Oath, depoſing upon the Evangeliſts, that he, the next year following, about the time of Eaſter, had certainly prefixed to addreſs himſelf towards that journey; requiring him likewiſe not to fail but to be ready at the term above limited, appointing alſo the place where both the Kings ſhould meet together.

A tenth gathered through all England.

K. Philip and K. Richard concluding to travel to the Holy Land.

The next year then enſued, which was one thouſand one hundred and ninety, in the beginning of which year upon Twelf-even, fell a foul northern brawle, which turned well near to a fray, between the Archbiſhop new elected of the Church of York and his company on the one ſide, and Henry Dean of the ſaid Church with his Catholick partakers on the other ſide, upon occaſion as followeth: Gaufridus or Geoffry, Son to King Henry the ſecond, and Brother to King Richard, whom the King had elected a little before to the Archbiſhoprick of York, upon the Even of Epiphany, which we call Twelf-day, was diſpoſed to hear Evenſong with all ſolemnity in the Cathedral Church, having with him Hamon the Chanter, with divers Canons of the Church. Who tarrying ſomething long, belike in adorning and attiring himſelf, in the mean while Henry the Dean, and Bucardus the Treaſurer, diſdaining to tarry his coming, with a bold courage, luſtily began their holy Evenſong, with ſinging their Pſalms, ruffling of deſcant, and merry piping of Organs. Thus this Catholick Evenſong with as much devotion begun, as to Gods high ſervice proceeding, was now almoſt half compleat, when as at length (they being in the midſt of their mirth) cometh in the new elect with his Train and Gardevians, all full of wrath and indignation, for that they durſt be ſo bold, not waiting for him, to begin Gods ſervice, and ſo eſtſoons commanded the Quire to ſtay and hold their peace. The Chanter likewiſe, by vertue of his office, commandeth the ſame. But the Dean and Treaſurer on the other ſide, willed them to proceed; and ſo they ſung on, and would not ſtint. Thus the one half crying againſt the other, the whole Quire was in a rore, their ſinging was turned to ſcolding, their chanting to chiding; and, if inſtead of the Organs they had had a Drum, I doubt they would have ſole-faed by the ears together.

{Anno 1190.} A Northern bravel in the Cathedral Church of York, betweene the new Archbiſhop and the Dean.

Henry Dean of York, and Bucard begin Service, not tarrying for their Archbiſhop.

The Dean and Treaſurer would not ceaſe Evenſong at the Archbiſhops command.

At laſt, through the authority of the Archbiſhop, and of the Chanter, the Quire began to ſurceaſe and give ſilence. Then the new elect not contented with that had been ſung before, with certain of the Quire began the Evenſong new again. The Treaſurer, upon the ſame, cauſed by vertue of his office, the Candles to be put out: whereby the Evenſong, having no power further to proceed, was ſtopped forthwith. For, like as without the light and beams of the Sun, there is nothing but darkneſs in all the world; even ſo you muſt underſtand the Popes Church can ſee to do nothing without Candle-light, albeit the Sun do ſhine never ſo clear and bright. This being ſo, the Archbiſhop, thus diſappointed on every ſide of his purpoſe, made a grievous plaint, declaring to the Clergy and to the People, what the Dean and Treaſurer had done; and ſo upon the ſame, ſuſpended both them and the Church from all Divine ſervice, till they ſhould make to him due ſatisfaction for their treſpaſs.

The Archbiſhop beginneth Evenſong again being half done before.

The Treaſurer putteth out the candles at Evenſong.

The Popes Church can do nothing without Candle light.

The Dean and Church of York ſuſpended by the Archbiſhop from Divine Service.

The next day, which was the day of Epiphany, when all the People of the City were aſſembled in the Cathedral Church, as their manner was, namely in ſuch Feaſts, devoutly to hear Divine Service (as they call it) of the Church, there was alſo preſent the Archbiſhop and the Chanter, with the reſidue of the Clergy, looking when the Dean and Treaſurer would come and ſubmit themſelves, making ſatisfaction for their crime. But they, ſtill continuing in their ſtoutneſs, refuſed ſo to do, exclaiming and uttering contemptuous words againſt the Archbiſhop and his partakers. Which when the People heard, they in a great rage would have fallen upon them; but the Archbiſhop would not ſuffer that. The Dean then and his fellows, perceiving the ſtir of the People, for fear, like prety men, were fain to flee, ſome to the Tomb of S. William of York, ſome ran unto the Deans houſe, and there ſhrowded themſelves, whom the Archbiſhop then accurſed. And ſo for that day the People returned home without any ſervice. Ex veteri chronico manuſcripto, cui initium, Anno gratiæ milleſimo, &c.

After this, King Richard, peparing to ſet all things in an order before his going, committed the whole government of the Realm, principally to William, Biſhop of Ely, his Chancelor, and to Hugh Biſhop of Durham, whom he ordained to be the Chief Juſtice of all England in his abſence, the one to have the cuſtody of the Tower, with the overſight of all other parts of the Land, on this ſide of Humber, the other (which was the Biſhop of Durham) to have charge upon all other his Dominions beyond Humber, ſending moreover unto Pope Clement, in the behalf of the foreſaid William Biſhop of Ely, that he might be made the Popes Legat through all England and Scotland, which alſo was obtained. Thus the Biſhop being advanced in high authority, to furniſh the King towards his ſetting forth, provideth out of every City in England two Palfries, and two Sumpters, and alſo out of every Abby one Palfrey and one Sumpter.

K. Richard prepareth towards his journey.

William Biſhop of Ely the Kings Chancelor, and Hugh Biſhop of Durham, made chief overſeers of the Realm in the Kings abſence.

William Biſhop of Ely made the Popes Legate in England and Scotland.

Theſe things and other thus ſet in a ſtay, the King according to his former appointment, about the time of Eaſter, ſailed into France, where the French King and he conferring together, becauſe they could not make ready at that time of Eaſter, concluded to take a longer day, proroguing their Voyage till after Midſummer. In which mean time, the King occupying himſelf in redreſſing and ſtabliſhing ſuch things as further were to be ordered, there determined that Gaufridus and John his Brethren, ſhould not enter into England in three years after his departure; nevertheleſs he releaſed that bond afterward to his Brother John. Then he appointed the Captains and Conſtables over his Navy, and ſet Laws to be obſerved in his Journey upon the Seas, but eſpecially his care was to make unity and concord between parties that were at variance, and ſo ſet them together at one. At which time the long contention began alſo to be appeaſed, which ſo many years had continued between Baldwinus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Monks of Chriſts-Church: the diſcourſe whereof, although it be ſomewhat tedious to be ſet forth at large, being enough to make a whole Tragedy; yet to the intent the age now preſent may ſee what great conflicts and diſquietneſs, upon what little trifles, have been ſtirred up, what little peace and unity hath been not only in this Church, but commonly in all other Churches under the Popes Catholick regiment; I thought it not labour ill beſtowed, ſomewhat to interrmeddle in opening to the eyes of the Reader, the conſideration of this matter.

Captains & Conſtables of the Kings Navy pointed.

The long contention betwixt Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks of Chriſts-Church.

Archbiſhops of Canterbury commonly were wont to work the Kings of England much ſorrow.

Wherein firſt is to be underſtood, that the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, commonly being ſet up by the Pope, eſpecially ſince the time of the Conqueſt, have put the Kings of this Land to much ſorrow and trouble, as appeared by William Rufus and Lanfrank, and alſo Anſelm; by Henry the firſt and Anſelm; King Stephen and Theobald; Henry the Second and Becket, &c. For which the Kings of this Land have uſed the more care and circumſpection, to have ſuch Archbiſhops placed in the See, as either ſhould ſtand with them, or at the leaſt, ſhould not be againſt them.

Kings of England ever careful about the chuſing of the Archbiſhop, and wherefore. Ex Gervaſ. p. [illegible]

Now to the purpoſe of our matter intended: Firſt, after Lanfrancus, who was Archbiſhop twenty years, the See ſtanding vacant five years, ſucceeded Anſelmus, and ſat ſeventeen years; after whom the See ſtanding vacant four years, ſucceeded Rodulphus, and continued nine years, then followed William, who ſat twelve years, and died in the year 1137. after whom came Theobaldus in the time of King Stephen. This Theobaldus, being no great favourer of the Monkiſh Generation, fell out with Jeremias, Prior of the Houſe of Canterbury, for certain cauſes between them; for which the Archbiſhop, taking ſtomach againſt the Prior, would lay the ſentence of interdiction againſt him. The Prior, ſeeing that, to ſave himſelf, made his appeal to Pope Innocent. The Archbiſhop, provoked the more by that, depoſed him from his Priorſhip, and placed one Walter in his room. Jeremias notwithſtanding, making his complaint and appeal to Rome, obtained Letters from the Pope to Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, being the Popes Legate; by the vertue whereof, he againſt the heart of the Archbiſhop was reſtored, and Walter diſplaced. Nevertheleſs, the ſaid Jeremy, not willing there to continue with diſpleaſure of the Archbiſhop, ſhortly after of his own accord, renounced his Priory, and Walter again was received in his ſtead. Not long after this followed the General Council at Rhemes, in the year 1140. To the which Council, Theobald, contrary to the commandment of the King, would needs reſort, to ſhew his obedience to the Pope. Wherefore at his returning home again, the King took ſuch diſpleaſure with him, that within a while after the Archbiſhop was driven to avoid the Realm, and fly into France, where he, by cenſure of interdiction, ſuſpended divers Churches and religious Houſes which refuſed to come to the Council; and alſo hearing how the King had ſeized upon all his Goods, he interdicted likewiſe all the Kings Land whatſoever, belonging to the Crown: ſo that the King, in concluſion, was fain to compound with him, and fall to agreement, which was about the year 1148. Ex Gervaſ.

Concilium Rhemenſ. An. 1140.

After this in the year of our Lord 1151. after the death of Hugh Abbot of S. Auſtins in Canterbury, Silveſter was elected by the Covent to be their Abbot in the Reign of King Stephen. Which Silveſter when he came unto Theobald the Archbiſhop to make his profeſſion of ſubjection unto him, and to receive of him Conſecration; the Archbiſhop was contented, ſo that the Abbot would come to Chriſts-Church in Canterbury, and there make his profeſſion. But to this Silveſter in no caſe would grant to take his Conſecration there; but elſe in any other Church, whereſoever the Archbiſhop would, he was contented.

A frivolous ſtrife betwixt Theobald Archbiſhop, and Silveſter Abbot of S. Auſtins, about the place, in what Church the Abbot ſhould take his conſecration.

Whereunto when the Archbiſhop in no wiſe would agree, Silveſter making a great Bag of Mony, went to Rome, where he obtained of the Pope for mony (for what cannot mony do at Rome?) Letters that the Archbiſhop ſhould conſecrate the Abbot in his own Church of S. Auſten, and alſo not exact of him any profeſſion of Canonical Subjection. Whereupon the Archbiſhop was compelled againſt his will to come to the Abbots Church, and there at the Popes Commandment to conſecrate him ſimply, and without any further profeſſion to be required.

Silveſter goeth up to Rome.

Then Walter, Prior of Chriſts-Church in Canterbury, ſeeing that, and perceiving how prejudicial and derogatory the example thereof would be to the honour and majeſty of their Church, through counſel of his Brother went thither: and notwithſtanding the Doors were ſtraitly watched and kept; yet by means, he at laſt got in. And as he ſaw the Archbiſhop attired in his Pontificalibus, ready to miniſter Conſecration to the Abbot, he ſtepped ſtraight to the Archbiſhop, and eſtſoons appealeth him to Rome, for the great injury wrought againſt the Church of Canterbury, forbidding him in the name of him to whom he appealed, not to proceed any further. And ſo this holy Conſecration was for the preſent time ſtaid. For the which Silveſter with a new Purſe of Mony was fain to travel and trot again to Rome, where he complaining of the Archbiſhop, and accuſing him of contempt of the Pope, in not executing the commandment ſent down, obtaineth again new Letters with more effectual charge to the foreſaid Archbiſhop, that he without any profeſſion, ſimply ſhould give to Silveſter his Conſecration in his own Church, Omni occaſione & appellatione remota, All manner of ſtay, or let, or appellation to the contrary notwithſtanding. And ſo in concluſion, the Abbot, contrary to whatſoever the Archbiſhop and all the Monks of Canterbury could do, was in his own Church made Abbot, and had the victory for that time. Notwithſtanding, the Archbiſhop left not the matter ſo, but within five years after, obtained of Pope Adrian, that Silveſter ſhould make profeſſion of his obedience to the Archbiſhop, and ſo he did. Ex Gervaſ.

The Monks of Chriſt-Church ſtrive againſt the Monks of S. Auſtin in Canterbury, for the honour of their houſe.

Walter Prior of Chriſts Church, appealeth the Archbiſhop up to Rome.

Silveſter trudgeth again to Rome.

Silveſter conſecrated Abbot in his own Church, whether the Archbiſhop would or not.

In few years after this, died King Stephen, Anno 1154. and after him Theobald the Archbiſhop, Anno 1159. after he had ſate three and twenty years; after whom through the inſtant procurement of King Henry the ſecond, was placed Thomas Becket, the Kings Chancellor, An. 1162. of whoſe ſturdy rebellion againſt the King, becauſe ſufficient hath been ſaid before, it ſhall not need to make a double labour now about the ſame.

After the death of Becket, much ado there was between King Henry and Odo Prior of Canterbury, about the Election of a new Archbiſhop. For the King ſeeing the Realm ſo oftentimes incumbred by thoſe Popiſh Archbiſhops, and fearing leſt the Monks of Canterbury ſhould elect ſuch another as would follow the ſteps of Thomas Becket, moſt humbly with Cap in hand, and courtelie of knee, deſired Odo the Prior, that at his requeſt, and for contentation of his mind, ſuch a one might be elected whom he would appoint (appointing and naming a certain Biſhop, which was a good ſimple man after the Kings liking) but the Prior diſſemblingly anſwering the King again, that he neither could nor would, without the conſent of his Covent, give promiſe to any man: in fine, contrary to the Kings ſo humble requeſt, agreed to the Election of another, which was the Prior of Dover, called Richard, Anno Domini 1173. who continued in that See eleven years.

Odo Prior of Canterbury.

Richard Prior of Dover, elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury. An. 1173.

And here was renewed again the like variance between this Archbiſhop, and Roger Abbot of the Auſten Monks in Canterbury, as was before mentioned between Theobaldus and Silveſter. For when the ſaid Roger, after his Election to be Abbot, muſt needs take his Conſecration at the Archbiſhops hand, neither would the Archbiſhop grant it unto him, unleſs he made profeſſion of obedience, according to the ancient cuſtom of his Predeceſſors: then Roger conſulting with his Monks, firſt denied ſo to do, but at length was contented, ſo it might not be done in the Archbiſhops Church: but in any other Church where he would, under-writing this clauſe withal, Salvis utriuſque eccleſiæ privilegiis, that is, Saving the priviledges of both Churches. To this the Archbiſhop ſaid again, firſt, that he ſhould make his due and Canonical Profeſſion, and that he ſhould not come to him with writing or underwriting, but ſhould ſay in his heart, Salve ſancta parens, or Salve feſta dies, not Salvis privilegiis, or any ſuch like thing. Whereunto when the Auſten Monks in no caſe would conſent, nor the Archbiſhop otherwiſe would grant his benediction: Roger the Abbot was fain to poſt to Rome, and there to bring the Archbiſhop in hatred in the Court of Rome, made his Abby Tributary to Pope Alexander.

Roger Abbot of Saint Auſtens, maketh his Houſe Tributary to Pope Alexander. 1177.

The Pope well contented with this, not only granteth the Abbot his deſire, but alſo in contumely of the Archbiſhop, dubbeth the Abbot with all ſuch ornaments as to a Prelate appertain; and ſo in the year 1178. ſent home the Abbot triumphantly with his Ring and Miter, and other Enſigns of Victory, with Letters alſo to the Archbiſhop, injoyning him immediately upon the ſight thereof, to conſecrate the Abbot in his own Church, and without making any profeſſion. Although with theſe Letters the Archbiſhop was ſhrewdly preſſed, yet notwithſtanding his ſtout heart would not ſtoop for this; but he laid his Appeal againſt the ſame, and ſo the Conſecration for that time was ſuſpended.

Roger the Abbot returneth home with triumph.

Appellation of the Archbiſhop.

Then Roger, for his more defence, getting the Kings Letters, travelled up the ſecond time to Rome, where grievouſly he complained to Pope Alexander of the Archbiſhop. At the ſame time a General Council was ſummoned to be kept at Lateran, where Richard the foreſaid Archbiſhop was alſo looked for amongſt other Biſhops to be preſent. Who then came as far as Paris; but, being there, durſt approach no further, and ſo retired home again. Whereupon the Pope being offended with his contempt, without any more delay exalted the Abbot with his own Conſecration, and inveſted him with all pomp and glory; howbeit, providing before that the ſaid Conſecration ſhould redound to no prejudice againſt the Liberties of the Mother Church of Canterbury, and ſo upon the ſame, wrote to the Archbiſhop his Letters of Certificate, with this addition annexed, Salvo jure & dignitate Cant. Eccleſiæ: that is to ſay, Saving the liberties and dignities of the Church of Canterbury.

Concilium Lateranum ſub Alexandro Papa.

Roger Abbot of St. Auſten, travelleth up again to Rome.

Roger Abbot conſecrated at Rome by the Pope.

After the Council ended, Roger the Abbot returneth home, although with an empty Purſe, yet full of Victory and Triumph. The Archbiſhop, again thinking to work ſome grievance to the Auſten Monks, had procured in this mean time Letters from Pope Alexander unto the Biſhop of Durham, and Abbot of S. Albans, that they ſhould cauſe the ſaid Roger Abbot of the Auſten Monks, to ſhew unto the Archbiſhop all the old priviledges of his Houſe; which indeed, being ſhewed, ſeemed to be raced and new written, with Bulls of Lead, not after the manner nor ſtile of that age, nor pretending any ſuch antiquity as ſhould ſeem to reach from the time of Auſten, but rather newly counterfeit.

The Houſe of Auſten Monks in Canterbury not able to ſhew for them any Deeds or Writings of antiquity.

All this notwithſtanding, the Abbot, bearing him bold upon the Popes favour, ceaſed not ſtill to diſquiet and overcrow the Archbiſhop by all ways he could, in exempting all his Prieſts and Lay-men, belonging to his Juriſdiction, from the Archbiſhops obedience; forbidding alſo that any of his ſhould come to his Chapters or Synods, or fear any Sentence of his Curſe or Excommunication. Whereupon the Archbiſhop, about the month of November the ſame year, ſayling over to Normandy where the King was, thought to take his journey to the Pope to complain of the Abbot; but being ſtayed by the King, he was not ſuffered to paſs any further, the King labouring what he could, to bring them to agreement. Nevertheleſs the Pope and his Romans (ſaith my ſtory) Aurum & argentum magis quam juſtitiam ſitientes, ſeditiones inter eos & litigia commovebant: that is, Caring more for gold and ſilver, than for juſtice, ſtill ſtirred coles of ſedition and debate between them. Ex Hiſtoria Gervaſii.

Ex Hiſtor. Gervaſ. Richard the Archbiſhop, going towards Rome to complain of the Abbot, was ſtaid by the King.

A Catholick practice of the Romiſh Court, to ſet men together at variance, that they might get their mony.

The next year after this enſuing, which was the year of our Lord 1184, died Richard the Archbiſhop aforeſaid, in the eight and thirtieth year of King Henry the Second. After whoſe deceaſe much trouble happened about the election of a new Archbiſhop, between the King and Monks of Canterbury. And now to enter here into the ſtory of Baldwin above mentioned: firſt the King ſent to the Monks, that they ſhould conſider with themſelves about the Election of their Archbiſhop, and to be ready againſt the time that he would ſend for them to the Court. Upon this the Covent, gladly aſſembling together, agreed in themſelves upon one, whom they thought chiefly to prefer; yet naming four more, that if the King would refuſe one, the other yet might ſtand. Now the practice in the Monks was, firſt to keep the Election only in their own hands, as much as they could. And ſecondly, Ever to give the Election either to ſome Prior or Monk of their own houſe, or to ſome Abbot or Biſhop, which ſometimes had been of their company. Whereby as much inconvenience and blind Superſtition was bred in the Church of England: ſo the ſame diſliked both the King and the Biſhops not a little.

Trouble in chuſing the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, after the death of Richard.

Monks of Canterbury ſent for by K. Henry the 2d. about chuſing of their Archbiſhop.

Monks of Canterbury partial in chuſing their Archbiſhop.

As this paſt on, the King, when he ſaw his time, willed the Monks of Canterbury to be cited or ſent for, to underſtand what they had concluded in their Election. Whereupon the Monks ſent up their Prior called Alanus, with certain other Monks to Reading, where the King then lay, about the month of Auguſt. Who at firſt were courteouſly entertained; but after the King had intelligence whom they had nominated and elected, they were ſent home again with cold cheer, the King willing them to pray better, and to adviſe more earneſtly upon the matter amongſt themſelves. Alanus the Prior with his fellows, thus departed; who coming home, in concluſion, ſo concluded amongſt themſelves, that they would remit no jot of their liberties to the King, without the Popes conſent and knowledge. The King underſtanding hereof, ſent his Embaſſadors likewiſe of the Pope, for the fortifying of his cauſe, being in the mean time grievouſly offended with the Prior, ſaying, that he was proud, and would make Archbiſhops whom he liſted, and would be the ſecond Pope in England, &c.

Monks of Canterbury again ſent for to the K. about their election of Alanus Prior of Canterbury.

The King offended with the Prior and Monks of Canterbury.

The ſtubbornneſs of the Monks againſt the King.

Not long after this, as theſe Letters were ſent up to Rome, the King ſent for Alanus the Prior, and more of the Monks to come to him; whom he intreateth, deſiring them in gentle ſpeech, that they would ſhew ſo much gentleneſs and favour to him being their Lord and King, as becometh his friends and ſubjects to do, as to confer with the Biſhops of the Realm about this matter, and to take ſome better counſel, ſo as might redound to Gods glory, his honour and wealth of the publick State; with other like words to the ſame effect.

The K. ſendeth to Rome againſt the Monks.

The King's gentle words to the Monks.

To whom when the Prior had anſwered again, with thanks and due reverence, according to the Kings requeſt, the Biſhops and Monks went to confer together about the matter. And firſt, the Biſhops marvelled why the Monks ſhould exclude them out of the Election, ſeeing they were profeſſed and Suffragans to the ſaid Church of Canterbury; Neither is there any Prince, quoth the Biſhop of Bath, that will refuſe our counſel. There be ſome counſels, ſaid the Monks, whereat you may be called; but as touching the doing of this Election, it pertaineth not unto you, further than to publiſh only, and denounce the party whom we have choſen. The Biſhop of London then asked, if they had already made an Election. No Election, ſaid the Prior, as yet, but only we have denominated the perſons. Then have ye proceeded further, quoth he, than ye ought, having commandment from the Pope, not to proceed without us. And with that was brought forth the Popes Letter, commanding that within forty days, the Biſhops of England, and the Prior, and Covent of Canterbury ſhould elect an able and fit perſon to their Archbiſhop. About the ſcanning of theſe Letters was much ado. The Biſhops ſaid, they were firſt named, and therefore ought to have moſt intereſt in this Election. The Monks ſaid again, That they alſo were not excluded, and required to have a tranſcript of the Letter, whereof much doubt was made.

Biſhops of England claim to have intereſt in the election of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The Popes Letter, commanding the Biſhops of the Realm, with the Prior & Covent, to chuſe the Archbiſhop.

After long concertation, when they could not agree, the King, coming between them both, called away the Biſhops from the Monks, ſuppoſing, by ſeparating the one from the other to draw both parties to his ſentence. But that would not be for the Monks, ſtiffly ſtanding to their Liberties, would loſe no preheminence of their Church, ſtill alledging how by the ancient priviledges of the Church of Canterbury, the Covent ſhould chuſe their Paſtor and Biſhop, and the Prior was but to publiſh and denounce the perſon. The Biſhops again replied, That it was their right to appoint their Archbiſhop and Metropolitan, which were Biſhops and Suffragans; and namely, the Biſhop of London, alſo being Dean of the ſaid Church of Canterbury. The King then as Umpire between them, yet favouring rather the ſide of the Biſhops, deſired them to agree together in in peace. When that would not prevail, he ſet the Lord Steward, and other Noblemen to intreat the Prior to draw to ſome agreement; at leaſt to be contented with this form of election, which was, that the Biſhop of London, or ſome other Biſhops, ſhould declare the Election in theſe words:

The form of election of Archbiſhop, ſet between the Biſhops and Monks of Canterbury.

We Biſhops, and the Prior and Covent of Chriſts Church in Canterbury, with the aſſent of our Lord the King, do chuſe ſuch a perſon to be Archbiſhop, &c. Or elſe thus, that the Prior ſhould pronounce forth the Election in theſe words, ſaying: The Biſhops of England, and I Prior, and the Covent of Canterbury, with the aſſent of our Lord and King, do chuſe ſuch a perſon, &c.

The Biſhops and Monks could not agree about the form of Election.

Upon this, the Prior ſaid he would convent with his Covent. Who with much ado were content to grant to the Kings deſire; but afterward being required to put down the ſame in writing, that they refuſed to do; yet notwithſtanding, relented at laſt to the King. But when the Biſhops made excuſes for the abſence of their fellow Biſhops, ſo the matter for that time ſtaid; and the King, ſending home the Monks again to their houſe in peace, deferred that buſineſs to a further day, which was till the firſt day of December; commanding the Prior with his fellows the ſame day not to fail, but to be at London about the chuſing of the Archbiſhop.

The election of the Archbiſhop deferred to the Month of December Anno 1184.

As the day prefixed came, the Prior with his company were alſo preſent, who giving attendance all that day, and the next day alſo following, ſo were driven off till the third day after. At length the Lord Steward, with other Nobles of the Realm, were ſent unto them from the King to declare, That whereas the King before had divided the Biſhops from the Monks, that they both might have their Election by themſelves, after the form of a Bill which was put down in writing: Now the mind of the King was, that the Monks, taking another way, ſhould joyn with the Biſhops, and ſo, having the matter in talk together, ſhould proceed joyntly in the Election.

The Kings meſſage to the Monks.

Againſt this many things were alledged by the Prior and his Mates, complaining much upon the Biſhops, which ſaid, that the Biſhops had ever holden with the Kings, againſt the liberties of their Church and Archbiſhops. As firſt, they ſtood againſt Anſelm for King William; then againſt Theobald for King Stephen; after that, againſt Tho. Becket for King Henry; and after him, did ſupplant the election of Richard their Archbiſhop; and now again, went about to practiſe and work againſt this their election preſent, &c. At laſt the Prior with his fellows concluding, deſired they might ſpeak with the King himſelf. Who, eſtſoons coming unto them, willed them as good men to be contented, and go talk with the Biſhops about the election; promiſing, that whom they agreed upon, he alſo would grant his aſſent unto the ſame. To whom when the Prior again had objected the writings that before were made: Truth it is (ſaid the King) ſuch writings were made, but I neither may nor will go againſt the council of my Realm; and therefore agree, ſaid he, with my Biſhops and Abbots, and remember that the voice of the People is the voice of God.

The Kings words to the Monks of Canterbury.

The Monks of Canterbury compell'd againſt their wills to join with the Biſhops, in chuſing the election of the Archbiſhop.

Upon this the Prior with his Monks, ſeeing no other remedy, went to the Biſhops to confer, according to the King his requeſt, about the election; who then were willed by the Biſhops to nominate whom they would, and the Biſhops would likewiſe name theirs. So that when the Prior with his complices, had named three, after their chuſing the Biſhops, ſaid they would nominate but one; and ſo did, which was the Biſhop of Worceſter, willing the Prior to go home, and to conſer with his Covent about the ſame. To whom ſhortly after the Biſhops ſent certain Prieſts, to ſignifie to the Covent, that they, according to the Popes Letters, ſhould repair to the Biſhops concerning the election of the Archbiſhop; alſo declared moreover to them, that the perſons whom they had named were good men; but he whom they had to nominate was a more worthy man, whom they both had nominated, and alſo would elect. The Monks, marvelling hereat, ſent two Monks with the Archdeacon of Canterbury to the King.

This done, immediately after the return of the Prieſts, the Biſhops cauſed all the Bells of the City to be rung, and Te Deum to be ſung for the Archbiſhop new elect. Whereof when the two Monks brought tidings to the Covent at Canterbury what was done at London, they were all in a marvellous dump. The King hearing this, and perceiving the ſtiffneſs of the Monks, in all haſte ſent meſſengers to Canterbury with gentle words, to will the Prior to come to the King, and certifie him of the purpoſe of his Monks. Unto whom the Prior, eſtſoons being come, declareth in the name of the whole Covent, that in no caſe he, nor the Monks would ever while the world ſtood, agree to that Election of the Biſhops; unleſs the King in his own perſon would come to Canterbury, and there openly, before the whole Covent, proteſt by his own mouth the foreſaid Election to be nought and void; and ſo, returning to London again, openly likewiſe, before the Clergy and People, would repudiate and reject the ſame: and furthermore, that the party alſo elected, ſhould openly in the ſame place proteſt and ſay, that he neither would nor ought to take that function upon him, unleſs he entred by the conſent of the Prior and Covent of Canterbury; and all this to be done in the ſame place where the Biſhops had made their Election before; and ſo peradventure (ſaid they) at the Kings ſo earneſt ſute and requeſt, they would gratifie his will, and ratifie the ſaid Election with the voices of their conſent. To make the ſtory ſhort, after great hold between the Secular Clergy on the one ſide, and the regular order on the other ſide, and after the Kings indignation againſt the Prior, and the ſwooning of the Prior before the King, at length the King to take up the matter, and to ſave the Priors life, was fain to perform in his own perſon all thoſe conditions above preſcribed by the Monks. Ex Gervaſ. fol. 100.

Biſhops of the Realm make their Election of the Archbiſhop, with the Monks of Canterbury.

Conditions preſcribed to the King by the Monks of Canterbury, for the ratification of the Archbiſhop made by the Biſhops.

Baldwin the Biſhop of Worceſter elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Anno 1184.

And thus have ye heard the tragical election of the Biſhop of Worceſter, named Baldwin, made Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Now what a troubleſome time the ſaid Baldwin had with the Monks in governing the Church of Canterbury, here followeth likewiſe not unworthy to be conſidered.

The troubles between Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks of the ſame Church.

IN the firſt year the Archbiſhop ſhewed himſelf friendly and loving to the Monks; the next year following he began to appear ſomewhat rough unto them. The manner then was of the houſe of Chriſts-Church, toward the time of the Nativity and of Eaſter, to receive certain Preſents or Gifts of their Farmers or Tenants, which the Celarer ſhould take and lay up. Thoſe Preſents the Archbiſhop began firſt to intercept from the Monks, and to beſtow them upon his Secular Clerks. After this he took three Churches or Benefices (which the Monks claimed as proper to themſelves) and placed in them three of his Chaplains. After this he incroacheth to his hands, certain Tenements, Revenues and Victuals, belonging before to the Monks (as they ſaid) and committed the cuſtody thereof to certain of his own Clerks and houſhold ſervants.

The great trouble and contention between Baldwin Archbiſhop and the Monks of Canterbury.

The Monks which had born ſo much with the Archbiſhop before, ſeeing this, could forbear him no longer, but needs would make their appeal againſt him. The Archbiſhop, not much regarding that, waxed thereby the more fierce againſt them, inſomuch that ſuch Farms and Tenements as he before had let alone, now he received to his own occupying, with many other grievances wherewith he greatly vexed the Monks, ſo that three Abbots were fain to come and reconcile the Archbiſhop and the Monks; which reconciliation was this, that the Monks ſhould let fall their appeal, and the Archbiſhop ſhould reſtore again to them their Farms and Tenements. But as touching the Benefices and the Preſents, the Archbiſhop ſtill kept them in his hands for a further trial of their obedience and patience. Nevertheleſs, ſome there were of the ancient Monks which in no caſe would give over the foreſaid appeal before the Archbiſhop made a full reſtitution of all together.

The Monks of Canterbury appeal to the Pope againſt their Archbiſhop.

Reconciliation between the Archbiſhop and the Monks, which did not hold long.

After this agreement, ſuch as it was between the Monks and him, the Archbiſhop ſoon after ſent up to Rome one of his Chaplains (unto whom he had given one of the Benefices afore-mentioned) partly for confirmation of his Benefice, partly alſo to obtain licence for the Archbiſhop to build a Church, which he intended to erect of Secular Prieſts near unto the Town of Canterbury. Which being being obtained of the Pope, the Archbiſhop, not a little glad thereof, began now more and more to war fierce againſt the Monks, not only in taking from them their Churches and Oblations, but alſo in aggravating the whole ſtate of their Houſe, which he intended either to ſubvert, or greatly to diminiſh, to pluck down the pride and ſtubbornneſs of the Monks. Wherefore taking with him certain other Biſhops (whom he knew bare no good will to that Monkiſh generation) he went to the King, declaring how he had a good purpoſe in his mind to erect a new and a ſolemn Church, in the honour of S. Thomas of Canterbury, of ſecular Prieſts or Canons, and therefore deſired of the King to have his favourable licence to the ſame. The King right well perceiving the purpoſe of the Archbiſhop whither it tended, as to the bridling of the ſtiff-necked Monks, was the more willing to give aſſent, if he were not alſo the chief worker of that matter himſelf.

The Archbiſhop goeth about to pluck down the pride of the Monks of Canterbury.

Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury about to build a new Church on the North ſide of Canterbury.

The intent of the Archbiſhop in planting of that new Church, was to found there divers Prebends, and to make both the King, and every Biſhop being his Suffragans, Prebendaries thereof, ſo that every one of them ſhould confer one Prebendſhip to the ſame foundation; minding there to conſecrate Biſhops, to make his Chriſmatory, to celebrate his Synods, and to adminiſter all other things belonging unto the function of his See, and the ſame to be called Hakington Church. The Monks, not ignorant how the Archbiſhop privily intended the deſolation and ſubverſion of their Houſe and Liberties, conſulting upon the matter, determined at length among themſelves to appeal to the See of Rome, namely, for theſe three cauſes againſt the Archbiſhop: Firſt, for ſpoiling them of their Gifts and Oblations: Secondly, for depriving them of their Churches and Benefices: and Thirdly, for erecting a new foundation of ſecular Canons, to the derogation and overthrow of their Religious Order; giving admonition to the Archbiſhop before by their Monks, ſent to him of this their appellation. To whom the Archbiſhop anſwered, that the foundation, which he went about, was to no derogation, but rather to the fortification and honour of their Houſe. Who anſwered again, that it was, and could not otherwiſe be, but to their ſubverſion. And what ſhould lett me then (ſaid the Archbiſhop) but I may build in my own ground what I will? No (ſaid they) no ground of yours, but your ground is our ground, as all other things that you have by right are ours, forſomuch as you have them not of your ſelf, but of the Church, and for the Churches cauſe. All which things have been given neither to you, nor to the Archbiſhops, but unto the Church of Chriſt: and therefore (ſaid they) all ſuch as appertain unto us inwardly and outwardly, with the perſons alſo, and the whole ſtate of our Church, we ſubmit under the Popes protection, and now here make our appeal to the See Apoſtolick, aſſigning alſo the term when to proſecute the ſame.

Hakington Church.

The Monks of Canterbury make their appeal againſt Baldwin their Archbiſhop.

Three cauſes alledged againſt the Archbiſhop by the Monks.

The Monks of Canterbury claim all the goods of the Archbiſhop to be their own.

The Monks put themſelves and their houſe in the Popes protection.

Appellation againſt the Archbiſhop.

The Archbiſhop receiving this appellation, and ſaying, that he would anſwer to the ſame either by himſelf, or by his reſponſal, within three days after, which was the ſixteenth of December, came to Canterbury: where the Monks underſtanding how he was in mind to place new ſecular Prieſts in the Church of St. Stephen, where the Monks had ſerved before, came to the Church, to ſtop the proceeding of the Archbiſhop by way of appeal. Whereof the Archbiſhop having warning before, deferred the matter till the next day after. On which day the Monks, again being ſent by Honorius the Prior into the Church, charged the Achbiſhop in the name of Almighty God, and by vertue of their appeal made to the Apoſtolick See, to ſurceaſe thoſe his doings; charging alſo the Parſon of the Church in no wiſe to ſuffer thoſe Secular Clerks to be admitted into the Church. All which yet notwithſtanding, the Archbiſhop proceedeth in his buſineſs. And firſt, placing in his Clerks, he ſuſpendeth the Prior from his adminiſtration. Then he adjureth the Porters of the Gate, upon their Oath, to let none of the Monks paſs out of the houſe without his licence. The Monks likewiſe he commanded, by vertue of obedience, not to ſtray any where abroad without his leave. And furthermore, one of the foreſaid Monks, which ſerved the Appeal againſt him, he utterly baniſhed from that Covent. Upon this, the day next following, Honorius the Prior truſting (ſaith the Story) on God, and S. Thomas, took his way to Rome, ſent in commiſſion by the Covent, to proſecute the appeal againſt the Archbiſhop.

Buſineſs between the Monks and the Archbiſhop for placing ſecular clerks in the Church of St. Stephens in Canterbury.

The Prior of Canterbury ſuſpended

In this mean ſeaſon, a new jarr began between the ſaid Archbiſhop and the Monks, about their Rents and Revenues, which the Archbiſhop would have committed to the receiving and keeping of three Monks, but the Sub-prior or Geffery, with the Covent, in no caſe would ſuffer that: whereabout there was a foul ſtir. The Archbiſhop, craving the aid of the King, firſt had three Biſhops ſent down to him, of Coventry, Norwich and Worceſter. Who, being inſtant with the Monks to ſubmit their cauſe into the Kings hands, like as the Archbiſhop had done, they utterly refuſed it; eſpecially ſeeing they had already referred the whole ſtate of their cauſe to the determination of the Apoſtolical See. The King ſeeing no other remedy, came himſelf with the Archbiſhop into the Chapter-houſe; where he commanded firſt the doors to be kept faſt, that none ſhould enter but which by name were called for. Amongſt whom were two Biſhops, to wit, of Norwich and Durham, and one Petrus Bleſenſis a learned man (whoſe Epiſtles be yet extant in Libraries) a chief worker in this matter againſt the Monks. Then was called in Geffry the Sub-prior, with a few other Monks whom he brought with him. The King then firſt talking with the Archbiſhop and his company, and afterwards with the Monks, laboured to intreat them that they would let fall their appeal, and ſo ſtand to the arbitrement of him and of the Biſhops, concerning the cauſe which was between the Archbiſhop and them in traverſe.

Another garboile between the Monks of Canterbury and their Archbiſhop.

The King cometh into the chapter of Canterbury.

Petr. Bleſenſ. a great doct. againſt the Monks.

The King intreateth peace betweeen the Monks and the Archbiſhop.

To this the Monks anſwered, that theſe were good words, but ſerved not for that time, forſomuch as their cauſe was already tranſlated to the Court of Rome, and now was preſently in hearing before the Popes Holineſs, and therefore they could not, ne would do that injury to their Lord Pope, to refuſe him, and to put the matter unto the judgment of any other. Then was it required of the Monks, that they would put the matter in comprimiſe, in caſe the Prior would conſent thereto: upon this intent, that if the Prior conſented, and the Monks not, then ſhould they run in contempt and diſobedience; or if the Monks would conſent, and the Prior not, then ſhould the Prior be excluded the Realm. The wily Monks, being not unprovided of this ſubtilty, made their anſwer, that ſeeing they had ſent their Prior forth in their commiſſion, it ſtood not with their honeſty to give any determinate conſent, without the knowledge, and before the return of the ſaid Prior; unleſs the Archbiſhop firſt would promiſe to make full reſtitution of all that he had wrongfully wreſted from them. When the King could get no other anſwer of the Monks, neither could move the Archbiſhop to releaſe the ſentence of their ſuſpenſion, unleſs they would confeſs and knowledge their fault, he, ſo parting from them, paſſed over into France.

The matter from the Pope to the Kings hearing.

The Monks excuſe to the King.

Not long after this came a Meſſenger from Rome, bringing Letters from Pope Urban to the Archbiſhop, wherein the Pope conſidering and tendering (as he ſaid) the enorme grievances done againſt the Monks, ſtraitly injoyned and commanded him, within ten days after the receiving thereof, to releaſe the ſentence of his ſuſpenſion againſt the Prior and others of the ſaid Covent, and alſo to retract and reſtore again to the Monks whatſoever he plucked from them ſince the time of their appeal firſt made. Who, in caſe he ſhould deny, or foreſlack the doing hereof, commiſſion was given to three Abbots, of Battel, of Feverſham, and of St. Auſtins, with ample authority to perform the ſame, &c. The Archbiſhop, receiving theſe Letters brought to him by a Monk of the foreſaid Houſe, firſt made his excuſe that the Pope was miſinformed. But the Monks not contented with that excuſe, when they would needs know what anſwer he would make to the Popes Nuncio, his anſwer was, that he had yet ten days given him of the Pope. In which mean time the Archbiſhop went to London, and there in the Church of St. Paul conſecrated his holy Oyl and Cream (making one of the Popes ſeven Sacraments) which was grievouſly taken in the Church of Canterbury. At laſt the ten days being ended, when the Archbiſhop refuſed to accompliſh that which was in the Popes Letter injoyned him, the three Abbots aforeſaid, to execute the Popes commandment, came at their day aſſigned to Canterbury, and there aſſoiled all ſuch as the Archbiſhop before had ſuſpended, and in the end certified Pope Urban by Letters what they had done.

The Archbiſhops new Church made of wood.

The Archbiſhop hearing this, within four days after, ſent two of his Clerks, which appealed the three Abbots aforeſaid up to Rome; and he himſelf in the mean time prepared buſily for the building up of his Church, ſending to all Churches in England upon releaſement of their ſins, to confer unto the ſame; and to make the more haſt, for lack of Free-ſtone he made up his building with Timber, and ſuch other ſtuff as he could get.

A Letter of Pope Urban againſt the Archbiſhop.

The Prior Honorius all this while remained ſtill at the Court of Rome, giving attendance upon the Pope; who having intelligence of the Archbiſhops doings, procured another Letter of Pope Urban to the whole Clergy of England, ſtraitly injoyning them that none ſhould confer to the new Fraternity of Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury. To theſe Letters the Archbiſhop ſhewed ſuch reverence, that where before he had planted his Chappel of wood and boards, now he provided the ſame to be builded of Lime and ſtone.

The Archbiſhops meſſengers come to the Popes Court.

By this time Petrus Bleſenſis, with other meſſengers of the Archbiſhop, ſeeing Honorius the Prior to be gone from the Court of France, reſorted to the Court of Rome, bringing with them Letters of Credit from the King, from the Archbiſhop, and alſo from other Biſhops of the Realm; but the Pope reading only the Kings Letters, and the Archbiſhops, the reſidue he caſt into a window by, ſaying he would read them at further leiſure. Then the Pope giving audience in his Conſiſtory to hear their cauſe, firſt came in Petrus Bleſenſis with the Agents of the Archbiſhop, exhibiting their Letters, and propounding their requeſts to the Pope, which were, that reſtitution ſhould be made by the Monks to the Archbiſhop, wherein they had injured him. Item, That the things which had been granted before to the Prior in that Court, might be called in again. Thirdly, That the Archbiſhop might have licenſe to proceed in building his Colledg of Canons, &c. After this was called in M. Pilleus the Attorny for the Monks of Canterbury. Who alledging many great things againſt the Archbiſhop for his contempt and diſobedience to the Popes precepts, required that he ſhould make reſtitution to the Monks for his injuries done to them, and alſo that his new foundation of Secular Canons, tending to the overthrow of the Conventual Church of Canterbury, ſhould be utterly raced and thrown down to the ground. Thus between theſe parties pleaing and repleaing one againſt the other, much hard hold there was, but in concluſion for all the Kings Letters, and for all that the Archbiſhop and Biſhops could do, the matter went on the Monks ſide. So that there was no remedy, but the Pope would needs have the Archbiſhops new building come down, and the Monks to be reſtored again to their full poſſeſſions. The execution whereof was committed to the three Abbots aforeſaid, to wit, of Battel, of Feuerſham, of St. Auſtins in Canterbury, and to Geffrey Subprior of Canterbury.

Which things being thus determined at Rome, then Radulph Glanvile, Lord Steward of England, writing to the ſaid Abbot of Battel, and to the Subprior and Covent of Canterbury, commandeth them in the Kings name, and upon their Oath and fealty given unto him, that they nor any of them do proceed in this Controverſie between the Monks and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, before they come and talk with him, there to know further of the Kings pleaſure: and furthermore charging the Covent of Canterbury not to enter further in any Examinations as concerning the Archbiſhops matters; and alſo citing the Subprior of the ſaid Houſe, to appear before him at London, at the Feaſt of St. James the ſame year, which was 1187. Notwithſtanding he excuſing himſelf by ſickneſs, ſent two Monks in his ſtead, and ſo kept himſelf at home. To whom commandment was given, that the Monks of Canterbury within fifteen days ſhould ſail over to Normandy to the King, and there ſhew the tenor and evidences of their priviledges; and alſo that ſuch Stewards and Bailiffs whom they had placed in their Farms and Lordſhips, contrary to the will of the Archbiſhop, ſhould be removed. And likewiſe the three Abbots in the Kings name were commanded in no wiſe to execute the Popes commandment againſt the Archbiſhop. Not long after this the Archbiſhop took Shipping at Dover, and went over to the King, where he ordained three principal Officers over the Monks of Chriſts Church; the Sacriſt, the Cellarer, and the Chamberlain, contrary to the will of the Covent, with other Grievances more, whereby the Monks were not a little offended, ſo that upon the ſame they made a new Appellation to the Pope. Whereupon Pope Urban by the ſetting on of Honorius the Prior, who was now come again to the Court, wrote to him another Letter after a ſharper and more vehement ſort, to the effect as followeth.

The Pope holdeth on the Monks ſide againſt the King, the Archbiſhop and the Biſhops of the Realm.

In that we have born with your Brotherhood hitherto, and have not proceeded in ſuch grievous manner againſt you, as we might, although being thereto greatly provoked; the chiefeſt cauſe was this, that we ſuppoſed your heart would have relented from the oppreſſion of the Conventual Church of Canterbury, committed unto you; if not for our reverence, which you ſeem to have contemned more than became you, yet at leaſt for fear of Gods judgment. For well we hoped, our conſcience perſwading us to the ſame, that after you had obtained that high ſtate and dignity in the Church of England, you would have been an example to others of obedience and reverence to be given to the See Apoſtolick of all Eccleſiaſtical perſons. Wherefore at the firſt beginning both of our and alſo of your promotion, we did not ſpare to advance and honour you as we have done few others beſides, thinking no leſs, but that we had found a faithful friend of the Church, for our honour. Wherein we perceive now (which maketh us not a little to marvel) our expectation greatly deceived. And whom we well truſted to be a ſure ſtay for the maintenance of our eſtate, him now we find a perſecutor againſt us in our members.

For whereas we ſundry times have written to you in the behalf of our Brethren, and the Church committed to your charge, that you ſhould deſiſt from diſquieting them, and not vex or diſturb their liberties, at leaſt for reverence of us: you not only in this, but in other things more (as commonly is reported of you in all places) ſet at light our Letters and Appellations made unto the Apoſtolical See. What you have wrought againſt them after their ſo manifold Appellations laid unto us, and our Inhibitions again unto you, we are aſhamed to utter. But revolve and conſider in your mind, if ye have well done, and adviſe in your own conſcience what you have done. We for our part becauſe we neither may ne ought with deaf ears to paſs over the clamors of the Brethren, and ſuch contempt of the Apoſtolick See; although our biddings and warnings given to you ſeem to be all in vain, yet notwithſtanding we ſend our Mandates again unto your Brotherhood, in theſe Apoſtolical Writings, diſtrictly and in vertue of obedience commanding you, that whether you be preſent in your Church, or abſent; all that notwithſtanding, whatſoever you have done in building of your Chappel (which you to the deſtruction of the Monaſtery of Canterbury *have erected) after the time of their appeal made to us, or our inhibition ſent to you, you fail not of your proper coſts and charges to demoliſh; undoing again, and making void, whatſoever ye have begun and innovated concerning the inſtitution of the Canons, and other things belonging to the erection of the ſaid Chappel; accounting moreover and reputing the place where the Chappel was, to be accurſed and prophane, and alſo that all ſuch, whoſoever have celebrated in the ſame place, ſhall ſtand ſuſpended till the time they appear before our preſence. Commanding furthermore, that all thoſe Monks whom you have preſumed to remove from their office, or to excommunicate, ſince the time of their appeal made, you reſtore and abſoile again, rendring alſo and reſtoring all ſuch Farms, Manors, Tenements, and Oblations as you, after their appeal made, have inveagled from them; and finally, that you innovate nothing touching the ſtate of that Monaſtery, during the time of this Controverſie depending before us. The Pope writeth to the Abbots, and alſo to the King.

Another Letter beſides this the Pope alſo ſent to the three Abbots aforeſaid for the correction of theſe enormities. Likewiſe another Letter was ſent to King Henry the Second, wherein the Pope injoyneth and requireth him, upon remiſſion of his ſins, not to diſſemble and bear with the Archbiſhop in his oppreſſion of his Monks, but to help that thoſe things may be amended, where he hath treſpaſſed againſt them.

Pope Urban dieth. Baldwinus King of Jeruſalem, with many Nobles taken of the Saracens, and the City won.

Theſe Pontifical Letters were written Anno 1187, the third day of October, and in the nineteenth day after, the ſame month, the ſaid Pope Urban died. In the which year, and about the which month, Baldwin King of Jeruſalem was taken, with many Noblemen of Soldan the Saracen; and Jeruſalem loſt, after that it had been in the poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians, and ſo continued the ſpace of eighty eight years, and eighty days, from the time that Godfridus Bolonius did firſt win it from the Infidels.

The King and Archbiſhop glad to agree with the Monks. The Monks got the upper hand over the Archbiſhop.

After the receiving of thoſe Letters of Pope Urban above ſpecified, both the King and Archbiſhop, with all the Biſhops of the Realm were marvellouſly quailed, glad now to pleaſe, and ſpeak fair to the Monks, promiſing all things to be done and reſtored to them after the beſt ſort. Neither was the King now and Archbiſhop ſo ſubmiſs, but the Monks on the other ſide were as brag and jocant, being fully aſſured that all now was their own. In the Narration of which Hiſtory (as it is ſet in Gervaſius at large) this we have to note by the way, in what fear and thraldom Kings in thoſe days were under the Pope, who could not be Maſters over their own ſubjects, but that every pild Monk, or pelting Prior, upon vertue of their appeal to the Court of Rome, and making their houſe Tributary to the Pope, was able not only to match, but to give Checkmate unto the beſt King Chriſtened, as not in this Story only may appear.

The miſerable ſubjection of Kings under the Pope to be noted.

Calipha is the High Prieſt of the Saracens ſitting in Damaſcus, unto whom all the Sultans were ſubject, as our Princes now are to the Pope.

It followeth then in the Story of theſe Monks, that as they were thus in the midſt of their joy and jollity, ſuddenly cometh news of the death of Pope Urban their great Calipha, and alſo how that Gregory the Eighth was placed in his room, who was a ſpecial friend and favourer of the Archbiſhop; which as it did greatly incourage the King and the Archbiſhop, ſo the Monks on the other ſide were as much diſcomforted, ſo that now all was turned upſide down. For whereas the King and the Archbiſhop before thought they had loſt all, and were glad to compound with the Monks, and to ſeek their favour, now were the Monks on the contrary ſide fain to crouch to the King, and glad to have a good countenance; who then reſorting to him, and finding him altered both in word and geſture, deſired he would confirm and grant that which of late before he had promiſed. To whom it was anſwered again by the King, that ſeeing the Archbiſhop had granted to them their Sacriſt, their Chamberlain, and their Cellerar, they ſhould have no more reſtored of him; neither would he ſuffer the Liberties and Priviledges of the Archbiſhop to be impaired, or take any wrong. And touching the new Chappel of St. Thomas (ſaid he) whereabout ye ſtrive ſo long, with the Canonſhips and other buildings belonging thereto, the ſame I receive into my hands, ſo that none ſhall have any thing to do therein but my ſelf, &c. In like manner of the Archbiſhop ſuch another like anſwer they received, and of Biſhops little better. So the Monks ſent away with a flea in their ear, went home again out of Normandy to their Cell.

The Kings anſwer to the Monks of Canterbury.

Now the Archbiſhop having the Monks where he would, wrought them much grievance; but that continued not very long. For within two months after, and leſs, died Pope Gregory the Eighth, about the ſixteenth day of December following. After whom ſucceeded Pope Clement the Third, who following the ſteps of Urban, bent all his power with the Monks againſt the Archbiſhop, ſending divers Precepts and Mandates in the next year following, which was the year One thouſand one hundred eighty eight, with an imperious Letter, willing and commanding him to deſiſt from his oppreſſion of the Monks, and to throw down his new Chappel. Whereupon the Archbiſhop made his appeal, and minded to go to Rome, but was called back of the King, being ready to ſail over. In the which year Honorius the Prior died at Rome of the Plague, which was ſome help and comfort to the Archbiſhop, for whom the Archbiſhop made Roger Noris Prior, againſt the wills of the Covent. After this, about the latter end of the ſame year, Pope Clement ſent down his Legate called Radulphus a Cardinal, to Canterbury, with another Letter more ſharply written to the ſame effect unto the Archbiſhop. *Ex Hiſt. Furthermore, in the year next after, which was One thouſand one hundred eighty nine, he wrote alſo the third Letter to him. In the which year alſo died King Henry the Second, after whom ſucceeded King Richard his Son, who joyning likewiſe with the Archbiſhop, took his part ſtrongly againſt the ſaid Monks. At laſt, after much ado on both parts, and after great diſturbance, and impriſoning divers of the Monks, King Richard preparing his Voyage towards Jeruſalem, and ſtudying firſt to ſet peace between them, conſulted and agreed with the Biſhops and Abbots about a final concord in this matter, between the Archbiſhop and Monks of Canterbury; which at length on both parts was made, upon theſe Conventions which follow:

K. Henry the 2*d* death. K. Rich. the firſt joyned with the Archbiſhop.

1. That Roger Noris ſhould be depoſed, whom the Archbiſhop had made Prior againſt their wills: whom the King then at the requeſt of the Archbiſhop promoted to be Abbot of Euſham.

Agreement between the Archbiſhop and Monks of Canterbury upon what conditions.

2. Item, That the Archbiſhop ſhould pluck down his Chappel, which he builded in the ſuburbs of Canterbury, againſt the minds of the Monks.

3. Item, That the foreſaid Monks ſhould make profeſſion of their obedience and ſubjection to the Archbiſhop, as they had done to his other Predeceſſors before him.

4. Item, As touching all other complaints and injuries (except only the Chappel, and depoſition of Roger Noris the Prior) the Monks ſhould ſtand to the Arbitrement of the King, of the Archbiſhop, and the Prelates.

5. Item, That the Monks kneeling down before the King in the Chapter-houſe, ſhould ask the Archbiſhop forgiveneſs. Which being done, they went all together to the Church, and ſang Te Deum for this reformation of peace. Ex veteri Chronico Manuſcripto, & ex Gervaſio.

Ex Lib. Anonymo, & ex Hiſt. Gervaſii Monachi Cantuarienſis.

The next day after the Archbiſhop coming into the Chapter, reſtored to the Covent their Manors and Farms again; alſo he diſcharged the Prior which he had made before; deſiring them likewiſe, that if he had offended them either in word or deed, they would from their heart remit him. This reconciliation being made between the Archbiſhop and the Covent, then the Archbiſhop going about to diſſolve the building of his new Church, though he changed the place, yet thought not to change his intent, and therefore making exchange of Lands with the Biſhop and Monks of Rocheſter, purchaſed of them their ground in Lambeth, Ann. 1191. Which done, he came to his Clerks whom he had placed to be Canons in his new Colledg of Hakington, and alſo willed them to remove all their Goods and Furniture to Lambeth, over againſt Weſtminſter, where he erected for them another Church, and there placed the ſaid Canons. About which Colledg of Lambeth afterwards much trouble likewiſe enſued, by the ſtirring of the ſaid Monks of Canterbury, in the time of Hubert the Archbiſhop in the reign of the ſaid King Richard, and in the year of our Lord 1196. Furthermore, after the depoſing of Roger Noris Prior of Canterbury aforeſaid, Baldwin the Archbiſhop, inforced to grant them another Prior by the aſſent of the King and of the Covent, aſſigned Osbernus to be their Prior, who had taken part before with the Archbiſhop; but the Monks not pleaſed with him, after the death of Baldwin the Archbiſhop removed him again.

And

Three things to be obſerved in this ſtory of Canterbury Monks above rehearſed.

And thus have you the tedious Diſcourſe of this Catholick Tragedy between the Monks of Canterbury and their Archbiſhop, ſcarce worth the rehearſal; notwithſtanding, this I thought to give the Reader to ſee of purpoſe. Firſt to ſhew forth unto the world the ſtout ſturdineſs of this Monkiſh generation, who profeſſing profound humility in their coat, what little humility they had in their heart, what pride and arrogancy in their converſation, and what hypocriſie in their Religion, this one example among a thouſand others may give ſome experience. Secondly, That the poſterity now may ſee how little Kings could then do in their own Realms for the Pope. And thirdly, to the intent it may more notoriouſly appear to all Readers, what ſtrife and debate, what diſſention and diviſion, what little unity and concord hath always followed the Popes Catholick Church, whereſoever the corrupt Religion and uſurped ambition of the Pope prevailed. For not to ſpeak only of this Monkiſh houſe of Canterbury, What Church Cathedral, Collegiate, or Conventual; what See, Church, Monaſtery or Chappel was under all the Popes Government, but ever there happened ſome variance, either between the King and the Archbiſhop, as between King William and Lanfranke, King Henry the Firſt and Anſelm, King Stephen and Richard, King Henry the Second and Becket, King John and Stephen Langton, King Henry the Third and Boniface, &c. Or elſe between Archbiſhop and Archbiſhop, for making profeſſion, for carrying the Croſs, for ſitting on the right hand of the Popes Legate, &c. Or elſe between Archbiſhops and their Suffragans; or between Archbiſhops and their Covents; or between Biſhops and Monks, between Dean and Chapter, between Monks and Secular Prieſts, Monks of one ſort againſt another, Friers of one Order againſt another, Students againſt Friers, Townſmen againſt Scholars, &c. As for example: What diſcord was between the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Richard Archbiſhop of York, between Lanfrancus and Archbiſhop Thomas, between Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sylveſter Abbot of St. Auſtins, between Walter of Chriſts Church, and Sylveſter Abbot aforeſaid, between William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Jeremias Prior of Canterbury, Anno 1144. between the Monks of Canterbury and Odo their Prior for tranſlating the Relicks of Dunſtan, between King Stephen and Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury, the Biſhop of Lincoln and Roger Biſhop of Ely his Son, Anno 1138, between Pope Innocent and Anacletus the ſpace of ſeven years; the Cardinals for money (ſaith Gervaſius) ſometime holding with the one, ſometime with the other; at laſt the Election was determined by a ſore battel between Lotharius Emperor, and Rogerius Duke of Apulia, Ann. 1137; alſo between Pope Innocent the Fourth, and Frederick Emperor the Second, between King Henry the Third and William Rale Biſhop of Wincheſter, when the King bad the Gates of Wincheſter Town to be ſhut againſt him, Anno 1250, between Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Canons of St. Paul: Item, between the ſaid Boniface and Monks of St. Bartholomew, who ſat there in Harneſs in his Viſitation, Anno 1250; between the Abbot of Weſtminſter and Monks of the ſame houſe, Anno 1251. Item, Between the foreſaid William Rale Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for a Prieſt of the Hoſpital in Southwark, Anno 1252; between the ſaid Boniface and Canons of Lincoln after the death of Robert Groſthead, for giving of Prebends, Anno 1253; between the Monks of Coventry and Canons of Lichfield, for chuſing their Biſhop in the time of King Henry the Third?

Hypocriſie in Monkery.

Kings made ſlaves under the Pope.

No concord nor unity in Popiſh Churches.

Examples proving what diſcord and how little unity is in the Popes Church.

Ex Matth. Pariſ.

And what ſhould I ſpeak of the diſcord which coſt ſo much money between Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Monks of Rocheſter, for chuſing Richard Wandor to be their Biſhop, Anno 1328; between Robert Groſthead Biſhop of Lincoln and Canons of the ſame houſe, for which both he and they were driven to travel to Rome, Anno 1244; between Gilbert Biſhop of Rocheſter, Delegate to Archbiſhop Baldwin, and Robert the Popes Legate for ſitting on the right hand of the Legate in his Council at Weſtminſter, Anno 1190; between the Abbot of Bardeny and the ſaid Groſthead about the Viſitation of their Abbey, Anno 1242. Item, between the Covent of Canterbury and the ſaid Robert Biſhop of Lincoln, Ann. 1243; between Hugo Biſhop of Dunham, and Hubert Biſhop of Sarum, and Geffery Archbiſhop of York, Ann. 1189; between William Biſhop of Ely, the Kings Chancellor, and the Canons of York, for not receiving him with Proceſſion, Anno 1190; between the Abbot of Weſtminſter and his Covent of Black Monks, whom King Henry the Third had much ado to ſtill and agree, Anno 1249. Item, Between the foreſaid Biſhop of Lincoln and the Abbot of Weſtminſter; likewiſe between Nicolas Biſhop of Durham and John Abbot of St. Albans, Ann. 1246; alſo between Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks there for the houſe of Lambeth, Ann. 1146. And what a ſtir was between the Preaching Friers and the Gray-Friers, mentioned in Matthew Paris for Superiority, Anno 1243. Alſo between the ſaid Gray-Friers, and the Prelates and Doctors of Paris about nine Concluſions, condemned of the Prelates to be erroneous?

No unity in the Popes Church.

Concluſions of the Friers condemned for erroneous by the Prelates of Paris. Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 167.

1. Concerning the Divine Eſſence, that it cannot be ſeen of the Angels or men glorified.
2. Concerning the Eſſence of the Holy Ghoſt.
3. Touching the proceeding of the Holy Ghoſt, as he is love.
4. Whether men glorified ſhall be In Cælo Empyreo, or, In Cælo Cryſtallino.
5. That the evil Angel at his firſt creation was evil, and never good.
6. That there have been many Verities from the beginning which were not of God.
7. That an Angel in one inſtant may be in divers places.
8. That the evil Angel never had whereby he might ſtand, no more had Adam in his ſtate of innocency.
9. That he which hath Meliora naturalia, that is to ſay, More perfect ſtrength of nature working in him, ſhall have more full meaſure of neceſſity to obtain grace and glory. To the which Articles the Prelates anſwering, did excommunicate the ſame as erroneous, affirming, that grace and glory ſhall be given according to that God hath elected and predeſtinate, &c. Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 167.

Contention between Friers about the Conception of our Lady.

In like manner between the ſaid Dominick Friers, and the Gray Friers, what a brawl and tumult was about the conception of our Lady, whether ſhe was without original ſin conceived or not, in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, and King Henry the Eighth, in the year of our Lord 1559. Add moreover to theſe, the four and twenty hainous Schiſms, and not ſo few, which happened between Pope and Pope in the Church and See of Rome. But what do I ſtand to recite the diviſions and diſſentions of the Popes Church, which is as much almoſt as to reckon the ſands of the Sea? For what Church, Chapter, or Covent, was in all that Religion, which either had not ſome variance with themſelves, or with others? Upon which continual ſtrife and variance among them, the Readers hereof may judge of them and their Religion as pleaſeth them: in the mean time, my judgment is this; that where ſuch diſſention dwelleth, there dwelleth not the ſpirit of Chriſt.

Continual variance in the Popes Church.

K. Richard taketh his journey toward the land of Jeruſalem.

Theſe things thus diſcourſed, touching the tragical diſſention between Baldwin the Archbiſhop, and the Monks of Canterbury; now let us proceed by the Lords aſſiſtance, in continuing our ſtory. After King Richard had thus, as is declared, ſet the Monks and the Archbiſhop in ſome agreement, and had compoſed ſuch things as were to be redreſſed within the Realm, he advanced forward his journey, and came unto Turon to meet with Philip the French King; and ſo after that went to Vizeliace; where the French King and he joyning together, for the more continuance of their journey, aſſured themſelves by ſolemn Oath, ſwearing fidelity one unto the other; the form of whoſe Oath was this: That either of them ſhould defend and maintain the honour of the other, and bear true fidelity unto him of life, members, and worldly honour; and that neither of them ſhould fail one the other in their affairs; but the French King ſhould aid the King of England in defending his Land and Dominions, as he would himſelf defend his own City of Paris, if it were beſieged; and that Richard King of England likewiſe ſhould aid the French King in defending his Land and Dominions, no otherwiſe than he would defend his own City of Rone, if it were beſieged, &c.

The Oath and fidelity between Philip ſecond French King, and K. Richard the firſt, going to the Holy Land.

But how ſlenderly this Oath did hold between theſe two Kings and by whoſe chief occaſion firſt it fell aſunder, the the ſequel of the Hiſtory (the Lord willing) ſhall declare hereafter.

Diſcipline and Orders ſet up by K. Richard for malefactors.

Furthermore, touching the Laws and Ordinances appointed by this King Richard for his Navy, the form thereof was this:

1. That whoſoever killed any perſon on Shipboard, ſhould be tyed with him that was ſlain, and thrown into the Sea.

2. And if he killed him on the land, he ſhould in like manner be tyed with the party ſlain, and be buried with him in the earth.

3. He that ſhall be convicted by lawful witneſs to draw out his knife or weapon, to the intent to ſtrike any man, or that hath ſtricken any to the drawing of blood, ſhall loſe his hand.

4. Alſo, he that ſtriketh any perſon with his hand, without effuſion of blood, ſhall be plunged three times in the Sea.

Item, Whoſo ſpeaketh any opprobrious or contumelious words, in reviling or curſing one another, for ſo oftentimes as he hath ſo reviled, ſhall pay ſo many ounces of ſilver.

Item, A thief or felon that hath ſtoln, being lawfully convicted, ſhall have his head ſhorn, and boiling pitch poured upon his head, and feathers or downe ſtrowed upon the ſame, whereby he may be known; and ſo the firſt landing place they ſhall come to, there to be caſt up, &c.

The French K and King Richard come to Lions.

Theſe things thus ſet in a readineſs, King Richard ſending his Navy by the Spaniſh Seas, and by the ſtraits of Jubaltary, between Spain and Africa, to meet him at Marſilia, he himſelf went (as is ſaid) to Vizeliace, to the French King. Which two Kings, from thence went to Lions, where the Bridge over the Flood Rhodanus, with preſs of people, brake, and many, both Men and Women, were drowned. By reaſon whereof the two Kings, for the cumbrances of their trains, were conſtrained to diſſever themſelves for the time of their journy, appointing both to meet together in Sicilia; and ſo Philip the French King took his way to Genua, and King Richard to Marſilia, where he remained eight days, appointing there his Navy to meet him. From thence croſſing over to Genua, where the French King was, he paſſed forward by the Coaſt of Italy, and entred into Tyber not far from Rome, where meeting with Ottomanus, the Cardinal and Biſhop of Hoſtia, he did complain greatly of the filthy Simony of the Pope and the Popes Court, for receiving ſeven hundred Marks for Conſecrating the Biſhop Cenomanenſis; alſo a thouſand and five hundred Marks of William the Biſhop of Ely for his office Legantine; and likewiſe an infinite ſumm of mony of the Biſhop of Burdeaux, for acquitting him when he ſhould be depoſed for a certain crime laid to his charge by his Clergy, &c.

K. Richard cometh to Marſilia.

K. Richard complaineth of the filthy Simony of the Popes Court.

K. Richard departeth from Marſilia.

The ſeventh day of Auguſt, in the year aforeſaid, King Richard departed out of Marſilia, after he had there waited ſeven days for his Navy, which came not, and ſo hiring twenty Gallies, and ten great Barks, to ſhip over his Men, ſailed by the Sea Coaſt of Italy, and came to Naples, and ſo partly by Horſe and Wagon, partly by the Sea paſſing to Falernum, he came to Calabria; where after that he had heard his Ships were arrived at Meſſana in Sicilia, he made the more ſpeed; and ſo the three and twentieth of September ſent to Meſſana, with ſuch a noiſe of Trumpets and Shalmes, with ſuch a rout and ſhew, that it was to the great wonderment and terror both of the Frenchmen, and all others that did hear and behold the fight.

The Kings Ships arrive at Meſſana.

The coming of K. Richard to Meſſana.

The French K lodged in Meſſana.

To the ſaid Town of Meſſana the French King was come before the ſixteenth day of the ſame Month of September, and had taken up the Palace of Tancredus King of Sicilia for his lodging. To whom King Richard after his arrival, eftſoons reſorted; and when the two Kings had communed together, immediately the ſame day the French King took ſhipping, and entred the Seas, thinking to ſail toward the Land of Jeruſalem. But after he was out of the Haven, the Wind ariſing contrary againſt him, returned him back again to Meſſana. Then King Richard (whoſe lodging was prepard in the Suburbs without the City) after he had reſorted again, and talked with the French King, and alſo had ſent to Tancredus King of Sicilia, for deliverance of Joan his Siſter (who had been ſometimes Queen of Sicilia) and had obtained her to be ſent unto him, the laſt day of September paſſed over the ſloud of Delfar, and there getting a ſtrong Hold called de la Bagmare, or le Bamre, and placing therein his Siſter, with a ſufficient Garriſon, he returneth home again to Meſſana. The ſecond of October King Richard wan another certain ſtrong Hold, called Monaſterium Griffonum, ſituated in the midſt of the River of Delfar, between Meſſana and Calabria; from whence the Monks being expulſed, he repoſed there all his Store and Proviſion of Victuals, which came from England, or other places.

The Citizens of Meſſana, ſeeing that the King of England had won the Caſtle and Iſland in de la Bagmare, and alſo the Monaſtery of the Griffons, and doubting leſt the King would extend his power further to invade their City, and if he could, all the whole Iſle of Sicilia, began to ſtir againſt the Kings Army, and to ſhut the Engliſhmen out of the Gates, and keep their Walls againſt them. The Engliſhmen ſeeing that, made to the Gates, and by force would have broken them open; inſomuch that the King riding among them with his ſtaff, and breaking divers of their heads, could not aſſwage their fierceneſs; ſuch was the rage of the Engliſhmen againſt the Citizens of Meſſana. The King, ſeeing the fury of the People to be ſuch as he could not ſtay them, took Boat, and went to the Palace of King Tancred, to talk of the matter with the French King. In which time the matter was taken up by the wiſe handling of the ancient of the City, that both parties laying down their Armour went home in peace.

The King could not ſtay the rage of the People.

The fourth day of the ſaid Month of October, came to King Richard the Archbiſhop of Meſſana, with two other Archbiſhops, alſo with the French King, and ſundry other Earls, Barons and Biſhops, for intreatance of peace. Who, as they were together conſulting, and had almoſt concluded upon the peace, the Citizens of Meſſana iſſuing out of the Town, ſome went up upon the Mountains, ſome with open force invaded the Manſion or Lodging of Hugh Brun an Engliſh Captain. The noiſe whereof coming to the ears of the King, he, ſuddenly breaking off talk with the French King and the reſt, departed from them, and coming to his men, commanded them forthwith to arm themſelves; who then with certain of his Souldiers, making up to the top of a Mountain (which ſeemed to paſs their power to climb) there put the Citizens to flight, chaſing them down the Mountain, unto the very Gates of the City; whom alſo certain of the Kings ſervants purſued within the City, of whom five valiant ſouldiers, and twenty of the Kings ſervants were ſlain, the French King looking on, and not once willing to reſcue them, contrary unto his Oath and League before made with the King of England. For the ſaid French King with his Men, being there preſent, rode in the midſt of them ſafely and without harm to and fro, and might well have eaſed the Kings party more than he, if it had ſo liked him.

The French K. a bearer with Frang. ers againſt the Engliſhmen.

This being known to the Engliſh Hoſt, how their fellows were ſlain, and the Frenchmen permitted in the City, and that they were excluded, and the Gates barred againſt them, being alſo ſtopped from buying of Victuals and other things; they upon great indignation, gathered themſelves in Arms, braſt open the Gates, and ſcaled the Walls, and ſo, winning the City, ſet up their Flags, with the Engliſh Arms upon the Walls. Which when the French King did ſee, he was mightily offended; requiring the King of England, that the Arms of France might alſo be ſet up and joyned with his; but King Richard to that in no caſe would agree. Notwithſtanding, to ſatisfie his mind, he was well contented to take down his Arms, and commit the cuſtody of the City to the Hoſpetalares and Templars of Jeruſalem, till the time that Tancred King of Sicilia and he, ſhould agree together upon conditions.

Engliſh Arms ſet up at Meſſana.

Theſe things being done the fifth and ſixth day of October, it followed then upon the eighth day of the ſame Month of October, that peace among the Kings was concluded. In which peace firſt King Richard and Philip the French King renewed again their Oath and League before made, concerning their mutual aid and ſociety, during all the time of that Peregrination. Secondly, peace alſo was concluded between King Richard and Tancred King of Sicilia aforeſaid, with this condition, That the Daughter of Tancred (in caſe King Richard ſhould die without iſſue) ſhould marry to Arthur Duke of Britain, the Kings Nephew and next heir to this Crown, &c. Whereof a formal Chart was drawn, and Letters ſent thereof to Pope Clement, being dated the ninth day of November.

Peace concluded between King Richard and Tancred K. of Sicilia.

Frederick the firſt Emperor, with his Son Conrade come up toward the ſiege of Achon.

In this mean time as theſe two Kings of France and England were thus wintring at Meſſana, Frederick Emperor, firſt of that name (the ſame on whoſe neck Pope Alexander did tread in the Church of Venice, ſaying the verſe of the Pſalm, Super Aſpidem & Baſiliſcum ambulabis, &c. whereof read before) and his Son Conradus, with a mighty Army of Almans and others, were coming up likewiſe toward the land of Jeruſalem to the ſiege of Achon; where by the way the good Emperor through a great miſchance, falling off his horſe into a river called Salef, was therein drowned. After whoſe deceaſe Conradus his Son taking the Government of his Army, came to the ſiege of Achon; in which ſiege alſo he died. Upon whoſe coming ſuch a dearth followed in the Camp, which laſted two months, that a loaf of bread, which before their coming was ſold for one peny, was afterward ſold for three pounds, by reaſon whereof many Chriſtian Soldiers did there periſh through famine. The chiefeſt food which the Princes there had to feed upon was horſe-fleſh. This famine being ſo miſerable, ſome good Biſhops there were in the Camp, namely Hubert Biſhop of Salisbury, with certain other good Biſhops, who making a general Collection through the whole Camp for the poor, made ſuch a proviſion that in this penury of all things, yet no man was ſo deſtitute and needy, but ſomewhat he had for his relief; till within a few days after by the merciful Providence of God (who is the feeder of all Creatures) Ships came unto them with abundance of Corn, Wine, and Oyl.

The ſiege of Achon.

Ignis Græcus much uſed of the Saracens.

The ſiege of this Town of Achon endured a long ſeaſon, which as it was mightily oppugned by the Chriſtians, ſo it was ſtrongly defended by the Saracens, ſpecially by the help of wild-fire, which the Latins, call Græcum ignem, ſo that great ſlaughter there was on both ſides. During the time of which ſiege, many Noble Perſonages, and alſo Biſhops died, among whom was Conradus the Emperors Son, Radulph Earl of Fougiers, the Earl of Pericio, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with four Archbiſhops, and divers other Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and alſo Barons, to the number of four and thirty, and not ſo few. All this while King Richard, and King Philip of France ſtill kept at Meſſana in Sicilia, from the month of September till April, for lack (I ſuppoſe) of wind or weather, or elſe for neceſſity of repairing their Ships. In which mean time King Richard hearing of Joachim Abbot of Curacio, a learned man in Calabria (who was then thought to have the ſpirit of Propheſie, and told many things of a people that ſhould come) ſent for him, with whom he and his Biſhops had much conference about the coming and time of Antichriſt. This Joachim belike in his Book and Revelations uttered ſome things againſt the See and pride of Rome, for the which he was leſs favoured of the Popes, and judged an enemy to their See, and ſo by Pope Innocent the Third was condemned with his Books for an Heretick, in his Idolatrous General Council of Lateran, Ann. 1215, as ye may read in Antoninus.

Henricus Son of Frederick ſtandeth to the Emperor.

After this Henricus King of Almans, Son of Frederick the Emperor, hearing of the deceaſe of his Father, ſtanding now to be Emperor, firſt reſtoreth to Henry Duke of Saxony, and to others, whatſoever his Father before had taken from them. That done he ſent unto Clement and his Cardinals, promiſing in all things to confirm the Laws and Dignities of the Church of Rome, if they would grant him their aſſent to be Emperor. Whereupon Pope Clement by advice of the Romans, aſſigned him the term of Eaſter in the next year inſuing for his Coronation. But before the Eaſter came, Pope Clement died, after he had ſit three years, and about four months; after whom ſucceeded Celeſtinus the Third, of whom more hereafter, God willing.

Pope Clement dieth. Celeſtinus the third Pope.

The time thus paſſing over in the month of February, the next year following, which was of the Lord 1191, King Richard ſent over his Gallies to Naples there to meet his Mother Elenor, and Berengaria the Daughter of Sanctius King of Navar, whom he was purpoſed to marry. Who by that time were come to Brunduſium, under the conduct of Philip Earl of Flanders, and ſo proceeding unto Naples, there found the Kings Ships, wherein they ſailed to Meſſana. In this mean ſpace King Richard ſhewed himſelf exceeding bounteous and liberal unto all men. To the French King firſt he gave divers Ships; upon others likewiſe he beſtowed rich rewards; and of his goods and treaſure he diſtributed largely unto his Souldiers and ſervants about him. Of whom it was reported that he diſtributed more in one month, than ever any of his Predeceſſors did in a whole year; by reaſon whereof he purchaſed great love and favour, which not only redounded to the advancement of his fame, but alſo to his ſingular uſe and profit, as the ſequel afterward proved.

The bountiful liberality of King Richard.

To proceed then in the progreſs of King Richard, it followeth: In the firſt day of the month of March, he leaving the City of Meſſana, where the French King was, went to Cathnienſium, a City where Tancredus King of Sicilia then lay, where he was honourably received, and there remained with King Tancredus three days and three nights. On the fourth day when he ſhould depart, the foreſaid Tancredus offered him many rich Preſents in Gold and Silver, and precious Silks; whereof King Richard would receive nothing, but one little Ring for a token of his good will. For the which King Richard again gave him a rich ſword. At length when King Richard ſhould take his leave, King Tancredus would not ſo let him part, but needs would give him four great Ships, and fifteen Gallies; and furthermore, he himſelf would needs accompany him the ſpace of two days journey to a place called Tavernium.

K. Richard goeth from Meſſana, and cometh to Cathnienſium.

The honorable entertainment of R. Richard by Tancredus.

Then the next morning when they ſhould take their leave, Tancredus declared unto him the meſſage which the French King a little before had ſent unto him by the Duke of Burgundy, the Contents whereof was this: That the King of England was a falſe Traytor, and would never keep the peace that was between them. And if the ſaid Tancredus would war againſt him, or ſecretly by night invade him, he with all his power would aſſiſt him, and joyn with him to the deſtruction of him and all his Army, &c. To whom Richard the King proteſted again, that he was no Traytor, nor ever was; and as touching the peace begun between them, the ſame ſhould never be broken through him; neither could he believe that the French King, being his good Lord and his ſworn compartner in that Voyage, would utter any ſuch words by him. Which when Tancredus heard, he bringeth forth the Letters of the French King ſent to him by the Duke of Burgundy; affirming moreover, that if the Duke of Burgundy would deny the bringing of the ſaid Letters, he was ready to try with him by any of his Dukes. King Richard receiving the Letters, and muſing not a little upon the ſame, returneth again to Meſſana. The ſame day that King Richard departed, the French King cometh to Tavernium to ſpeak with Tancredus, and there abode with him that night, and on the morrow returned to Meſſana again.

Philip the French King traiterouſly ſeeketh the deſtruction of K. Richard by ſecret Letters ſent to the K. of Sicilia.

A faithful part of Tancredus K. of Sicilia towards K. Richard.

From that ſame time King Richard moved in ſtomack againſt King Philip, never ſhewed any gentle countenance of peace and amity, as he before was wont. Whereat the French King greatly marvelling, and inquiring earneſtly what ſhould be the cauſe thereof, word was ſent him again by Philip Earl of Flanders, what words he had ſent to the King of Sicilia; and for the teſtimony thereof the Letters were ſhewed which he wrote by the Duke of Burgundy to the King of Sicilia. Which when the French King underſtood, firſt he held his peace, as guilty in his conſcience, not knowing well what to anſwer. At length turning his tale to another matter, he began to quarrel with King Richard, pretending as though he ſought cauſes to break with him, and to malign him, and therefore he forged theſe lyes (ſaid he) upon him, and all becauſe he by that means would void to marry with Alice his Siſter, according as he had promiſed: adding moreover, that if he would ſo do, and would not marry the ſaid Alice his Siſter, according to his Oath, but would marry another, he would be an enemy to him and his while he lived.

The firſt occaſion of diſcord betweene the French King and King Richard.

The French King quarreleth with King Richard about marrying his ſiſter.

To

Causes alledged why K. Richard could not marry with the French Kings ſiſter.

To this King Richard ſaid again, that he could by no means marry that Woman, forſomuch as his Father had carnal copulation with her, and alſo had by her a Son: for proof whereof he had there preſently to bring forth divers and ſundry witneſſes to the Kings face, to teſtifie with him. In concluſion, through counſel and perſwaſion of divers about the French King, agreement at laſt was made; ſo that King Philip did acquit King Richard from his bond of marrying his ſiſter; and King Richard again ſhould be bound to pay to him every year, for the ſpace of five years, two thouſand Marks, with certain other conditions beſides, not greatly material in this place to be deciphered. Thus peace being between them concluded, the eight and twentieth day of the ſaid month of March, the French King lanching out of the Haven of Meſſana, on the two and twentieth day after in Eaſter Week came with his Army to the Siege of Achon.

After the departure of the French King from Meſſana (King Richard with his Army yet remaining behind) arrived Queen Elenor the Kings Mother, bringing with her Bernegera the King of Navar's Daughter, to be eſpouſed to King Richard. Which done, Elenor, leaving Bernegera behind her, departed, taking her journey toward Rome, to intreat the Pope for Gaufridus her other Son above mentioned, to be conſecrated in the Archbiſhoprick of York, being before elected by the procurement of King Richard his Brother, as ye heard. In which time, as Queen Elenor was travelling toward Rome, Pope Clement above mentioned, died about the ſixth day of April, in whoſe room ſucceeded Pope Celeſtinus the third. Who the next day after his Conſecration came from Lateran to Saint Peter's Church, where in the way meeteth him Henricus the Emperor, and Conſtantia his Wife, with a great rout of armed Souldiers, but the Romans making faſt their Gates would not ſuffer them to enter their City. Then Pope Celeſtine, ſtanding upon the Stairs before the Church door of St. Peter, received an Oath of the ſaid Henricus King of the Almains, (his Army waiting without) that he ſhould defend the Church of God, and all the liberties thereof, and maintain juſtice; alſo that he ſhould reſtore again the patrimony of S. Peter full and whole, whatſoever hath been diminiſhed thereof; and finally, That he ſhould ſurrender to the Church of Rome again the City of Tuſculanum, &c. Upon theſe conditions and grants, then the Pope took him to the Church, and there anointed him for Emperor, and his Wife for Empreſs; who, there ſitting in his Chair Pontifical, held the Crown of Gold between his feet, and ſo the Emperor, bowing down his head to the Popes feet, received the Crown, and in like manner the Empreſs alſo. The Crown thus being ſet upon the Emperors head, the Pope eftſoons with his foot ſtruck it off again from his head unto the ground, declaring thereby that he had power to depoſe him again, in caſe he ſo deſerved. Then the Cardinals taking up the Crown, ſet it upon his head again. *Ex veteri Chronico manuſcripto anonymo, de geſtis Richardi Regis, cui initium: Anno gratiæ, &c. Not long after the departure of King Philip from Meſſana, which was in the Month of March, King Richard in April following, about the twentieth day of the ſaid Month, ſayling from the Haven of Meſſana with an hundred and fifty great Ships, and three and fifty great Gallies well manned and appointed, took journey towards Achon; who being upon the Seas on Good-friday, about the ninth hour roſe a mighty South wind with a Tempeſt, which diſſevered and ſcattered all his Navy, ſome to one place, and ſome to another. The King with a few Ships, was driven to the Iſle of Creta, and there before the Haven of Rhodes caſt Anchor. The Ship that carried the Kings Siſter Queen of Sicilia, and Bernegera the King of Navar's Daughter, with two other Ships, were driven to the Iſle of Cyprus. The King making great moan for the Ship of his Siſter, and Bernegera his Wife that ſhould be, not knowing where they were become, after the Tempeſt was overblown, ſent forth his Gallies diligently to ſearch the reſt of his Navy diſperſed, but eſpecially for the Ship wherein his Siſter was, and the Maiden whom he ſhould marry; who at length were found ſafe and merry at the Port of Limſzem in the Iſle of Cyprus. Notwithſtanding the two other Ships, which were in their company before in the ſame Haven, were drowned, with divers of the Kings ſervants, and Men of Worſhip, amongſt whom was M. Roger, called Malus Catulus, the Kings Vice-chancellor, who was found having the Kings Seal hanging about his Neck. The King of Cyprus was then Iſakius (called alſo the Emperor of the Griffons) who took and impriſoned all Engliſhmen which by Shipwrack were caſt upon his Land; alſo inveigling into his hands the goods and prizes of them which were found drowned about his Coaſts, neither would ſuffer the Ship wherein the two Ladies were to enter within the Port.

K. Richard cometh from Meſſana to Achon

K. Richard overtaken with a tempeſt on the Seas going to Achon.

Iſakius K. of Cyprus cruel enemy to Engliſh men.

The tidings of this being brought to King Richard, he in his great wrath, gathering his Gallies and Ships together, bordeth the Land of Cyprus, where he firſt in gentle wiſe ſignifieth to King Iſakius, how he with his Engliſhmen, coming as ſtrangers to the ſupportation of the Holy Land, were by diſtreſs of Weather, driven upon his bounds; and therefore with all humble petition beſought him in Gods behalf, and for reverence of the Holy-Croſs, to let go ſuch Priſoners of his which he had in Captivity, and to reſtore again the Goods of them which were drowned, which he detained in his hands, to be imployed for the behoof of their ſouls, &c. And this the King, once, twice and thrice deſired of the Emperor. But he, proudly anſwering again, ſent the King word, that he would neither let the Captives go, nor render the Goods of them which were drowned, &c.

The diſdainful and proud anſwer of Iſakius to K. Richard.

When King Richard heard this, how little the Emperor Iſakius made of his ſo humble and honeſt petition, and how nothing there could be gotten without violent force; eftſoons he giveth commandment through all his Hoſt, to put themſelves in armour, and to follow him, to revenge ſuch injuries received of that proud and cruel King of Cyprus; willing them to put their truſt in God, and not to miſdoubt but the Lord would ſtand with them, and give them the full Victory. The Emperor in the mean time, with his people, ſtood warding the Sea Coaſts, where the Engliſhmen ſhould arrive, with Swords, Bills and Lances, and ſuch other Weapons as they had, ſetting Boards, Stools, and Cheſts before them inſtead of a Wall. Howbeit but few of them were harneſſed, and for the moſt part all unexpert, and unskilful in the feats of War. Then King Richard with his Souldiers, iſſuing out of their Ships, firſt ſet his Bowmen before, who with their ſhot made a way for others to follow. The Engliſhmen, thus winning the land upon them, ſo fiercely preſſed upon the Griffons, that after long fighting, and many blows, at laſt the Emperor was put to flight; whom King Richard valiantly purſued, and ſlew many, and divers he took alive, and had gone near alſo to have had the Emperor, had not the Night come on and parted the Battel. And thus King Richard with much ſpoil and great victory returning to the Port Town of Limſzem, which the Townſmen had left for fear, found there great abundance of Corn, Wine, Oyl and Victuals.

The ſame day after the Victory got, Joan the Kings Siſter, and Bernegera the Maiden entred the Port and Town of Limſzem, with fifty great Ships, and fourteen Galliots; ſo that all the whole Navy, there meeting together, were two hundred fifty four tall Ships, and above threeſcore Galliots. Then, Iſakius the Emperor, ſeeing no way for him to eſcape by the Sea, the ſame Night pitched his Tents five Miles off from the Engliſh Army, ſwearing that the third day after he would ſure give Battel to King Richard. But he preventing him before, ſuddenly, the ſame morning before the day of Battel ſhould be, fetteth upon the Tents of the Griffons early, they being unawares and aſleep, and made of them a great ſlaughter, inſomuch that the Emperor was fain naked to run away, leaving his Tents and Pavilions to the Engliſhmen, full of Horſes and rich Treaſure, alſo with the Imperial Standard, the lower part whereof, with a coſtly Streamer was covered and wrought all with Gold. King Richard then returning with Victory and Triumph to his Siſter, and Bernegera, ſhortly after in the Month of May next following, and the twelfth day of the ſame Month, married the ſaid Bernegera Daughter of Rancon King of Navar, in the Iſle of Cyprus at Limſzem.

The K. of Cyprus again put to flight.

K. Richard marrieth Bernegera Daughter of the K. of Navar in the Iſle of Cyprus.

The King of Cyprus ſeeing himſelf overmatched, was driven at length to yield himſelf with conditions, to give King Richard twenty thouſand Marks in Gold, for amends of ſuch ſpoils as he had gotten of them that were drowned, alſo to reſtore all his Captives again to the King, and further more in his own perſon to attend upon the King to the Land of Jeruſalem, in Gods ſervice and his, with four hundred Horſmen, and five hundred Footmen: in pledge whereof he would give to his hands his Caſtles, and his only Daughter, and would hold his Kingdom of him. This done, and the Emperor ſwearing fidelity to King Richard, before Guido King of Jeruſalem, and the Prince of Antioch (who were come thither to King Richard a little before) Peace was taken, and Iſakius was committed to the Ward of certain Keepers. Notwithſtanding ſhortly after he, breaking from his Keepers, was again at defiance with the King. Whereupon King Richard, beſetting the Iſland of Cyprus round about with Ships and Gallies, did in ſuch ſort prevail, that the Subjects of the Land were conſtrained to yield themſelves to the King, and at length the Daughter alſo of the Emperor, and at laſt the Emperor himſelf, whom King Richard cauſed to be kept in Fetters of Silver and Gold, and to be ſent to the City of Tripolis.

These things thus done, and all ſet in order touching the poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Cyprus, the keeping whereof he committed unto Radulph, Son of Godfrey, Lord Chamberlain, being then the firſt day of June; upon the fifth of the ſaid month, King Richard departed from the Iſle of Cyprus, with his Ships and Gallies towards the ſiege of Achon, and on the next morrow came unto Tyrus; where, by procurement of the French King, he was conſtrained by the Citizens to enter. The next day after, which was the ſixth day of June, croſſing the Seas, he met with a great Bark, fraught with Soldiers and Men of War, to the number of one thouſand and five hundred; which pretending to be French men, and ſetting forth their Flag with the French Arms, were indeed Saracens, ſecretly ſent with wild-fire and certain Barrels of unknown Serpents, to the defence of the Town of Achon. Which King Richard at length perceiving, eſtſoons ſet upon them, and ſo vanquiſhed them, of whom the moſt were drowned, and ſome taken alive. Which being once known in the City of Achon, as it was a great diſcomfort unto them, ſo it was a great help unto the Chriſtians for winning the City. The next day after, which was the ſeventh of June, King Richard came to Achon, which at that time had been long beſieged of the Chriſtians; after whoſe coming it was not long, but the Pagans within the City ſeeing their Walls to be undermined, and Towers overthrown, were driven by compoſition to eſcape with life and limb, to ſurrender the City unto the two Kings. Another great help to the Chriſtians in winning the City was this: In the ſaid City of Achon there was a ſecret Chriſtian among the Saracens, who in time of the ſiege there, uſed at ſundry times to caſt over the Walls, into the Camp of the Chriſtians, certain Bills written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, wherein he diſcloſed unto the Chriſtians, from time to time, the doings and counſels of the Enemies, Adverting them how and by what way they ſhould work, and what to beware: and always his Letters began thus: In nomine Patris, & Filii, & Spiritus Sancti, Amen. By reaſon whereof, the Chriſtians were much advantaged in their proceedings. But this was a great heavineſs unto them, that neither he would utter his name not when the City was got, could they ever underſtand who he was. Ex Chronico manuſcripto, de geſtis Richardi.

To make of a long Siege a ſhort Narration, upon the twelfth day of July in the year aforeſaid, the Princes and Captains of the Pagans, upon agreement, reſorted unto the Tent of the Templars, to commune with the two Kings touching Peace and giving up of their City: the form of which Peace was thus: That the Kings ſhould have the City of Achon freely and fully delivered unto them, with all which was within: and five hundred Captives of the Chriſtians ſhould be reſtored unto them, which were in Achon; alſo the holy Croſs ſhould be to them rendred, and a thouſand Chriſtian Captives, with two hundred Horſmen, whoſoever they themſelves would chuſe out of all them which were in the power of Saladine; over and beſides they ſhould give to the Kings, two hundred thouſand Biſants, ſo that they themſelves would remain as pledges in the Kings hands for the performance hereof; that if in forty days theſe foreſaid Covenants were not accompliſhed, they would abide the Kings mercy touching life and limb. Theſe Covenants being agreed upon, the Kings ſent their Soldiers and Servants into the City, to take one hundred of the richeſt and beſt of the City, to cloſe them up in Towers under ſtrong keeping, and the reſidue they committed to be kept in Houſes and Streets, miniſtring unto them according to their neceſſities: to whom notwithſtanding this they permitted, that ſo many of them as would be Baptized, and receive the Faith of Chriſt, ſhould be free to go whither they would. Whereupon many there were of the Pagans, which for fear of Death pretended to be Baptized; but afterward, ſo ſoon as they could, revolted again to the Saladine. For the which it was afterwards commanded by the Kings, that none of them ſhould be Baptized againſt their wills.

The thirteenth day of the ſaid Month of July, King Philip of France, and King Richard, after they had obtained the poſſeſſion of Achon, divided between them all things therein contained, as well the People, as Gold and Silver, with all other Furniture whatſoever was remaining in the City: who, in dividing the ſpoil, were ſo good carvers unto themſelves, that many Knights, and Barons, with other Soldiers, who had there ſuſtained the whole travel two years together about the ſiege, ſeeing the Kings to take all unto themſelves, and their part to be but little, retracted themſelves without the uttermoſt Trench, and there, after conſultation had together, ſent word to the Kings, that they would leave and forſake them, unleſs they were made partakers alſo of the gains for the which they had ſo long travelled. To whom anſwer was ſent again by the Kings, that their wills ſhould be ſatisfied. Howbeit, becauſe of long deferring of their promiſe, many conſtrained by poverty departed from them.

The two Kings divide the City of Achon with all the ſpoil thereof betweene themſelves.

Commonly ſeen, who ſo taketh moſt pains, their part to be the leaſt.

Many of the Chriſtian Soldiers for need were conſtrained to depart from Achon.

The twentieth day of July, King Richard, ſpeaking with the French King, deſired him that they two with their Armies would bind themſelves by Oath to remain there ſtill in the Land of Jeruſalem the ſpace of three years, for the winning and recovering again of thoſe Countries. But he would ſwear (he ſaid) no ſuch Oath: and ſo the next day after, King Richard with his Wife and Siſter entreth into the City of Achon, and placed there himſelf in the Kings Palace, the French King remaining in the Houſes of the Templars, where he continued till the end of the Month. So about the beginning of the month of Auguſt, Philip the French King, after that he and King Richard had made agreement between Guido and Conradus the Marqueſs, about the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, went from Achon to Tyrus; notwithſtanding King Richard and all the Princes of the Chriſtian Army with great intreaty deſired him to tarry; ſhewing what a ſhame it were for him to come ſo far, and now to leave undone that for which he came; and on the third of Auguſt from Tyrus he departed; leaving his half part of the City of Achon in the hands of the foreſaid Conradus, Marqueſs. After whoſe departure the Pagans refuſed to keep their Covenants made; who neither would reſtore the holy Croſs, nor the Mony, nor their Captives; ſending word to King Richard, that if he beheaded the pledges left with him at Achon, they would chop off the heads of ſuch Captives of the Chriſtians, which were in their hands. Shortly after this, the Saladine, ſending great gifts to King Richard, requeſted the times limited for beheading of the Captives to be Prorogued; but the King refuſed to take his gifts, and to grant his requeſt. Whereupon the Saladine cauſed all the Chriſtian Captives within his poſſeſſion forthwith to be beheaded, which was the eighteenth day of Auguſt. Which albeit King Richard underſtood, yet would not he prevent the time afore limited for the Execution of his Priſoners, being the twentieth of Auguſt. Upon which day he cauſed the Priſoners of the Saracens, openly in the ſight of the Saladines Army, to loſe their heads: the number of whom came to 2500, ſave only that certain of the principal of them he reſerved for purpoſes and conſiderations, eſpecially to make exchange for the holy Croſs, and certain others of the Chriſtian Captives.

After this, King Richard purpoſed to beſiege the City of Joppe; where, by the way between Achon and Joppe, near to a Town called Aſſur, Saladine with a great multitude of his Saracens came fiercely againſt the Kings rearward: but through Gods Merciful Grace, in the ſame Battel the Kings Warriors acquitted them ſo well, that the Saladine was put to flight (whom the Chriſtians purſued the ſpace of three Miles) and loſt the ſame day many of his Nobles and Captives, in ſuch ſort (as it was thought) that the Saladine was not put to ſuch confuſion forty years before: and but one Chriſtian Captain, called James Avernus, in that conflict was overthrown. From thence King Richard, proceeding further, went to Joppe, and then to Aſcalon, where he found firſt the City of Joppe forſaken of the Saracens, who durſt not abide the Kings coming. Aſcalon the Saladine threw down to the ground, and likewiſe forſook the whole Land of Syria; through all which Land the King had free paſſage without reſiſtance, neither durſt the Saracen Prince incounter after that with King Richard. Of all which his atchievances the ſaid King Richard ſent his Letters of Certificate as well into England, as alſo to the Abbot of Clara Valle in France; well hoping that he (God willing) ſhould be able to make his repair again to them by Eaſter next.

A brief Story of William Biſhop of Ely, the Kings Chancellor.

The ſtory of William the proud Biſhop of Ely.

AND now to leave King Richard a while in the field, let us make a ſtep into England, and look a little what is done at home while the King was abroad, and ſo return to the King again. Ye heard before how King Richard, at his ſetting forth, committed the Government of the Realm to Hugo Biſhop of Durham, and to William Biſhop of Ely, ſo that to the Biſhop of Durham was committied the keeping of the Caſtle of Windſor. The other, which was the Biſhop of Ely, had the keeping of the Tower of London, about which he cauſed a great Ditch with a Rampire to be caſt, which is yet remaining. Furthermore, to theſe two Biſhops the King alſo aſſigned four other Chief Juſtices, which joyntly with them ſhould have the hearing and overſight of all cauſes, as well to the Clergy as to the Laity appertaining: to wit, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marſhal, Geofrey Peterſon, and William Bruer. But the Biſhop of Ely was the principal, or at leaſt he that took moſt upon him: who both was the Kings Chancellor, and bought with his money to be the Popes Legate through England, Ireland, and Scotland, as is before ſpecified. Touching the exceſſive pride and pomp of which Biſhop his rufflings outragious, and fall moſt ſhameful, it would make a long Tragedy to diſcourſe the whole circumſtances at full: only to demonſtrate certain ſpecialities thereof for our preſent purpoſe, it may ſuffice.

Ut juſte judicarent clerum & populum, verba hiſt.

Four Chief Juſtices with two Biſhops appointed overſeers of the Realm in the Kings abſence.

William Longchamp Biſhop of Ely, Lord Chancellor and the Popes Legate.

First, This William called Longchamp, being thus advanced by the King to be his High Chancellor, and Chief Juſtice of the Realm, and alſo the Popes Legate, to ſhew abroad the authority of his Legateſhip, began to ſuſpend the Canons, Clerks, and Vicars of the Church of S. Peter in York, becauſe they received him not with proceſſion: under which interdiction he held them, till they were fain at laſt both Canons, Clerks and Vicars to fall down at his feet, cauſing all their Bells to be let down out of the Steeple. After this cometh Hugo Biſhop of Durham, whom the King ſent home out of Normandy with his Letters; who, meeting with the aforeſaid William Biſhop of Ely in the Town of Ely, ſhewed him the Kings Letters, wherein was granted to him the keeping of Windſor Caſtle, and to be the Kings Juſtice from the River of Humber to the borders of Scotland. To the which Letters the Chancellor anſwered, That the Kings commandment ſhould be done, and ſo brought him with him to Suwel; where he took him and kept him faſt, till he was forced at laſt to ſurrender to him the Caſtle of Windſor, and other things which the King had committed to his cuſtody; and moreover he was conſtrained to leave with the ſaid Chancellor, Henry de Puteaco his own Son, and Gilbert Leie, for Pledges and Hoſtages of his fidelity, to be true to the King and Realm. And thus the biſhop of Durham, being ſet at liberty, went to his Town of Howeden; where after he had made his abode a few days, cometh thither Osbert Longchamp the Chancellors Brother, and William Stutivil, with a great Company of Armed Men ſent by the Chancellor to apprehend him. But the ſaid Biſhop of Durham, putting in Sureties not to depart that Town without licence of the King and of the Chancellor, there ſtill remained till he got Letters to be ſent to the King, ſignifying how he was uſed. Whereupon the King writing his Letters from Marſilia to the Biſhop of Ely, ſet the ſaid Biſhop of Durham free, and confirmed to him all the Poſſeſſions and Grants that he before had given him.

The Church and Bells of York ſuſpended, becauſe the Lord Legate was not ſet in with proceſſion.

Biſhop of Ely getteth the Caſtle of Windſor from the Biſhop of Durham.

Hugo Biſhop of Durham vexed William Biſhop of Ely.

It is almoſt incredible to think how intemperately this Biſhop and Chancellor miſuſed himſelf, after the Kings departure into Syria, in exceſs of pride, and in cruel exactions and oppreſſions of the Kings Subjects. Firſt his fellow Juſtices, whom the King joined with him for Government of the Realm, he utterly rejected and refuſed to hear their counſel, reputing none to be equal with him in all the Realm. Neither was he contented with the authority of a Prelate, but played both King and Prieſt in the Realm. All Caſtles, Lordſhips, Abbies, Churches, and all other Appropriations belonging to the right of the King, he claimed to himſelf. And by vertue of his Legateſhip, when he came to any Biſhops Houſe, Abby, Priory, or any other Religious Houſe, he brought with him ſuch a ſuperfluity of Men, Horſes, Dogs, and Hawks, that the Houſe was the worſe for it three years after. For commonly he rode never under 1500 Horſes, of Chaplains, Prieſts, and other Servingmen waiting upon him. From the Clergy and Laity he took away their Churches, their Vowſons, their livings and lands, to beſtow upon his Nephews and other waiting Chaplains to ſerve his vain glory; or elſe converted them to his own uſe, to maintain his pomp and vanity. In getting and gathering of Treaſures he had no meaſure; in miſ-pending the ſame he kept no order. And that no vice ſhould be wanting, where ſuch avarice taketh root, the money, which he wrongfully got, he committed to the Bank to be increaſed by uſury. What wantonneſs and laſciviouſneſs was uſed in that ſo riotous life, the ſtones do ſhame to declare it. All ruffianly Runagates, idle bellies, and light perſons, whereſoever he were, hanged upon his Court. To increaſe the vain jollity of this Royal Prelate, there was lacking no kind of muſical inſtruments and melodious noiſe, to refreſh belike his wearied ſenſes, too much beaten and macerated with continual labor and ſtudy of Hunting, Hawking and Gaming; of Preaching and Reading I ſhould have ſaid.

The exceſſive pride and enormities of William Biſhop of Ely.

Biſhop of Ely never rode and 1500 Horſ

His Vanit

His uſury

His rioto and delicate life.

Briefly, this foreſaid Prelate, bearing the authority both of the King and of the Pope, kept ſuch a ſtir in England, that the whole Realm was at his beck, with Cap and Knee crouching to him; neither durſt any Man, rich or poor diſpleaſe him, yea none in all the Realm ſo noble or worſhipful, but was glad to pleaſe him, accounting themſelves happy if they might ſtand in his favor. At his Table all Noble-mens Children did ſerve and wait upon him, with whom he coupled in Marriages his Nieces and Kinſwomen. And when any, that ſtood waiting before him, durſt once caſt up his eyes, or did not demurely look downward upon the ground, he had a ſtaff in his hand with a prick, wherewith he uſed to prick them; learning, belike, by the Carter his Father, which uſed at the Plough or Cart to drive his Oxen. Furthermore, as Kings uſe to have their Guard about them, ſo he becauſe he would not alſo be unguarded, refuſing Men of the Engliſh Nation, had his Waiters and Warders moſt of Frenchmen and Flemmings.

The Biſho of Ely pleeth both King and Prieſt.

William Biſhop of E guarded with Frenc men and Flemings.

It hapned after this, in the year 1191. that a great diſcord roſe between John Earl of Morton the Kings Brother, with other States of the Realm, and the ſaid William Biſhop of Ely; ſo that univerſally they all wrote over to the King concerning the miſgovernment and enormities of the ſaid Biſhop. Who, underſtanding of the caſe, ſent from Meſſana into England, Walter Archbiſhop of Rone, and William Marſhal Earl, unto the Biſhop of Ely with Letters, commanding him that in all his doings he ſhould aſſociate unto him the Archbiſhop of Rone, William Marſhal, Geofrey Peterſon, William Bruer, and Hugo Bardolf above mentioned. Who when they came into England, durſt not deliver their Letters, dreading the diſpleaſure of the Chancellor, for he deſpiſed all the commandments of the King, nor would ſuffer any fellow to joyn with him in his Kingdom.

Anno 1191 A generall complaint to the King of William Biſhop of Ely.

Hitherto have you heard of the glorious vanity of this Lordly Legate and Chancellor of the Realm: now ye ſhall hear of his ſhameful fall, after his ſhameleſs exaltation. For ſhortly after this followeth an other breach between the ſaid Earl John the Kings Brother and him, about the beſieging of the Caſtle of Lincoln. Concerning the which Caſtle the ſaid John ſent him word, that unleſs he raiſed his Siege the ſooner from thence, he would ſend him away by force of ſword. The Biſhop, either not able to make his party good, or not daring to reſiſt, thought beſt to fall to ſome compoſition with the Earl, and ſo did. In which compoſition, compoſition, he was contented againſt his will, by mediation of divers Biſhops and others; to make ſurrender not only of the Caſtle of Lincoln, but alſo of Nottingham, of Tickhil, Wallingford, and many more, which were then committed to the cuſtody of ſundry Men of worſhip and honour. And thus was that Controverſie agreed; wherein the Biſhop of Ely began a little to be cut ſhorter.

If followed then not long after in the ſame year, that another like buſineſs began to kindle between Geofrey the Archbiſhop of York the Kings Brother, and the aforeſaid glorious Biſhop of Ely upon this occaſion. Ye heard before how the King, at his ſetting out, left order that Earl John and Geofrey his Brethren ſhould not enter into the Realm the ſpace of three years after his departure (howbeit his Brother John was ſhortly after releaſed of that bond) and alſo after that, how King Richard, being at Meſſana, ſent his Mother Elenor to the Pope for his Brother Geofrey (elected before to the Sea of York) to be conſecrated Archbiſhop. Whereupon the ſaid Geofrey being Conſecrated through licenſe of Pope Celeſtine by the Archbiſhop of Turon; the ſaid Geofrey, eſtſoons after his Conſecration, deferred no time, but would needs come into England. Whereof the Biſhop of Ely having intelligence, ſent him word being at Wiſſand in Flanders, not to preſume to adventure into the Realm, contrary to his oath made to King Richard before; commanding moreover, that if he came, he ſhould be apprehended. All which notwithſtanding, the Archbiſhop letted not for all that, but needs would repair to his See, and ſo arrived at Dover in the month of September, where the Chancellors Men ſtood on the Sea ſide to apprehend him; but he by changing his Apparel, and ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, eſcaped their hands, and came to the Monks Houſe of Dover: But the Chancellors Men, whom he ſent to take him, beſet the Church of the Monks round about, ſo that in no wiſe he cold avoid their hands.

Another breach between the Chancellor and Geofrey Archbiſhop of York the Kings Brother.

To make the ſtory ſtort: as the Archbiſhop on a day, when he had ſaid Maſs, was ſtanding at the Altar, with his Garments yet about him, the rude Souldiers having little good manners, and leſs devotion, ſpared not boldly to ruſh into the Church, and there laid hands upon the Archbiſhop as he ſtood; took him, bound him, and dragged him through dirt and mire, and (as we uſe to ſay) through thick and thin, and ſo committed him to Matthew Clark their Conſtable to be kept: whereat the people greatly diſdained, ſeeing him that was a Kings Son, and the Brother of a King, ſo to be intreated: The hearing whereof, when it came to the ears of Earl John his Brother, he being not a little offended therewith, ſent to know of the Chancellor, whether this was his doing or not. To whom when the Chancellor ſent anſwer again, and ſtoutly confeſſed the fact to be his; then the Earl ſent commandment that his Brother ſhould be delivered, and ſo he was. Who, then coming to London, made his complaint to the Earl his Brother, and to other Nobles of the Realm of the injuries done to him by the Chancellor. Whereupon the Earl ſent for the foreſaid Chancellor, and appointed a day peremptory for him to appear before the whole body of the Council, to make anſwer to ſuch injuries as he had done, both to the Archbiſhop of York, and alſo to the Biſhop of Durham above mentioned. But the Chancellor, driving off the time with delays, would neither come nor ſend. Then the Earl, with the Biſhops about him, made their journey towards London, to have the matter there handled in a great audience.

Geofrey Archbiſhop of York delivered out of priſon by commandment of Earl John his Brother.

The Chancellor ſeeing that, withdrew himſelf from Windſor to the City of London; where by the way it happned that the ſervants of the Earl and of the Chancellor meeting, did ſkirmiſh together. In which fray one of the Earls Family was ſlain, but yet his Men had the better; and the Chancellor with his Men were put to flight, and ſo fled to the Tower, where they did hide themſelves. The next day after (which was about the twelfth day of October) Earl John the Kings Brother, and the Archbiſhop of Rone, with all the Biſhops, Earls and Barons, and Citizens of London Aſſembled together in Pauls Church; where many and great accuſations were laid againſt the ſaid Chancellor; ſo that in fine it was agreed in that Aſſembly, That the ſaid Chancellor ſhould be depoſed; and in his place was ſubſtituted the Archbiſhop of Rone, according to the tenor of the Kings Letters ſent from Meſſana; which was, That certain other perſons ſhould be aſſociated with the Chancellor for the Government of the Realm; by woſe Counſel if he would not be directed, the Archbiſhop of Rone ſhould be ſet in his place, and he to be depoſed. The third day after this, the Chancellor firmly promiſed not to depart out of the Realm before he had delivered out of his hands all ſuch Caſtles, the keeping whereof he committed to certain Foreigners and ſtrangers: and for aſſurance thereof he gave his two Brethren and Chamberlain for Pledges, and ſo went to Canterbury; where he ſaid he would take the Croſs of a Pilgrim, and leave the Croſs of his Legateſhip.

The Biſhop of Ely reſigneth his Caſtles.

Now when he was come to the Caſtle of Dover, and there had remained a few days, contrary to his promiſe made, his purpoſe was to take Ship, and to paſs over the Seas. And becauſe he durſt not do it openly, he deviſed a new kind of diſguiſing, decking himſelf in the apparel of a Woman; and ſo, as gowty as he was, he went to the Sea ſide in his Womans weed, having in his hand a Meet-yard, and on his arm a piece of linnen cloth. And thus as he was ſitting upon a rock, waiting for his Ship to come and convey him over, a certain Fiſher-man eſpying him, and ſuppoſing him to be an Harlot, came to him, and ſo, with ſtrugling with him, found him as he was indeed to be a Man, in likeneſs of a Woman: whereat he wondered and began to make an out-cry upon him. But the Biſhops ſervants being not far off, came running and ſtilled him as well as they could.

The Fiſher-man then going to the next Village, and there belike declaring what he had ſeen, to try out the matter further, came out certain Women, who ſeeing the linnen cloth hanging on his arm, began to queſtion with him of the price of his cloth, and what he would take for it: but to this he would anſwer never a word, but ſmiled upon them. Whereat they muſing with themſelves, and whiſpering one with another, at laſt with their hands were ſo bold as to pluck down his muffler, and there by his beard new ſhaven found him indeed to be a Man; and ſo with a loud exclamation raiſed the Village upon him; and would have fallen upon him with ſtones. Then came running a great multitude both of Men and Women; who, wondering at him, as Birds are wont at an Owl, laid hands upon him, and pluckt him down to the ground, haling and drawing him by the ſleeves and collar of his Gown through ſtones and rocks, whereby he was ſhrewdly hurt. His Servants once or twice made out to reſcue their old Maſter, or new Miſtris, but could not for the preſs of the people; who, beating him with their fiſts, and ſpitting at him, drew him thorow the whole Town, and ſo with ſhame enough at length laid him in a dark Cellar inſtead of a priſon, at whom all the Country about wondred and cryed out. In concluſion, Earl John, hearing thereof, within eight days after ſent word, that they ſhould deliver him and let him go.

Set at liberty by John Earl of Morton.

The Biſhop, then ſet at liberty, ſailed over as he could to Flanders, where he had but cold welcoming: from thence he went to Paris, where he gave Mauricius their Biſhop threeſcore Marks of ſilver to be received in with Proceſſion, and ſo he was. Then returned he into Normandy. But the Archbiſhop of Rone there gave commandment that the Church doors ſhould be locked, and no Service ſaid ſo long as he there remained. The Biſhop ſeeing that, directed his Letters and Meſſengers to Pope Celeſtine, and alſo to King Richard into Syria, ſignifying to them how John the Earl of Morton and his complices had handled him, and expulſed him out of the Realm: requiring that he might be reſtored again to that was taken from him, and alſo offering himſelf to be tryed by the Law for that he had done; ſo that if the King ſhould diſlike in any thing that he had done, he was ready to ſatisfie the Kings contentation in all things wherein juſtly he could be charged.

Upon this, Pope Celeſtine, inflamed with an Apoſtolical zeal in the behalf of the ſaid Biſhop of Ely his Legate, wrote a ſharp and thundering Letter to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Prelates of England; commanding them by his Authority Apoſtolical, That forſomuch as the injuries, done to his Legate, did redound to the contumely of the whole mother Church of Rome, they ſhould not fail therefore, but with ſevere Cenſures of the Church, that is, with Book, Bell, and Candle, proceed as well againſt the ſaid John Earl of Morton, as alſo all other whoſoever had, or

The Biſhop of Ely the Popes Legate, bearing himſelf bold upon the favour and Letters of the Pope which took his part, writeth to Henry Biſhop of Lincoln, charging and requiring, That he in vertue of obedience ſhould execute the Popes Sentence and Mandat in Excommunicating all ſuch as were offendors in that behalf, and there exciteth the names of divers againſt whom he ſhould proceed, as the Archbiſhop of Rone, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, W. Mareſchal, Geoffery Peterſon, Breuer, and Bardolf, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Mellent, Gilbert Baſſet, the Archdeacon of Oxford, and eſpecially Hugh Biſhop of Coventry, alſo M. Benet and Stephen Ridle Chancellor to Earl John the Kings Brother; to the which Earl he reſerved a further day of reſpite before he ſhould be Excommunicate, with a number of other more beſide theſe. Howbeit the ſaid Biſhop of Ely could find none to excecute this commandment of the Pope. Then they with a general conſent wrote again to King Richard, complaining of the intolerable abuſes of the ſaid Biſhop his Chancellor. In like ſort the ſaid Chancellor alſo, complaining of them, wrote his Letters to the King, ſignifying how Earl John his Brother went about to uſurp his Kingdom, and would alſo ſhortly ſet the Crown upon his own head, unleſs he made the more ſpeed homeward. The King then was buſie in repulſing the Saladine, and prepared to lay Siege againſt Jeruſalem, and got Sclavonia, with divers other Towns from the Saracens, which was in the year 1192. having divers conflicts in the mean ſpace with the Saladine, and ever put him to the worſe. As the King was thus preparing to lay his Siege againſt Hieruſalem; the Saladine, glad to fall to ſome compoſition with the King, ſent unto him, that if he would reſtore to him again Sclavonia in as good ſtate as it was when he took it, he would grant to him and to all Chriſtians in the Land of Hieruſalem truce for three years, and offered himſelf thereunto to be ſworn. The King, ſeeing the Duke of Burgundy and the French-men to ſhrink from him, and his own Men to decay, and alſo his money and health to diminiſh; but eſpecially for that he underſtood by the Biſhop of Ely his Chancellor, that the French King intended to ſet up John his Brother to poſſeſs his Kingdom, being counſelled thereto by the Templars, took the truce offered of the Saracens, and ſo began to draw homeward.

Strife between the Biſhop of Ely and the Archbiſhop of Rone. Pope Celeſtine ſtandeth in excuſe of the Biſhop of Ely.

In this mean while much grudge and ſtrife increaſed more and more between the Biſhop of Ely and the Archbiſhop of Rone above ſpecified; inſomuch that the Archbiſhop being Excommunicate, ſent up his Clerks to Pope Celeſtine to complain of the Biſhop: but the Pope ever ſtood in his Purgation. At laſt he ſent two of his Cardinals, to wit, Ottomannus Biſhop of Hoſtia, and Jordanus De foſſa nova, to break the ſtrife between the Biſhop of Ely, and the Archbiſhop of Rone.

The Biſhop of Ely with the Kings Letters cometh again into England.

After this King Richard being taken, and in the cuſtody of Henry the Emperor; the Biſhop of Ely, reſorting to him, was ſent by him into England to Elenor his Mother, and other Nobles. Who then returning into England again, not as Chancellor, nor as Legate (as he ſaid) but as a ſimple plain Biſhop, ſo by that means was received. Ex Matth. Pariſ. Et ex aliis incertis nominis manuſcriptis codicibus.

But of this vain-glorious Prelate enough and too much. Now to return again to Richard; concerning whoſe worthy acts done abroad in getting of Cyprus, Arhon, and and Ptolemaida, in pacifying Joppe, &c. partly is ſpoken of before. Many other valiant and famous acts were by him and the French King atchieved, and more ſhould have been, had not thoſe two Kings falling into diſcord diſſevered themſelves: by reaſon whereof Philip the French King returned home again within ſhort ſpace. Who, being returned again, eſtſoons invaded the Country of Normandy, exciting alſo John the Brother of King Richard, to take on him the Kingdom of England in his Brothers abſence. Who then made League (upon the ſame) with the French King, and did homage unto him, which was about the fourth yea rof King Richard. Who then being in Syria, and hearing thereof, made peace with the Turks for three years. And not long after King Richard, the next Spring following, returned alſo. Who, in his return, driven by diſtreſs of weather about the parts of Hiſtria, in a Town called Synaca, was there taken by Limpold Duke of the ſame Country, and ſo ſold to the Emperor for 60000 Marks; who, for no ſmall joy thereof, writeth to Philip the French King theſe Letters following.

King Richard, thus being traiterouſly taken and ſold to the Emperor by the Duke of Auſtrige for 60000 Marks, was there kept in cuſtody a year and three months. In ſome ſtories it is affirmed, That King Richard, returning out of Aſia, came to Italy with proſperous wind; where he deſired of the Pope to be abſolved from an Oath made againſt his will, and could not obtain it. And ſo ſetting out from thence towards England, paſſing by the Country of Conradus the Marqueſs, whoſe death (he being ſlain a little before) was falſly imputed by the French King to the King of England, was there traiterouſly taken, as is before ſaid by Limpoldus Duke of Auſtrige. Albeit in another ſtory I find the matter more credibly ſet forth, which ſaith thus; That King Richard ſlew the Brother of this Limpoldus, playing with him at Cheſs in the French Kings Court. And Limpoldus, taking his advantage, was the more cruel againſt him, and delivered him, as is ſaid, to the Emperor; in whoſe cuſtody he was detained during the time above mentioned, a year and three months. During the which time the Kings indurance, the French King in the mean ſeaſon ſtirred War in Normandy. And Earl John the Kings Brother made ſtir and invaded England, but the Barons and Biſhops of the Land mightily withſtood him, and beſieged him in the Caſtle of Windſor, where they took from him all the Caſtles and Munitions which before he had got. Thus the Earl ſeeing no hope to prevail in England, and ſuſpecting the deliverance of the King his Brother, made into France, and kept with the French King: at length it was ſo agreed and concluded with the Emperor, That King Richard ſhould be releaſed for an hundred thouſand pounds; of the which money, part ſhould remain to the Duke of Auſtrige, the reſt ſhould be the Emperors. The ſum of which money was here gathered and made in England of Chalices, Croſſes, Shrines, Candleſticks, and other Church Plate, alſo with publick contribution of Frieries, Abbies and other Subjects of the Realm. Whereof part was preſently paid, and for the reſidue remaining hoſtages and pledges were taken, which was about about the fifth year of his Reign. And then it was obtained of the Pope, that Prieſts might celebrate with Chalices of Latin and Tin, and ſo it was granted and continued long after, which, mine Author in his Chronicle intituled Eulogium, doth teſtifie himſelf to have ſeen. At what time this foreſaid money was paid, and the Hoſtages given for the ranſom of this King. I have an old ſtory that ſaith how the foreſaid Duke of Auſtrige ſhortly after was plagued by God with five ſundry plagues: Firſt, with burning of his cheif Towns; Secondly, with the drowning of ten thouſand of his Men in a great flood, hapning no Man could tell how; Thirdly, by turning all the ears of his Cornfield into Worms; Fourthly, by taking away almoſt all the Nobles of his Land by death; Fifthly, by breaking his own Leg falling from his Horſe, which Leg he was compelled to cut off with his own hands, and after died upon the ſame: who then is ſaid at his death to forgive King Richard fifty thouſand marks, and ſent home the Hoſtages that were with him. Ex variis Chron. The Book intituled Eulogium, before mentioned, declareth thus, That the ſaid Limpoldus Duke of Auſtrige fell in diſpleaſure with the Biſhop of Rome, and died Excommunicate the next year after, being the year one thouſand one hundred ninety ſix.

The moſt puniſhment of God upon the Duke of Auſtrige.

{Anno 1196.}

Thus the ſaid King, Richard being ranſomed, as hath been declared, from the covetous Captivity of the Emperor, was reſtored again, and made his repair into England. At whoſe return Earl John his Brother, reſorting unto him with humble ſubmiſſion, deſired to be pardoned of his tranſgreſſions. To whom King Richard anſwered again, Would God (ſaith he) this your treſpaſs, as it dieth with me in oblivion, ſo it may remain with you in remembrance, and ſo gently forgave him. And after he had again recovered his Holds and Caſtles, he cauſed himſelf to be Crowned again. Which done, he made his power againſt the French King, and drave him out of Normandy. After that, he turned his voyage againſt the Welch-men, and ſubdued them.

The anſwer of King Richard to his Brother.

{Anno 1197}

The next year following, which was the year 1197. Philip the French King brake the Truce made between him and King Richard; whereupon the King was compelled to ſail over again to Normandy to withſtand the malice of his Enemy. About which time, my ſtory recordeth of one called of ſome Fulco; ſome ſay he was the Archbiſhop of Rone, called Gualter. This Fulco being then in England, and coming to the Kings preſence, ſaid unto him with great courage and boldneſs; Thou haſt, O mighty King, three Daughters very vicious and of evil diſpoſition; take good heed of them, and betimes provide for them good Husbands; leſt, by untimely beſtowing of the ſame, thou ſhalt not only incur great hurt and damage, but alſo utter ruin and deſtruction to thy ſelf. To whom the King in a rage ſaid, Thou lying and mocking Hypocrite, thou knoweſt not where thou art, or what thou ſayeſt: I think thou art mad, or not well in thy wits; for I have never a Daughter, as all the world knoweth, and therefore thou open lyer get thee out of our preſence. To whom Fulco anſwered, No, and like your Grace, I lye not, but ſay truth: for you have three Daughters which continually frequent your Court, and wholly poſſeſs your perſon, and ſuch three Whores and naughty Packs as never the like hath been heard of: I mean, miſchievous Pride, greedy Covetouſneſs, and filthy Luxury; and therefore again I ſay, O King, beware of them, and out of hand provide Marriages for them, leſt in not ſo doing, thou utterly undo both thy ſelf and all the whole Realm.

Three Daughters of the King noted.

The which his words the King took in good part, with correction of himſelf, and confeſſion of the ſame. Whereupon incontinently he called his Lords and Barons before him, unto whom he declared the communing and motion of Fulco, who had willed him to beware of his three Daughters, Pride, Avarice, and Luxury, with counſel out of hand to marry them, leſt further diſcommodity ſhould enſue both to him and to the whole Realm; whoſe good counſel (my Lords) I intend to follow, not doubting of all your conſents thereunto. Wherefore here before you all, I give my Daughter ſwelling Pride to wife unto the proud Templars; my greedy Daughter Avarice to the covetous order of the Ciſtercian Monks; and laſt of all, my filthy Daughter Luxury to the riotous Prelates of the Church, whom I think to be very meet Men for her; and ſo ſeverally well agreeing to all their natures, that the like matches in this our Realm are not to be found for them. And thus much concerning Fulco.

Not long after this, it befel that a certain Noble perſonage (Lord of Lemonice in little Britain, Widomarus by name) found a great ſubſtance of Treaſure both of gold and ſilver hid in the ground, whereof a great part he ſent to King Richard, as chief Lord and Prince over the whole Country. Which the King refuſed; ſaying, He would have all or none, for that he was the principal Chieftain over the Land. But the finder would not condeſcend to that. Wherefore the King laid Siege to a Caſtle of his, called Galuz, thinking the Treaſure to lie there. But the Keepers and Warders of the Caſtle, ſeeing themſelves not ſufficient to withſtand the King, offered to him the Caſtle, deſiring to depart with life and armor. To this the King would in no wiſe grant, but bid them to re-enter the Caſtle again, and to defend it in all the forcible wiſe they could. It ſo befel, that as the King with the Duke of Brabant went about the Caſtle, viewing the places thereof; a Souldier within, named Bertandus Cordoun, ſtruck the King with an Arrow in the arm, whereupon the Iron remaining and feſtring in the wound, the King within nine days after dyed; who, becauſe he was not content with the half of the treaſure that another Man found, loſt all his own treaſure that he had. The King, being thus wounded, cauſed the Man that ſtrook him to be brought unto him, and asked the cauſe of him why he ſo wounded him? Who anſwered him again (as the ſtory ſaith) That he thought to kill rather than to be killed: and what puniſhment ſoever he ſhould ſuſtain, he was content, ſo that he might kill him which had before killed his Father and Brethren. The King, hearing his words, freely forgave him, and cauſed an hundred ſhillings to be given him. Albeit (as the ſtory addeth) after the death of the King, the Duke of Brabant, after great torments, cauſed him to be hanged. Ex hiſtoria Regis Richardi ſecundi, cui initium, De patre iſtius Bruti, &c. The ſtory of Gisburn ſaith, That the killer of King Richard coming to the French King, thinking to have a great reward, was commanded to be drawn aſunder with Horſes, and his quarters to be hanged up.

Another ſtory affirmeth, and Gisburn partly doth teſtifie the ſame, That a little before the death of King Richard, three Abbots of the Order Ciſtertian came to him, to whom he was confeſſed: And when he ſaw them ſomewhat ſtay at his abſolution, he had theſe words: That he did willingly commit his body to be eaten of worms, and his ſoul to the fire of Purgatory, there to be tormented till the judgment, in the hope of God his mercy. Ex Jornalenſ. Gisburn. & aliis.

Ex Jornal. Gisburnenſi & aliis.

About the Reign of this King, the ſaid Jornalenſis maketh mention of Roger Archbiſhop of York, which put out of his Church the Monks, and placed for them ſecular Prieſts; ſaying, That he would rather wiſh Eccleſiaſtical Benefices to be given to wanton Prieſts, than to abominable Monks; and that Thurſtinus did ſin never worſe in all his life, than in building that Houſe for Monks, &c. Another ſtory I have, which ſaith, That this was the Biſhop not of York, but of Coventry.

Monks put out, and ſecular Prieſts received.

The King not long after departed without iſſue, and John his Brother Reigned after him: in whom although ſome vices may worthily be reprehended, eſpecially for his incontinent and too much licentious life, yet was he far from that deſerving, for the which he hath been ſo ill reported of divers writers: who, being led more with affection of Popery, than with true judgment and due conſideration, depraved his doings more than the ſincere truth of the Hiſtory will bear them. Concerning which Hiſtory, after ſo many writers, we thought alſo to beſtow a little labor, although in this matter we cannot be ſo long as I would, and as the matter requireth.

King JOHN.

King John.

AFter the death of King Richard, called Coeur de Lion, Reigned his Brother John Earl of Morton. Afterward the Archbiſhop put the Crown on his head, and ſware him to defend the Church and to maintain the ſame in her good Laws, and to deſtroy the ill. And except he thought in his mind to do this, the Archbiſhop charged him not to preſume to take on him this dignity. And on S. John Baptiſts Day next following, King John ſailed into Normandy and came to Rone, where he was royally received, and Truce concluded between him and the French King for a time. And thither came to him the Earl of Flanders, and all other Lords of France that were of King Richard's band and friendſhip, and were Sworn unto him.

Arthur of Britain.

Not long after this, Philip the French King made Arthur Knight, and took his Homage for Normandy, Britain, and all other his poſſeſſions beyond the Sea, and promiſed him help againſt King John. After this, King John and the French King talked together with their Lords about one hours ſpace; and the French King asked ſo much Land for himſelf and Knight Arthur, that King John would grant him none, and ſo he departed in wrath.

A communication between the King of England and the French King.

The ſame Year a Legate came into France, and commanded the King, in pain of interdiction, to deliver one Peter out of Priſon, that was elect to a Biſhoprick; and thereupon he was delivered.

And after that the Legate came into England, and commanded King John, under pain of interdiction, to deliver the Archbiſhop whom he had kept as Priſoner two Years; which the King denied to do, till he had paid him ſix thouſand Marks; becauſe he took him in harneſs in a Field againſt him, and Sware him upon his deliverance, That he ſhould never wear Harneſs againſt any Chriſtian man.

This time Divorce was made between King John and his Wife, Daughter of the Earl of Gloceſter, becauſe they were in the third degree of kindred. And after, by the counſel of the French King, King John wedded Iſabel, Daughter of the Earl of Anguilla: and then Arthur of Britain did homage to King John for Britain and others.

Mariage in the third degree forbidden by the Pope.

{Anno 1200}

At this time fell ſtrife between King John and Geffery the Archbiſhop of York, for divers cauſes: firſt, becauſe he would not ſuffer and permit the Sheriff of York, in ſuch affairs as he had to do for the King within his Dioceſs. Secondly, becauſe he did alſo excommunicate the ſaid Sheriff. Thirdly, becauſe he would not ſail with him into Normandy, to make the Marriage between Lewis the French Kings Son, and his Neece, &c.

{Anno 1202}

After this, in the Year of our Lord 1202, Philip the French King (in a communication between King John and him) required that the ſaid King John ſhould part with all his Lands in Normandy and Pictavia which he had beyond the Sea, unto Arthur his Nephew, and that incontinent, or elſe he would War againſt him; and ſo he did. For when King John denied that requeſt, the next day following, the French King, with the ſaid Arthur, ſet upon certain of his Towns and Caſtles in Normandy, and put him to much diſquietneſs. But he (the Lord ſo providing, which is the giver of all victory) had ſuch repulſe at the Engliſh mens hands, that they, purſuing the Frenchmen in their flight, did ſo follow them in their hold, and ſo inforced upon them, that not only they took the ſaid Arthur Priſoner, with many other of the French men, but alſo gave ſuch an overthrow to the reſt, that none was there left to bear tidings home. This Arthur was Nephew to King John, and Son to Geffrey which was the elder Son to John. For King Henry the ſecond (to make the matter more evident) had eight Children: one William, which died in his childhood; the ſecond, Henry, which died alſo, his Father being yet alive; the third, Geffrey, Earl of Britain, which likewiſe deceaſed in his Fathers days, leaving behind him two Children, Arthur and Brecca; the fourth, Richard Coeur de lion, King; the fifth, John, now reigning; and three other Daughters beſides. The ſame Arthur, being thus taken in War, was brought before the King, at the Caſtle of Faleſie in Normandy; who, being exhorted with many gentle words to leave the French King, and to incline to his Uncle, anſwered again ſtoutly, and with great indignation; requiring the Kingdom of England, with all the other Dominions thereto belonging, to be reſtored to him, as to the Lawful Heir of the Crown. By reaſon whereof, he (provoking the Kings diſpleaſure againſt him) was ſent to the Tower of Rome, where at length (whether by leaping into the Ditch, thinking to make his eſcape, or whether by ſome other privy hand, or by what chance elſe it is not yet agreed upon in ſtories) he finiſhed his life. By occaſion whereof, the foreſaid King John was had after in great ſuſpition; whether juſtly or unjuſtly, the Lord knoweth.

Nat. Parens in vita Joannis Regis.

Arthur.

The Year following, Hiſtoriographers write, That King John, for lack of reſcue, loſt all his Holds and Poſſeſſions in Normandy, through the force of the French King.

{Anno 1203} Normandy loſt and gotten by the French men.

After theſe loſſes, came other troubles upon him, with other as great or more great enemies (that is, with the Pope and his popelings) by occaſion of chuſing of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; as in this Hiſtory following, by Chriſt his Grace is to be declared.

The Year of our Lord 1205, about the Month of July, Hubert the Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed; whoſe deceaſe after it was in Canterbury to the Monks known, and afore his Body was yet committed to the Earth; the younger ſort of the Monks there, gathered themſelves together at midnight, and elected their ſuperior Reginald, and without the Kings licenſe, or yet knowledge, privily placed him in the Metropoliticel Seat, ſinging Te Deum at midnight. And becauſe the King ſhould not make their election void, they charged him by vertue of his Oath to keep all ſecret by the way, and to ſhew nothing what was done before he came to the Pope: but he contrary to his Oath, ſo ſoon as he came into Flanders, opened abroad all the matter, and uttered their counſel: whereupon the Monks, being not a little grieved with him, ſent him privily unto the Court of Rome out of hand. The next day the elder Monks ſent to the King, deſiring him of his gracious licenſe Canonically to chuſe their Archbiſhop. The King moſt gently and favourably granted their Petition; requiring them inſtantly, and deſiring that for his ſake they would ſhew favour to John Gray, then Biſhop of Norwich, as they did indeed, erecting him into the See of their high Primacie. Moreover, becauſe the Authority of Kings and Princes was then but ſmall in their own Dominion, without the Popes conſent and confirmation to the ſame: he ſent alſo to Rome of his own charges to have the foreſaid election ratified by the Pope. The Suffragans of Canterbury then (being not a little offended at theſe two Elections) ſent ſpeedily to Rome to have them both ſtopped; for that they had not been of counſel with them. And hereupon at the laſt grew a moſt prodigious tumult.

¶ In this Year the Clergy grew ſo unruly, that they neglected their Charge, and thereby incenſed the Kings diſpleaſure ſo ſore againſt them, that he took order about the goods of ſuch as in that caſe were faulty: as ſhall appear more manifeſtly by that which followeth.

A Letter of King John, touching the Lands and Goods of ſuch Clerks as refuſe to celebrate Divine Service.

Rex omnibus de Epiſcopatu Lincolniæ clericis & laicis, ſalutem. Sciatis quod a die lunæ proxime ante Floridam paſchatis commiſimus, &c.

Turris Lond. Some think that Floridum paſchatis is Palm-Sunday: but Eaſter, is rather thought to be meant thereby, ſith the Spaniards, at this day, call the ſame Florida.

In Engliſh:

The King to all Clerks and Lay people within the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, Greeting: Know ye that from Monday next before the Feaſt of Eaſter, we have committed to William of Cornhill, Archdeacon of Huntington, and to Joſeline of Canvil, all the Lands and Goods of the Abbats and Priors, and of all the Religious Perſons; and alſo of all Clerks within the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, which will not from that time celebrate Divine Service. And we command you, that from thence you aſſiſt them as our Bailiffs; and believe them in thoſe things which they ſhall tell you privately on our behalf. Witneſs our ſelf at Clarendon the Eighteenth day of March, in the Ninth Year of our Reign.

{Anno 1206} Prelates of the Church had then Money enough belike, that they could keep play at Rome againſt their Prince, which thing cauſed the Princes after to ſeek ſuch means to cut them ſhort.

The like was written to all within the Biſhoprick of Ely. So that hereby we ſee the diſſolutneſs and wilfulneſs of thoſe Popiſh Church-men, whom conſcience of diſcharging their duty did ſo little move, as that they thought upon nothing leſs, ſith the King was driven to uſe ſuch auſterity and ſharpneſs againſt them. But to proceed in this troubleſome Election you ſhall underſtand, that the next Year after, the Suffragans of the Province of Canterbury on the one ſide, and the Monks of Canterbury on the other ſide, came afore the Pope with their brawling matter. Firſt the Monks, preſenting Reginald their ſuperior, deſired deſired that their Election might be confirmed. The Suffragans likewiſe complained that the Monks would preſume to chuſe the Archbiſhop without their conſent, and therefore deſired by divers reaſons the firſt Election to be of none effect. The Pope, deciding the matter between both, pronounced with the Monks, charging the Suffragans and Biſhops to meddle no more with that Election, but to let the Monks alone. The Monks of Canterbury, now having the whole Election in their own hands, fell alſo at ſquare among themſelves, the younger ſort with the elder. The younger ſort, which had choſen Reginald their ſuperior, would that Election to ſtand. The elder ſort of the Monks replied again, ſaying, That the firſt Election was done by ſtealth, and by night, and by the younger part; alſo without the counſel of other Monks. Over and beſides, it was done without the Kings licenſe, and appointment, and without the due ſolemnity thereunto belonging.

Anno 1207. Diſſention amongſt the Monks of Canterbury about the Election of the Arch-biſhop.

And as concerning our Election (ſaid they) it was done in the clear light of the day, by which it had authority in preſence of our Liege Lord the King; and his Council being willing to the ſame.

This Allegation thus proponed, the Suffragans Proctor or man of Law ſtood forth, and proved the former Election to be good; and this later to be void and of no value, after this ſort. Whether the firſt Election (ſaith he) were juſt or unjuſt, ye ought firſt by the Law to have condemned it afore ye ſhould have preſumed to the ſecond; but thus ye did not: therefore is this your later doing no Election at all, and the firſt therefore is rather to be ratified than yours. When they had thus multiplied talk on both ſides, with many frivolous allegations a long time, and could not agree upon one perſon; Pope Innocent condemned both their Elections, commanding them to chuſe Stephen Langton, then Cardinal of St. Chryſogon, for their Archbiſhop. The Monks then anſwered, That they durſt not ſo do without conſent of their King, and for that it was prejudicial to their ancient Liberties. The Pope by and by (ſaith the text) as one in a fury, taking the words out of their mouths, ſaid thus unto them: We will you to know, That we have full power and authority over the Church of Canterbury; neither are we wont to tarry the conſent of Princes, therefore we command you, in pain of our great curſe, that ye chuſe him only whom we have appointed.

The pride and tyranny of the Pope

The Monks at theſe words abaſhed and terrified, though they much murmured in their hearts, yet conſented they all in one, and thereupon ſang Te Deum. Only Doctor Helias Brantfield withdrew himſelf from that Election; whom the King had ſent for the admiſſion of the Biſhop of Norwich.

Thus was Stephen Langton (in the high Church of Viterby, by the Popes hand) made Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Stephen Langton made Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

¶ This Election thus paſt with the Popes grace and favour, the ſaid Stephen had in England, among others that ſolicited his cauſe to the King, a brother named Maſter Simon Langton, who in tract of time alſo became Archbiſhop of York, as appeareth in the courſe of this Story, in the Reign of Henry the third, An. 1228. In this behalf the King ſeemed tractable; ſo he might have his Sovereignty entire. Againſt the which, becauſe the ſaid Stephen had vowed to oppoſe himſelf, and the King miſliked ſuch demeanor; he ſent abroad his Letters certificatory about the Realm: therein giving intimation to all people of proud Stephen Langton's countenance. The form of the ſaid Letters followeth:

Letters certificatory of King John, touching the contumacy of Stephen Langton, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the Popes Election.

Wint. Lond.

Rex omnibus hominibus, &c. Sciatis quod magiſter Simon de Langton venit ad nos apud Winton die Mercurii proxime ante mediam quadrageſimæ, &c.

In Engliſh.

The King to all men, &c. Know ye that Maſter Simon Langton came to us at Wincheſter, on the Wedneſday next before Mid-lent, and in preſence of our Biſhops beſought us that we would receive his Brother, Maſter Stephen Langton, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And when we ſpake unto him touching the reſervation and ſaving of our Dignity unto us, he told us that he would do no ſuch thing for us, unleſs we would wholly rely our ſelves upon his courteſie and gentleneſs. This therefore we command, that you know evil and wrong to be done unto us in this behalf: and we charge you, that you believe thoſe things which Reginald of Cornhil ſhall tell you on our part touching the aforeſaid Deed between us and the Biſhops abovenamed, &c. Witneſs the King at Wincheſter, the fourteenth day of March, in the ninth year of his reign.

Now, albeit the King took indignation at this proceeding in the Election of Stephen, yet from thenceforth (ſaith Matthew Paris) the Pope could do no leſs but mightily defend him from all vexation and danger; conſidering that he was his own dear Darling, and a Child of his own creation.

Furthermore, upon this occaſion King John conceived an exceeding diſpleaſure againſt the Clergy and Monks of Canterbury (as he had good cauſe) they doing ſo many evils againſt his Princely Prerogative. Without his Licenſe they Elected their Archbiſhop, and put by the Biſhop of Norwich, whom he had appointed. They waſted a great part of his Treaſure for the Wars; and, to bring all to the Divel, they made Stephen Langton their high Metropolitan, whom he took for a grievous Enemy to the whole Realm; being always ſo familiar with the French King. Wherefore in his anger he baniſhed them out of the Land, to the number of threeſcore and four, for this their contumacy, and contempt of his Regal Power.

The Monks of Canterbury thus being expulſed, the King forthwith ſendeth Meſſengers to the Pope with his Letters, wherein he doth ſharply and expreſly expoſtulate with the Pope. Firſt, for that ſo uncourteouſly he repulſed the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, and ſet up one Stephen Langton, a man unknown to him, and brought up amongſt his Enemies a long time in the Kingdom of France, Conſecrating him Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and letting the other go. Alſo (which is more) for that it redoundeth to the Subverſion and Derogation of the Liberties appertaining to his Crown: for notwithſtanding his conſent paſt (being before of the Monks, not made privy, which ſhould have ſo done) yet he raſhly preſumed to promote and prefer another. Wherefore he cannot marvel (he ſaith) enough, that neither the ſaid Pope, nor the Court of Rome, doth conſider and revolve with themſelves, how neceſſary his love and favour hath been always hitherto to the See of Rome; and that they conſider not what great profit and revenews have proceeded hitherto to them out of the Realm of England; the like whereof hath not been received out of any other Country beſides on this ſide the Alpes. He addeth moreover, and ſaith, that for his Liberties he will ſtand (if need be) unto Death, neither can he be ſo removed and ſhaken off from the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, which he ſeeth to be ſo commodious to him and profitable. Finally, he thus concludeth, ſaying, That in caſe in this his requeſt he be not heard, he will ſo provide by the Seas that there ſhall be no ſuch gadding and courſing any more over to Rome, ſuffering the Riches of the Land no more to be tranſported over, whereby he ſhould be himſelf the leſs able to reſiſt his Enemies. And ſeeing he hath of his own at home, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates of the Church (both of Engliſhmen and of others) ſufficiently provided and inſtructed in all kind of knowledge: therefore he ſhall not need greatly to ſeek for judgment and juſtice further abroad.

The King doth expoſtulate with the Pope for Conſecrating Stephen Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

When theſe came to the Popes intelligence, he directeth Letters again to the King in this form:

The Popes Letters anſwering King John.

INnocentius, Pope, ſervant of the ſervants of God, to our well-beloved Son in Chriſt, the King of England, health, and Apoſtolical bleſſing. Whereas we have written to you heretofore, exhorting and intreating you after an humble, diligent, and gentle ſort (concerning the Church of Canterbury) you have written to us again after a threatning ſort and upbraiding manner; both ſpitefully and alſo frowardly. And whereas we more, and above that our right and duty required, have born and given to you: you again for your part have given to us not ſo much as by right and duty you are bound to do. And though your Devotion, as you ſay, hath been to us very neceſſary,

It is pity but this Pope ſhould be honoured of Kings and Princes.

yet conſider again that ours alſo is not a little opportune and expedient for you. And whereas we in ſuch like caſes have not ſhewed at any time the like honour to any Prince as we have unto you; you again have ſo much derogated our honour, as no Prince elſe hath preſumed to do beſides you alone; pretending certain frivolous cauſes and occaſions, I cannot tell what, why you would not condeſcend to the Election of Stephen Langton, Cardinal of St. Chryſogono, choſen by the Monks of Canterbury; for that the ſaid Stephen (as you ſay) hath been converſant and brought up amongſt your Enemies, and his perſon is to you unknown. But you know what is the Proverb of Solomon: The Net is caſt, but in vain in the ſight of the flying Birds, &c.

A craftful caſe that a King cannot conſtitute an Archbiſhop within his own Realm, whom he moſt liketh.

With much other matter in the ſame Epiſtle, wherein he falleth into the commendation of Stephen Langton his Cardinal, declaring how learned he was in the Liberal Arts, and in Divinity, in ſo much that he was Prebendated at Paris; alſo come of an honeſt ſtock, and an Engliſh man born, and not unknown to the King, ſeeing the King had written his Letters thrice to him before. Declaring moreover in the ſaid Letter, how the Meſſengers of the King had ſpecified to him another cauſe; which was, for that the Monks of Canterbury, which had to do in the Election, came not to him before for his conſent. Declaring moreover in the ſaid Letter, how the ſaid Meſſengers of the King intreated in the Kings behalf, that foraſmuch as the Popes Letters (wherein the King was commanded to ſend his Procters to Rome for the ſame matter) came not to the Kings hand, neither did the Monks direct any ſuch Letters or Meſſage to the King to have his conſent; therefore the Pope, conſidering the ſame, would grant ſo much for the regard of the Kings honour, that the Monks of Canterbury ſhould not proceed without the Kings aſſent therein. And foraſmuch as that hath not been done as yet, therefore they deſired ſome delay therein to be given, ſufficient for the doing thereof. Whereunto he ſaid, That he had granted and fulfilled their requeſt, in ſending his Letters and Meſſengers once or twice to the King for the ſame purpoſe, although he ſaid it was not the manner of the See Apoſtolick (who had the fulneſs of power over the Church of Canterbury) to wait for Princes conſents in ſuch Elections, who then could not be ſuffered to do that which they came for. Wherefore in knitting up his Letter, he thus concludeth in theſe words:

And therefore ſeeing the matter ſo ſtandeth, we ſee no cauſe why we ſhould require or tarry for the Kings favour or conſent any more therein, but intend ſo to proceed in this matter, neither inclining on the right hand, nor on the left, according as the Canonical Ordinances of the holy Fathers ſhall direct us; that is (all impediments and delaies ſet aſide) ſo to provide that the Church of Canterbury be not any longer deſtitute of her Paſtor. Wherefore be it known to your diſcretion or kingly prudence, that for ſo much as this Election of Stephen Langton hath orderly and concordly thus proceeded without fraud or deceit, upon a perſon meet for the ſame; therefore we will for no mans pleaſure, neither may we without danger of ſame and of conſcience defer or protract any longer the conſummation of the ſaid Election. Wherefore my well-beloved Son, ſeeing we have had reſpect to your honour, above that our right and duty required, ſtudy to honour us ſo much as your duty requireth again, ſo that you may the more plentifully deſerve favour, both at Gods hand and ours; leſt that by doing the contrary, you bring your ſelf into ſuch a peck of troubles, as afterwards you ſhall ſcarce rid your ſelf of again. For this know for a certain, in the end it muſt needs fall out, that he ſhall have the better, unto whom every knee (of Heavenly, Earthly, and Infernal creatures) doth bow, whoſe turn I ſerve in Earth, though I be unworthy. Therefore ſettle not your ſelf to obey their perſwaſions, which always deſire your unquietneſs, whereby they may fiſh the better in the Water when it is troubled; but commit your ſelf to our pleaſure, which undoubtedly ſhall turn to your praiſe, glory, and honour. For it ſhould not be much for your ſafety in this cauſe to reſiſt God and the Church; in whoſe quarrel that bleſſed Martyr, and glorious Biſhop, Thomas hath of late ſhed his blood; eſpecially ſeeing your Father and your Brother of famous memory, then Kings of England, did give over thoſe three wicked cuſtoms into the hands of the Legates of the See Apoſtolick. But if you yield your ſelf humbly into our hands, we will look that you and yours ſhall be ſufficiently provided for, that no prejudice may ariſe hereupon to you-ward. Given at Lateran the tenth year of our Popedome.

Princes muſt be ſubject to the Pope.

Note the proceedings of this ambitious Pope.

Tho. Becket he meaneth.

Thus haſt thou (gentle Reader) the glorious Letter of the proud Pope; I beſeech thee mark it well. Now to the Story.

After this Letter was ſent out, not long after proceedeth a charge and commandment ſent into England, unto certain Biſhops there, requiring them by authority Apoſtolical, That if the ſaid King would not receive the ſaid Prior of Canterbury, and his Monks, then they ſhould Interdict him throughout all his Realm. For the executing whereof four Biſhops were appointed by the uſurped Power of the Popes Bulls: namely, William, Biſhop of London; Euſtace, Biſhop of Ely; Walter, Biſhop of Wincheſter; and Giles, Biſhop of Hereford. Which ſaid four Biſhops went unto the King, and ſhewed their Commiſſion from the Pope, as is aforeſaid, willing him to conſent thereto, &c. But the ſaid King refuſed the ſame, and would by no means grant to their requeſt. Whereupon they, departing from his Grace, went the morrow after the Annuntiation of our Lady, and pronounced the ſaid general Interdiction throughout all England, ſo that the Church-doors were ſhut up with Keys, and other faſtenings, and with Walls, &c.

Four Biſhops appointed to interdict the Realm.

England interdicted by the Pope.

Now when the King heard of this, he began to be moved againſt them, and took all the poſſeſſions of the four Biſhops into his hands, appointing certain men to keep the Livings of the Clergy throughout the Realm, and that they ſhould injoy no part thereof. Which being done, the Biſhops (ſeeing the ſame) curſed all them that kept, or ſhould meddle with Church Goods, againſt the will of them that ought them: and underſtanding, for all that, that the King nothing regarded their doings, they went over Sea to the Biſhop of Canterbury, and informed him what had happened: who hearing the ſame, willed them again to return to Canterbury, and he would come thither to them, or elſe ſend certain perſons thither in his ſtead, that ſhould do as much as if he were there himſelf. Then when the Biſhops heard this, they returned again to England, to Canterbury; which tidings came ſhortly to the King, that they were come again thither. And becauſe he might not himſelf travel to them, he ſent thither Biſhops, Earls, and Abbats to intreat them, that the Archbiſhop, whom he had choſen, might be admitted; promiſing the Prior and all the Monks of Canterbury in his behalf, that he ſhould never take any thing of the Church Goods againſt the will of them that owe them; but would make amends to them of whom he had taken any ſuch Goods, and that the Church ſhould have all her Franchiſes in as ample manner as in St. Edward's time, the Confeſſor it had.

Diſcipline of the Church abuſed for private revenge.

The inconſiderate ſtoutneſs of the Prelats againſt the King.

When the form of agreement was thus concluded, it was ingroſſed in a pair of Indentures; and the foreſaid four Biſhops, to the one part thereof, ſet their Seals: and the other part the ſaid Biſhops, Earls, and Abbats carried to ſhew the King. When the King ſaw the order thereof, he liked it well, ſaving he would not agree to make reſtitution of the Church Goods. So he ſent to the four Biſhops again that they ſhould put out that point of Reſtitution. But they anſwered ſtoutly that they would not put out one word. Then the King ſent word to the Archbiſhop, by the four Biſhops, that he ſhould come to Canterbury to ſpeak with him, and for his ſafe conduct to come and go again at his will, he ſent his Juſtices as Pledges, Gilbert Peiteuin, William de la Bereuar, and John Letſitz. Which thing thus done, the Archbiſhop Stephen came to Canterbury, and the King (hearing thereof) came to Chilham; from whence he ſent his Treaſurer the Biſhop of Wincheſter to him, to have him put out of the Indentures the Clauſe of Reſtitution aforeſaid: who, denying to alter any word of the ſame, moved the King in ſuch ſort, that immediatly it was proclaimed throughout England at the Kings Commandment, that all thoſe that had any Church-Livings, and went over Sea, ſhould come again into England by a certain day, or elſe loſe their Livings for evermore. And further in that Proclamation, he charged all Sheriffs within the Realm, to inquire if any Biſhops, Abbats, Priors,

Stephen Langton ſtout againſt his King.

The King moved againſt the Archbiſhop Langton.

Priors, or any other Church man (from that day forward) received any commandment that came from the Pope, and that they ſhould take his or their body and bring it before him: and alſo that they ſhould take into their hands, for the Kings uſe, all the Church Lands that were given to any man through the Archbiſhop Stephen, or by the Priors of Canterbury, from the time of the Election of the Archbiſhop: and further charged that all the Woods, that were the Archbiſhops, ſhould be cut down and ſold.

Legats ſent from the Pope.

When tidings came to the Pope that the King had thus done, being moved thereby with fiery wrath, he ſent to the King two Legates (the one called Pandulph, and the other Durant) to warn him in the Popes name that he ſhould ceaſe his doings to the holy Church, and amend the wrong he had done to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the Priors and the Monks of Canterbury, and to all the Clergy of England. And further, that he ſhould reſtore the Goods again that he had taken of them againſt their will, or elſe they ſhould curſe the King by name: and to do this, the Pope took them his Letters in Bulls Patent. Theſe two Legates, coming into England, reſorted to the King to Northampton, where he held his Parliament, and, ſaluting him, ſaid they came from the Pope of Rome, to reform the Peace of holy Church. And firſt, ſaid they, we admoniſh you in the Popes behalf, that ye make full reſtitution of the Goods, and of the Lands, that ye have raviſhed holy Church of; and that ye receive Stephen the Archbiſhop of Canterbury into his Dignity; and the Prior of Canterbury and his Monks; and that ye yield again unto the Archbiſhop all his Lands and Rents without any withholding. And, Sir, yet moreover, That ye ſhall make ſuch reſtitution to them, as the Church ſhall think ſufficient.

Reſtitution required of the King.

Then anſwered the King, As touching the Prior and his Monks of Canterbury, all that ye have ſaid I would gladly do, and all things elſe that you would Ordain; but as touching the Archbiſhop, I ſhall tell you as it lieth in my heart: Let the Archbiſhop leave his Biſhoprick; and if the Pope then ſhall intreat for him, peradventure I may like to give him ſome other Biſhoprick in England; and upon this condition I will receive and admit him.

Then ſaid Pandulph unto the King, holy Church was wont never to degrade Archbiſhop without cauſe reaſonable: but ever ſhe was wont to correct Princes that were diſobedient to her.

What? How now (quoth the King) threaten ye me? Nay, ſaid Pandulph, but ye have now openly told us as it ſtandeth in your heart; and now we will tell you what is the Popes will; and thus it ſtandeth: He hath wholly Interdicted and Curſed you, for the wrongs you have done unto the holy Church, and unto the Clergy. And for ſo much as ye will dwell ſtill in your malice, and will come to no amendment; you ſhall underſtand, that from this time forward the Sentences upon you given have force and ſtrength. And all thoſe that with you have communed before this time, whether that they be Earls, Barons, or Knights, (or any other whatſoever they be) we abſoil them ſafely from their ſins unto this day: And from this time forward (of what condition ſoever they be) we accurſe them openly, and ſpecially by this our Sentence, that do commune with you. And we abſoil moreover Earls, Barons, Knights, and all other manner of men of their Homages, Services, and Fealties that they ſhould do unto you. And this thing to confirm, we give plain power unto the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the Biſhop of Norwich, and the ſame power we give againſt Scotland unto the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and of Salisbury: and in Wales we give the ſame power to the Biſhops of St. David, and of Landaff, and of St. Aſſe.

Sentence of the Popes Curſe pronounced againſt the King.

The Pope Author of Rebellion and diſobedience of Subjects towards their Prince.

Alſo Sir King (quoth Pandulph) all the Kings, Princes, and the great Dukes Chriſtened, have laboured to the Pope to have Licenſe to Croſs themſelves, and to War againſt thee, as upon Gods great Enemy, and win thy Land, and to make King whom it pleaſeth the Pope. And we here now abſoil all thoſe of their ſins, that will riſe againſt thee here in thine own Land.

Then the King, hearing this, anſwered: What ſhame may ye do more to me than this?

Pandulph again: We ſay to you in Verbo Dei, that neither you, nor any Heir that you have, after this day ſhall be Crowned. So the King ſaid, By him that is Almighty God, if I had known of this thing before ye came into this Land, and that ye had brought me ſuch news, I ſhould have made you tarry out theſe twelve months.

Then anſwered Pandulph, Full well we thought, at our firſt coming, that ye would have been obedient to God and to holy Church, and have fulfilled the Popes commandment, which we have ſhewed and pronounced to you, as we were charged therewith. And now ye ſay, that if ye had wiſt the cauſe of our coming, ye would have made us tarry out a whole year; who might as well ſay, that ye would have taken a whole years reſpite without the Popes leave: but for to ſuffer what death ye can ordain, we ſhall not ſpare to tell all the Popes meſſage and will, that he gave us in charge. Like maſter like man.

In another Chronicle I find the words between the King and Pandulph ſomething otherwiſe deſcribed, as though the King ſhould firſt threaten him with hanging, if he had fore-known of his coming. To whom Pandulph again ſhould anſwer, That he looked for nothing elſe at his hand, but to ſuffer for the Churches right. Whereupon the King, being mightily incenſed, departed. The King the ſame time being at Northampton, willed the Sheriffs and Bailiffs to bring forth all the Priſoners there, that ſuch as had deſerved ſhould be put to Death: to the intent (as ſome think) to make Pandulphus afraid. Among whom was a certain Clerk, who for counterfeiting the Kings Coin, was alſo condemned to be Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered; and moreover, by the King was commanded (thereby to anger Pandulphus the more, as may be thought) to be Hanged up higheſt above the reſt. Pandulphus hearing thereof, notwithſtanding he ſomewhat began to fear leaſt he ſhould be Hanged himſelf; yet with ſuch courage as he had, he went to the Church to ſet out Book, Bell, and Candle, charging that no man, under pain of Accurſing, ſhould lay hands upon the Clerk. Upon this the King and the Cardinal departed in no little anger. And Pandulph went to Rome, and reported to the Pope and the Cardinals what had been done. Pandulph worſe afraid than hurt.

Then the Pope Summoned all the Biſhops, Abbats, and Clerks of England, to come and repair unto Rome, to conſult what was to be done therein. This Council began the firſt day of October. In the which Council it was Decreed by the Pope and his Aſſembly, That John King of England ſhould be Accurſed, with all ſuch as held with him, every day ſo long as that Council endured. Albeit this was not yet Granted, that the People ſhould be croſſed to fight againſt him, becauſe as yet he had ſhed no blood. But afterwards the ſaid Pope Innocent, ſeeing that King John by no means would ſtoop under his ſubjection, nor under the rule of his Popiſh See, he ſent unto the French King, upon remiſſion of all his ſins, and of all that went with him, That he ſhould take with him all the power he might, and ſo to invade the Realm of England to deſtroy King John.

This occaſion given, Pope Innocent yet once again commanded, in pain of his great Curſe, That no man ſhould obey King John, neither yet keep company with him: he forbad all perſons to Eat and Drink with him, or Talk with him, to Commune or Counſel with him; yea, his own familiar Houſhold to do him any kind of ſervice, either at Bed or at Board, in Church, Hall, or Stable. And what followed thereof? The greater part of them, which after ſuch ſort fled from him (by the Ordinance of God) of divers and ſundry Diſeaſes the ſame year died. And between both Nations (Engliſh and French) fell that year great amity; but ſecret, ſubtil, and falſe, to the bitter betraying of England. Neither was the Pope content only with this, but moreover, the ſaid Pope Innocent gave Sentence definitive (by Council of his Cardinals) that King John ſhould be put from his Seat Regal and Depoſed, and another put in his Room. And to the ſpeedy execution thereof he appointed the French King Philip, promiſing to give him full remiſſion of all his ſins, and the clear poſſeſſion of all the Realm of England, to him and his Heirs, if he did either kill him or expel him. The Popes great Curſe. The firſt puniſhment of God upon diſobedient Subjects. The Pope found a murtherer.

The next year the French King began his attempt, in hope of the Crown of England; being well-manned with Biſhops, Monks, Prelates, Prieſts, and their Servants, to maintain the ſame: bragging of the Letters which they had received from the great men there. But behold the work of God; the Engliſh Navy took three hundred of the French Kings Ships, well loaden with Wheat, Wine, Meal, Fleſh, Armor, and ſuch other like meet for the War: French Ships taken by Engliſh men.

and one hundred they burnt within the Haven, taking the ſpoils with them. In the mean time the Prieſts within England had provided them a certain falſe counterfeit Prophet, called Peter Wakefield of Poiz; who was an idle gadder about, and a prating merchant. This Peter they made to propheſie lyes, rumoring his propheſies abroad, to bring the King out of all credit with his people. They noiſed it daily among the Commons of the Realm, that Chriſt had twice appeared to this prophet of theirs in ſhape of a Child between the Prieſts hands, once at York, another time at Pomfret; and that he had breathed on him thrice, ſaying, Peace, peace, peace, and teaching many things which he anon after declared to the Biſhops; and bid the people amend their naughty living. Being rapt alſo in ſpirit (they ſaid) he beheld the Joys of Heaven, and Sorrows of Hell. For ſcant were there three (ſaith the Chronicle) among a thouſand that lived Chriſtianly. This counterfeit ſoothſayer propheſied of King John, that he ſhould Reign no longer than Aſcention-day, within the year of our Lord 1213. which was the fourteenth from his Coronation; and this (he ſaid) he had by revelation. Then was it of him demanded, whether he ſhould be ſlain, or expelled, or ſhould of himſelf give over the Crown? He anſwered, That he could not tell. But of this he was ſure (he ſaid) that neither he, nor any of his ſtock or lineage ſhould Reign, that day once finiſhed. The King, hearing of this, laughed much at it, and made but a ſcoff thereof. Tuſh (ſaith he) it is but an Idiot Knave, and ſuch a one as lacketh his right wits. But when this fooliſh prophet had ſo eſcaped the danger of the Kings diſpleaſure, and that he made no more of it; he gat him abroad and prated thereof at large (as he was a very idle Vagabond) and uſed to tattle and talk more than enough: ſo that they which loved the King cauſed him anon after to be apprehended as a malefactor, and to be thrown into Priſon, the King not knowing thereof.

Peter the falſe prophet.

The falſe prophet found a Lyer.

Anon after, the fame of this phantaſtical prophet went all the Realm over, and his name was known every where (as fooliſhneſs is much regarded of people, where wiſdom is not in place) ſpecially becauſe he was then Impriſoned for the matter, the rumor was the larger, their wondrings were the wantoner, their practiſing the fooliſher, their buſie talks, and other idle occupyings the greater. Continually from thence (as the rude manner of people is) old Goſſips Tales went abroad, new Tales were invented, Fables were added to Fables, and Lyes grew upon Lyes: ſo that every day new ſlanders were raiſed on the King, and not one of them true: rumors aroſe, blaſphemies were ſpread, the Enemies rejoyced, and Treaſons by the Prieſts were maintained, and what likewiſe was ſurmiſed, or other ſubtilty practiſed, all was then fathered upon this fooliſh prophet: As, thus ſaith Peter Wakefield, Thus hath he propheſied, and, This ſhall come to paſs; yea, many times when he thought nothing leſs. When the Aſcenſion-day was come, which was propheſied of before, King John commanded his Regal Tent to be ſpread abroad in the open field, paſſing that day with his Noble Council and men of Honour, in the greateſt Solemnity that ever he did afore, Solacing himſelf with Muſical Inſtruments and Songs, moſt in ſight amongſt his truſty Friends. When that day was paſt in all proſperity and mirth, his Enemies being confounded, turned all to an allegorical underſtanding, to make the propheſie good, and ſaid, He is no longer King, for the Pope Reigneth, and not he; yet Reigned he ſtill, and his Son after him, to prove that prophet a Lyer. Then was the King by his Council perſwaded that this falſe prophet had troubled all the Realm, perverted the hearts of the people, and raiſed the Commons againſt him. For his words went over the Sea by the help of his Prelates, and came to the French Kings Ear, and gave unto him a great incouragement to Invade the Land; he had not elſe done it ſo ſuddenly. But he was moſt foully deceived, as all they are and ſhall be that put their truſt in ſuch dark drowſie dreams of Hypocrites. The King therefore commanded that he ſhould be drawn and hanged like a Traytor.

The falſe prophet proved a Lyer by King John.

The falſe prophet hanged.

After that the Popiſh Prelates, Monks, Canons, Prieſts, &c. ſaw this their crafty jugling by their ſained prophet would not ſpeed, notwithſtanding they had done no little harm thereby; to help the matter more forward, they began to travel and practice with Pope Innocent of the one ſide, and alſo with the French King on the other ſide, beſides ubtil Treaſons which they wrought within the Realm, and by their confeſſions in the Ear, wherby they both blinded the Nobility and Commons. The King thus compaſſed about on every ſide with Enemies, and fearing the ſequel thereof, knowing the Conſpiracies that were in working againſt him, as well by the Pope (in all that ever he might) as alſo by Philip the French King by his procurement: and moreover his own People, eſpecially his Lords and Barons being rebelliouſly incited againſt him; as by the Popes Curſes and Interdictions againſt ſuch as took his part, and by his Abſolutions and Diſpenſations with all thoſe that would rebel againſt him, commanding them to detain from him ſuch Homage, Service, Duties, Debts, and all other Allegiance that godly Subjects owe and are bound to yield and give to their Liege Lord and Prince: All which things conſidered, the King, I ſay, in the thirteenth year of his Reign, for that the French King began to make ſharp Invaſion upon him within his own Realm, ſent ſpeedy Ambaſſadors to the Pope (as to the Fountain of all this his miſchief, pretended to work and intreat his Peace and Reconciliation with him) promiſing to do whatſoever the Pope ſhould will him, and command him in the reformation of himſelf, and reſtitution of all wrongs done to holy Church, and to make due ſatisfaction therefore unto all men that could complain.

King John ſubmitteth himſelf to the Pope.

King John intreateth for Peace with the Pope.

Then ſent the Pope again into England his Legate Pandulph, with other Ambaſſadors: the King alſo at Canterbury (by Letters, as it ſhould ſeem, certified from his own Ambaſſadors) waited their coming. Where the thirteenth day of May the King received them, making unto them an Oath, That of and for all things wherein he ſtood Accurſed, he would make ample reſtitution and ſatisfaction. Unto whom alſo all the Lords and Barons of England (ſo many as there were with the King attending the Legates coming) ſware in like manner, That if the King would not accompliſh in every thing the Oath which he had taken, then they would cauſe him to hold and confirm the ſame whether he would or not (or by ſtrength) to uſe the Authors words.

Then ſubmitted the King himſelf unto the Court of Rome, and to the Pope, and reſigning gave up his Dominions and Realms of England and Ireland from him and from his Heirs for evermore that ſhould come of him. With this condition, that the King and his Heirs ſhould take again theſe two Dominions of the Pope to Farm, paying yearly therefore to the Court of Rome 1000 Marks of Silver. Then took the King the Crown from his Head, kneeling upon his Knees, in the preſence of all his Lords and Barons of England, to Pandulph the Popes chief Legate, ſaying in this wiſe, Here I reſign up the Crown of the Realm of England to the Popes hands, Innocent the third, and put me wholly in his mercy and ordinance. Then took Pandulph the Crown of King John, and kept it five days as a poſſeſſion and ſeizin-taking of theſe two Realms of England and Ireland, confirming alſo all things promiſed by his Charter Obligatory as followeth:

King John ſubmitteth himſelf and reſigneth his Crown.

The Copy of the Letter Obligatory that King John made to the Pope, concerning the yielding up of the Crown and Realm of England into the Popes hands, for a certain Sum of Mony yearly to be paid.

The Draught of the Inſtrument Obligatory, wherein King John reſigneth his Kingdom to the Popes hand Chriſt was offered a Kingdom and would none of it, but the Pope doth not refuſe it.

TO all Chriſtian People throughout the World dwelling, John by the Grace of God, King of England, greeting: To your Univerſity known be it, That for ſo much as we have grived and offended God, and our Mother Church of Rome, and for ſo much as we have need of the Mercy of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: and we may nothing ſo worthy offer, and competent ſatisfaction make to God and to holy Church (but if it were our own body) as with our Realms of England and of Ireland; then by the grace of the Holy Ghoſt we deſire to meek us for the Love of him, that meeked him to the Death upon the Croſs. And through Counſel of the Nobles, Earls, and Barons, we offer and freely grant to God, and to the Apoſtles St. Peter and Paul, and to our mother Church of Rome, and to our holy father Pope Innocent the third, and to all the Popes that come after him, all the Realm, Patronages of Churches of England and of Ireland, with all the appurtenances, for remiſſion of ſins, and help and health of our Kings ſouls, and

of all Chriſtian ſouls. So that from this time afterward, we will receive and hold of our mother Church of Rome as in Farm, doing fealty to our holy father the Pope, Innocent the third, and to all the Popes that come after him, in the manner above-ſaid. And in the preſence of the wiſe man Pandulph the Popes ſooth-deacon, we make Liege Homage, as if it were in the Popes preſence and we before him were, and as if he himſelf ſhould have done all manner of things above-ſaid; and thereto we bind us, and all that come after us, and our Heirs for evermore, without any gain-ſaying to the Pope, and eke the ward of the Church vacant. And in token of this thing ever for to laſt, we will, confirm, and ordain, That he be our ſpecial renter of the fore-ſaid Realms (ſaving St. Peter-pence) in all things. To the mother Church of Rome, paying by the year 1000 Marks of Silver at two times of the year for all manner cuſtoms that we ſhould do for the ſaid Realms; that is to ſay, at Michaelmas and at Eaſter; that is, for England 700 Marks, and 300 Marks for Ireland; ſaving to us and to our Heirs, our Juſtices and our other Franchiſes. And all theſe things that before been ſaid, we will that they be firm and ſtable without end, and to that Obligation we and all our Succeſſors, and our Heirs in this manner been bound, That if we or any of our Heirs through any preſumption fall in any point again of theſe things above-ſaid (and be been warned and will not right amend him) he ſhall then loſe the fore-ſaid Realms for evermore: and this Charter of Obligation and our Warrant for evermore be firm and ſtable without gain-ſaying. We ſhall from this day afterward be true to God and to the mother Church of Rome, and to thee, Innocent the third, and to all that commen after thee, and the Realms of England and of Ireland we ſhall maintain true lich in all manner points, againſt all manner of men, by our power through Gods help.

Upon this Obligation the King was diſcharged, the ſecond day of July; from that tyrannical Interdiction, under which he continued ſix years and three months. But before the releaſement thereof, firſt he was miſerably compelled (as hath been declared) to give over both his Crown and Scepter to that Antichriſt of Rome for the ſpace of five days, and as his Client, Vaſſal, Feudary, and Tenant, to receive it again of him at the hands of another Cardinal; being bound Obligatory, both for himſelf, and for his Succeſſors to pay yearly (for acknowledgment thereof) 1000 Marks for England and Ireland: Then came they thither from all parts of the Realm, ſo many as had their Conſciences wounded for obeying their Liege King, as blind Idiots, and there they were Abſolved, every one of his own Biſhop, except the Spiritual Fathers, and Eccleſiaſtical Soldiers, for they were compelled to ſeek to Rome, as Captives reſerved to the Popes own fatherhood. In this new ruffling the King eaſily granted, that Abbats, Deans, and Curates ſhould be Elected freely every where, ſo that the Laws of the Realm were truly obſerved. But againſt that were the Biſhops, alledging their Canonical Decrees and Rules Synodal, determining the King therein to have nothing to do, but only to give his conſent after they had once Elected. But among this ſhaven Rabble, ſome there were which conſented not to this wicked error: a ſort alſo there were of the Prelates at that time, which were not pleaſed that the Lands Interdiction ſhould ceaſe, till the King had paid all that which their Clergy in all quarters of the Realm had demanded, without reaſon: yea, what every ſawcy Sir John for his part demanded, even to the very breaking of their Hedges, the ſtealing of their Apples, and their other occaſional damages, which grew to an incredible ſum, and impoſſible to be anſwered. Such was the outragious cruel noiſe of that miſchievous progeny of Antichriſt, againſt their natural King.

Notwithſtanding that which is uttered afore concerning the bitter malice of the Clergy againſt their Prince, yet did the Popes Legate and Cardinal Nicolaus Tuſculanus much favour his doings, and allow of his proceedings. Wherefore they reported of him that he was exceeding partial, and regarded not their matters Eccleſiaſtical, as he ſhould have done. For leaving the account of their Reſtitutions, he went with the Kings Officers, as the Kings pleaſure was, to the Cathedral Miniſters, Abbies, Priories, Deanries, and great Churches vacant; and there for the next incumbent always he appointed two; one for the King, another for the Parties. But upon him only whom the King nominated, he compelled moſt commonly the Election to paſs: which vexed them wonderfully. Upon this therefore they raiſed a new Conſpiracy againſt the Kings Perſon by help of their Biſhops, ſeditious Prelates, and ſuch Noble men as they had drawn to their Parties. We beheld (ſaith Hoveden) about the ſame time many noble Houſes and Aſſemblies divided in many places. The Fathers and the Aged men ſtood upon the Kings part, but the younger ſort contrary. And ſome there were that for the love of their kindred, and in other ſundry reſpects forſook the King again. Yea, the ſame went that time, ſaith he, That they were confederated with Alexander the Scotiſh King; and Leolin the Prince of Wales, to work him an utter miſchief. A Council at Oxford the Archbiſhop called; whereat ſome would not tarry, conſidering the confuſion thereof; the other ſort, having very obſtinate hearts, reviled the King moſt ſpitefully behind his back, and ſaid, That from thenceforth he ought to be taken for no Governor of theirs. Their outragious and frantick clamors ſo much prevailed in thoſe days, that it grew to a grievous tumult, and a moſt perillous commotion.

In the year of our Lord 1215, as witneſſeth Paulus Æmilius and other Hiſtories, Pope Innocent the third held a General Synod at Rome, called the Council Lateran. The chief cauſes of that Council were theſe: In the days of this Innocent, Hereſie (as he calleth the Truth of God, or the Doctrine that rebuketh ſin) began to riſe up very high, and to ſpread forth his branches abroad; by reaſon whereof many Princes were Excommunicated, as Otho the Emperor, John the King of England, Peter King of Aragon, Raimund the Earl of Tholouſe, Aquitania, Sataloni, and ſuch other like, as is aforeſaid. So that it could be no otherwiſe, ſaith Hoveden, but with the ſharp Ax of the Goſpel (ſo called he the Popes Excommunications) they ought of neceſſity to have been cut off from the Church. Therefore was this Council provided, proclaimed, and Prelates from all Nations thereunto called. And to colour thoſe miſchiefs which he then went about, he cauſed it by his Legates and Cardinals (very crafty merchants) to be noiſed abroad, that his intent therein was only to have the Church univerſally reformed, and the Holy Land from the Turks hands recovered. But all this was craft and falſhood; as the ſequel thereof hath manifeſtly declared. For his purpoſe thereby was to ſubdue all Princes, and to make himſelf Rich and Wealthy. For there he made this Antichriſtian Act, and Eſtabliſhed it by publick Decree, That the Pope ſhould have from thenceforth the Correction of all Chriſtian Princes, and that no Emperor ſhould be admitted, except he were ſworn before, and were alſo Crowned of him. He Ordained moreover, That whoſoever he were that ſhould ſpeak evil of the Pope, he ſhould be puniſhed in Hell with Eternal Damnation: Conradus, Urſpergenſis, Hieronymus, Marius. He provided Confeſſion to help theſe matters; he allowed their Bread a Pix to cover him; and a Bell when he goeth abroad; and made the Maſs equal with Chriſts Goſpel.

The Council of Lateran holden by Pope Innocent.

The Pope to have juriſdiction of all Churches.

In this Council was firſt invented and brought in Tranſubſtantiation: of which Johannes Scotus, whom we call Duns, maketh mention in his fourth Book, writing in theſe words: The words of the Scripture might be expounded more eaſily and more plainly without Tranſubſtantiation. But the Church did chuſe this ſenſe, which is more hard; being moved thereunto, as it ſeemeth, chiefly, becauſe that of the Sacraments men ought to hold as the holy Church of Rome holdeth, &c. And in the ſame place he maketh mention of Innocentius the third.

Tranſubſtantiation firſt brought in.

Moreover, in the ſaid Council was Eſtabliſhed and Ratified the wretched and Impious Act, compelling Prieſts to abjure Lawful Matrimony. Whereupon theſe Meeters or Verſes were made the ſame time againſt him, which here follow under-written.

Now let us return to King John again, and mark how the Prieſts and their adherents were plagued for their humble handlings of his Majeſties will. In the foreſaid Council of Lateran, and the ſame year, was Stephen Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury Excommunicated of Pope Innocent, with all thoſe Biſhops, Prelates, Prieſts, Barons, and Commons, which had been of counſel with him in the former Rebellion. And when the ſaid Archbiſhop had made inſtant ſute of him to be Abſolved, anon he made him this anſwer with great indignation: Brother mine, I ſwear by Saint Peter, thou ſhalt not ſo ſoon at my hand obtain the benefit of Abſolution: for why? thou haſt not only done harm to the King of England, but alſo thou haſt in a great many of things injured the Church of Rome here, and therefore thou ſhalt tarry my leaſure. The Archbiſhop was alſo at that time ſuſpended out of the Church, and commanded to ſay no Maſs at all, neither yet to exerciſe any other Eccleſiaſtical Office; becauſe he would not at time convenient execute the Popes Curſe upon the Rebellious Barons. With them the ſaid Pope had been ſo deeply offended and angred a little before, that the great Charter of the Liberties of England (with great indignation and countenance moſt terrible) he rent and deſtroyed, by ſentence definitive condemning it for ever; and by and by thereupon Curſed all the other Rebels, with Book, Bell, and Candle. The greater Captains of them (with the Citizens of London) for that aſſay were pronouced Excommunicate by name, and remained ſtill Interdicted. They appealed then to the council general.

Stephen Langton ſuſpended out of the Church.

Appeal to the general council.

In the ſame year 1215. were thoſe great men alſo ſummoned to appear at Rome in that general Synod, which would not conſent to their Kings expulſion, nor yet tyrannical depoſing. Though they were called (they ſaid) thereunto by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and others, and required by oath to ſubſcribe unto the ſame: yet could they not of their conſcience do it, becauſe he had humbled himſelf, and alſo granted to keep peace with all Men. Thus was the whole Realm miſerably then divided into two factions through malice of the Clergy: ſo ſtriſes increaſed in the Land every where. Yet were there of the Lords and Gentlemen a great number at that time, that followed the King and allowed his doings. But they which were on the other ſide (not a little ſuſpecting the ſtate that they were in) fled ſpeedily to the French King Philip: deſiring him that he would grant to them his eldeſt Son Ludovick, and they would Elect him to be their King, and that without much tarriance. They beſought him moreover, that he would ſend with him a ſtrong and mighty power, ſuch as were able to ſubdue him utterly, that they mighty (they ſay) be delivered of ſuch a wicked Tyrant. Such was the report that thoſe moſt wicked Papiſts gave their Chriſtian Governour, appointed to them of God: whom they ought to have obeyed, though he had been evil, even for very conſcience ſake, Rom. 13. And as certain of the Lords and Barons were buſie to chuſe the ſaid Ludovick for their King, the Pope ſent thither one Gualo the Cardinal of S. Martin to ſtay thoſe raſh and cruel attempts; charging the French King upon his Allagiance, That he with all power poſſible ſhould favour, maintain, and defend King John of England, his Feudary or Tenant. The French King thereto made anſwer, as one not content with that arrogant precept; The Realm of England (ſaid he) was never yet any part of Saint Peter's Patrimony, neither is it now, nor yet any time ſhall be hereafter. Thus ſpake he, for that he was in hope to obtain it for his Son by treaſon of the Barons.

Gualo Cardinal ſent into England.

No Prince or Potentate (ſaid Philip the French King) may pledge or give away his Kingdom, which is (beſide the Realm) the Government of his whole Common-wealth, without the lawful conſent of his Barons, which are bound to defend the ſame. If the Pope ſhall introduce or ſet up ſuch a preſident in Chriſtianity, he ſhall at his pleaſure bring all Chriſtian Kings and their Kingdoms to nought. I like not this example in theſe days begun. I cannot therefore allow this fact of King John of England: though he be my utter adverſary, yet I much lament that he hath ſo indammaged his Realm, and hath brought that noble ground and Queen of Provinces under miſerable tribute. The chief Lords and Men of his Nobility ſtanding by, when he uttered theſe words, (being as it were in a fury) cryed with one voyce: By the blood of God, in whom we truſt to be ſaved, we will ſtick in this Article to the loſing of our heads. Let the King of England do therein what him liketh: no King may put his Land under Tribute, and ſo make his Nobility Captive Servants. With that came in Ludovick the Kings eldeſt Son, and ſaid unto them all there preſent; I beſeech you, let not my purpoſed journey: the Barons of England have Elected me for their Lord and King, and I will not ſurely loſe my right, but I will fight for it even to the very death, yea ſo long as heart ſhall ſtir within my breſt: and I doubt not but I ſhall well obtain it, for I have friends among them. His Father the King ſtood ſtill as if he had been in a dump, and anſwered never a word, but fared as though he had diſſembled the matter. Belike he miſtruſted ſomething therein, as he might well enough; for all was procured by the Prieſts, that they might live licentiouſly in all wealth and freedom from the Kings yoke.

The French King and his Son reaſoning about England.

About the ſame time were ſuch Treaſons and Conſpiracies wrought by the Biſhops, Prieſts, and Monks throughout all the Realm, that the King knew not where to become or find truſty friends; he was then compelled, by the uncertainty of his Subjects, to travel from place to place, but not without a great Army of Men, looking every day when his Barons and their Confederates would cruelly ſet upon him. At laſt he came to Dover, and there looked for aid from other quarters, which loved him better than did his own people. And thither reſorted to him from Flanders, Brabant, and Holland, on one ſide, and from Guian, Gaſcoin, and Poitiers, on the other ſide, and from other Countries more, a wonderful number of Men. The report then went, That the Pope had written unto thoſe Countries, mightily to aſſiſt him for divers conſiderations: one was, for that he had both ſubmitted himſelf and his Dominions unto his protection; another was, Becauſe he had taken upon him, a little before, the livery of the Croſs, to win again Jeruſalem; the third was, For that he had gotten by him the Dominion of England and Ireland, and feared to loſe both, if he ſhould chance to decay. For the ſpace of three months he remained in the Iſle of Wight, abroad in the Air to quiet himſelf for a time from all manner of tumults, and led there a ſolitary life among Rivers and Water-men; whereas he rather coveted to dye than to live, being ſo traiterouſly handled of his Biſhops and Barons, and not knowing how to be juſtly avenged of them. Upon the Purification day of our Lady, therefore he took upon him the Croſs or Voyage againſt the Turks, for recovery of Hieruſalem, moved thereto rather for the doubts which he had of his people, than for any other Devotion elſe. And thus he ſaid to his familiar Servants: Since I ſubmitted my ſelf and my Lands (England and Ireland)

Anno 1216. In the next year after 1216. was Simon Langton choſen Archbiſhop of York; but that Election anon after was diſſolved; for information was given to the Pope, that the ſaid Simon was Brother to Stephen Langton the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which had been the occaſion of all the Tumults which were at that time in England. And the Pope had the more hate unto him, for that he had brought him up of nought, and did find him at that time ſo ſtubborn: wherefore he placed in his Brothers place Walter Gray, the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

Walter Gray Archbiſhop of York.

Gualo the Popes Legate.

In the ſame year Gualo the Popes Legate renewed his great curſe upon Lewis the French Kings Son, for uſurping upon King John: Likewiſe upon Simon Langton, and Gervais Hobruge, for provoking him to the ſame, and that with a wonderful Solemnity: For in that doing he made all the Bells to be Rung, the Candles to be light, the Doors to be opened, and the Book of Excommunications or Interdictions publickly to be read, committing them wholly to the Devil for their contumacy and contempt. He alſo commanded the Biſhops and Curates to publiſh it abroad over all the whole Realm, to the terror of all his ſubjects. The ſaid Simon and Gervais laughed him to ſcorn, and derided much his doings in that behalf, ſaying, that for the juſt title of Ludovike, they had appealled to the general Council at Rome.

Radul. Niger cap. 43. 44.

The Magiſtrates of London, and Citizens of the ſame, did likewiſe vilipend and diſdainfully mock all that the Pope had there commanded and done. And in ſpight both of him and his Legate, they kept company with them that were Excommunicated, both at Table and at Church, ſhewing themſelves thereby as open contemners both of him and his Laws. Ludovike at London, taking himſelf for King, conſtituted Simon Langton for his high Chancellor, and Gervais Hobruge for his chief Preacher; by whoſe dayly Preachings (as well the Barons as the Citizens themſelves being Excommunicated) he cauſed all the Church doors to be opened, and the ſervice to be ſung, and the ſaid Ludovike was in all points fit for their hands.

The Popes curſe laught to ſcorn.

Pandulphus the Popes collector made Biſhop of Norwich.

About this time was Pandulphus (then Cardinal) collecting the Peter-pence, and old pillage of the Pope, taking great pains therein. And for his great labours in thoſe the affairs of holy Church, and for other great miracles beſides, he was then made Biſhop of Norwich, to the augmenting of his dignitie and expences.

Mat. Pariſ. Radul. Niger cap. 47.

It chanced about this time, that the Vicount of Melun (a very Noble Man of the Realm of France, which came thither with the Prince Ludovike) fell deadly ſick at London, and alſo moved in conſcience to call certain of the Engliſh Barons unto him, ſuch as were there appointed to the cuſtody of that City, ſaid unto them: I lament your ſorrowful caſe, and pity with my heart the deſtruction that is coming towards you and your Country. The dangerous ſnares which are prepared for your utter confuſion are hidden from you; you do not behold them, but take you heed of them in time. Prince Ludovike hath Sworn a great Oath, and ſixteen of his Earls and Noble Men are of Counſel with him, that if he obtain the Crown of England, he will baniſh all them from ſervice, and deprive them of Lands and Goods, as many as he findeth now to go againſt their Liege King, and are Traytors to his Noble Perſon. And becauſe you ſhall not take this Tale for a Fable, I aſſure you on my faith, lying now at the mercy of God, that I was one of them which was Sworn to the ſame. I have great conſcience thereof, and, therefore I give you this warning. I pity poor England which hath been ſo Noble a Region, that now it is come to ſo extreme miſery. And when he with tears had lamented it a ſpace, he returned again unto them and ſaid: My friends I Counſel you Earneſtly to look to your ſelves, and to provide the remedy in time, leſt it come upon you unawars, Your King for a ſeaſon hath kept you under, but if Ludovike prevail, he will put you from all. Of two extreme evils chuſe the more eaſie, and keep that ſecret which I have told you of good will. With that he gave over and departed this life.

The great providence of God for the help of England.

When this was once noiſed among the Barons, they were in great heavineſs, for they ſaw themſelves intrapped every way, and to be in exceeding great danger. And this daily augmented that fear which then came upon the Barons. They were extremely hated of the Pope and his Legates, and every week came upon them new Excommunications. Daily detriments they had beſides in their poſſeſſions and goods, in their Lands and Houſes, Corn and Cattel, Wives and Children: So that ſome of them were driven to ſuch need, that they were enforced to ſeek preys and booties for ſuſtaining their miſerable lives. For look whatſoever Prince Ludovike obtained by his Wars, either Territories or Caſtles, he gave them all to his French-men in ſpight of their heads, and ſaid that they were but Traytors, like as they had warning afore, which grieved them worſt of all. At the laſt they perceiving that they in ſeeking to avoid one miſchief, were ready to fall into another much worſe: they began to lay their heads together, conſenting to ſubmit themſelves wholly with all Humility unto the mercy of their late Sovereign and natural Liege Lord King John. And for that they were ſomewhat in doubt of their lives for the Treaſon afore committed, many of the friends of them which were of moſt credit with him, made ſute for them. So were a great number of them pardoned, after inſtant and great ſute made for them. I here omit his recovery of Rocheſter Caſtle and City, with many other dangerous adventures againſt the foreſaid Ludovike, both at London, York, Lincoln, Wincheſter, Norwich, and other places elſe, as things not pertaining to my purpoſe. And now I return to my matter again.

Into Suffolk and Norfolk he conſequently journeyed, with a very ſtrong Army of Men, and there with great miſchief he afflicted them, becauſe they had given place and were Sworn to his Enemies. After that, he deſtroyed the Abbies of Peterborough and Crowland, for the great Treaſons which they alſo had wrought againſt him, and ſo he departed from thence into Lincolnſhire.

In this year, about the ſeventeenth day of July, died Pope Innocent the third, and was buried in a City called Peruſium in Italy: whereas he had traveled to make a peace between the Genovaies and Piſes, for his own commodity and advantage. After him anon ſucceeded one Cintius, otherwiſe called Honorius tertius, a man of very great age: yet lived he in the Papacy ten years and an half, and more. When this was once known in England, greatly rejoyced all they which were King Johns enemies, ſpecially the Prieſts: yet had they ſmall cauſe, as will appear hereafter. They noiſed it all the Realm over, that this new Pope would ſet a new order, and not rule all things as the other Pope did; thinking thereby that he would have done all things to their commodity, but they found it otherwiſe. For he made all them, which were Excommunicated, to pay double and treble, ere they could be reſtored again to their former livings.

Pope Innocent the third dieth.

And in the ſelf ſame year, as King John was come to Swinſtead Abbey, not far from Lincoln, he reſted there two days: where (as moſt writers teſtifie) he was moſt Traiterouſly poiſoned by a Monk of that Abbey, of the Sect of the Ciſtercians or S. Bernards Brethren, called Simon of Swinſtead. As concerning the Noble Perſonage of this Prince, this witneſs giveth Roger Hoveden therein, Princeps quidem magnus erat, ſed minus fœlix, atque, ut Marius, utramque fortunam expertus. Doubtleſs (ſaith he) King John was a mighty Prince, but not ſo fortunate as many were; not altogether unlike to Marius the Noble Roman, he taſted of Fortune both ways, bountiful in mercy; in wars ſometime he wan, ſometime again he loſt. Munificus ac liberalis in exteros fuit, ſed proditionis cauſa ſuorum deprædator, plus advenis quam ſuis confidens. He was alſo very bounteous and liberal unto ſtrangers, but of his own people (for their daily Treaſons ſake) he was a great oppreſſor, ſo that he truſted more to forreiners than to them.

King John poiſoned by a Monk.

Ex Chronica cui titulus Eulogium.

Among other divers and ſundry conditions belonging to this King, one there was which is not in him to be reprehended but commended rather: For that being far from the ſuperſtition which Kings at that time were commonly ſubject to, he regarded not the Popiſh Maſs, as in certain Chronicles writing of him may be collected: for ſo I find teſtified of him by Matth. Pariſien. that the King upon a time in his Hunting, coming where a very fat Stag was cut up and opened (or how the Hunters tearme it I cannot tell) the King beholding the fatneſs and the liking of the Stag: See, ſaith he, how eaſily and happily he hath lived, and yet for all that he never heard any Maſs.

Ex Caxtono lib. 7.

It is recorded and found in the Chronicle of William Caxton called Fructus temporum, and in the ſeventh Book: The foreſaid Monk Simon being much offended with certain talk that the King had at his Table, concerning Ludovike the French Kings Son (which then had entred and uſurped upon him) did caſt in his wicked heart how he moſt ſpeedily might bring him to his end. And firſt of all he Counſelled with his Abbots, ſhewing him the whole matter, and what he was minded to do. He alledged for himſelf the prophelie of Caiaphas, Joh. 11. ſaying; It is better that one man die, than all the people ſhould periſh. I am well contented (ſaith he) to loſe my life, and ſo become a Martyr, that I may utterly deſtroy this Tyrant. With that the Abbot did weep for gladneſs, and much commended his Fervent Zeal, as he took it. The Monk then being abſolved of his Abbot for doing this Act (aforehand) went ſecretly into a Garden upon the backſide, and finding there a moſt venemous Toad, he ſo pricked him and preſſed him with his Pen-knife, that he made him vomit all the poiſon that was within him. This done, he conveyed it into a cup of Wine, and with a ſmiling and flattering countenance he ſaid thus to the King, If it ſhall like your Princely Majeſty, here is ſuch a Cup of Wine as ye never drank better before in all your life time; I truſt this Waſſail ſhall make all England glad: and with that he drank a great draught thereof, the King pledging him. The Monk anon after went to the Farmary, and there died (his Guts guſhing out of his Belly) and had continually from thenceforth three Monks to ſing Maſs for his Soul, confirmed by their general Chapter. What became after that of King John, ye ſhall know right well in the proceſs following. I would ye did mark well the wholeſome proceedings of theſe holy votaries, how vertuouſly they obey their King, whom God hath appointed, and how religiouſly they beſtow their confeſſions, abſolutions, and Maſſes.

Wo be to you that call good evil, and evil good.

Simon the Monk abſolved of his Abbot for poiſoning his King.

The Monk dieth of his own poiſon.

The King within a ſhort ſpace after (feeling great grief in his body) asked for Simon the Monk; and anſwer was made that he was departed this life. Then God have mercy upon me (ſaid he) I ſuſpected as much, after he had ſaid that all England ſhould thereof be glad; he meant now I perceive then of his own Generation. With that he commanded his Chariot to be prepared, for he was not able to ride. So went he from thence to Slaford Caſtle, and from thence to Newark on Trent, and there within leſs than three days he died. Upon his death bed he much repented his former life, and forgave all them with a pitiful heart that had done him injury; deſiring that his Elder Son Henry might be admoniſhed by his example, and learn by his misfortunes to be natural, favourable, gently, and loving to his natural people. When his body was imbalmed and ſpiced (as the manner is of Kings) his bowels or intrals were buried at Croxton Abbey, which was of the ſect of Premonſtratenſes or Canons of S. Norbert. His hired ſouldiers both Engliſh-men and ſtrangers were ſtill about him, and followed his Corps Triumphantly in their Armor, till they came to the Cathedral Church of Worceſter, and there Honourably was he buried by Silveſter the Biſhop betwixt S. Oſwald and Saint Wolſtan, two Biſhops of that Church. He died in the year of our Lord 1216. the ninteenth day of October, after he had Reigned in ſuch calamity, by the ſubtil conveyance of his Clergy, eighteen years and ſix months and odd days. Now ſo ſoon as King John was dead and buried (as is ſaid before) the Princes, Lords and Barons, ſo many as were of his part (as well of ſtrangers as of them that were born here) by Counſel of the Legate Gualdo, gathered themſelves together, and all with one conſent proclaimed Henry his Son for their King. Of whom more ſhall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter.

The death of King John.

A Prince to be loving to his ſubjects.

King John buried at Worceſter.

Anno 1216.

Many opinions are among the Chroniclers of the death of King John. Some of them do write that he died of ſorrow and heavineſs of Heart, as Polydorus: ſome of ſurfeiting in the night, as Radulphus Niger: ſome of a bloody flux, as Roger Hoveden: ſome of a burning ague, ſome of a could ſweat, ſome of eating Apples, ſome of eating Pears, ſome of Plums, &c.

The death of King John.

Thus you ſee what variety is among the writers concerning the death of this King John. Of which writers, although the moſt agree in this, that he was poiſoned by the Monk above named, yet Matthew Paris (ſomething differing from the others) writeth thus concerning his death, That he going from Linn to Lincolnſhire, and there hearing of the loſs of his carriage and of his Treaſures upon the Waſhes, fell in great heavineſs of mind, inſomuch that he fell thereby into a fervent Fever, being at the Abbey of Swinſted. This Ague he alſo increaſed through evil ſurfeiting and naughty diet, by eating Peaches and drinking of new Ciſer, or as we call it Sider. Thus being ſick, he was carried from thence to the Caſtle of Slaford, and from thence to the Caſtle of Newark; where calling for Henry his Son, he gave to him the ſucceſſion of his Crown and Kingdom, writing to all his Lords and Nobles to receive him for their King; and ſhortly after, upon S. Lucies Even, departed this life, being buried at Worceſter, &c.

In Gisburne I find otherwiſe, who, diſſenting from others, ſaith; that he was poiſoned with a diſh of Pears, which the Monk had prepared for the King therewith to poiſon him. Who asking the King whether he would taſte of his Fruit, and being bid to bring them in; according to the Kings bidding, ſo he did. At the bringing in whereof (ſaith the ſtory) the precious ſtones about the King began to ſweat; inſomuch that the King misdoubting ſome poiſon, demanded of the Monk what he had brought. He ſaid, of his Fruit, and that very good, the beſt that ever he did taſte. Eat, ſaid the King. And he took one of the Pears which he did know, and did eat. Alſo being bid to take another, he did eat likewiſe ſavourly, and ſo likewiſe the third. Then the King refraining no longer, took one of the poiſoned Pears, and was therewith poiſoned, as is before, &c.

King Henry the Third.

King Henry the third.

AFter this King John had Reigned (as ſome ſay) ſeventeen years, or as ſome ſay, though falſely, nineteen years; he was (as is above ſaid) poiſoned and died. This King left behind him four Sons and three Daughters, firſt Henry, the ſecond Richard, and he was Earl of Cornwal, the third William of Valentia, the fourth Guido Diſenaie: he had alſo another Son, who afterward was made Biſhop. Of his Daughters, the firſt was Iſabel, married afterward to Fredrick the Emperor; the ſecond named Elenor, married to William Earl Marſhal; the third to Mountford the Earl of Leiceſter, &c. Another Story ſaith that he had but two Daughters, Iſabel and Elenor, or as another calleth her Joan, which was after Queen of Scotland. Ex chronico vetuſto Angliæ.

The iſſue of King John.

This King John being deceaſed, which had many Enemies both of Earls, Barons, and eſpecially of the Popiſh Clergy; Henry the Eldeſt Son was then of the age of nine years, at what time the moſt of the Lords of England did adhere to Ludovike or Lewis the French Kings Son, whom they had ſent for before, in diſpleaſure of King John, to be their King, and had ſworn to him their allegiance. Then William, Earl Marſhal, a Noble Man, and of great Authority, and a grave and ſound Counſellor, friendly and quietly called unto him divers Earls and Barons, and taking this Henry the young Prince, Son of King John, ſetteth him before them, uſing theſe Words, Behold (ſaith he) Right Honorable and well Beloved, although we have perſecuted the Father of this young Prince for his evil demeanor, and worthily; yet this young child whom here ye ſee before you, as he is in years tender, ſo is he pure and innocent from theſe his Fathers doings: wherefore in as much as every man is charged only with the burthen of his own works and tranſgreſſions, neither ſhall the child (as the Scripture teacheth us) bear the iniquity of his Father: we ought therefore of duty and conſcience to pardon this young and tender Prince, and take compaſſion of his age as ye ſee. And now for ſo much as he is the Kings natural and Eldeſt Son, and muſt be our Soveraign and King, and ſucceſſor of this Kingdom; come and let us appoint him

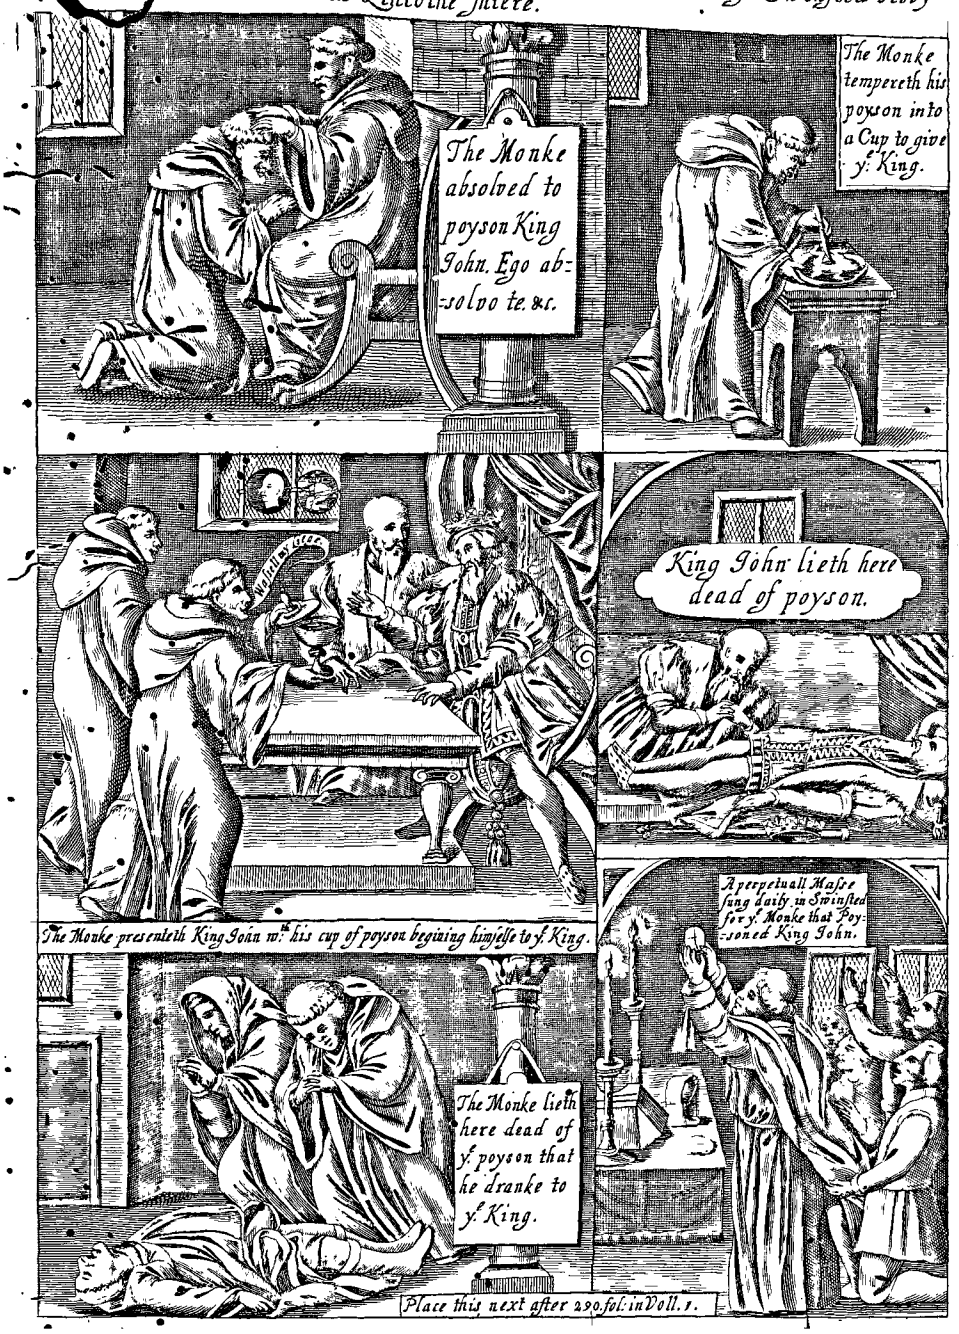
The description of y.e poysoning of King John by a Monke of Swinsted Abby in Lincolne Shiere.



Place this next after 290 fol: in Voll. 1.

him our King and Governour, and let us remove from us this Lewis the French Kings Son, and ſuppreſs his people, which is a confuſion and a ſhame to our nation, and the yoke of our ſervitude let us caſt off from our ſhoulders. To theſe words ſpake and anſwered the Earl of Gloceſter: And by what reaſon or right (ſaid he) can we ſo do, ſeeing we have called him hither, and have ſworn to him our fealty?

Whereunto the Earl Marſhal inferred again, and ſaid, Good right and reaſon we have, and ought of duty to do no leſs; for that he contrary to our mind and calling hath abuſed our affiance and fealties. Truth it is we called him, and meant to prefer him to be our Chieftain and Governor; but he eftſoons, ſurpriſed in pride, hath contemned and deſpiſed us: And if we ſhall ſo ſuffer him, he will ſubvert and overthrow both us and our nation, and ſo ſhall we remain a ſpectacle of ſhame to all men, and be as out caſts of all the world.

At theſe words all they, as inſpired from above, cryed all together with one voice, Be it ſo, he ſhall be our King. And ſo the day was appointed for his Coronation, which was the day of Simon and Jude. This Coronation was kept, not at Weſtminſter, forſomuch as Weſtminſter the ſame time was holden of the French-men, but at Gloceſter, the ſafeſt place (as was thought) at that time in the Realm, Anno 1216. by Swalo the Popes Legate, through Counſel of all the Lords and Barons that held with his Father King John, to wit, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Biſhop of Bath, Biſhop of Cheſter, and Biſhop of Worceſter, the Earl Radulph of Cheſter, William Earl Marſhal, William Earl of Pembroke, William Tren Earl of Feres, William de Brues, Serle or Samarike de Mal Baron. Theſe were at the Crowning of the King at Gloceſter. Many other Lords and Barons there were, which as yet held with Lewis the French Kings Son, to whom they had done their Homage before. And immediatly after the Crowning of this King, he held his Council at Briſtow at S. Martins feaſt; where were aſſembled eleven Biſhops of England and Wales, with divers Earls and Barons and Knights of England, all which did ſwear Fealty to the King. After which Homage thus done to the King, the Legate Swalo interdicted Wales, becauſe they held with the foreſaid Lewis; and alſo the Barons and all others, as many as gave help or Counſel to Lewis, or any other that moved or ſtirred any War againſt King Henry the new King, he accurſed them. All which notwithſtanding, the ſaid Lewis did not ceaſe, but firſt laid ſiege to the Caſtle of Dover fifteen days. When he could not prevail there, he took the Caſtle Berkhamſted, and alſo the Caſtle of Hertford, doing much harm in the Countries, in ſpoiling and robbing the people where he went: by reaſon whereof the Lords and Commons, which held with the King, aſſembled themſelves together to drive Lewis and his men out of the Land. But ſome of the Barons with the French-men in the mean ſeaſon went to Lincoln and took the City, and held it to the uſe of Lewis. Which being known, eftſoons a great power of the Kings part made thither, as Earl Ranulph of Cheſter, William Earl Marſhal, and William de la Brues Earl of Feres, with many other Lords, and gave battel unto Lewis and his party; ſo that in concluſion Lewis loſt the field, and of his ſide were ſlain the Earl of Parchis, Saer de Quincie Earl of Wincheſter, Henry de la Bohun Earl of Hertford, and Sir Robert le Fitzwater, with divers other more. Whereupon Lewis for ſuccor fled to London, cauſing the Gates there to be ſhut and kept, waiting there for more ſuccor out of France. Which as ſoon as the King had knowledge of, immediatly he ſent to the Maior and Burgeſſes of the City, willing them to render them and their City to him as their chief Lord and King, promiſing to grant tot hem again all their Franchiſes and liberties as in times paſt, and to confirm the ſame by his great Charter and Seal. In this mean time on Bartholomew Even, Euſtace a French Lord, accompanied with many other Lords and Nobles of France, come with a grand power, to the number of a 100 Ships to aid and aſſiſt the ſaid Lewis; who before they arrived, were encountred upon the Seas by Richard, King Johns Baſtard Son; who, having no more but eighteen Ships to keep the Cinque ports, ſet eagerly upon them, and through Gods Grace overcame them, where preſently he ſmote off the Head of Euſtace: the reſt of the French Lords, to the number of ten, he brought with him to the Land, where he impriſoned them in the Caſtle of Dover, and ſlew almoſt all their men that came with them, and ſunk their Ships in the Sea, only fifteen Ships (ſaith ſome of my ſtories) eſcaped away. Ludovike or Lewis hearing this loſs of his Ships and Men, and misdoubting his own life for the great miſchief he had done to the Realm, ſought means by Swalo and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and by other Lords, to be at accord with the King. With whom at length it was ſo concluded and agreed, that for his coſts and expenſes, he ſhould have a Thouſand pound of Silver given. Pariſienſis ſpeaketh of fifteen thouſand Marks (which he borrowed of the Londoners) that he ſhould depart the Realm never to return into England again, neither he nor none of his.

This done, upon the ſame he, with all the other Barons that took his part, was aſſoiled of Swalo the Legate. And thus peace being confirmed at Merton, Lewis took his leave, and being brought Honourably to the Sea with the Biſhop of Canterbury and other Biſhops, Earls and Barons, he returned home into France.

And here, ſaith Gisburn, it was truly verified that was before ſpoken of the French King, Father of Lewis. At what time the ſaid Lewis was in England, his Father the French King demanded of his Meſſengers coming into France, where his Son was? And they ſaid at Stamford. And he asking again whether he had got the Caſtle of Dover? And they ſaid no. Then the Father ſwearing by the Arm of Saint James: My Son (quoth he) hath not one foot in England, as afterward well proved true. Ex Gisburn.

But the chiefeſt help that repelled Lewis and the French men out of the Realm, and that moſt preferred King Johns Son to the Crown, was the ſingular working of Gods hand, whereof mention was made before: which was through the confeſſion of a certain Gentleman of the French Hoſt (as Florilegus doth teſtifie) who lying ſore ſick at the point of death, and ſeeing no hope to eſcape, was touched in conſcience for danger of his ſouls health, openly to confeſs and utter to the Barons of England, what was the purpoſe of the French-men to do; who were conſpired and ſworn together among themſelves, with a privy compaction, that ſo ſoon as they ſubdued the Land, they ſhould thruſt all the chief and Nobles thereof into perpetual exile out of the Realm, whereout they ſhould never return again. This coming to the ears of the Barons, as is ſaid, gave them to conſider more with themſelves, whereby many of them were the more willing to leave Lewis, and apply to their natural King and Prince. Which no leſs may alſo be an admonition to all times and ages for Engliſh-men to take heed, and not to admit or to place foreign Rulers into the Realm, leſt perhaps it follow that they be diſplaced themſelves.

After the happy departure of this Lewis and his French-men out of the Land, whereby the State of this Realm, long vexed before, was now ſomewhat more quieted; immediatly Swalo the Legate, looking to his Harveſt, directeth fourth Inquiſitors through every Shire, to ſearch out all ſuch Biſhops, Abbots, Proirs, Canons, and ſecular Prieſts, of what order or degree ſoever they were, that with any ſuccor or counſel did either help, or elſe conſented to Lewis. For all theſe were exempted out of the Charter of pardon and abſolution made before, between the King and Lewis. By reaſon whereof no ſmall gain grew to the Pope and the Cardinal; for all ſuch were either put out of their livings and ſent up to the Pope; or elſe were fain to fine ſweetly for them. Among whom (beſides a great number of other Clerks, both Religious and Secular) was Hugo Biſhop of Lincoln, who, for the recovery of his Biſhoprick, diſburſed 1000. Marks to the Pope, and 100. Marks to the foreſaid Swalo the Legate, who now (as Paris recordeth) by this time had gathered in a fair crop of that which he did never ſow. Ex Mat. Paris, &c.

About this ſeaſon, or not much before, died Pope Innocentius the third, in the nineteenth year of his Popedom, to whoſe cuſtody Fredricus the Nephew of Fredrick Barbaroſſa, being yet young, was committed by the Empreſs his Mother; of whom more ſhall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter. The effect of the Letter of Pope Honorius the third to King Henry the third. Ex Pariſienſ.

in a ſpecial Letter, exhorteth him to the love of Vertue, and to the fear of God, namely to be circumſpect with what Familiars and reſort he acquainted himſelf; but principally above all other things he moniſheth him to reverence the Church which is the Spouſe of Chriſt, and to honour the Miniſters thereof, in whom Chriſt himſelf (ſaith he) is both honoured and deſpiſed. And this ſeemeth the chiefeſt Article of that his writing to him.

A ſtrange tale of Pope Honorius, if it be true.

Of this Pope Honorius, Abbas Urſpergenſis (who lived in the ſame time) reporteth a ſtrange wonder, more ſtrange peradventure than credible; which is this, Honorius being Prieſt in Rome (whoſe name was then Centius) and Procurator to Jacinthus a Cardinal: ſo it befel, that his Maſter ſent him abroad about Rome, to borrow and procure money for him againſt his Journey into Spain: for Pope Clement then intended to ſend this Jacinthus his Legate into Spain. As this Centius was walking by himſelf all ſad and ſollicitous to ſpeed his Maſters Meſſage, there cometh to him a certain aged and reverend Father, and asketh him, What cauſe he had to walk ſo heavy and careful? To whom he anſwered again, and ſignified the occaſion of his buſineſs that then he had to do. Then the old Father ſaid to him, Go and return home again, for thy Maſter (ſaith he) ſhall not at this time go to Spain. How ſo (quoth the other) how is that true? As true (ſaith he) as it is certain that the Pope ſhall die, and thy ſaid Maſter ſhall be Pope after him. Centius, thinking that to be unlikely, ſaid, He could not believe that to be true. To whom the other inferreth again, So know this (ſaid he) to be as certain, as it is true that the City of Hieruſalem this day is taken of the Saracens, and ſhall not be recovered again from them, before the time of thy Papacy. And thus ſpeaking (ſaith Urſperg.) he vaded ſuddenly away. Ex Abbate Urſperg. All which (ſaith the ſaid Author) came afterwards to paſs, and were teſtified of the ſame Honorius, being Pope afterward, in his publick Sermons at Rome. All which I grant may be, and yet notwithſtanding this fabulous Narration may be a piece of the Popes old Practiſes, ſubtily invented to drive men forth to Hieruſalem to fight, &c. Again, after Honorius (when he had governed ten years) followed Gregorius the Ninth, which two Popes were in the time of this King Henry the Third, and of Frederick the Emperor; of whom we mind (Chriſt willing) further to touch, after that we ſhall have proſecuted more concerning the Hiſtory of King Henry, and matters of England.

Ex Abbate Urſperg. in Chronico.

After that it ſo pleaſed the merciful Providence of Almighty God, to work this great mercy upon the ſtock of King John (which notwithſtanding the unkind Prelates with their falſe Prophets had declared before, That never any of them ſhould ſucceed in the Throne after that King) and alſo unto the whole Common-wealth of the Realm, in delivering them from the dangerous Service of Ludovick and the foreſaid Frenchmen. After their departure, the next year following, Anno 1218. which was the third of this Kings Reign, the Archbiſhop S. Langton, and the Biſhops, Earls and Barons reſorted to London unto the King at Michaelmas next following, and there held a great Parliament, wherein were confirmed and granted by the King all the Franchiſes which were made and given by King John his Father at Ronemedow, and them he confirmed and ratified by his Charter; which long time after (ſaith mine Author) unto his days did continue, and were holden in England. For the which cauſe, by the Nobles and Commons was given and granted again unto the King two ſhillings for every plow-land through England. And Hubert Burgh was made Chief Juſtice of England, of whoſe Troubles more is to be ſaid hereafter. And this was the third year of King Henry, and the fiftieth year after the death of Thomas Becket: wherefore the ſaid Becket the ſame year next following was taken up and ſhrined for a new Saint made of an old Rebel. Thither came ſuch reſort of people of England and of France, that the Country of Kent was not ſufficient to ſuſtain them. Ex Hiſtoria D. Scales. About the ſame time Iſabel the Kings Mother was married to the Earl of March. And William Marſhall the good Earl died, which was the Governor of the King and the Realm, not without great lamentation of the people of England. Then was the King committed to the Government of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter. This noble Earl left behind him five Sons, and five Daughters.

The year next enſuing, Anno 1219. it was ordained and proclaimed through all the Land, that all Aliens and Foreigners ſhould depart the Realm, and not return to the ſame again, only ſuch excepted as uſed Traffick or Trade of Merchandize under the Kings ſafe Conduct. This Proclamation was thought chiefly to be ſet forth for this cauſe, to avoid out of the Land Foukes de Brent, Philip de Marks, Egelardus de Ciconia, William Earl Albemarle, Robert de Veteri ponte, Brihenne de Inſula, Hugo de Bailluell, Roger de Gaugi, with divers other ſtrangers more, which kept Caſtles and Holds of the Kings againſt his will. Of whom the forenamed Foukes was the Principal, who fortified and held the Caſtle of Bedford, which he had by the Gift of King John, with might and ſtrength againſt the King and his Power, near the ſpace of three months. Moreover he went about to apprehend the Kings Juſtices at Dunſtable; but they, being warned thereof, eſcaped all, except Henry Braibroke, whom he impriſoned in the ſaid Caſtle. The King hearing hereof, and conſulting with his Clergy and Nobles, made his Power againſt the ſame. Which after long Siege and ſome ſlaughter at length he obtained, and hanged almoſt all that were within, to the number of ninety and ſeven, which was (as Paris writeth) about the ſeventh or eighth year of his Reign. Foukes the ſame time was in Wales; who, hearing of the taking of the Caſtle, conveyed himſelf to the Church of Coventry. At length ſubmitting himſelf to the Kings mercy, upon conſideration of his Service done before to the Kings Father, he was committed to the Cuſtody of Euſtace Biſhop of London, and afterwards being deprived of all his Goods, Poſſeſſions and Tenements within the Realm, was forced to perpetual baniſhment, never to return to England again.

{Anno 1219} Aliens commanded out of England.

Foukes de Brent rebelled againſt King Henry.

Here (by the way) I find it noted in Paris, that after this aforeſaid Foukes had ſpoiled and razed the Church of Saint Paul in Bedford, for the building up of his Caſtle; the Abbeſs of Helveſtue, hearing thereof, cauſed the Sword to be taken from the Image of S. Paul ſtanding in the Church, ſo long as he remained unpuniſhed. Afterward ſhe, hearing him to be committed to the cuſtody of S. Paul in London, cauſed the Sword to be put into the hands of the Image again. Matth. Pariſienſ. in vita Henr. 3.

Ex Pariſienſ.

About this year the young King the ſecond time was crowned again at Weſtminſter, about which time began the new building of our Lady Church at Weſtminſter. Shortly after Gualo the Legate was called home again to Rome. For the holy Father (as Matth. Paris reporteth) being ſick of a Spiritual Dropſie, thought this Gualo (having ſo large occupying in England) to be able ſomewhat to cure his diſeaſe. And ſo that Legate returned with all his bags well ſtuffed, leaving Pandulph behind him to ſupply that Bayliwick of his great Grandfather the Pope.

King Henry crowned the ſecond time at Weſtminſter.

The life and acts of Pope Innocentius the Third are partly deſcribed before, how he intruded Stephen Langton againſt the Kings will into the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, ſtirring up alſo ſixty and four Monks of the ſame Church of Canterbury privily to work againſt the King. Moreover how he did Excommunicate the ſaid King as a publick Enemy of the Church, ſo long as the ſaid King withſtood his tyrannical doings, putting him and his whole Kingdom under interdiction, for the ſpace of five years and three months, and at length depoſed and deprived him from his Scepter, keeping it in his own hands for five days. How he abſolved his Subjects from their due Obedience and Subjection unto him. How he gave away his Kingdoms and Poſſeſſions to Lewis the French Kings Son, commanding the ſaid Lewis to ſpoil him both of lands and life. Whereupon the King (being forſaken of his Nobles, Prelates, and Commons) was inforced againſt his will to ſubmit himſelf, and ſware Obedience unto the Pope, paying unto him a yearly Tribute of 1000 Marks by year, for receiving his Kingdom again, whereby both he and his Succeſſors after him were Vaſſals afterwards unto the Pope. And theſe were the Apoſtolical Acts of this holy brought firſt into the Church the paying of private Tythes. He ordained the receiving once a year at Eaſter. Unto the Papal decretals he added the Decree, Omnes utriuſque ſexus, &c. Alſo the reſervation of the Sacrament, and the going with the Bell and light before the Sacrament was by him appointed. In the ſaid Council of Lateran he alſo ordained that the Canon of the Maſs ſhould be received with equal Authority, as though it had proceeded from the Apoſtles themſelves. He brought in Tranſubſtantiation. Look in the decrets, Titulo 1. De ſumma Trinit. & fide Catholica, cap. firmiter credimus.

Marriage in the third degree forbidden.

Item, the ſaid Innocentius the Third ordained that none ſhould marry in the third degree, but only in the fourth degree, and ſo under.

The ſaid Pope ſtirred up Otho againſt Philip the Emperor, becauſe the ſaid Philip was elected Emperor againſt his will; upon the occaſion whereof followed much war and ſlaughter in Germany. And afterward againſt the ſaid Otho, whom he had made Emperor, he ſet up Frederick King of Cicile, and cauſed the Archbiſhop of Maience to pronounce him Excommunicate in all his Titles, and to be depoſed of his Empire. For the which cauſe the Princes of Germany did invade his Biſhoprick, ſpoiling and burning his Poſſeſſions. The cauſe why the Pope ſo did accurſe and depoſe him, was, for that the ſaid Otho did take and occupy Cities, Towns and Caſtles, which the Pope ſaid appertained to him.

The Pope erreth Kings and Emperors together by the ears. Philip the Emperor depoſed. Otho the Emperor depoſed.

Item, the ſaid Pope Ordained, That if any Princes offended one another, the correction ſhould appertain unto the Pope. In this Council of Lateran were Archbiſhops and Primates 61, Biſhops 400, Abbots 12, Priors and Conventuals 800, beſides other Ambaſſadors, Legates, Doctors and Lawyers an innumerable ſort, &c.

The Council of Lateran.

In the Hiſtory of Hermanus Mutius, we read how in the year of our Lord, 1212. in this Popes time divers Noblemen, and others in the Country of Alſatia, contrary to the tradition of the Romiſh Popes, did hold that every day was free for eating of fleſh, ſo it be done ſoberly. Alſo that they did wickedly, which reſtrained Prieſts and Miniſters from their lawful Wives, for the which cauſe (as is in the foreſaid Author) by this Pope Innocentius the Third and his Biſhops, an hundred of them in one day were burned and martyred.

Martyrs of Alſatia to the number of one hundred burned in one day. Ex Hermann Mutio.

Some other Hiſtory (as Nauclerus) recordeth alſo, that at the ſame time many were in the City of Millain of the ſaid Doctrine, which uſed to ſend Collects unto the foreſaid Saints of Alſatia. Ex Nauclero.

Collects ſent from the Brethren of Millain to them of Alſatia.

In the Chronicle of Gualter Hemingford, otherwiſe called Gisburnenſis, it is recorded, that in the days of this King John and Pope Innocent, began the two Sects, or Orders of Fryers, one called The Preachers Order, and black Fryers of S. Dominick; the other called The Minorits of S. Francis. The Preachers of black Fryers Order began of one Dominick a Spaniard, about the parts of Tholouſe, who after he had laboured ten years in preaching againſt the Albingenſes, and ſuch other as did hold againſt the Church of Rome, afterward coming up to the Council of Lateran with Fulco Biſhop of Tholouſe, deſired of the foreſaid Innocent the Third, to have his order of preaching Fryers confirmed, which the Pope a great while refuſed to grant: at length he had a dream, that the Church of Lateran was ready to fall. Which when he beheld, fearing and much ſorrowing thereat, cometh in this Dominick, who with his ſhoulders underproped the Church, and ſo preſerved the building thereof from falling, &c. And right well this dream may ſeem verified, for the Fryers have been always the chief Pillars and Upholders of the Popes Church. Upon this the Pope (waking out of his dream) called Dominick to him, and granted his petition: and ſo came up this wolviſh Order of the Dominicks. I call it wolviſh, for that his Mother when ſhe was great with this Dominick, dreamed that ſhe had in her womb a Woolf, which had a burning Torch in his mouth. The which dream the Preachers of that Order do greatly advance, and expound to their Orders glory, as well as they can. Nevertheleſs, howſoever they expound it, they can make a Woolf but a Woolf, and this a wolviſh Order. The rule which they follow ſeemeth to be taken out of S. Auguſtine, as who ſhould ſay, That Chriſts Rule were not enough to make a Chriſtian man. Their profeſſion ſtandeth upon three principal Points, as thus deſcribed, Charitatem habentes, humilitatem ſervantes, & paupertatem voluntariam poſſidentes; That is, Having Charity, holding Humility, and poſſeſſing wilful Poverty. Their habit and clothing is black.

Obſervant Fryers began.

Dominick.

Fryers upholders of the Popes Church.

The Order of the Minors or Minorit-Fryers deſcended from one Francis an Italian of the City of Aſſiſium. This Aſſiſian-Aſs, who I ſuppoſe was ſome ſimple and rude Idiot, hearing upon a time how Chriſt ſent forth his Diſciples to preach, thought to imitate the ſame in himſelf and his Diſciples, and ſo left off his ſhooes: he had but one Coat, and that of courſe Cloth. In ſtead of a latchet to his ſhooe, and of a Girdle, he took about him an hempen Cord, and ſo he apparelled his Diſciples, teaching them to fulfill (for ſo he ſpeaketh) the perfection of the Goſpel, to apprehend poverty, and to walk in the way of holy ſimplicity. He left in writing, to his Diſciples and Followers, his Rule, which he called Regulam Evangelicam, The Rule of the Goſpel. As though the Goſpel of Chriſt were not a ſufficient Rule to all Chriſtian men, but it muſt take his perfection of frantick Francis. And yet for all that great preſumption of this Francis, and notwithanding this his rule, ſounding to the derogation of Chriſts Goſpel, he was confirmed by this Pope Innocent. Yea, and ſuch Fools this Francis found abroad, that not only he had Followers of his doltiſh Religion (both of the Nobles and unnobles of Rome) but alſo ſome there were, which builded Manſions for him and his Fryers. This Francis, as he was ſuperſtitious in caſting all things from him, as his Girdle, girding a Cord about him; ſo in outward chaſtiſing of himſelf, ſo ſtrait he was to his fleſh (leaving the ordinary remedy appointed by God) that in Winter ſeaſon he covered his body with Ice and Snow. He called poverty his Lady, he kept nothing over night. So deſirous he was of Martyrdom, that he went to Syria to the Soldan, which received him honourably. Whereby it may be thought, that (ſurely) he told not the truth, as S. John Baptiſt did in Herods houſe. For truth is ſeldom welcome in Courts, and in the world. But it is hard to make a Martyr of him which is no true Confeſſor. I will here paſs over the Fable, how Chriſt and his Saints did mark him with five wounds. Theſe Franciſcan or begging Fryers, although they were all under one Rule and clothing of S. Francis, yet they be divided into many Sects and Orders, ſome go on treen ſhooes or pattins, ſome barefooted, ſome regular Franciſcans or Obſervants, ſome Minors or Minorits, others be called Minimi, others of the Goſpel, others De Caputio. They all differ in many things, but accord in Superſtition and Hypocriſie. And for ſo much as we have here entred into the matter of theſe two Orders of Fryers, by the occaſion hereof I thought a little by the way to digreſs from our ſtory, in reciting the whole Catalogue or Rabblement of Monks, Fryers and Nuns of all Sects, Rules and Orders, ſet up and confirmed by the Pope. The names of whom here in order of the Alphabet follows.

The Minorite-Fryers deſcended from S. Francis.

Thus haſt thou, if thou pleaſe (gentle Reader) to know what Orders and what Sects of Religion have been ſet up by the Pope, the Catalogue and number of them all, ſo far as we could ſearch them out, not only in Books printed of late in Germany, namely by the reverend Father Martin Luther: but alſo conferred with another Engliſh Book which came to our hands, containing the ſame likes Notes of ancient Antiquity, the number of which Rabblement of religious perſons came to 101. Now as I have reckoned up the names and varieties of theſe prodigious Sects, it cometh to mind conſequently to infer the Propheſie of Hildegardis, as well againſt the whole rout of Romiſh Prelates, and the fall of that Church, as eſpecially againſt the begging Fryers, and ſuch other unprofitable bellies of the Church. This Hildegardis is holden of the Papiſts themſelves to be a great Propheteſs: whoſe Propheſie proceedeth in this manner, firſt againſt the Prieſts and Prelates of the Romiſh Church, as followeth.

The Propheſie of Hildegardis of the ruine of Rome, and againſt the begging Fryers.

Hildegardis a Nun, and (as many judged) a Propheteſs, lived in the year 1146. In her propheſies ſhe doth moſt grievouſly reprehend not only the wicked and abominable life of the ſpiritual Papiſts, but alſo the contempt of the Eccleſiaſtical Office, and alſo the horrible deſtruction of the Church of Rome. In a certain place ſhe hath theſe words, And now is the Law neglected among the ſpiritual people, which neglect to teach and to do good things; the Maſter likewiſe and the Prelates do ſleep, deſpiſing Juſtice and laying it aſide. In a certain Viſion the Church appeared to her in the ſhape of a woman, complaining that the Prieſts had berayed her face with duſt, and rent her coat, &c. and that they did not ſhine over the people, neither in Doctrine, neither in example of life; but rather contrariwiſe, that they have driven the innocent Lamb from them. She ſaid moreover, That all Eccleſiaſtical Order did every day become worſe and worſe, and that Prieſts did not teach but deſtroy the Law of God: and for theſe horrible Crimes and Impieties, ſhe threatneth and propheſieth unto them Gods moſt heavy wrath and diſpleaſure, and doleful puniſhments. There is no cauſe why the ſpiritual Papiſts ſhould flatter themſelves upon this, that ſhe promiſed again to the Miniſters of the Church thoſe goods things to follow, like as Johannes de Rupe ſciſſa doth, and other ſuch like Prophets; for they ſay, it will come to paſs, that they muſt repent before the times be amended. By which thing (undoubtedly) they mean the godly Miniſters in the reformed Churches, which for the moſt part were of the ſpiritual number, and yet did forſake the dihoneſt life and thoſe wicked Idolatries. Now, whereas the Prieſts and Monks; that is, the whole Rabble and Spiritualty do account Hildegard for a true Propheteſs; they ought to conſider that by her they are more ſeverely accurſed, not as by a woman, but as by God himſelf. And I pray you, what Abomination, Impiety, and Idolatry hath been committed ſince that time by the ſpiritualty? I will note here a certain Propheſie of hers, taken out of the common places of Henry Token, becauſe we ſee it manifeſtly fulfilled in our time. She propheſieth of the reformation of Religion, and ſaith that it ſhall be moſt godly.

A Proph for the eay of Romiſh Church.

Then ſhall the Crown of Apoſtolical Honour be divided, becauſe there ſhall be found no Religion among the Apoſtolical Order, and for that cauſe ſhall they deſpiſe the dignity of that Name, and ſhall ſet over them other men and other other Archbiſhops. Inſomuch that the Apoſtolick See of that time (by the diminution of his Honour) ſhall ſcarce have Rome, and a few other Countries thereabout under his Crown. And theſe things ſhall partly come to paſs by incurſion of Wars, and partly alſo by a Common Council and conſent of the ſpiritual and ſecular perſons. Then ſhall Juſtice flouriſh, ſo that in thoſe days men ſhall honeſtly apply themſelves to the ancient cuſtoms and diſcipline of ancient men, and ſhall obſerve them as ancient men did.

Theſe things thus premiſed, now will we come to the Propheſie of the foreſaid Hildegard, concerning the foreſaid Begging Fryers above mentioned, reciting her words, not only as they are printed in a Book printed of late in Germany; but alſo as my ſelf have ſeen and read, agreeing to the ſame Book word for word, and yet have the ſame to ſhew, written in old parchment leaves, in ſuch ſort, as the thing it ſelf moſt evidently declareth a great iniquity of time. The words of her Propheſie be theſe:

Hildegardis propheſying of Fryers and Monks.

In thoſe days ſhall ariſe a ſenſeleſs people, proud, greedy, without faith, and ſubtil, the which ſhall eat the ſins of the people, holding a certain Order of fooliſh devotion under the feigned Cloke of beggery, preferring themſelves above all others by their feigned devotion, arrogant in underſtanding, and pretending holineſs, walking without ſhamefaſtneſs or the fear of God, in inventing many new miſchiefs ſtrong and ſtout. But this Order ſhall be accurſed of all wiſe men and faithful Chriſtians. They ſhall ceaſe from all labour, and give themſelves over unto idleneſs, chooſing rather to live through flattery and begging. Moreover they ſhall together ſtudy how they may perverſly reſiſt the Teachers of the Truth, and ſlay them together with the Noblemen; how to ſeduce and deceive the Nobility, for the neceſſity of their living, and pleaſures of this world: for the Devil will graft in them four principal Vices, (that is to ſay) flattery, envy, hypocriſie, and ſlander. Flattery, that they may have large Gifts given them. Envy, when they ſee Gifts given to others, and not to them. Hypocriſie, that by falſe diſſimulation they may pleaſe men. Detraction, that they may extol and commend themſelves, and backbite others, for the praiſe of men, and ſeducing of the ſimple. Alſo they ſhall inſtantly preach, but without devotion or example of the Martyrs, and ſhall detract the ſecular Princes, taking away the Sacraments of the Church from the true Paſtors, receiving Alms of the poor, diſeaſed, and miſerable, and alſo aſſociating themſelves with the common people, having familiarity with women, inſtructing them how they ſhall deceive their Husbands and Friends by their flattery and deceitful words, and to rob their Husbands to give it unto them, for they will take all theſe ſtollen and evil gotten goods, and ſay, Give it unto us, and we will pray for you; ſo that they being curious to hide other mens faults, do utterly forget their own. And alas, they will receive all things of Rovers, Pickers, Spoilers, Thieves and Robbers, of Sacrilegious perſons, Uſurers and Adulterers, Hereticks, Schiſmaticks, Apoſtates, Whores and Bawds, of Noble men, Perjurers, Merchants, falſe Judges, Souldiers, Tyrants, Princes, of ſuch as live contrary to the Law, and of many perverſe and wicked men, following the perſwaſion of the Devil, the ſweetneſs of ſin, a delicate and tranſitory life, and fulneſs; even unto eternal damnation.

All theſe things ſhall manifeſtly appear in them unto all people, and they (day by day) ſhall wax more wicked and hard hearted: and when as their wickedneſs and deceits ſhall be found out, then ſhall their gifts ceaſe, and then ſhall they go about their houſes hungry, and as mad dogs looking down upon the Earth, and drawing in their necks as Doves, that they might be ſatisfied with bread. Then ſhall the people cry out upon them: Woe be unto you ye miſerable children of ſorrow, the world hath ſeduced you, and the Devil hath bridled your mouths, your fleſh is frail, and your hearts without ſavour, your minds have been unſtedfaſt, and your eyes delighted in much vanity and folly, your dainty bellies deſire delicate meats, your feet are ſwift to run unto miſchief. Remember when you were apparently Bleſſed, yet envious; poor in ſight, but rich; ſimple to ſee to, but mighty flatterers, unfaithful betrayers, perverſe detractors, holy hypocrites, ſubverters of the truth, overmuch upright, proud, unſhamefaſt, unſtedfaſt teachers, delicate martyrs, confeſſors for gain; meek, but ſlanderers; religious, but covetous; humble, but proud; pitiful, hard hearted liers; pleaſant flatterers, perſecutors, oppreſſors of the poor, bringing in new ſects newly invented of your ſelves; merciful thought, but found wicked; lovers of the world, ſellers of pardons, ſpoilers of benefices, unprofitable orators, ſeditious conſpirators, drunkards, deſirers of honours, maintainers of miſchief, robbers of the world, unſatiable preachers, menpleaſers, ſeducers of women, and ſowers of diſcord, of whom Moſes the glorious Prophet ſpake very well in his ſong, A people without counſel or underſtanding: would to God they did know and underſtand and foreſee the end. You have builded up on high, and when you could aſcend no higher, then did you fall even as Simon Magus, whom God overthrew, and did ſtrike with a cruel plague; ſo you likewiſe through your falſe Doctrine, naughtineſs, lies, detractions, and wickedneſs, are come to ruine. And the people ſhall ſay unto them, Go ye Teachers of wickedneſs, Subverters of the Truth, Brethren of the Sunamite, Fathers of Hereſies, falſe Apoſtles, which have fained your ſelves to follow the life of the Apoſtles, and yet have not fulfilled it in part: ye Sons of Iniquity, we will not follow the knowledge of your ways, for Pride and Preſumption hath deceived you, and inſatiable Concupiſcence hath ſubverted your erroneous hearts. And when as you would aſcend higher than was meet or comely for you (by the juſt Judgment of God) you are fallen back into perpetual opprobry and ſhame.

This Hildegardis (whoſe Propheſie we have mentioned) lived about the year of our Lord 1146. as we read in Chronico Martini.

About the ſame time that theſe Franciſcans and Dominick Fryers began (which are above mentioned) ſprang up alſo the Croſs-bearers, or Crouched-Fryers, taking their Original and occaſion of Innocent the Third, which Innocent raiſed up an Army (ſigned with a croſs on their Breaſt) to fight againſt the Albingenſes, whom the Pope and his Sect accounted for Hereticks about the parts of Tholouſe. What theſe Albingenſes were, it cannot be well gathered by the old Popiſh Hiſtories: for if there were any that did hold, teach or maintain againſt the Pope or his Papal pride, or withſtand and gainſay his beggerly Traditions, Rites, and Religions, &c. the Hiſtorians of that time (for the moſt part in writing of them) do ſo deprave and miſreport them (ſuppreſſing the truth of their Articles) that they make them and paint them forth to be worſe than Turks and Infidels. And that, as I ſuppoſe, cauſed Matth. Pariſienſis and others of that ſort, to write ſo of them as they did: otherwiſe it is to be thought (and ſo I find in ſome Records) that the Opinions of the ſaid Albingenſes were ſound enough, holding and profeſſing nothing elſe but only againſt the wanton Wealth, Pride and Tyranny of the Prelates, denying the Popes Authority to have ground of the Scriptures: neither could they away with their Ceremonies and Traditions, as Images, Pardons, Purgatory of the Romiſh Church, calling them (as ſome ſay) blaſphemous Occupyings, &c. Of theſe Albingenſes were ſlain (at times) and burned a great multitude by the means of the Pope, and Simon Eccleſiaſticus, with others more. It ſeemeth, that theſe Albingenſes were chiefly abhorred of the Pope, becauſe they ſet up a contrary Pope againſt him about the coaſts of Burgarorum: for the which cauſe the Biſhop called Portinenſis, being the Popes Legate in thoſe quarters, writeth to the Archbiſhop of Rone and other Biſhops in this wiſe:

For ſo much as mention is here made of theſe ſuperſtitious Sects of theſe Friers, and ſuch other beggerly Religions, it might ſeem not much impertinent, being moved by the occaſion hereof, as I have done in Hildegardis before, ſo now to annexe alſo to the ſame a certain other ancient Treatiſe compiled by Geoffery Chaucer, by the way of a Dialogue or Queſtions, moved in the perſon of a certain uplandiſh and ſimple Ploughman of the country. Which Treatiſe, for the ſame, the Author intituled Jack Upland, wherein is to be ſeen and noted to all the world, the blind ignorance and variable diſcord of theſe irreligious Religions, how rude and unskilful they are in matters and principles of our Chriſtian inſtitution, as by the contents of this preſent Dialogue appeareth, the words whereof in the ſame old Engliſh wherein firſt it was ſet forth in this wiſe do proceed. Wherein alſo thou mayeſt ſee, that it is no new thing that their blaſphemous doings have by divers good men in old time been detected, as there are many and divers other old Books to ſhew.

The blind ignorance of Friers deſcribed.

A Treatiſe of Geoffery Chaucer, intituled, Jack Upland.

The Fruits of Anti-chriſt.

I Jack Upland make my mone to very God and to all true in Chriſt, that Antichriſt and his Diſciples (by colour of holineſs) walking and deceiving Chriſts Church by many falſe figures, where through (by Antichriſt and his) many vertues been tranſpoſed to vices.

Antichriſt his brood.

But the felleſt folk, that ever Antichriſt found, been laſt brought into the Church and in a wonder wiſe, for they been of divers Sects of Antichriſt, ſown of divers countries and kindreds. And all men known well, that they be not obedient to Biſhops, ne Leegemen to Kings: neither the tillen, ne ſowen, weeden, ne repen, wood, corn, ne graſs, neither nothing that man ſhould help: But only themſelves their lives to ſuſtain. And theſe men han all manner power of God as they ſeein in Heaven and in Yearth, to ſell Heaven and Hell to whom that them liketh, and theſe wretches weet never were to been themſelfs.

Patience proveth maſter trier.

And therefore (Freer) in thine orders and rules been grounded on Goddis Law, tell thou me Jack Upland, that I aske of thee, and if thou be or thinkeſt to be on Chriſts ſide keep thy paciens.

The Frier muſt anſwer according to Gods word.

SAint Paul teacheth, that all our deeds ſhould be doo in charity, and elſe it is nought worth, but diſpleaſing to God and harme to our own ſouls. And for that Freers challenge to be greateſt Clerks of the Church, and next following Chriſt in living: Men ſhould for charity âx them ſome Queſtions, and pray them to ground their anſwers in reaſon and holy writ, for elſe their anſwer would nought be worth, be it floriſhed never ſo fair: and as mee think men might skilully ask thus of a Freer.

Friers may better break Gods Law then Mans Law.

1. ℭ Freer, how many orders be in Earth, and which is the perfecteſt order? Of what order art thou? who made thine order? What is thy rule? Is there any perfecter rule then Chriſt himſelf made? If Chriſts rule be moſt perfect, why ruleſt thou thee not thereafter? Without more, why ſhall a Freer be more puniſhed if he break the rule that his patron made, then if he break the heſts that God himſelf made?

There is but one Religion.

2. Approoveth Chriſt any more religions then one, that S. James ſpeaketh of? If he approoveth no more, why haſt thou left his rule and takeſt another? Why is a Freer Apoſtata that leaveth his order and taketh another Sect, ſith there is but one Religion of Chriſt?

The Frier more bound to his habit then the Man to his Wife.

3. Why be you wedded faſter to your habits then a man is to his wife? For a man may leave his wife for a year or two as many men done: and if you leave your habit a quarter of a year, ye ſhould be holden Apoſtatas.

The habit make the Frier religious, as his habit weareth, ſo doth his religion.

4. Maketh your habit you men of religion or no? If it do, then ever as it weareth, your Religion weareth, and after that your habit is better, your religion is better, and when you have liggen it beſide, then lig ye your religion beſide you, and bin Apoſtatas: why bie you ſo pretious clothes? ſith no man ſeeketh ſuch but for vain glory, as S. Gregory ſaith.

Holineſs of all Hypocrites conſiſteth in clothing and outward appearance.

What betokeneth your great hood, your ſcalpery, your knotted girdle, and your wide cope?

5. Why uſe ye all one colour, more then other Chriſtian Men doo? What betokeneth that ye been clothed all in one manner of clothing?

If ye ſay, it betokeneth love and charity, Certes then ye be oft Hypocrits, when any of you hateth another, and in that that ye wooll be ſaid holy by your clothing.

Why may not a Freer wear clothing of another Sect of Friers, ſith holineſs ſtondeth not in the cloths?

6. Why hold ye ſilence in one Houſe more then another, ſith men ought over all to ſpeak the good and leave the evil?

Why eat you fleſh in one Houſe more then in another, if your rule and your order be perfect, and the Patron that made it?

All Friers fond liers.

7. Why get you your diſpenſations to have it more eaſie? Certes, either it ſeemeth that ye be unperfect, or he that made it ſo hard, that ye may not hold it, And ſiker, if ye hold not the rule of your Patrons, ye be not then her Freers, and ſo ye lie upon your ſelves.

Friers be dead Men and quick beggers.

8. Why make you as dead Men when ye be profeſſed, and yet ye be not dead, but more quick beggers then ye were before? And it ſeemeth evil a dead Man to go about and beg.

Graves beat dead men and not courts Houſes.

9. Why will yee not ſuffer your noviſes hear your Councels in your Chapter Houſe ere that they have been profeſſed, if your Councels been true and after Gods Law?

10. Why make ye you ſo coſtly Houſes to dwell in? ſith Chriſt did not ſo, and dead Men ſhould have but graves, as falleth it to dead Men, and yet ye have more Courts then many Lords of England: For ye now wenden through the Realm, and each night will lig in your own Courts, and ſo mow but few right Lords do.

11. Why heire you to ferth your limitors, giving therefore eᵭh year a certain rent, and will not ſuffer one in anothers limitation, right as yee were your ſelves Lords of Countries?

Friers not the Kings Liegemen.

Why be ye not under your Biſhops Viſitations, and leege men to our King?

Friers need no mens prayers.

Why axe ye no letters of bretherheds of other men prayers, as ye deſire that other men ſhould axe letters of you?

If your letters be good, why grant ye them not generally to all manner of men for the more charity?

Friers greater and better then God.

12. Mow ye make any man more perfect brether for your prayers then God hath by our believe? By our baptiſm and his own grant? If ye mow, Certes then ye be above God.

O uncharitable Friers.

Why make ye men believe that your golden trental ſong of you, to take therefore ten ſhillings, or at leaſt five ſhillings, wool bring Souls out of Hell, or out of Purgatory? If this be ſooth, Certes ye might bring all Souls out of pain, and that wool ye nought, and then ye be out of charity.

13. Why make ye men believe that he that is buried in your habit ſhall never come in Hell, and ye weet not of your ſelf whether ye ſhall to Hell or no? and if this were ſooth, ye ſhould ſell your high Houſes to make many habits for to ſave many mens Souls.

Friers ſtealers of mens children.

14. Why ſteal ye mens children for to make hem of your Sect, ſith that theft is againſt Gods heſts, and ſith your Sect is not perfect? ye know not whether the rule, that ye bind him to, be beſt for him or worſt.

15. Why

15. Why undermene ye not your brethren for their treſpaſs after the Law of the Goſpel, ſith that undermening is the beſt that may be? But ye put them in priſon oft when they do after Gods Law, and by S. Auguſtines rule, If any do amiſs and would not amend him, ye ſhould put him from you.

Shrift and burials were more gainful than the miniſtring of the Sacraments.

16. Why covet ye ſhrifts and burying of other mens pariſhens, and none other Sacrament that falleth to Chriſtian folk.

Why buſſy ye not to hear to ſhrift of poor folk as well as of rich Lords and Ladies, ſith they mow have more plenty of ſhrift Fathers than poor folk mow.

Why ſay ye not the Goſpel in houſes of bedred men, as ye do in rich mens that mow go to Church and hear the Goſpel?

Poor men have no meals, ſaith my fellow frier.

Why covet you not to bury poor folk among you? ſith that they bin moſt holy (as ye ſaine that ye been for your poverty?)

17. Why will ye not be at hir dirges as ye have bin at rich mens? ſith God praiſeth him more then he doth other men.

Theſe be they that will not enter themſelves, nor ſuffer other men that would.

What is thy Prayer worth? ſith thou wilt take therefore, for all Chapriſts ye need be moſt wiſe for dread of Simony.

What cauſe haſt thou that thou wilt not Preach the Goſpel, as God ſaith that thou ſhouldeſt? ſith it is the beſt lore and alſo our believe.

Why be ye evil apaid that ſecular Prieſts ſhould Preach the Goſpel? ſith God himſelf hath bodden hem.

The Frier getteth by In Principio, and yet hateth the Goſpel.

18. Why hate ye the Goſpel to be Preached, ſith ye be ſo much hold thereto? For ye win more by year with In Principio, then with all the rules that ever your patrons made, and in this minſtrels bin better then ye, for they contrarien not to the mirths that they maken, but ye contrarien the Goſpel both in word and deed.

Judas for thirty pence but the Prieſt and Frier for four pence ſelleth Chriſt. A compariſon betweed Judas and the Frier.

19. Freer, when thou receiveſt a penny for to ſay a Maſs, whether ſelleſt thou Gods body for that penny, or thy prayer, or elſe thy travel? If thou ſaieſt thou wolt not travel for to ſay the Maſs, but for the penny, that certes if this be ſooth, then thou loveſt too little meed for thy ſoul: and if thou ſelleſt Gods body, other thy prayer, then it is very Simony, and art become a Chapman worſe then Judas that ſold it for thirty pence.

The Frier writeth becauſe God forgetteth.

20. Why writeſt thou her names in thy Tables that yeveth thee money? ſith God knoweth all things: For it ſeemeth by thy writing that God would not reward him, but thou writeſt in thy Tables, God would els forgotten it.

Why beareſt thou God in hand and ſlandereſt him that he begged for his meat? ſith he was Lord over all, for then had he bin unwiſe to have begged, and have no need thereto.

Freer, after what law ruleſt thou thee? where findeſt thou in Gods law that thou ſhouldeſt thus beg?

21. What manner men needeth for to beg?

For whom oweth ſuch men to beg?

Why beggeſt thou ſo for thy Brethren?

If thou ſaiſt, for they have need, then thou doſt it for the more perfection, or els for the leaſt, or els for the mean. If it be the moſt perfection of all, then ſhould all thy brethren do ſo, and then no man needed to beg but for himſelf, for ſo ſhould no man beg but him needed. And if it be the leaſt perfection, why loveſt thou then other men more then thy ſelf? For ſo thou art not well in charity, ſith thou ſhouldeſt ſeek the more perfection after thy power, living thy ſelf moſt after God. And thus leaving that imperfection thou ſhouldeſt not ſo beg for them. And if it is a good mean thus to beg as thou doeſt, then ſhould no man do ſo, but they bin in this good mean, and yet ſuch a mean granted to you may never be grounded on Gods law; for then both lerid and leaud that bin in mean degree of this world, ſhould go about and beg as ye do. And if all ſhould do ſo, certes well nigh all the world ſhould go about and beg as ye done, and ſo ſhould there be ten beggers againſt one yever.

It is better to labour and give, then to loiter and beg. Maiſter frier.

Why procureſt thou men to yeve thee their Alms, and ſaieſt it is ſo needful, and thou wilt not thy ſelf win thee that meed?

22. Why wilt not thou beg for poor bedred men that bin poorer then any of your ſect? That liggen and mow not go about to help himſelfes, ſith we be all brethren in God, and that bretherhed paſſeth any other that ye or any man could make, and where moſt need were, there were moſt perfection, either els ye hold them not your pure brethren, but worſe, but then ye be unperfect in your begging?

Why make ye ſo many maſters among you? ſith it is againſt the teaching of Chriſt and his Apoſtles?

23. Whoſe been all your rich Courts that ye han, and all your rich Jewels? ſith ye ſaine that ye han nought ne in proper ne in common. If ye ſaine they been the Popes, why gether ye then of poor Men and Lords ſo much out of the Kings hand to make your Pope rich? And ſith ye ſaine that it is great perfection tō have nought in proper ne in common, why be ye ſo faſt about to make the Pope that is your Father rich, and put on him imperfection? ſithen ye ſaine that your goods been all his, and he ſhould by reaſon be the moſt perfect man, it ſeemeth openlich that ye been curſed children ſo to ſlander your Father and make him imperfect. And if ye ſaine that the goods be yours, then do ye aienſt your rule, and if it be not aienſt your rule, then might ye have both Plough and Cart, and labor as other good men done, and not ſo to beg by loſengery, and idle as ye doone. If ye ſay that it is more perfection to beg, then to travel or to worch with your hand, why preach ye not openly and teach all men to do ſo? ſith it is the beſt and moſt perfect life to the help of their Souls, as ye make children to beg that might have been rich heirs.

Friers beg from all men to make the Pope rich.

If it be imperfection to be rich, why do the friers deſire to make the Pope unperfect.

Why make ye not your feaſts to poor men and yeveth him yefts, as ye done to the rich? ſith poor man han more need then the rich.

What betokeneth that ye go twain and twain together? If ye be out of charity, ye accord not in ſoul.

Why beg ye and take ſalaries thereto more then other Prieſts? ſith he that moſt taketh, moſt charge hath.

If Francis order be contrary to Chriſt his teſtament then is Francis accurſed.

24. Why hold ye not S. Francis rule and his teſtament? ſith Francis ſaith, that God ſhewed him this living and this rule: and Certes if it were Gods will, the Pope might not fordo it; or elſe Francis was a lier that ſaid on this wiſe. And but this teſtament that he made accord with Gods will, or elſe erred he as a lier that were out of charity: and as the Law ſaith, he is accurſed that letteth the rightful laſt will of a dead man. And this teſtament is the laſt will of Francis that is a dead man; it ſeemeth therefore that all his Freers been curſed.

He that is more holy in hand then in heart, is falſe to God.

25. Why will you not touch no coined money with the croſs, ne with the Kings head, as ye done other Jewels both of Gold and Silver? Certes if ye deſpiſe the Croſs or the Kings Head, then ye be worthy to be deſpiſed of God and the King; and ſith you will receive money in your hearts, and not with your hands, and it ſeemeth that ye hold more holines in your hands then in your hearts, and then be falſe to God.

A ſubject to exempt himſelf from the Laws of his Prince ſmelleth of Treaſon.

26 Why have ye exempt you from our Kings Laws and viſiting of our Biſhops more then other Chriſten men that liven in this Realm, if ye be not guilt of Traitory to our Realm, or treſpaſſers to our Biſhops? But ye will have the Kings Laws for the treſpaſs do to you, and ye will have power of other Biſhops more then other Prieſts, and alſo have leave to priſon your brethren, as Lords in your Courts, more then other folks han that been the Kings leege men.

Friers are forced to be thieves.

27. Why ſhall ſome ſect of your Freers pay ech a year a certain to her general Provincial or Miniſter, or elſe to her Sovereigns? but if he ſteal a certain number of children (as ſome men ſaine) and certain if this been ſooth, then ye be conſtrained upon a certain pain to doe theft againſt Gods commandment, Non furtum facies.

Works of ſuperogation.

28. Why be ye ſo hardy to grant by Letters of Fraternity to men and women, that they ſhall have part and merit of all your good deeds, and ye weeten never whether God be apaid with your deeds becauſe of your ſin? Alſo ye witten never whether that man or woman be in ſtate to be ſaved or damned, then ſhall he have no merit in Heaven for his own deeds ne for none other mans. And all were it ſo, that he ſhould have part of your good deeds: yet ſhould he have no more then God would give him after that he were worthy, and ſo much ſhall each man have of Gods yeft without your limitation. But if ye will ſay that ye been Gods fellows, and that he may not do without your aſſent, then be ye blaſphemers to God.

God is the limiter of meed and reward, and not the Frier.

29. What

Fryers will not pray, but for them that be of their Fraternity.

29. What betokeneth that ye have ordained, that when ſuch one as ye have made your Brother or Siſter, and hath a Letter of your Seal, that Letter mought be brought in your holy Chapter and there be read, or elſe ye will not pray for him. And but ye willen pray eſpecially for all other that were not made your brethren or ſiſtren, then were we not in right charity, for that ought to be commen, and namely in ghoſtly things.

Fryers do make Apoſtates.

30. Freer, What Charity is this, to overcharge the people by mighty begging under colour of preaching or praying, or Maſſes ſinging? ſith holy Write biddeth not thus, but even the contrary: for all ſuch ghoſtly deeds ſhould be done freely, as God yeveth them freely?

31. Freer, What Charity is this to beguile Children or the commen to diſcretion, and bind hem to your Orders that bin not grounded in Gods Law againſt her Friends will? ſithen by this folly bin many Apoſtatas both in will and deed, and many bin Apoſtatas in her will during all her life, that would gladly be diſcharged if they wiſt how, and ſo many bin Apoſtatas that ſhoulden in other States have bin true men.

The number of Fryers ſuperfluous, and as needſary as ten fingers on one hand.

32. Freer, What Charity is this, to make ſo many Freers in every Country to the charge of the people? ſith Parſons and Vicars alone, yea ſecular Prieſts alone, yea Monks and Canons alone, with Biſhops above them were inough to the Church to do the Prieſts Office. And to add more then inough is a foul error, and great charge to the people, and this openly againſt Gods will that ordained all things to be done in weight, number and meaſure. And Chriſt himſelf was apaid with twelve Apoſtles and a few Diſciples, to preach and to do Prieſts Office to all the whole world, then was it better done then is now at this time by a thouſand dele. And right ſo as four fingers with a thumb in a mans hand helpeth a man to worch, and double number of fingers in one hand ſhould let him more, and ſo the more number that there were paſſing the meaſure of Gods Ordinance, the more were a man letted to worch: right ſo (as it ſeemeth) it is of theſe new Orders that bin added to the Church without ground of holy Write and Gods Ordinance.

See, ſo faſt the Fryer followeth Chriſt in his Poverty.

33. Freer, What Charity is this, to the people to lye, and ſay that ye follow Chriſt in poverty more than other men done? and yet in curious and coſtly houſing, and fine and precious clothing, and delicious and liking feeding, and in Treaſure and Jewels, and rich Ornaments, Freers paſſen Lords and other rich wordly men, and ſooneſt they ſhould bring her cauſe about (be it never ſo coſtly) though Gods Law be put back.

Fryers are the letters of preaching the Goſpel.

34. Freer, What Charity is this, to gather up the Books of holy write, and put hem in treaſory, and ſo empriſon them from ſecular Prieſts and Curates, and by this cautel let hem to preach the Goſpel freely to the people without wordly meed, and alſo to defame good Prieſts of Hereſie, and lien on hem openly for to let hem to ſhew Gods Law by the holy Goſpel to the Chriſtian people?

What holineſs is in a Fryers coat.

35. Freer, What Charity is this, to fain ſo much holineſs in your bodily clothing (that you clepe your habit) that many blind Fools deſiren to die therein more than in another? and alſo that a Freer, that leaveth his habit late founden of men, may not be aſſoiled till he take again, but is Apoſtata as ye ſain, and curſed of God and man both? The Freer believeth truth, and patience, chaſtity, meekneſs and ſobriety, yet for the more part of his life he may ſoon be aſſoiled of his Prior, and if he bring home to his houſe much good by the year (be it never ſo falſely begged and pilled of the poor and needy people in Countries about) he ſhall be hold a noble Freer. O Lord whether this be Charity?

The ſtouter begger the nobler Fryer.

Why Fryers ſo much deſire to have rich men buried in their Fryeries.

36. Freer, What Charity is this, to preaſe upon a rich man, and to intice him to be buried among you from his Pariſh-Church, and to ſuch rich men give Letters of Fraternity confirmed by your general Seal, and thereby to bear him in hand that he ſhall have part of all your Maſſes, Mattens, Preachings, Faſtings, Wakings, and all other good deeds done by your Brethren of your Order (both whilſt he liveth, and after that he is dead) and yet ye witten never whether your deeds be acceptable to God, ne whether that man that hath that Letter be able by good living to receive any part of your deeds, and yet a poor man (that ye wite well or ſuppoſen in certen to have no good of) ye ne given no ſuch Letters, though he be a better man to God than ſuch a rich man: nevertheleſs, this poor man doth not retch thereof. For as men ſuppoſen ſuch Letters and many other that Freers behotten to men, be full falſe deceits of Freers, out of all reaſon, and Gods Law and Chriſtian mens faith.

Fryers beheſts are falſe deceits.

Fryers deſire to be Lords and Ladies Confeſſors.

37. Freer, What Charity is this, to be Confeſſors of Lords and Ladies, and to other mighty men, and not amend hem in her living? but rather as it ſeemeth, to be the bolder to pill her poor Tenants, and to live in lechery, and there to dwell in your Office of Confeſſor for winning of worldly goods, and to be hold great by colour of ſuch ghoſtly Offices? this ſeemeth rather pride of Freers, than charity of God.

Fryers and Phariſees ſay one thing and do another.

38. Freer, What Charity is this, to ſain that who ſo liveth after your Order, liveth more perfectly, and next followeth the ſtate of Apoſtles in poverty and penitance, and yet the wiſeſt and greateſt Clerks of you wend or ſend, or procure to the Court of Rome to be made Cardinals or Biſhops of the Popes Chaplains, and to be aſſoiled of the vow of Poverty and Obedience to your Miniſters, in the which (as ye ſain) ſtandeth more perfection and merit of your Orders, and thus ye farren as Phariſees that ſain one and do another to the contrary.

Why name ye more the Patron of your Order in your Confiteor when ye begin Maſs, then other Saints, Apoſtles, or Martyrs, that holy Church hold more glorious then hem, and clepe hem your Patrons and your Avowries?

Dilemma.

Freer, Whether was S. Francis in making of his rule that he ſet thine Order in, a Fool and a Lyar, or elſe wiſe and true? If ye ſain that he was not a Fool, but wiſe ne a Lyar but true: why ſhew you contrary by your doing, when by your ſuggeſtion to the Pope ye ſaid, That your Rule that Francis made was ſo hard that ye mow not live to hold it without Declaration and Diſpenſation of the Pope, and ſo by your deed? Ne let your Patron be a Fool that made a Rule ſo hard that no man may well keep, and eke your deed proveth him a Lyar, where he ſaith in his Rule, That he took and learned it of the Holy Ghoſt. For how might ye for ſhame pray the Pope undo that the Holy Ghoſt bit, as when ye prayed him to diſpence with the hardneſs of your Order?

Which is the beſt Order of Fryers.

Freer, Which of the four Orders of Freers is beſt to a man that knoweth not which is the beſt, but would fain enter into the beſt, and none other? If thou ſayeſt that thine is the beſt, then ſaieſt thou that none of the other is as good as thine, and in this each Freer in the three other Orders wooll ſay that thou lyeſt, for in the ſelf manner each other Freer wooll ſay that his Order is beſt. And thus to each of the four Orders bin the other three contrary in this point: in the which if any ſay ſooth, that is one alone, for there may but one be the beſt of four. So followeth it that if each of theſe Orders anſwered to this queſtion as thou doſt, three were falſe, and but one true, and yet no man ſhould wite who that were. And thus it ſeemeth, that the moſt part of Freers bin or ſhould be Lyers in this point, and they ſhould anſwer thereto. If you ſay that another Order of the Freers is better than thine, or as good; why took ye not rather thereto as to the better, when thou mightſt have choſe at the beginning? And eke why ſhouldſt thou be an Apoſtata to leave thine Order and take thee to that is better, and ſo why goeſt thou not from thine Order in that?

Fryers never agree one with another.

Freer, Is there any perfecter rule of Religion than Chriſt Gods Son gave in his Goſpel to his Brethren? Or then that Religion that S. James in his Epiſtle maketh mention of? If you ſay Yes, then putteſt thou on Chriſt (that is the Wiſdome of God the Father) unkunning, unpower, or evil will: for then he could not make his Rule ſo good as another did his. And ſo he had unkunning, that he might not ſo make his Rule ſo good as another man might, and ſo were he unmighty, and not God, as he would not make his Rule ſo perfect as another did his, and ſo he had bin evil willed, namely to himſelf.

The Fryer thinketh his Rule perfecter than Chriſts, becauſe he leaveth the one and followeth the other.

For if he might and could, and would have made a Rule perfect without default, and did not, he was not Gods Son Almighty. For if any other Rule be perfecter than Chriſts, then muſt Chriſts Rule lack of that perfection by as much as the other weren more perfecter, and ſo were default, and Chriſt had failed in making of his Rule: but to put any default or failing in God is blaſphemy. If thou ſay

ſay that Chriſts Rule, and that Religion which S. James maketh mention of, is perfecteſt; why holdeſt thou not thilk Rule without more? And why clepeſt thou the rather of S. Francis or S. Dominicks Rule or Religion or Order, than of Chriſts Rule or Chriſts Order?

Freer, Canſt thou aſſign any default in Chriſts Rule of the Goſpel (with the which he taught all men ſikerly to be ſaved) if they kept it to her ending? If thou ſay it was too hard, then ſayſt thou Chriſt lyed; for he ſaid of his Rule, My Yoke is ſoft, and my Burthen light. If thou ſay Chriſts Rule was too light, that may be aſſigned for no default, for the better it may be kept. If thou ſayſt that there is no default in Chriſts Rule of the Goſpel, ſith Chriſt himſelf ſaith it is light and eaſie: what need was it to Patrons of Freers to add more thereto? and ſo to make an harder Religion to ſave Freers, than was the Religion of Chriſts Apoſtles and his Diſciples helden and were ſaved by? But if they wonlden that her Freers ſaten above the Apoſtles in Heaven for the harder Religion that they keepen here, ſo would they ſitten in Heaven above Chriſt himſelf, for their more and ſtrict Obſervations, then ſo ſhould they be better than Chriſt himſelf with miſchance.

Freers would ſit in Heaven above the Apoſtles.

Go now forth and frain your Clerks, and ground ye you in Gods Law, and gif Jack an anſwer, and when ye han aſſoiled me that I have ſaid ſadly in truth, I ſhall ſoil thee of thine Orders, and ſave thee to Heaven.

If Freers kun not or mow not excuſe hem of theſe queſtions asked of hem, it ſeemeth that they be horrible guilty againſt God, and her even Chriſtian; for which guilts and defaults it were worthy that the Order that they call their Order were foredone. And it is wonder that men ſuſtain hem or ſuffer her live in ſuch manner. For holy write biddeth, That thou do well to the meek, and give not to the wicked, but forbed to give hem bread, leaſt they be made thereby mightier through you.

After theſe Digreſſions, now to return to the courſe of our ſtory again. As Henry this King ſucceeded King John his Father, ſo after Innocent the Pope came Honorius the Third, then Gregory the Ninth, &c. And after Otho the Emperor (whom the Pope had once ſet up, and after deprived again) ſucceeded Frederick the Second, as it is partly before touched. In the days of theſe Kings, Popes, and Emperors, it were too long to recite all that happened in England, but eſpecially in Germany, betwixt Pope Honorius, Gregorius and Frederick the Emperor: the horrible Tragedy whereof were enough to fill a whole Book by it ſelf. But yet we mean (God willing) ſomewhat to touch concerning theſe Eccleſiaſtical matters, firſt beginning with this Realm of England.

Otho the Emperor ſet up and depoſed again by the Pope.

After that the Kingdom of England had been ſubjected by King John (as hath been ſaid) and made Tributary to the Pope and the Romiſh Church, it is incredible how the inſatiable avarice and greedineſs of the Romans did oppreſs and wring the Commons and all Eſtates and Degrees of the Realm, eſpecially beneficed men, and ſuch as had any thing of the Church. Who, what for their domeſtical Charges within the Realm, what for the Pope, what for the Legates, what for contributing to the holy Land, what for Relaxations, and other ſubtil ſleights to get away their money, were brought into ſuch ſlavery, captivity, and penury, that whereas the King neither durſt nor might remedy their Exclamations by himſelf: yet notwithſtanding by his advice, Simon Montfort and the Earl of Leiceſter, with other Noble men (not forgetting what great grievances and diſtreſſes the Realm was brought into by the Romans) thought to work ſome way how to bridle and reſtrain the inſatiable ravening of theſe greedy Wolves. Wherefore they deviſed their Letter, giving ſtrait commandment to the religious men, and to ſuch as had their Churches to farm, that henceforth they ſhould not anſwer the Romans of ſuch Farms and Rents any more, but ſhould pay the ſaid Farms or Rents unto their own Proctors appointed for the ſame purpoſe, as by their writings ſent abroad to Biſhops or Chapters, and other Eccleſiaſtical Houſes, may appear, in this form and effect as followeth.

A complaint of the Nobles of England againſt the intolerable Covetouſneſs of the Pope and Prelates of Rome.

A Complaint of the Nobles of England againſt the covetouſneſs of Rome.

TO ſuch and ſuch a Biſhop, and ſuch a Chapter; all the Univerſity and Company of them, that had rather die than to be confounded of the Romans, wiſheth health. How the Romans and their Legates have hitherto behaved themſelves toward you and other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons of this Realm of England, it is not unknown to your diſcretions, in diſpoſing and giving away the Benefices of the Realm after their own luſt, to the intolerable prejudice and grievance both of you and all other Engliſhmen. For whereas the collation of Benefices ſhould and doth properly belong to you and other your fellow-Biſhops (Eccleſiaſtical Perſons) they, thundering againſt you the Sentence of Excommunication, ordain that you ſhould not beſtow them upon any perſon of this Realm, until in every Dioceſs and Cathedral-Church within the Realm, five Romans (ſuch as the Pope ſhall name) be provided for, to the value of every man an hundred pounds by year. Beſides theſe, many other grievances the ſaid Romaniſts do inflict and infer, both to the Laity and Nobles of the Realm, for the Patronages and Alms beſtowed by them and their Anceſtors, for the ſuſtentation of the poor of the Realm, and alſo to the Clergy and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons of the Realm touching their Livings and Benefices. And yet the ſaid Romaniſts, not contented with the premiſſes, do alſo take from the Clergy of this Realm the Benefices which they have, to beſtow them on men of their own Country, &c.

Wherefore, we conſidering the rigorous auſterity of theſe foreſaid Romaniſts, which, once coming in but as ſtrangers hither, now take upon them not only to judge, but alſo to condemn us, laying upon us importable burthens, whereunto they will not put to one of their own fingers to move; and laying our heads together upon a general and full advice had among our ſelves concerning the ſame, have thought good (although very late) to withſtand them, rather than to be ſubject to their intolerable Oppreſſions, and greater ſlavery more hereafter to be looked for. For the which cauſe we ſtraitly charge and command you (as your friends going about to deliver you, the Church, the King, and the Kingdom from that miſerable yoke of Servitude) that you do not intermeddle or take any part concerning ſuch Exactions or Rents to be required or given to the ſaid Romans. Letting you to underſtand for truth, that in caſe you ſhall (which God forbid) be found culpable herein, not only your Goods and Poſſeſſions ſhall be in danger of brnuing, but you alſo in your perſons ſhall incur the ſame peril and puniſhment as ſhall the ſaid Romiſh Oppreſſors themſelves.

Thus fare ye well.

Example teaching never to take part againſt their King with foreign Power.

¶ Thus much I thought here to inſert and notifie concerning this matter, for that not only the foul and avaricious greedineſs of the Romiſh Church might the more evidently unto all Engliſh-men appear: but that they may learn by this example how worthy they be ſo to be ſerved and plagued with their own Rod, which before would take no part with their natural King againſt foreign Power, of whom now they are ſcourged.

To make the ſtory more plain: in the Reign of this Henry the third (who ſucceeding, as is ſaid, after King John his Father reigned ſix and fifty years) came divers Legates from Rome to England. Firſt Cardinal Otho ſent from the Pope with Letters to the King, like as other Letters alſo were ſent to other places for exactions of money.

Cardinal Otho Legate.

The King opening the Letters, and perceiving the contents, anſwered, That he alone could ſay nothing in the matter which concerned all the Clergy and Commons of the whole Realm. Not long after a Council was called at Weſtminſter, where the Letters being opened, the form was this, Petimus imprimis ab omnibus Eccleſiis Cathedralibus duas nobis præbendas exhiberi, unam de portione Epiſcopi, & alteram de capitulo: & ſimiliter de cœnobiis ubi diverſæ ſunt portiones Abbatis & Conventus; a conventibus quantum pertinet ad unum Monachum, æquali;

The Pope requireth two Prebendſhips in every Cathedral Church.

facta diſtributione bonorum ſuorum, & ab Abbate tantundem; That is, We require to be given unto us, firſt, of all Cathedral-Churches two Prebends, one for the Biſhops part, the other for the Chapter: and likewiſe of Monaſteries where be divers portions, one for the Abbot, another for the Covent: of the Covent ſo much as appertaineth to one Monk, the portion of the goods being proportionally divided; of the Abbot likewiſe as much. The cauſe why he required theſe Prebends was this, It hath been (ſaith he) an old ſlander, and a great complaint againſt the Church of Rome, and it hath been charged with inſatiable covetouſneſs, which as ye know is the root of all miſchief, and all by reaſon that Cauſes be wont commonly not to be handled, nor to proceed in the Church of Rome without great gifts and expence of money. Whereof ſeeing the poverty of the Church is the cauſe, and the only reaſon why it is ſo ſlandered and evil ſpoken of: it is therefore convenient that you (as natural Children) ſhould ſuccour your Mother. For unleſs we ſhould receive of you and of other good men as you are, we ſhould then lack neceſſaries for our life, which were a great diſhonour to our Dignity, &c.

Note the cauſe why the Pope is compelled to crave money of other Countries.

When thoſe Petitions and Cauſes of the Legate were propounded in the foreſaid Aſſembly at Weſtminſter on the Popes behalf (the Biſhops and Prelates of the Realm being preſent) anſwer was made by the mouth of Maſter John Bedford on this wiſe: that the matter there proponed by the Lord Legate in eſpecial concerned the King of England, but in general it touched all the Archbiſhops with their Suffragans, the Biſhops, and all the Prelates of the Realm. Wherefore, ſeeing both the King by reaſon of his ſickneſs was abſent, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with divers other Biſhops alſo were not there, therefore in the abſence of them they had nothing to ſay in the matter, neither could they ſo do without prejudice of them which were lacking. And ſo the Aſſembly for that time brake up.

A Council at London called.

Not long after, the ſaid Otho, Cardinal De carcere Tulliano, coming again from Rome, Cum autentico plenariæ poteſtatis, indicted another Council at London, and cauſed all Prelates, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and other of the Clergy to be warned unto the ſame Council, to be had in the Church of S. Pauls at London about the Feaſt of S. Martin. The pretence of which Council was for redreſs of matters concerning Benefices and Religion; but the chief and principal was to hunt for money: for putting them in fear and in hope, ſome to loſe, ſome to obtain Spiritual Promotions at his hand, he thought gain would riſe thereby, and ſo it did. For in the mean time (as Pariſienſis in vita Henrici tertii writeth) divers precious Rewards were offered him in Palfries, in rich Plate and Jewels, in coſtly and ſumptuous Garments ſo richly furred, in Coin, in Victuals, and ſuch like things of value well worthy of acceptation. Wherein one indeavoured to go beyond another in Munificence (not conſidering, by means of the ſervility wherewith they were oppreſſed of thoſe Popiſh ſhavelings and ſhameleſs ſhifters, that all was meer Pillage and Extortion.) Inſomuch that only the Biſhop of Wincheſter (as the ſtory reporteth) hearing that he would winter at London, ſent him fifty fat Oxen, an hundred Coome of pure Wheat, eight Tun of choſen Wine toward his houſe keeping. Likewiſe other Biſhops alſo for their part offered unto the Cardinals Box after their ability.

Great Rewards given to the Cardinal.

The time of the Council drawing nigh, the Cardinal commanded at the Weſt end of Pauls Church an high and ſolemn Throne to be prepared, riſing up with a glorious Scaffold upon mighty and ſubſtantial Stages ſtrongly builded, and of great height. Thus againſt the day aſſigned, came the ſaid Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and other of the Prelacy, both far and near throughout all England, wearied and vexed with the Winters journey, bringing their Letters Procuratory. Who being together aſſembled, the Cardinal beginneth his Sermon. But before we come to the Sermon, there hapned a great diſcord between the two Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, for ſitting at the right hand and left hand of the glorious Cardinal, for the which the one appealed againſt the other. The Cardinal to pacifie the ſtrife between them both, ſo that he would not derogate from either of them, brought forth a certain Bull of the Pope: in the midſt of which Bull was pictured the figure of the Croſs. On the right ſide of the Croſs ſtood the Image of S. Paul, and on the left ſide S. Peter: Lo, ſaith the Cardinal (holding open the Bull with the Croſs) here you ſee S. Peter on the left hand of the Croſs, and S. Paul on the right ſide, and yet is there between theſe two no contention, for both are of equal glory. And yet S. Peter for the prerogative of his Keys, and for the preheminence of his Apoſtleſhip and Cathedral dignity, ſeemeth moſt worthy to be placed on the right ſide. But yet becauſe S. Paul believed on Chriſt when he ſaw him not, therefore hath he the right hand of the Croſs: For bleſſed be they (ſaith Chriſt) which believe and ſee not, &c. And from that time forth the Archbiſhop of Canterbury injoyed the right hand, and the Archbiſhop of York, the left. Wherein yet this Cardinal is more to be commended than the other Cardinal Hugo mentioned a little before, which in the like contention between theſe Archbiſhops ran away.

Contention for ſitting on the right hand of the Cardinal.

Why S. Paul ſtandeth on the right hand of the Popes Croſs. Why the Archbiſhop of Canterbury hath the right hand and the Archbiſhop of York the left hand.

Thus the Controverſie ceaſed and compoſed between theſe two, Otho the Cardinal, ſitting aloft between theſe two Archbiſhops, beginneth his Sermon, taking this Theme of the Prophet; In medio ſedis & in circuitu ejus quatuor animalia plena oculis ante & retro, &c. that is, In the midſt of the Seat, and in the circuit about the Seat, were four Beaſts full of eyes before and behind, &c. Upon this Theme the Cardinal proceeded in his Sermon, ſitting like a god in the midſt. He compared them about him to the four Beaſts about the Seat, declaring how they ought to have eyes both before and behind (that is) that they muſt be provident in diſpoſing of ſecular things, and circumſpect in ſpiritual matters, continuing and joyning wiſely things paſt with things to come; and this was the greateſt effect of his Clerkly Sermon. That done, he giveth forth certain Statutes for ordering of Churches, as for the dedication of Temples, for ſeven Sacraments, for giving of Orders, for framing of Benefices, collations and reſignations of Benefices and Vicariges, Prieſts Apparrel, and ſingle life, for eating of fleſh in religious Houſes, or Archdeacons, Biſhops, Proctors, and ſuch other like matters. But the chiefeſt intent of all his proceeding was this, That they ſhould be vigilant, provident, and circumſpect, with all their eyes (both before and behind) to fill the Popes Pouch, as appeared not only by this, but all their other travels beſides. Inſomuch that the King, dreading the diſpleaſure of his Commons for the doings of the Legate, willed him to repair home to Rome again, but yet could not ſo be rid of him; for he, receiving new Commandments from the Pope, applied his Harveſt, ſtill gleaning and raking whatſoever he might ſcrape, writing and ſending to Biſhops and Archdeacons in this form and tenor,

Note the Theme of the Cardinal applied to God, how he appleth it to himſelf. Scripture Clerkly applied.

Four Marks to be paid to the Pope of every Procuration

And moreover, note again the wicked and curſed trains of theſe Romiſh Rakehels, who, to pick ſimple mens purſes, firſt ſend out their Fryers and Preachers to ſtir up in all Places and Countries, men to go fight againſt the Turks: whom when they have once bound with a Vow, and ſigned them with the Croſs, then ſend they their Bulls to releaſe them both of their labour, and their Vow for money, as by their own ſtile of writing is here to be ſeen, thus proceeding.

The cauſe why the Pope was ſo greedy and needy of Money, was this; becauſe he had mortal hatred, and waged continual battel the ſame time againſt the good Emperor, Fredrick the ſecond, who had to Wife King Johns Daughter, and Siſter to King Henry the third, whoſe name was Iſabel. And therefore becauſe the Popes war could not be ſuſtained without charges, that made the Pope the more importunate to take money in all places, but eſpecially in England. Inſomuch that he ſhamed not to require the fifth part of every Eccleſiaſtical mans living, as Pariſienſis writeth. And not only that, but alſo the ſaid Pope Gregory (conferring with the Citizens of Rome) ſo agreed with them, that if they would joyn with him in vanquiſhing the foreſaid Frederick, he would (and ſo did) grant unto them, that all the Benefices in England which were or ſhould be vacant (namely pertaining to religious Houſes) ſhould be beſtowed at their own will and commandment to their children and kinſfolks. Whereupon it followed in the forenamed Hiſtory, Unde infra paucos dies miſit D. Papa ſacra præcepta ſua domino Cant. Archiep. Elienſi & Lincol. & Salisb. Epiſcopis, ut trecentis Romanis, in primis beneficiis vacantibus, providerent, ſcientes ſe ſuſpenſos a beneficiorum collatione donec tot competenter provideretur, That is, the Pope ſent in commandment to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and four other Biſhops, that proviſion ſhould be made for three hundred Romans in the chiefeſt and beſt Benefices in all England at the next voidance: So that the foreſaid Archbiſhop and Biſhops ſhould be ſuſpended in the mean time from all collation or gift of Benefices, until the foreſaid three hundred were provided for. Whereupon the Archbiſhop the ſame time ſeeing the unreaſonable oppreſſion of the Church of England, left the Realm and went into France.

Fredrick the Emperor married King Johns Daughter.

The fifth part of every ſpiritual mans living given to the Pope.

Three hundred Romans to be placed in the beſt benefices of England.

Again, mark another as much or more eaſie ſleight of the Pope in procuring money. He ſent one Petrus Rubeus the ſame time with a new device, which was this, Not to work any thing openly, but privily to go betwixt Biſhop and Biſhop, Abbot and Abbot, &c. Telling in their ears, ſuch a Biſhop, ſuch an Abbot hath given ſo much and ſo much unto the Popes Holineſs, truſting that you alſo will not be behind for your part, &c. By the means whereof it is incredible to think what a Maſs of Money was made out of the Realm unto the Pope.

Petrus Rubeus the Popes Agent.

A Romiſh ſleight of the Pope to get Engliſh money.

At length the foreſaid Biſhops, Abbots, and Archdeacons feeling their own ſmart, came to the King (whoſe Father before they did reſiſt) with their humble ſute, lamentably complaining of the unmeaſurable exactions of the Pope, and eſpecially againſt Petrus Rubeus and his fellow Otto the Legate; deſiring the King, that ſeeing the matter toucheth not themſelves alone, but the whole Church, and ſeeing the valuation of Churches was known better to their Archdeacons than to themſelves, therefore there might be a general calling and talk had in the matter. In the octaves of S. John the Baptiſt, the day and place was aſſigned where they ſhould talk; at which day and place the Prelates of England, conventing together, durſt not give any direct denial of that contribution, but after a modeſt ſort did inſinuate certain exceptions againſt the ſame.

Exceptions alledged for not contributing to the Pope.

1. Firſt they ſay, that for ſo much as the contribution is demanded to war againſt him, who was joyned in Matrimony with their Prince, they were not bound ſo to do.

2. Secondly, for that the ſaid contribution tended to the ſhedding of Chriſtian blood; for ſo the form of the bill pretended to fight againſt the Emperor.

3. Thirdly, becauſe it was againſt the liberty of the Church; for ſo it is in the bill, that they that would not ſhould be Excommunicate.

4. Fourthly, becauſe that when of late they gave the tenth part of their goods, it was with this proteſtation, that they ſhould contribut to the Pope no more heteafter.

5. Item, becauſe they had contributed before; if they ſhould now contribute again, it were to be feared leſt an Action twice done ſhould grow into a cuſtom, as is in the Law, Lege nem, &c.

6. Item, for ſo much as they ſhall have cauſes continually to ſeek to Rome through the Emperors Land; it were to be feared leſt the ſaid Emperor by the way would work their Annoyance.

7. Item, becauſe the King hath many Enemies abroad, and for his wars hath need of much money at home, it is not convenient that the goods of the Realm ſhould be alienated out of the Realm.

8. Item, becauſe that could not be done without prejudice to the Patrons of their Churches, not knowing whether their Patrons did or would agree unto the ſame.

9. Laſtly, becauſe they hear ſay, that the general State of the Church is in danger, for the which they underſtand there ſhall be ſhortly a general Council, wherein ſuch matters ſhall be determined: and therefore if they ſhould contribute now, it ſhould be to the hinderance and damage of the Church.

The Legate and his fellow hearing theſe Allegations, ſeeing their own confuſion, were the leſs importunate.

Not long after this followed a general Council at Lions, called by Pope Innocentius the fourth, in the which Council the Engliſh Nation did exhibit certain Articles of their grievances not unworthy to be known. Gravatur regnum Angliæ, eo quod D. Papa non eſt contentus ſubſidio illo, quod vocatur denarius beati Petri, &c.

In Engliſh thus.

Articles exhibited in the Councell of Lugdune for the grievances ſuſtained by the Pope.

1. The Kingdom of England is grieved that the Pope, being not contented with his Peter-pence, requireth and extorteth from the Clergy great exactions (and more is like) both without the conſent of the King, and againſt the Cuſtoms of the Realm. The firſt grievance.

2. Item, the Church and Kingdom of England is grieved, that the Patrons of the ſame cannot preſent as they were wont, unto their Churches, for the Popes Letters: But the Churches are given to Romans, which know neither the Realm nor the Tongue thereof, both to the great peril of ſouls and robbing away the money out of the Realm. The ſecond.

3. Item, it is grieved, for that the Pope premiſing by the Tenor of his Letters, that in requiring of penſions and proviſions in the Realm of England he would require but only twelve Benefices, now contrary to the Tenor thereof many more Benefices and proviſions are beſtowed away by him. The third.

4. Item, the Realm is grieved and complaineth, that in the Benefices in England, one Italian ſucceedeth another, the Engliſh-men being not only excluded, but alſo compelled (for the dertermining of their matters) to ſeek to Rome, contrary both to the Cuſtoms of the Realm, and alſo to the priviledges granted by the Popes predeceſſors to the King and Kingdom of England, The fourth.

5. The fifth grievance is for the oft recourſe of that infamous Legate, by whom both faith and fidelity, the ancient Cuſtoms of the Realm, the Authorities of old Grants, Statutes, Laws and Priviledges, are imbecilled and abrogate, whereby an infinite number in England be grievouſly afflicted and oppreſſed. The fifth, He meaneth perchaſe Otho or maſter Martinus.

6. The ſaid Realm is alſo grieved in general Tallages, Collections, and Aſſeſes, made without the Kings conſent, the appellation and contradiction of the Kings Proctors to the contrary notwithſtanding. The ſixth.

7. Seventhly, the foreſaid Realm complaineth and is grieved, that in the Benefices given to Italians, neither the old Ordinances, nor relief of the poor, nor Hoſpitality, nor any Preaching of Gods Word, nor care of Men Souls, nor ſervice in the Church, nor yet the walls of the Churches be kept up and maintained, as the manner and Cuſtom of the ſame Realm requireth. Over and above theſe foreſaid grievances, there came moreover from the Pope other freſh Letters, charging and commanding the Prelates of England to find of their proper coſts and charges for one whole year, ſome ten armed ſouldiers, ſome five, ſome fifteen, to be ready at the Popes commandment there where he ſhould appoint. The ſeventh. The Babylonical captivity and ſlavery of England under the Pope.

After theſe and other grievances and enormities of Rome, the States of England conſulting together direct their Letters to the Pope, for reformation thereof. Firſt the Abbots and Priors, then the Biſhops and Suffragans, after the Nobles and Barons, laſt of all the King himſelf. But as the proverb is, Venter non habet aures; ſo the Popes purſe had no ears to hear. And as our common ſaying goeth; As good never a whit as never the better: ſo went it with the Pope, who not long after the ſame ſent for new Tallages and exactions to be collected. Which thing when it came to the Kings ear, he being moved and diſturbed vehemently withal, writeth in this wiſe to the Biſhops, ſeverally to every one in his Dioceſs.

The Letter of King Henry the third to the Biſhops.

HEnricus tertius Dei gratia, &c. Venerabili in Chriſto, N. Epiſcopo ſalutem. Licet alias vobis, &c.

In Engliſh thus.

Henry the Third by the Grace of God, to the Reverend in Chriſt Biſhop of N. Whereas we have heretofore Written unto you, once, twice, thrice, as well by our privy ſeals, as by our Letters Patents, that you ſhould not exact or collect, for the Popes behalf, any Tallage or other help of our Subjects, either of the Clergy, or of the Laity, for that no ſuch Tallage nor help either can or is uſed to be exacted in our Realm without the great prejudice of our Princely Dignity, which we neither will nor can ſuffer or ſuſtain: yet you contemning and vilipending our commandment, and contrary to the proviſion made in our laſt Council at London (granted and agreed upon by our Prelates, Earls, and Barons) have that notwithſtanding proceeded in collecting the ſaid your Taxes and Tallages. Whereupon we do greatly marvel and are moved (eſpecially ſeeing you are not aſhamed to do contrary unto your own Decrees) whereas you and other Prelates in the ſaid Council in this did all agree and grant, that no ſuch exactions ſhould be hereafter, until the return of our and your Ambaſſadors from the Court of Rome, ſent thither purpoſely of us, and in the name of the whole Realm for the ſame, to provide redreſs againſt thoſe oppreſſions. Wherefore we ſtraitly will and command you, that from henceforth you do not proceed any more in collecting and exacting ſuch Tallages or helps, as you will injoy our favour and ſuch poſſeſſions of yours as within this our Kingdom you have and hold. And if you have already procured or gather any ſuch thing, yet that you ſuffer not the ſame to be tranſported out of our Realm, but cauſe it to be kept in ſafe cuſtody till the return of the ſaid Ambaſſadors, under the pain of our diſpleaſure in doing of the contrary, and alſo of provoking us to extend our hand upon your poſſeſſions, further than you will think or believe. Moreover, willing and charging you that you participate and make common this our inhibition, with your Archdeacons and Officials, which we have have ſet forth for the liberties of the Clergy and of the people, as knoweth God, &c.

King Henry the third commandeth no tax nor tallage to be ſent to the Pope.

At length the Ambaſſadors which were at Rome came home about the later end of December, bringing word that the Pope, hearing what was done in the Council of Wincheſter, and of the King, was greatly diſpleaſed with him and the Realm, ſaying, Rex Anglorum, qui jam recalcitrat & frederiſat, ſuum habet conſilium, ego vero & meum habeo, quod & ſequar, &c. Whereupon when the Ambaſſadors began to ſpeak in the Kings behalf, from that time they were half counted for Schiſmaticks, and could no more be heard in the Court of Rome. The King hearing this was marveloſly incenſed therewith, commanding by general Proclamation through all his Realm, that no man ſhould hereafter conſent to any Tax or ſubſidy of money for the Court of Rome. When this came to the Popes ear, upon a cruel rage he directed his Letters to the Prelates of England, charging that under pain of ſuſpence or interdiction, they ſhould provide the ſame ſum of money to be collected againſt the Feaſt of Aſſumption, the charge being given to the Biſhop of Worceſter to be executer of the ſaid Curſe. The King lately intended to ſtand to the liberties of the Church, now for fear of the Pope, and partly for perſwaſions of the ſaid Biſhop of Worceſter and other Prelates, durſt not ſtand to it, but gave over. Moreover the greedy gulf of the Romiſh avarice waxed ſo un meaſurable, that at length the Pope ſhamed not, upon the cenſure of his Curſe, to ask the third part of the Church goods, and the yearly Fruit of all vacant Benefices. The chief Doers and Legates in England, were Otho, Stephanus Capellanus, Petrus Rubeus Nuncius, Mag. Martin, and Mag. Marinus, Johannes Anglicus Epiſcopus Sabinenſis. Of whom to ſpeak further (for that I have matter much more to write) for this preſent time I think beſt to furceaſe, leſt in opening all the deteſtable doings and peſtilent workings of thoſe men, I might perhaps, not only moleſt good ears, but alſo infect the Air. Yet one thing concerning the ſaid Otho I cannot well overpaſs.

The Pope taketh one againſt the King.

The King compelled for fear to give over to the Pope.

The Pope asketh the third part of the Church goods.

This Otho, as he left no place unſought, where any vantage might be got: ſo amongſt all others he came to Oxford, where lying in the Houſe of Oſney, he was received with great honour; the Scholars preſenting him Honourably with ſuch Diſhes and rewards as they had, thinking to gratifie the Cardinal after the beſt manner. This being done before dinner, and the dinner ended, they came reverently to ſee and welcome him, ſuppoſing that they alſo ſhould with like courteſie again of him be entertained. As they came to the Gate, the Porter (being an Italian) with a loud voice asketh what they would have? They ſaid they came to ſee the Lord Legate. But Cerberus the Porter, holding the door half open, with proud and contumelious language thruſt them out, and would not ſuffer them to enter. The Scholars ſeeing that, by force thruſt open the Gate and came in; whom when the Romans which were within would have repelled with their Fiſts, and ſuch Staves as they had in their Hands, they fell to Alarum and by the ears together, with much heaving and ſhooving, and many blows on both ſides. In the mean time, while ſome of the Scholars ran home for their Weapons, there chanced a poor Scholar (an Iriſh-man) to ſtand at the Gate waiting for his Alms. Whom when the Maſter ſaw at the Gate, he, taking hot ſkalding water out of the pan where the meat was ſodden, did caſt it in his Face. One of the Scholars a Welſh-man, that came with his Bow and ſhafts, ſeeing that, letteth drive an arrow, and ſhooteth this Nabuzardan (that Maſter of Cooks) clean thorow the body, and ſlaieth him out of hand. The Cook falling dead, there was a mighty broil and a great clamour throughout all the Houſe. The Cardinal, hearing the tumult and great noiſe about him, like a Valiant Roman runneth as faſt as he could into the Steeple, and there locketh the doors faſt unto him, where he remained till midnight. The Scholars in the mean while, not yet all pacified, ſought all corners about for the Legate, exclaiming and crying out; Where is that Uſurer, that Simoniack, that piller and poller of our livings, that proller and extortioner of our Money, which perverteth our King, and ſubverteth his Kingdom, inriching himſelf with our ſpoils? &c. All this heard the Cardinal, and held his peace. When the night approaching had broken up the field, the Cardinal coming out of his Fort, and taking his Horſe (in ſilence of the night) was privily conveied over the River toward the King, conveying himſelf away as faſt as he could. After the King heard this, he ſendeth to Oxford a garriſon of armed Men, to deliver the Romans which were there hidden for fear of Scholars. Then was Maſter Otho a Lawyer, with thirty other Scholars apprehended, and carried to Walingford Caſtle, and from thence had in Carts to London, where at length (through much intreaty of the Biſhops) they, being brought barefoot to the Legates door, had their pardon, and the Univerſity releaſed of interdiction. And thus much concerning the Popes Legate in England.

Thus partly you have heard, and do underſtand the miſerable Thraldom and Captivity of this Realm of England, and the Clergy of the ſame, who before refuſed to take part with King John their natural Prince, againſt the foreign power of the Pope; and now how miſerably they are oppreſſed and ſcourged of the ſame Pope; whoſe inſatiable extortion and rapacity did ſo exceed in pilling and polling of this Realm long after this, that neither the King now could help them, neither could the Pope with any reaſonable meaſure be content. Inſomuch (as writers record) in the days of Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury, An. 1360. the Pope by his Proctors gat from the Clergy, in leſs than one year, more than forty Thouſand Florens, of meer contribution: beſides his other avails and common revenues out of Benefices, Prebendaries, firſt Fruits, Mention was made a little before of Albingenſes keeping about the City of Tholouſe. Theſe Albingenſes becauſe they began to ſmell the Pope, and to contro[l] the inordinate proceedings and diſcipline of the See of Rome, the Pope therefore recounting them as a people heretical, excited and ſtirred up about this preſent time and year, Anno 1220. Ludovike the young French King, through the inſtance of Philip his Father, to lay ſiege againſt the ſaid City of Tholouſe to expugne and extinguiſh theſe Albingenſes his Enemies. Whereupon Ludovike (according to his Fathers commandment) reared a puiſſant and mighty Army to compaſs about and beſet the forenamed City, and ſo did. Here were the men of Tholouſe in great danger. But ſee how the mighty Protection of God fighteth for his people againſt the might of Man: For after that Ludovike (as Matth. Paris teſtifieth) had long wearied himſelf and his men in waſte, and could do no good with all their Engins and Artillery againſt the City, there fell moreover upon the French Hoſt, by the hand of God, ſuch famine and peſtilence both of Men and Horſes, beſides the other daily ſlaughter of the Souldiers, that Ludovike was inforced to retire, and with ſuch as were left to return again home to France from whence he came. In the ſlaughter of which Souldiers, beſides many others, was Earl Simon de monte forti, General of the Army, to whom the lands of the Earl of Tholouſe were given by the Pope; who was ſlain before the Gate of the City with a ſtone, and ſo was alſo the Brother of the ſaid Simon the ſame time, in beſieging a Caſtle near to Tholouſe, ſlain with a ſtone in like manner. And ſo was the ſiege of the French-men againſt Tholouſe broke up. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi.

As the ſiege of theſe French-men could do no good againſt the City of Tholouſe; ſo it happened the ſame time that the Chriſtians, marching towards the Holy land, had better ſucceſs in laying their ſiege to a certain Tower or Caſtle in Egypt near to the City Damieta, which ſeemed by nature for the ſituation and difficulty of the place inexpugnable: which being ſituate in the midſt of the great flood Nilus (hard by the City called Damieta) could neither be come to by land, nor be undermined for the water, nor by famine ſubdued, for the neerneſs of the City; yet notwithſtanding through the help of God and Policy of Man, Erecting Scaffolds and Caſtles upon tops of Maſts, the Chriſtians at laſt conquered it, and after that alſo the City Damieta, albeit not without great loſs of Chriſtian people. In the expugnation of this City or fort, among others that there died, was the Lantgrave of Thuring, named Ludovike the Husband of Elizabeth, whom we uſe to call S. Elizabeth. This Elizabeth (as my Story recordeth) was the Daughter of the King of Hungary, and married in Almain, where ſhe lived with the forenamed Ludovike Lantgrave of Thuring, whom ſhe through her perſwaſions provoked and incenſed to take that voyage to fight for the Holy land, where he in the ſame voyage was ſlain. After whoſe death Elizabeth (remaining a widow) entred the profeſſion of cloyſterly religion, and made her ſelf a Nun; ſo growing and increaſing from vertue to vertue, that after her death all Almain did ſound with the fame of her worthy doings. Matthew Paris addeth this more, that ſhe was the Daughter of that Queen, who, being accuſed to be naught with a certain Archbiſhop, was therefore condemned with this ſentence pronounced againſt her; Reginam interficere nolite timere bonum eſt, & ſi omnes conſenſerint non ego contradico, That is (although it be hard in Engliſh to be tranſlated as it ſtandeth in Latin) To kill the Queen will ye not to fear, that is good, and if all men conſent thereunto, not I my ſelf do ſtand againſt it, &c. The which ſentence being brought to Pope Innocent, thus in pointing the ſentence, which otherwiſe ſeemeth to have a double underſtanding, he ſo ſaved the Queen, thus interpreting and pointing the ſame, Reginam interficere nolite, timere bonum eſt, et ſi omnes conſenſerint, non ego, contradico. That is, To kill the Queen will ye not, to fear, that is good: And if all do conſent thereto, yet not I, I my ſelf do ſtand againſt it, and ſo eſcaped ſhe the danger. This Queen was the Mother (as is ſaid) of Elizabeth the Nun, who for her holy nunniſhneſs was Canonized of the Popes Church for a Saint in Almain, about the year of our Lord 1220. *Ex Matth. And this by the way. Now to proceed further in the years and life of this King Henry. The next year following, which was Anno. 1221. the King went to Oxford, where he had ſomething to do with William Earl de Albemarlia, who had taken the Caſtle of Biham: but at laſt, for his good ſervice he had done in the Realm before, he was releaſed of the King with all his men, by the interceſſion of Walter Archbiſhop of York, and of Pandulph the Legate. About which preſent year entred firſt the Frier Minorits, or Gray-Friers into England, and had their firſt Houſe at Canterbury, whoſe firſt Patron was Franciſcus, which died Anno 1127. and his Order was confirmed by Pope Honorius the third, Anno 1224.

About the firſt coming of theſe Dominick and Gray-Friers Franciſcan into the Realm (as is in Nicol. Trivet teſtified) many Engliſhmen the ſame time entred into their orders. Among whom was Johannes de ſancto Egidio, a man famouſly expert in the ſcience of Phyſick and Aſtronomy, and Alexander de Hales, both Engliſhmen and great Divines. This Johannes making his Sermon Ad clerum, in the Houſe of the Dominick Friers, exhorted his Auditory with great perſwaſions unto wilful poverty. And to confirm his words the more by his own example, in the midſt of his Sermon he came down from the Pulpit and put on his Friers habit; and ſo, returning into Pulpit again, made an end of his Sermon. Likewiſe Alexander Hales entred the order of the Franciſcans, of whom remaineth yet the Book intituled De ſumma theologiæ in old Libraries.

Moreover, not long after by William de longa ſpata, which was the baſtard Son of King Henry the ſecond, and Earl of Salisbury, was firſt founded the Houſe of the Carthuſian Monks at Heitrope, Anno 1222. After whoſe death his Wife Ela was tranſlated to the Houſe of Henton in Barkeſhire, An. 1227. which Ela alſo founded the Houſe of Nuns at Lacocks, and there continued her ſelf Abbeſs of the place. In the Town of Oxford above mentioned, where the King kept his Court, Simon Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury held a Council, where was condemned and burned a certain Deacon, as Nicol. Trivet ſaith, for Apoſtaſie. Alſo another rude Country-man, who had crucified himſelf, and ſuperſtitiouſly bare about the wounds in his feet and hands, was condemned to be cloſed up perpetually within walls. Ex Nicol. Trivet. About which year alſo Alexander King of Scots married Joan Siſter to King Henry.

Ex Nicol. Trivet.

Not long after began the new building of the Minſter of Salisbury, whereof Pandulphus the Popes Legate laid the five firſt ſtones; one for the Pope (ſuch was the Fortune of that Church to have the Popes ſtone in his Foundation) the ſecond for the young King Henry; the third, for the good Earl of Salisbury; the fourth, for the Counteſs; the fifth, for the Biſhop of Salisbury, &c. Which was about the ſame year above mentioned, Anno. 1221. Ex Chron. de Sal.

In the ſame year about S. James tide fell a diſſention between the Citizens of London, and the men of Weſtminſter; the occaſion whereof was this. A certain gain between theſe two parties was appointed, to try whether part in wreſtling could overcome the other. Thus in ſtriving for maſtery, each part contending againſt the other (as the manner is in ſuch paſtime) it happened that the Londoners got the Victory, and the other ſide was put to foile, but eſpecially the Steward of the Abbot of Weſtminſter; who, being not a little confounded therewith, began to forethink in his mind how to be revenged again of the Londoners. Whereupon another day was ſet, which was at Lammas, that the Londoners ſhould come again to wreſtle; and who ſo had the Victory ſhould have the Belwether, which was the price of the game appointed. As the parties were thus occupied in their Play, the Steward ſuddenly bringeth upon the Londoners unawares, a company of harneſſed men prepared for the ſame before, and letteth drive at the Londoners; who, at length being wounded and grievouſly hurt, after much bloodſhed were driven back again into the City. This contumely thus being received, the Citizens, eagerly ſtrucken with ire and impatience, ran to the common Bell, and by ringing thereof aſſemaſſembled their Commons together, to conſult with themſelves what was to be done in that caſe ſo contumelious. Wherein when divers ſentences were given diverſly, Serle the ſame time Maior of London (a wiſe and diſcreet Man) gave this Counſel, that the Abbot of Weſtminſter ſhould be talked withal, who if he would rectifie the injury done, and ſatisfie for the harm received, it ſhould be to them ſufficient. But contrary, one Conſtantine a great Man then in the City of London, in much heat exciting the people, gave this ſentence, that all the Houſes of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, but eſpecially the Houſe of the Steward ſhould be caſt down to the ground. In fine, that, which he ſo unadviſedly Counſelled, was as madly performed: For the furious people according to his Counſel ſo did. This tumultuous outrage, as it could not be privy, coming to the knowledge of Hubert de Burgo, Lord chief Juſtice of England above mentioned, he coming with a ſufficient ſtrength of armed ſouldiers to the City of London, ſent to the Maior and Aldermen of the City to will them to come unto him. Who ſo obeying his commandment, he required of them the principal beginners of the Riot. To whom Conſtantine there being preſent anſwered, that he would warrant that which was done; ſorrowing moreover that they had not done more than they did in the matter. The Juſtice, upon the ſame his confeſſion, commanded him with two others, without any further tumult, to be taken; and ſo with the ſame two he was hanged, he offering for his life 1500. Marks, &c.

Ex Matth. Pariſienſi.

And forſomuch as mention hath been made of the wrangling between the Commoners of London and of Weſtminſter, both time and occaſion bringeth me in remembrance ſomething to ſpeak likewiſe of the Eccleſiaſtical conflicts among Church-men, nothing inferior in my mind, nor leſs worthy to be noted than the other. For ſo I read in Matth. Paris, and in Flores Hiſt. that at what time this wreſtling was among the Citizens for the ſheep, the like contention kindled and enflamed between Euſtace Biſhop of London and the Chapter of Pauls on the one ſide, and the Abbot of Weſtminſter with his Covent on the other ſide, about ſpiritual juriſdiction and ſubjection: to wit, whether the Monaſtery of Weſtminſter were exempted from the ſubjection and juriſdiction of the Biſhop of London or not. Which controverſie at laſt coming into compromiſe, was committed to the Arbitrement of Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Philip Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas of Merton, and Richard Prior of Dunſtable; and at length it was thus agreed, that the Monaſtery of Weſtminſter ſhould be utterly exempted from the juriſdiction of the Biſhop of London, and that Stanes, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, ſhould appertain to the Monaſtery of Weſtminſter. Alſo, that the manner of Sunbury ſhould be due and proper to the Church of S. Paul, and alſo that the Church of S. Margaret with all the Lands belonging to the ſame ſhould be exempted from all other juriſdiction, but only of the Biſhop of Rome: and ſo was this matter decided, An. 1222. *Ibidem Flor. {Anno 1222.} Horrible Tempeſt in England.

The ſame year (as writeth Mat. Paris) horrible tempeſts with thundring and lightning, and whirlewinds, went through all the Land, that much harm was done, Churches, Steeples, Towers, Houſes, and divers Trees with the voilence of Winds were blown up by the Roots. In Warwickſhire a certain Wife with eight others in her Houſe were ſlain. In Grantham the Church was ſet on fire by Lightning moſt terrible, with ſuch a ſtink left there behind, that no Man could after a long time abide it. The Author addeth, that manifeſt Marks of the Tempeſt did remain long after in that Monaſtery to be ſeen. Some alſo write that fiery Dragons and Spirits were ſeen then flying in the Air.

A woman with eight of her ſhouſhold ſlain with Thunder. Grantham Church burned with Lightning.

{Anno 1223.} Anno 1223. Philip the French King died, after whom his Son Ludovick ſucceeded in the Crown. To whom King Henry ſending his Meſſage, and deſiring him to remember his Promiſe and Covenant made in rendring again the Lands loſt in Normandy, could obtain nothing at his hands. Whereupon Richard Earl of Cornwal, alſo William the Kings Uncle Earl of Saliſbury, with divers other Nobles made over into France, where they recovered Poictiers, and kept Gaſcoin under the Kings obedience. Ex Matth. Paris. Trivet. Flor. Hiſt.

Lewis King of France. The French King falſe of his Promiſe.

In the ſame year, or as Fabian giveth, the next following, which was 1224. By the vertue of a certain Parliament, it was granted of the Lords and Barony of the Land, that the King and his Heirs, ſhould have the ward and marriage of their Heirs, which then was called, and after ſo proved to be, Initium malorum, the beginning of harms.

{Anno 1224.} Wardſhip firſt granted to the King.

In the ſame year, by the account of Gisburn and other Writers, the ſaid King holding another Parliament at Oxford, by the advice of his Council and of his Clergy, did grant and confirm, under his great Seal, two Charts of the old Liberties and Cuſtoms of this Realm, for ever to be kept and obſerved, the one called Magna Charta, the other Charta de foreſta. The Contents whereof fully in the forenamed Author be expreſſed. For the which cauſe was granted again by the whole Parliament a Quindecim, or a Fifteen of all his Subjects, as well of Lay-men as alſo of the Clergy.

Ex Gisburnenſi & aliis. Magna Charta. Charta de foreſta.

¶ Where is to be noted, that theſe Liberties were afterward broken, and confirmed again by the ſaid King, Anno 1236.

Anno 1226. died Pope Honorius a great Adverſary againſt Fredrick the Emperor, after whom ſucceeded Gregory the ninth, more grievous than his Predeceſſor. In which year alſo died Ludovick the perjured French King at the ſiege of Avinion; whom the Pope now the ſecond or third time had ſet up to fight againſt Reimund the good Earl of Tholouſe, and the Hereticks Albingenſes of that Country: For ſo the Pope calleth all them, which hold not in all points with his glorious pride, and uſurped power and ungodly proceedings. The Origin whereof was this, as in Matth. Paris appeareth. In the days of Philip the French King, this Reimundus Earl of Tholouſe was diſdained of the Pope for holding with the Albingenſes, and therefore, by the inſtigation of the Pope, the Lands of the Earl were taken from him and given to Simon Montfort; and inſtruments made upon the ſame: But when the ſaid Earl Reimundus would not be removed from the right of his poſſeſſions by unrighteous dealing; then the Pope ſeeketh Philip the French King to make open War againſt him. Whereupon Lewis the French King was ſent with a great power (as is above declared) to beſiege the City of Tholouſe; but being repulſed from thence by the marvellous hand of God fighting for his people, he could not prevail, and ſo returned home, after he had loſt the moſt part of his Army by peſtilence and other calamity, as hath been before deſcribed. And thus continued the good Earl ſtill in quiet poſſeſſion till this preſent time, Anno 1226. In the which year the Pope not forgetting his old Malice againſt the Earl, and no leſs enflamed with inſatiable avarice, directeth down his Legate Maſter Romanus to the parts of France for two ſeveral purpoſes; one to extripe the Earl, the other to inlarge his Revenues. Thus the Legate, being entred into France, beginneth to ſummon a Council, willing the French King with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Clergy of France to appear before him at Bitures; to whom eftſoons repaired ſix Archbiſhops with the Biſhops and Suffragans of nine Provinces, to the number of an Hundred, beſides the Abbots, Priors, and Proctors of all the Covents of France, to hear the Popes will and commandment. But becauſe there was a diſcord feared to riſe (ſaith Matthæus) about Preheminence of ſitting, for that the Archbiſhop of Lions challenged the Superior place above the Archbiſhop of Sene, alſo the Archbiſhop of Rone above the Archbiſhop of Bitures, and above the Archbiſhop of Narbon, &c. Therefore the Seſſion was holden there not in manner and form of a Council, but of a certain parly or conſultation. Thus the meek and holy Council being ſet, and the Popes Majeſties Letters read and declared, appeareth before them Reimund Earl of Tholouſe of the one party and Simon Montfort on the other part: which Simon required to be reſtored unto unto him the Lands and poſſeſſions of the ſaid Reimund, which the Pope and Philip the French King had given to him and to his Father before, having good evidences to ſhew for the ſame, confirmed by the donation of the Pope and of the King. Adding moreover, that the Earl Reimund was deprived and diſherited in the general Council at Rome for Hereſie, which is called the Hereſie of Albingenſes. At leaſt, if he might not have the whole yielded unto him, yet the moſt part of his Lordſhips he required to be granted him.

Reimundus wrongfully diſherited by the Pope.

To this the Earl Reimund anſwered again, offering himſelf ready to all duty and office both toward the French King, and to the Church of Rome, whatſoever duly to him did appertain. And moreover, touching the Hereſie wherewith he was there charged; he did not only there offer himſelf in that Council before the Legate, but moſt humbly did crave of him, that he would take the pains to come into every City within his Precinct to inquire of every perſon there the Articles of his Belief; and if he found any perſon or perſons holding that which was not Catholick, he would ſee the ſame to be corrected and amended according to the cenſure of holy Church to the uttermoſt. Or if he ſhould find any City rebelling againſt him, he, to the uttermoſt of his might with the inhabitants thereof, would compel them to do ſatisfaction therefore. And as touching himſelf, if he had committed or erred in any thing (which he remembreth not that he had done) he offered there full ſatisfaction to God and Church, as becomed any faithful Chriſtian Man to do; requiring moreover there before the Legate to be examined of his faith, &c. But all this (ſaith Matthæus) the Legate deſpiſed; neither could the Catholick Earl (ſaith he) there find any grace, unleſs he would depart from his Heritage; both from himſelf and from his Heirs for ever. In fine, when it was required by the contrary part, that he ſhould ſtand to the arbitrement of twelve Peers of France: To that Reimundus anſwered, that if the French King would receive his Homage which he was ready at all times to exhibit, he was contented therewith. For elſe they would not, ſaid he, take him as one of their ſociety and fellow Subjects.

Reimundus the good Earl of Tholouſe anſwereth for himſelf.

Albingenſes wilfully ſuſpected for Hereſie.

After much altercation on both ſides about the matter, the Legate willeth every Archbiſhop to call aſide his Suffragans, to deliberate with them upon the cauſe, and to give up in writing what was concluded. Which being done accordingly, the Legate denounceth Excommunication to all ſuch as did reveal any piece of that which was there concluded, before the Pope and the King had intelligence thereof.

Theſe things thus in hudder mutter among themſelves concluded, the Legate gave leave to all Proctors of Covents and Chapters to return home, only retaining with him the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and Abbots, and certain ſimple Prelates, ſuch as he might be more bold withal, to open, and of them to obtain the other part of his Commiſſion, which was indeed to obtain of every Cathedral Church two Prebendſhips; one for the Biſhop, the other for the Chapter. And in Monaſteries alſo after the like ſort, where the Abbot and Covent had divers and ſeveral portions, to require two Churches; one for the Abbot, the other for the Covent, keeping this proportion; that how much ſhould ſuffice for the living of one Monk, ſo much the whole Covent ſhould find for their part; and as much the Abbot likewiſe for his. And forſomuch as he would not ſeem to demand this without ſome colour of cauſe, his reaſon was this; that becauſe the Court of Rome had long been blotted with the note of avarice, which is Mother of all evil, for that no man could come to Rome for any buſineſs, but he muſt pay for the expedition of the ſame; therefore for the removing away of the occaſion of that ſlander, the publick help of the Church muſt neceſſarily be required, &c.

Mark Reader the practiſe here of Prelates, for thy learning.

The Proctors and Parties thus ſent home by the Legates, marvelling with themſelves why the Biſhops and Abbots ſhould be ſtaid and they ſent whom, and ſuſpecting no leſs but as the matter was indeed, conferred their Counſels together, and deviſed with themſelves to ſend certain unto him in the behalf of all the Cathedral and Conventual Churches in France; and ſent to the ſaid Legate his Meſſage, to ſignifie to him, that they were credibly informed he came with ſpecial Letters from the Court of Rome for the obtaining of certain Prebendaries in every Cathedral and Conventual Church. Which being ſo, they much marvelled that he would not in the publick Council make manifeſt to them thoſe Letters which ſpecially concerned them as much as the others. Wherefore their requeſt was to him in the Lord, that no ſuch offenſive matter might riſe by him in the French Church; knowing this, that the thing he enterpriſeth could not be brought to effect without great offence taken, and ineſtimable damage to the Church of France. For grant (ſaid they) that certain will aſſent unto you, yet their aſſent ſtandeth in no effect concerning ſuch matters as touch the whole: eſpecially, ſeeing both the States of the Realm, with all the inferior Subjects, yea, and the King himſelf they are ſure will withſtand the ſame, to the venture not only of their honour, but of their life alſo, conſidering the caſe to be ſuch, as upon the offence whereof ſtandeth the ſubverſion both of the Realm publick, and of the whole Church in general. Declaring Moreover the cauſe of this fear to riſe hereof, for that in other Realms ſuch communication hath been with Biſhops and Prelates for the procuring of ſuch Prebendſhips, whereas neither the Prince nor the Subjects were made any thing privy thereto.

The Clergy of France anſwering to the Legate.

In concluſion, when the matter came to debating with the Legate, the objections of the inferior parties againſt the cruel exaction were theſe in brief effect, as is in Pariſienſis noted.

Inferiors ever more bold to ſpeak in difficult cauſes of truth, than the rich.

The objections of the Clergy of France againſt the Popes exaction.

Firſt, They alledged their great damages and expenſes which they were like to ſuſtain thereby, by reaſon of the continual Procurators of the Pope, which in every Dioceſs muſt live not of their own, but muſt be ſuſtained upon the charges of the Cathedral Churches, and other Churches alſo; and many times they being but Procurators, will be found as Legates.

Item, By that means they ſaid great perturbations might inſue to the Covents and Chapters of Cathedral Churches in their elections: forſomuch as the Popes Agents and Factors being in every Cathedral Church and Chapter houſe, percaſe the Pope would command him in his perſon to be preſent at their Elections, and ſo might trouble the ſame, in delaying and deferring till it might fall to the Court of Rome to give; and ſo ſhould be placed more of the Popes Clientel in the Churches of France, than of the proper inhabitants of the Land.

Item, By this means they affirmed, that all they in the Court of Rome ſhould be richer, and ſhould receive more for their proportion than the King of the Realm: by reaſon of which aboundance of riches it was like to come to paſs that as the Worm of rich Men is pride; ſo by the means of this their riches, the Court of Rome would delay and drive off great Sutes, and ſcarce would take any pains with ſmall cauſes. The experiment whereof is evident, for that now alſo they uſe to delay their matters, when they come, with their gifts, and being in aſſurance to receive. And thus ſhould Juſtice ſtand aſide, and poor Sutors die at the Gates of the Court of Rome, thus flowing and triumphing in full aboundance of all Treaſure and Riches.

Item, Forſomuch as it is meet and convenient to have friends in the Court of Rome, for the better ſpeeding of their cauſes; therefore they thought to keep them needy, whereby their gifts may be the ſweeter, and their cauſes ſooner diſpatched.

Item, When as it is impoſſible the fountain of greedy deſire to be ſtopped, it was to be feared that either they would do that by others which they were wont to do by themſelves, or elſe they ſhould be inforced to give greater rewards than before; for ſmall gifts in the ſight of great rich men are not looked upon.

Item, Where he alledged the removing away of the ſlander which goeth on the Court of Rome: by this means rather the contrary were to be feared, wherein they alledged the ſentence of the verſe, that great riches ſtop not the taking of much, but a mind contented with a little:

Quod virtus reddit, non copia ſufficientem,
Et non paupertas ſed mentis hiatus egentem.

Further, they alledged that great riches would make the Romans mad, and ſo might kindle among them ſides and parts taking; ſo that by great poſſeſſions ſedition might follow to the ruine and deſtruction of the City, whereof ſome experiment they had already.

Item, they added, that although they would condeſcend and oblige themſelves to that Contribution, yet their Succeſſors would not ſo be bound, nor yet ratifie the Bond of theirs.

Laſtly, thus they conclude the matter, deſiring him that the Zeal of the Univerſal Church, and of the Church of Rome would move him: for if this Oppreſſion of the Church ſhould be univerſal, it were to be doubted leſt an univerſal departing might follow from the Church of Rome, which God forbid (ſay they) ſhould happen.

God grant, ſay we.

The Legate hearing theſe words, being therewith ſomething moved (as ſeemed) excuſed himſelf, that he being in the Court, never agreed to this Exaction; and that the Letters hereof came not to him before he was in France, whereat he ſaid he was greatly ſorry, adding this withall, that the words of his Precept included this ſecret meaning in them, thus to be underſtood and taken: ſo far forth as the Empire and other Realms would agree unto the ſame. And as for him, he would ſtir no more in the matter, before it were proved what other Countries would ſay and do therein.

The Cardinal repulſed and defeated of his purpoſe in France.

And thus much concerning the ſecond part of the blind Commiſſion of this Legate, touching his Exaction of Prebendſhips in every Cathedral and Conventual Church, wherein, as ye hear, he was repulſed: Ex Mat. Pariſ. pag. 62.

Ex Mat. Pariſ. pag. 62.

Now to return to the firſt part of his Commiſſion again, which was concerning Reimundus the godly Earl of Tholouſe, thus the ſtory proceedeth, that while the Legate was in hand with this matter of the Popes money, in the mean ſeaſon certain preaching Fryers were directed by the ſaid Romanus the Popes Legate into all France, to incite and ſtir up the French-men to take the Croſs upon them, and to war againſt the Earl of Thoulouſe and the people thereof, whom they accounted then for Hereticks. At the preaching whereof, a great number of Prelates and Lay-men ſigned themſelves with the Croſs, to fight againſt the Tholoſſians, being thereto induced, as the ſtory ſaith, more for fear of the French King or favour of the Legate, than for any true zeal of Juſtice. For ſo it followeth in the words of Paris, Videbatur enim multis abuſio, ut hominem fidelem Chriſtianum infeſtarent, præcipue cum conſtaret cunctis, eum, in concilio nuper Biturienſi, multis precibus perſuaſiſſe Legato, ut veniret ad ſingulas terræ ſuæ civitates, inquirens a ſingulis articulos fidei: & ſi quempiam contra fidem inveniret, &c. For to many (ſaith he) it ſeemed an abuſe, to move War againſt a faithful Chriſtian man, eſpecially ſeeing in the Council of Bitures, (before all men) he intreated the Legate with great inſtance that he would come into every City within his Dominions, and there to inquire of every perſon the Articles of his Faith; where if he found any man to hold any thing contrary to the Catholick Faith, he promiſed a full ſatisfaction to be had thereof, according to the Cenſure of the Church, to the uttermoſt, &c.

The Popes raiſeth War againſt the Earl and the people of Tholouſe.

Teſtimony of the Author for the clearing of Reimundus and of the Albingenſes

Yet all this notwithſtanding, the proud Legate, contemning this ſo honeſt and reaſonable purgation of the Earl Reimundus, ceaſed not by all manner of means to proſecute the Popes fury againſt him and his Subjects, ſtirring up the King and the Frenchmen, under pain of Excommunication, to war againſt them. Ludovick the French King, thus being inforced by the Legate, anſwered again, That he for his own ſafety would not atchieve that Expedition, or adventure againſt the Earl, unleſs it were firſt obtained of the Pope to write to the King of England: commanding him, that, during the time of that Expedition, he ſhould invade and moleſt no piece of his Lands and Poſſeſſions which he the ſame preſent time did hold, whether by right or by wrong, or howſoever they were holden, while the time of the ſaid War againſt the Hereticks (as they were then termed) did indure, but rather ſhould aid and aſſiſt him with counſel and money in that Enterpriſe. All this being done and accomplished, the French King and the Legate (croſſing themſelves to the field) appointed a day peremptory for the French Army to meet together at Lions, under pain of the Popes Excommunication, and with Horſe and Harneſs to ſet upon the Tholoſſians, againſt the Aſcenſion-day next inſuing.

The unreaſonable tyranny of the Pope againſt the Tholoſſians.

Excommunication abuſed.

When the Aſcenſion-day was come, which was the day peremptory appointed, the French King, having prepared at Lions all things neceſſary for his Army, marcheth forward with a great and mighty Hoſt; after whom alſo cometh the Legate, with his Biſhops, and Prelates. The number of fighting-men in his Army, beſides the Victuallers and Waggoners, were 50000 men. The Legate by the way openly Excommunicated the Earl of Tholouſe, and all that took his part, and furthermore interdicted his whole Land. Thus the King came marching forward, till he came into the Province of Tholouſe, and the firſt City which he came unto there of the Earls, was Avinion: which City they thought firſt to have beſieged, and ſo in order after, as they went, to have deſtroyed and waſted all the whole Province belonging to the Earl. And firſt the King demanded of them to have his paſſage through the City; ſaining himſelf in peaceable wiſe (for the expedition of his Journey) but to paſs through the ſame. The Citizens, conſulting with themſelves what was to be done, at length gave anſwer, That they miſtruſted their coming, and ſuppoſed that in deceit they required the entrance of their City, and for no neceſſity of their journey.

Lewis the French King and Romanus the Popes Legate marching againſt the Albingenſes.

Reimundus Earl of Thoulouſe Excommunicated.

The City of Avinion beſieged.

The King, hereat being much offended, ſware an Oath, That he would not depart thence till he had taken the City; and immediately in thoſe places, where he thought moſt meet, he began to make ſharp aſſaults with all manner of faultable means; the Citizens again within manfully defended themſelves, caſting ſtone for ſtone, and ſhooting ſhot for ſhot, and ſlew and wounded many of the French-men. Thus when they had long beſieged the City, and could not win the ſame: at length Victuals in the French Camp began to fail, and many of them died for hunger. For the Earl of Tholouſe as a wiſe man of war, hearing before of their coming, took into the Town all the proviſion that was abroad, and left nothing without to ſerve for their defence and ſuccour, he plowed up the fields, that there ſhould no ſtover be found to ſerve their Horſes; he put out of the Town all the old people and young children, leſt they ſhould want victuals that kept the Town, and before their coming ſent them far away, ſo that within the Town, they had plenty, and without they died for Famine. And beſides in ſeeking far for their forage, many fell into the hands of them that kept the City, who ſecretly lay in wait for them abroad and ſlew many of them: beſides a great number of cattel and horſes died for want of forage: and poor Souldiers, that had no great ſtore of money, died for want of Victuals. By which mortality and ſtink both of men and cattel grew great Infection and Peſtilence among them; inſomuch that the King himſelf and alſo the Legate were greatly diſmayed, thinking it to be no little ſhame, as well to the Realm of France, as alſo to Rome, that they ſhould ſo depart and break up their Siege. Thus again thought the Souldiers, that much better it were for them to end their lives by battel, than ſo to die like dogs and ſtarve. Wherefore with one conſent they purpoſed to give a new aſſault at the Bridge that goeth over the flood Rhodanus into the Town; to which place they came in ſuch number, that either by the debility of the Bridge or ſubtilty of the Souldiers that kept the Town, three thouſand of them, with Bridge and all, fell armed into the violent ſtream, and were drowned. What was there then but joy and gladneſs of the Citizens part, and much lamentation and havineſs on the other part? Then ſhortly after, the Citizens of Avinion (when they ſaw a convenient time, whilſt their enemies were eating meat) came ſuddenly upon them out of the Town, and ſlew of them two thouſand, and took the Town again with ſafety. But the Legate with his company of Prelates (like good men of War) practiſed none other Martial feats, but all to be curſed the Earl of Tholouſe, his Cities, and his people. Ludovicus the King, to avoid the Peſtilence that was in the Camp, went into an Abbey not far off, where ſhortly after he died; of whoſe death are ſundry Opinions, ſome ſaying, That he was poiſoned; ſome, That he died of a Bloody-flux.

Whoſe death notwithſtanding the Legate thought to keep ſecret and conceal, till that the Town might be rendred and given up: for he thought himſelf ſhamed for ever, if he ſhould depart before the Town were won. Wherefore after he had incouraged the Souldiers afreſh, and yet after many ſharp aſſaults could not prevail; he bethought him how by falſehood he might betray them, and ſent unto them certain Heralds, to will them that they ſhould amongſt themſelves conſult upon Articles of Peace, and bring bring the ſame to their Camp, whoſe ſafe Conduct they faithfully promiſed and warranted both of coming and going. And when they had given their pledges for the ſame, the Meſſengers from the Citizens talked with the Legate: who promiſed them, if they would deliver up their City, they ſhould have their Lives, Goods, and Poſſeſſions in as ample manner as now they injoyed the ſame. But the Citizens and Souldiers refuſed to be under the Servitude of the French King, neither would ſo deliver up their City to thoſe, of whoſe inſolent pride they had ſo good experiment. After much talk on both ſides, and none like to take effect, the Legate requeſted them, and friendly laboured, that he, and his Prelates which were about him, might come into their City to examine what Faith and Belief they were of, and that he neither ſought nor meant any other thing thereby, but their own ſafeties as well of Body as Soul, which thing he faithfully ſware unto: For (ſaith he) the bruit of your great Infidelity hath come to the Lord Popes ear, and therefore deſired he to make true Certificate thereof. Whereupon the Citizens, not miſtruſting his faithful Oath and Promiſe made unto them, granted entrance to him and the reſidue of the Clergy, bringing with them no weapon into the Town. The Souldiers of the Camp, as it was agreed before, made them ready; ſo that at the entrance of the Prelates in at the gate, nothing regarding their Oath and Fidelity, the other ſuddenly were ready, and with violence ruſhed in, ſlew the Porter and Warders, and at length won the City and deſtroyed the ſame, and ſlew many of them that were within. Thus by falſehood and policy when they had gotten this noble City, they carried the Kings Corps unto Paris, where they buried the ſame. Of the whole number of the French Souldiers which in this Siege were deſtroyed by Famine, Peſtilence, and drowning, be recounted more than two and twenty thouſand: Whereby, ſaith the ſtory of Mat. Pariſienſis, it may evidently appear the War was unjuſtly taken in hand, &c. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi.

After theſe things finiſhed, and after the Funeral of the King celebrated at Paris, it followeth more in the ſaid Hiſtory of Pariſienſis, that the ſaid Legate Romanus was vehemently ſuſpected, and grievouſly infamed to abuſe himſelf with Blanca the Kings Mother: Sed impium eſt (ſaith he) hoc credere, quia æmuli ejus hoc diſſeminaverunt, benignus autem animus dubia in melius interpretatur; that is, But it is ungodly to ſuſpect any ſuch thing of him, becauſe his enemies ſo rumoured the ſame abroad; but a gentle mind expoundeth things doubtful in the better part.

The inconſtant life of theſe Romiſh Prelates to be noted.

To paſs further to the year next following, which was 1227. of the Lord, firſt it is to be noted, that in this year King Henry, beginning to ſhoot up unto the twentieth year of his age, came from Reading to London, where he began to charge the Citizens of London, for old reckonings; namely, for giving or lending one thouſand Marks to Lewis the French King, at his departing out of the Realm, to the great prejudice of him and of his Kingdom. For the recompence whereof they were conſtrained to yield to the King the full ſum of the like money. That done, he removed to Oxford, where he aſſembled a great Council, there denouncing and proteſting before them all that he was come to ſufficient age, no more to be under Tutors and Governors; but to be his own man; requiring to be freed from the cuſtody of others. Which thing being proteſted, and contraried forthwith: he by the counſel of Hubert the Chief Juſtice (whom he made then the Earl of Kent) removed from his company the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and others, under whom he was moderated. And immediately in the ſame Council by the ſiniſter perſwaſion of ſome, he doth annihilate and make void the Charters and Liberties before by him granted, pretending this colour, for that they had been granted and ſealed in the time of his minority, at what time he had the rule neither of himſelf, nor of his Seal. Whereupon much muttering and murmuring was among the multitude, who did all impute the cauſe to Hubert the Juſtice. Moreover, it was the ſame time proclaimed, that whoſoever had any Charter, or Gift ſealed in the time of the Kings minority, they ſhould come and renew the ſame again under the new Seal of the King, knowing otherwiſe that the thing ſhould ſtand in no effect. And finally, for renewing of their Seals, they were taxed not according to their ability, but according as it pleaſed the Juſtice and other to levy them.

Moreover, beſide this general Subſidy of the fifteenth granted to the King through the whole Realm, and beſides all the Contribution of the Londoners, divers other parcels and payments he gathered through ſeveral places: as of the Burgeſſes of Northampton he required a thouſand and two hundred Marks, for his helping of them, and ſo of others likewiſe. All this preparation of money was made toward the furniſhing of his Voyage to recover Normandy. And yet becauſe he would gratifie the City of London again with ſome pleaſure; he granted the Citizens thereof ſhould paſs Toll-free (ſaith Fabian) throughout all England. And if of any City, Borough, or Town they were conſtrained at any time to pay their Toll, then the Sheriffs of London to attach every man coming to London of the ſaid City, Borough or Town, and him with his goods to withhold, till the Londoners were again reſtored of all ſuch money paid for the ſaid Toll, with all coſts and damages ſuſtained for the ſame. Ex Fabiano.

Anno 1228.

I declared before, how after the death of Honorius ſucceeded Pope Gregory the Tenth, between the which Gregory and the people of Rome, this year fell a great Sedition. Inſomuch that about the Feaſt of Eaſter, they thruſt the Pope out of the City, purſuing him unto his Caſtle at Viterbium. Where alſo they invaded him ſo valiantly, that they chaſed him to Peruſium. Then having no other remedy wherewith to revenge his Perſecutors, fiercely he did Excommunicate them. Ex Mat. Pariſ. pag. 69.

Ex Fab. par. 7.

Sedition between the Romans and the Pope.

Here, by the way, is to be obſerved and conſidered, Chriſtian Reader, not only by this Sedition, but by ſo many other Schiſms, Diviſions, Tumults, Fightings, Brawls and Contentions in the Church of Rome from the firſt beginning of the Popes uſurped Power, and that not only within the City of Rome, but univerſally almoſt in all Popiſh Monaſteries, Colledges, Churches, and Covents under the Popes ſubjected, continually reigning amongſt them, what is to be thought of their Religion and Holineſs, having ſo little peace, ſo great diſquietneſs, diſſentions, and wrangling amongſt them, as in ſtories both manifeſt it is to behold, and wondrous to conſider.

The Popes Church may be judged by their diſſentions and ſchiſms.

No peace in the Popes Church.

And for ſo much as I have here entred into the mention of this Schiſmatical Commotion between the Pope and his Citizens; it followeth moreover in the Hiſtory of Pariſienſis, who maketh relation of a like brawling matter, which befel the ſame year, and time, An. 1228. between the Prior and Covent of Durham, and this King Henry the Third, upon this occaſion: after the death of Richard Biſhop of Durham, the Prior and Chapter of the ſaid Church came to the King, to obtain licence for the electing of their Biſhop. The King offered to them one Lucas a Chaplain of his, requiring them inſtantly to elect him for their Biſhop. To this the Monks anſwered, That they would receive no man, but by their Order of Canonical Election. Meaning belike, by their Canonical Election, thus much, when as they elect either ſome Monk out of their own company, or elſe ſome Monkiſh Prieſt after their own liking. Contrary, the King again ſendeth word unto them, and bound it with an Oath, That they ſhould tarry ſeven years without a Biſhop, unleſs they would admit the foreſaid Lucas to that place of that Dignity. All which notwithſtanding, the Monks, proceeding in their Election, refuſed the ſaid Lucas; and preferred another Clerk of theirs, named William Archdeacon of Worceſter, and him they preſented to the King: but the King, bringing in exceptions and cauſes againſt the party, would not admit him. Then the Monks in all haſty ſpeed ſend up to Rome certain of their Covent, to have their Election ratified by the Authority Apoſtolical. On the other ſide the King, likewiſe hearing, ſendeth alſo to Rome againſt the Monks, the Biſhop of Cheſter, and the Prior of Lentony on his behalf, to withſtand the purpoſe of the Monks. And ſo the matter, being traverſed with great altercation on both ſides, did hang in ſuſpence (ſaith mine Author) till at length thus it was concluded between both, that neither Maſter William, nor yet Lucas ſhould be taken, but that Richard Biſhop of Sarum ſhould be tranſlated to Durham, and be Biſhop there, Anno 1228. *Ex Matth. being hoiſted up to Rome, had this determination; that the Monks of Coventry and the Church of Lichfield ſhould chuſe their Biſhop by courſe, each part keeping his turn the one after the other: provided notwithſtanding, that the Prior of Coventry ſhould always have the firſt voice in every Election, whereas the old cuſtom was, ſaith nine Author, that the Covent with the Prior of Coventry was wont to have the whole Election of the Biſhop without the Canons, this was Anno 1228. Ex Pariſienſi, pag. 68.

The Chapters of the Bible firſt diſtinguiſhed by Stephen Langton.

Another contentious diſſention between the Monks of Canterbury and King Henry the third.

After the death of this Langton inſued another variance about the Election of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, between the Monks of Canterbury and the King. The perturbation whereof as it was no leſs ſeditious, ſo the determination of the ſame was much more coſtly. After the death of Stephen Langton, the Monks of Canterbury, obtaining licence of the King to proceed in the Election of a new Archbiſhop, did chooſe one of their own Society, named Maſter Walter Hemeſham. Whom when the Monks had preſented unto the King, he, after long deliberation, began to object againſt that Election, ſaying, Firſt, That the Monks had elected ſuch a one as neither was profitable to him nor his Kingdom. Secondly, He objected againſt the party elect, that his Father was convict of Felony, and hanged for the ſame. Thirdly, That he ſtood in Cauſes againſt his Father King John in the time of the Interdict. Moreover, the Biſhops his Suffragans charged the party elect, That he had lien with a certain Nun, and had Children by her; adding further, That the Election of the Archbiſhop was without their preſence, which ought not to be, &c. But the Archbiſhop again, ſtoutly ſtanding unto the Election, appealed up to Rome, and eftſoons, taking with him certain Monks, preſented himſelf to the Popes own proper perſon, there to ſue his Appeal; inſtantly intreating, that his Election might ſtand confirmed by his Authority pontifical. But the Pope underſtanding that the ſaid Election was reſiſted by the King and the Biſhops, deferred the matter until he did hear further of the certainty thereof. The King and the Biſhops, having intelligence that the Archbiſhop with his Monks were gone to Rome, thought good to articulate the foreſaid Objections above alledged, in writing; and ſealing the ſame with the Seals both of the King and of the Biſhops, to exhibit them to the Biſhop of Rome. The Meſſengers of theſe Letters were the Biſhops of Rocheſter, of Cheſter, and the Archdeacon of Bedford, Maſter John, &c. Who coming to Rome, and exhibiting their Meſſage with their Letters unto the Pope (conſideration being had upon the ſame) were commanded to waite attendance againſt the next day after Aſh-Wedneſday: then to have a reſolute anſwer concerning the Cauſe, which was the ſecond day of March the next year following; that is, in the year of our Lord, 1229. In the mean ſeaſon, the Kings Proctors ceaſed not with all inſtance to labour the Pope and his Cardinals to be favourable to the Kings ſide. But finding them ſomewhat hard and ſtrict in the matter (as is the guiſe of that Court) they began to miſdoubt their ſpeeding. Wherefore conſulting together with themſelves upon the premiſſes, they came to the Pope, promiſing in the Kings behalf to be given and granted to him, out of the Realms both of England and Ireland, the tythe or tenth part of all the goods within the ſaid Realms moveable, to ſuſtain his Wars againſt the Emperor, ſo that he would incline favourably to the Kings Suit and Petition herein. At dominus Papa (ſaith Paris) qui rebellem Imperatorem ſuper omnia æſtuabat dejicere, tantis promiſſionibus exhilaratus, trahitur ad conſenſum: That is, But the Pope (ſaith the Author) which boiled with deſire above all meaſure, to have the Emperor his Enemy caſt down, being cheared with ſo great promiſes, granted his conſent to them, who, ſitting then in his Conſiſtory, had theſe words, which here follow.

Appeal ſued to Rome.

King Henry ſendeth to the Pope.

Tythe of all moveable goods in England and Ireland promiſed to the Pope for granting the Kings Suit.

O auri ſacra fames.

It is pity the Pope will take no bribes.

There hath come of late to our Intelligence the Election of a certain Monk named Walter, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury; whereupon after that we heard and adviſed as well thoſe things which the ſaid Monk hath ſaid for himſelf and for his Election; as alſo on the contrary ſide, the Objections and Exceptions of the Biſhops of England alledging againſt him and againſt his Election; namely, of the Biſhop of Cheſter, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and John Archdeacon of Bedford: We upon the ſame committed the Examination touching the perſon of the man, unto our reverend Brethren Lords Cardinal Albany, Lord Cardinal Thomas de Sabina, and Maſter Peter. And when the foreſaid Elect, coming before them, was asked of them, firſt concerning the Lords deſcending into Hell, Whether deſcended in fleſh, or without his fleſh, he anſwered not well. Item, being asked touching the making of the body of Chriſt on the Altar, he anſwered likewiſe not ſoundly. Being asked moreover how Rachel wept for her Children, ſhe being dead before, he anſwered not well. Item, being asked concerning the Sentence of Excommunication denounced againſt the Order of Law, he anſwered not well. Again, being required of Matrimony, if one of the married parties be an Infidel, and do depart, he anſwered thereto not well. Upon theſe Articles he was (as is ſaid) diligently examined of the Cardinals; to the which we ſay he anſwered not only not well, but alſo very ill. For ſo much therefore, as the Church of Canterbury is a noble Church, and requireth a noble Prelate, a man diſcreet and modeſt, and ſuch as ought to be taken out of the boſome of the Church of Rome; and for ſo much as this new Elect (whom not only here we pronounce to be unworthy, but alſo ſhould ſay more of him, if we would proceed with him by the rigor of the Law) is ſo inſufficient, that he ought not to be admitted to ſuch a room: we do utterly infringe, annihilate, and evacuate his Election, always reſerving to our ſelves the proviſion of the ſaid Church. Hæc ex Mat. Pariſienſi ad verbum.

No, but when your darling Thomas Becket came he was heard without ſuch excommunication.

The Election of Walter Archbiſhop of Canterbury diſſolved by the Pope for the Kings money.

Thus the Election of Walter being fruſtrate and diſſolved, the Kings Procurators bringing forth the Letters of the King, and of the Suffragans of the Church of Canterbury, preſented the ſame unto the Pope for the Ratification of Richard Chancellor of Lincoln, to be appointed Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom they with great commendation of words did ſet forth to be a man of profound Learning and Knowledge, of an honeſt Converſation; and which was greateſt of all, that he was a man much for the profit of the Church of Rome, as alſo for the Realm of England. And thus the ſaid Richard being commended to the Pope by the Letters Procuratory of the King and of the Biſhops, had the conſent of the Pope and of the Cardinals, and ſo was made Biſhop of Canterbury before he was elected. Whereupon the ſaid Pope Gregory in his behalf directeth down his Letters to all and ſingular Suffragans of the Church of Canterbury, declaring thus, and beginning firſt with a lye, that for ſo much as by the fulneſs of Eccleſiaſtical Power the charge of Paſtoral Office is committed to him in general upon all Churches, he therefore for the ſollicitude he beareth, as well to all other Churches in general, as in ſpecial to the Metropolitan-Church of Canterbury, repudiating and diſannulling the former Election of Walter the Monk upon juſt cauſes, hath provided for that See a man, as in all other good gifts perfect and excellent, by the report of them that know him, ſo for that Function very fit and commodious; and willeth and commandeth them, and all others, by his Authority Apoſtolical, with all devout reverence to receive him, and humbly to obey him, &c. which was Anno 1229. Ex Pariſ.

The Pope beginneth firſt with a lye.

Ex Mat. Pariſienſi.

These things thus finiſhed at Rome, the Pope not forgetting the ſweet promiſes made of the Engliſh Silver which he ſo greedily gaped for, omitting neither time nor diligence, in all ſpeedy wiſe ſendeth unto the King of England M. Stephen his own Chaplain and truſty Legate, to require and collect the foreſaid Tythes of all the moveable goods both of England, Ireland, and Wales, which were promiſed to him before, therewith to maintain his War againſt Frederick the Emperor. And to the intent he might inflame all Chriſtian Realms with the like hatred which he bare againſt Frederick the Emperor, he ſendeth alſo with the ſaid Stephen ſpecial Letters full of manifold Complaints, and grievous Accuſations againſt the ſaid Emperor, whereof more (Chriſt granting) ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. Upon the coming of this Stephen the Legate, the King aſſembled all his Earls and Barons, with the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, bots, Priors, Templars, Hoſpitalers, Parſons and Vicars, and other ſuch as held of him In Capite, to appear before him at Weſtminſter, to hear and to commune of the matter. In the Aſſembly of whom, the Popes Patent Letters were brought forth and read, wherein he required the Tenths of all the moveables in England, Wales and Ireland, as well of the Clergy as of the Laity, to maintain his Expedition againſt the foreſaid Frederick the Emperor. The which Expedition as he pretended to atchieve and to take in hand for the cauſe of the Univerſal Church, and happily had begun the matter already; and for ſo much as the Riches of the Apoſtolick See did not ſuffice for the accomplishing of ſo great an enterpriſe: he therefore, inforced by meer neceſſity, did implore the aid and help of all the true obedient and natural Chickens of the Church of Rome, leſt the Members thereof together with the Head ſhould be ſubverted. These Letters of the Pope to this effect being openly recited and explained by the Popes Chaplain, which he with much more allegation and perſwaſion of words did amplifie to his uttermoſt; the King (ſaith mine Author) in whom all men did hope for help to their defence, became then as a ſtaffe of Reed. For ſo much as he had obliged himſelf to the ſame before, for the Election of his Archbiſhop, now could he ſay nothing againſt it, but held his peace. The Earls, Barons, and all the Laity utterly refuſed ſo to bind their Baronies to the Church of Rome: but the Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, with other Prelates of the Church, firſt requiring ſpace and reſpite to deliberate for three or four days; at length for fear of the Popes Curſe (although they durſt not utterly withſtand) had brought to paſs to have concluded for a ſum of money much leſs, had not Stephen Segrave, one of the Kings Counſellors, craftily conventid with the Legate, and by ſubtil means brought it ſo to paſs, that the whole Tenths were gathered and paid, to the ineſtimable damage (ſaith Pariſienſis both of the Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal State. The means whereof (ſaith the Author) was this, The Legate ſhewing to the Prelates his Procuratory Letters, to collect and gather up all the foreſaid Tenths in the name and authority of the Pope, declared moreover the full Authority to him granted by the vertue of his Commiſſion, to Excommunicate all ſuch, and to interdict their Churches, whoſoever did gainſtand or go contrary to the ſaid Collection. Whereupon by the ſaid vertue Legantine, he ſendeth to every Shire his Proctors to gather the Popes money, or elſe to Excommunicate them which denied to pay. And for ſo much as the preſent need of the Pope required preſent help without delay, he ſendeth moreover to the Biſhops and Prelates of the Realm, in pain of interdiction, forthwith to procure and ſend to him either of their own, or by loan, or uſance, or by what means ſoever, ſo much money in all poſt ſpeed for the preſent uſe of the Pope; and after to take up again the ſaid money of the Tenths of every ſingular perſon, by the right taxing of their goods. Upon this, the Prelates to avoid the danger (having no other remedy) were driven to ſell their Challices, Cruets, Copes, Jewels, and other Church-Plate, and ſome to lay to morgage ſuch things as they had, ſome alſo to borrow upon uſance to make the money which was required. Moreover, the ſaid Stephen the Popes Chaplain (as reporteth Paris) brought with him into England, for the ſame purpoſe, ſuch Bankers and Uſurers, who lending out their money upon great uſury, did unreaſonably pinch the Engliſh people, which Merchant-Uſurers were then called Caurſini. Briefly, ſuch ſtrict Exaction was then upon the poor Engliſh-men, that not only their preſent goods were valued and taxed, but alſo the Corn, yet growing in the field, againſt the next Harveſt was tythed, &c. Only the Earl of Cheſter, named Ranulphus, ſtood ſtoutly againſt the Pope, ſuffering none within his Dominion either Lay-man or Clerk to yield any Tenths to the Popes Proctors. Ex Matth. Paris, pag. 74. And this was the end of the ſtrife between the Monks of Canterbury and the King for the Election of their Archbiſhop, which was about the year of our Lord, 1229. in the which year was finiſhed the new Church of Coventry, by Alexander Biſhop of the ſaid City, and partly by the help of the King: which Church Richard his Predeceſſor Biſhop before him of Coventry had begun.

The French-men about this time again prepared themſelves towards Provans, to war againſt the foreſaid Reimundus Earl of Tholouſe, and to expulſe him out of his Poſſeſſions. And hearing that he was in his Caſtle of Saracene, they made thither all their Power, thinking there to incloſe and compaſs him about: but the Earl being privy of their conſpired purpoſe, ſet for them by the way, appointing certain ambuſhments in woods, not ſo ſecretly as ſtrongly, there to wait and receive the coming of the French-men, and to give them their welcome. Thus when the French were entred the wood, the Earl with his train of well armed and able Warriors, ſuddenly did fly upon them unawares, and gave them a bitter meeting, ſo that in that Conflict five hundred of the French Souldiers were taken and many ſlain. Of their Servitors to the number of Two thouſand men with their armor were taken, of whom ſome loſt their Eyes, ſome their Noſes, ſome their Ears, ſome their Legs, and ſo were ſent home; the reſt were carried away Priſoners into the Caſtle. And to be brief (ſaith the Hiſtory) thrice the ſame Summer were the French-men diſcomfited, put to flight, taken and impriſoned by the foreſaid Reimundus the godly Earl. Ex Pariſ. pag. 69. Wherein is to be ſeen and to be praiſed the gracious Protection of the Lord our God againſt the furious Papiſts, which is glorious always in his Saints.

The ſame year the King, being at Portſmouth, had aſſembled together all his Nobility, Earls, Barons, and Knights of England, with ſuch an Army of Horſemen and Footmen, as hath not been lightly ſeen, thinking to recover again the Country of Normandy, of Gant, and other Poſſeſſions which King John his Father before had loſt. But when the Captains and Marſhals of the field ſhould take ſhipping, there were not half Ships enough to receive the Hoſt. Whereupon the King was vehemently inflamed with anger, laying all the fault in Hubert the Lord Chief Juſtice (who under the King had all the Government of the Realm) calling him old Traytor, charging him that he ſhould be the let of his Voyage, as he was before when he took of the French Queen five thouſand Marks to ſtay the Kings Journey into Normandy. Inſomuch that the rage of the King was ſo kindled againſt him, that drawing his Sword, he made at him to run him through, had not the Earl of Cheſter, Ranulph ſtopt the King. Hubert withdrew himſelf away till the Kings rage was paſt. This was about the time of Michaelmas, at which time arrived Henry Earl of Normandy in the Haven of Portſmouth in the month of October; who ſhould have conducted the King upon his Allegiance and Oath into Normandy. But he with other of the Kings Army counſelled the King not to take that Voyage towards Winter, but rather to defer it to the Eaſter next following: wherewith the King was ſtayed and well contented, and pacified again with Hubert the Juſtice, &c. Ex Pariſienſi.

Fabian recordeth this year the Liberties and Franchiſes of the City of London to be confirmed by the King, and to every of the Sheriffs to be granted two Clerks, and two Officers without any more. Ex Fabian.

Then followed the year 1230. in which upon the day of the Converſion of S. Paul (as ſaith Paris) as a great multitude of people for the ſolemnity of the day were congregate in the Temple of S. Paul, the Biſhop then being at his Maſs, a ſudden darkneſs with ſuch thickneſs of Clouds fell in the Air, that unneth one man might ſee another in the Church. After that followed cracks of thunder and lightning ſo terrible, leaving ſuch a ſcent in the Church, that the people, looking for Doomeſ-day, thought no leſs but that the Steeple and whole Church would have fallen upon their heads: inſomuch that they running out of the Church, as people amazed, fell down together by thouſands, as men amazed, not knowing for the time where they were; only the Biſhop and his Deacon ſtood ſtill at their Mats, holding the Altar faſt. Ex Pariſienſi.

Of the death of Stephen Langton, and of the troubleſome Election of the next Archbiſhop, alſo of the coſtly and chargeable bringing in of Richard to ſucceed in the room, which did coſt the whole Realm of England the tenths of all their moveables, ſufficient hath been declared before. This Richard, being now confirmed in his Seat, came to the King complaining of Hubert the Lord Chief Juſtice, oft mentioned before, for withholding from him the Caſtle and Town of Tunbridge with the appurtenances to the ſame belonging, and other Lands of the Earl of Clare late deceaſed. Which Lands appertain to the right of his Seat, and to the Church of Canterbury; for the which the ſaid Earl with his Anceſtors were bound to do Homage to him and to his Predeceſſors; and therefore he required the keeping of the foreſaid Caſtle, with the demains thereof to be reſtored to him. To this the King anſwered again, That the ſaid Earl did hold of him in Capite, and that the Caſtles being vacant of Earls and Barons, with their Heirs, did belong to his Crown, till the lawful age of the ſaid Heirs. The Archbiſhop, when he could get no other anſwer of the King, did Excommunicate all ſuch as invaded the foreſaid Poſſeſſions, with all others that took their part, the King only excepted. Which done, eſtſoons he ſpeedeth himſelf to Rome, there to proſecute his Suit before the Pope. The King hearing thereof, not long after ſendeth up Maſter Roger Cantelu, with certain other Meſſengers, unto Rome againſt the Archbiſhop.

The Kings Anſwer to Richard the Archbiſhop.

Excommunication abuſed.

Richard the Archbiſhop complaineth to the Pope of his King and other matters more.

This Richard the Archbiſhop, coming before the Popes preſence, beginneth firſt to complain of his King, for that he committed all the Affairs of his Realm to the diſpoſition and government of Hubert his Juſtice, uſing only his counſel, all his other Nobles deſpiſed.

Againſt the ſaid Juſtice, moreover he complained, laying to his Charge; firſt, that he had married a wife, being the Kinſwoman of her whom he had married before; alſo that the ſaid Hubert the Juſtice did invade, hold, and wrongfully detain ſuch Poſſeſſions as belonged to the See and Church of Canterbury.

As touching the Wife of this Hubert, here is to be noted, that he married the elder Siſter of the King of Scots: which, as it ſeemeth, could be of no great kin to her whom he married before.

Further, he complaineth of certain Biſhops his Suffragans, who, neglecting their Paſtoral Function, did ſit on Chequer-matter belonging to the King, and exerciſed Seſſions and Judgments of blood.

Plurality of Benefices complained of by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Over and beſides, he complaineth of beneficed Perſons, and Clerks within Orders, for having many Benefices joyned with cure of Soul: and that they alſo, taking example of the Biſhops, did intermeddle in Secular matters, and in Judgments of Lay-men.

Of theſe and ſuch other defaults he required redreſs to be had. The Pope weighing and conſidering the cauſe of the Archbiſhop to ſtand upon right and reaſon (at leaſtwiſe ſeeming ſo to his purpoſe) commanded incontinent his Petitions and Requeſts to be diſpatched according to Juſtice.

The Kings Attorneys could not ſpeed with the Pope. Reſpect of perſons doth much with the Pope.

Againſt theſe Complaints of the Archbiſhop, the Kings Attorneys alledged and defended, in as much favour of the King as they might, but could do no good. Such favour found the Archbiſhop in the Popes ſight, being (as the ſtory reporteth) of a comely Perſonage, and of an eloquent Tongue, that he obtained whatſoever he asked. Thus the Archbiſhop, with all favourable ſpeed being diſpatched at Rome after his own will and deſire, returned homeward; who in his Journey, within three days of his ſetting forth, departed in the houſe of Gray-Fryers at S. Gemmes, and ſo his cauſe departed with him: who, winning his Suit, loſt his life; for whom it had been better, I ſuppoſe, to have tarried at home. And here of him an end, with all his Complaints alſo. Ex Pariſienſi.

Richard the Archbiſhop in his journey from Rome dieth.

Ralph Nevil Biſhop of Chicheſter elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The King inveſteth the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Ex Mat. Paris.

After the death of this Richard, the Monks of Canterbury (according to the manner) addreſs themſelves to a new Election: at which was choſen Ralph Nevil, Biſhop of Chicheſter, who was the Kings Chancellor, much commended in ſtories, to be a man faithful, upright, and conſtant: which from the way of Juſtice declined neither to the right hand nor to the left, but was upright and ſincere both in word and deed. This Ralph (thus choſen of the Monks) was preſented unto the King to be their Archbiſhop, wherewith the King was right well contented, and glad alſo of his Election: and forthwith inveſted him for Archbiſhop of the Church of Canterbury. But this inveſting of the King was not enough, unleſs he ſhould alſo be confirmed by the Pope. Wherefore the Monks, ready to take their journey unto Rome, came to the new Archbiſhop, requiring his help for their expences by the way, and to know what Service he would command them to the Court of Rome. But he, fearing in his mind the ſame not to be without ſome ſcruple of ſimony and ambition, ſaid, He would not give an half-peny, and, holding up his hands to heaven, thus prayed, ſaying, O Lord God, if I ſhall be thought worthy to be called (although indeed unworthy) to the Seat and Office of this Church; ſo be it as thou ſhalt diſpoſe it. But if otherwiſe in this troubleſome Office of Chancery, and this my inferior Miniſtry, whereunto I have been aſſigned, I ſhall ſeem more neceſſary for this thy Kingdom and People I refuſe not my labour, thy will be done.

A rare example of a good Archbiſhop.

The prayer of the Archbiſhop elect.

The Monks beholding the conſtancy of the man, notwithſtanding they had of him no money, yet refuſed not their travel and journey to Rome, to have their Election confirmed by the Popes Authority. The Pope inquiring of Simon Langton (Brother of Stephen Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury before mentioned) of the perſon of this man, it was reported again to him by the ſaid Simon (maliciouſly depraving the good man behind his back) declaring to the Pope, that he was a Courtier, unlearned, haſty, and fervent in his doings, and ſuch a one, who, if he ſhould be promoted to that Dignity, would go about, with the help of the King and of the whole Realm, to remove and bring the Realm of England from under the Yoke of the Pope and of the Church of Rome: and ſo to bereave the See of Rome of the Tribute, under which King John had once ſubjected himſelf and his Realm, at what time he yielded his Crown to the hands of Pandulphus the Legate, &c. With theſe and ſuch other words Simon Langton falſly and maliciouſly depraved the godly Biſhop. The Pope hearing with one ear, and crediting what he heard, without further inquiſition made of the other party accuſed, ſendeth incontinent to the Monks of Canterbury to proceed in a new Election, and to chooſe them another Archbiſhop, ſuch as were an wholeſome Paſtor of Souls, profitable unto the Church of England, and devote to the Church of Rome: and thus was the lawful Election of this good Archbiſhop made fruſtrate; too good peradventure to ſerve in that place whereunto he was elected.

Simon Langton Archbiſhop of York, a malicious ſtickler of Radulphus Archbiſhop elect.

The raſh judgment of the Pope

The Election of Radulph Archbiſhop elect, defeated by the Pope.

After the repulſe of this Radulph, the Canterbury Monks, entring a new Election, agreed upon John their Prior, to be their Metropolitan; who, going up to Rome to have his Election confirmed by the Pope, was three days together examined of the Cardinals. And when they could find no inſufficiency in him, touching thoſe things wherein they tried him: yet notwithſtanding the Pope finding fault with his age (he peradventure being more aged himſelf) repelled him, for that he ſaid he was too old and ſimple to ſuſtain that Dignity. Ex Paris.

John Archbiſhop of Canterbury elected and refuſed of the Pope.

What was the age of this perſon, I find it not in the Author expreſſed; yet it is to be ſuppoſed, that he, which was able to take that Journey to Rome and home again, was not ſo greatly to be complained of for his age, but that he was able ſufficiently to take pains in keeping the Chair of Canterbury.

The Popes intolerable Exactions upon England.

In the former parts of this ſtory preceding, partly before hath been declared, partly hereafter more ſhall appear (Chriſt willing) how the Church of England and Commons of the ſame was grieved and miſerably afflicted by the intolerable Oppreſſion of the Pope: who through his violent extortion had procured the beſt Benefices to be given unto his Romans, and the chief fruits of them to be reſerved to his own Coffers. And what complaints thereof have been made, ye heard before; but yet no redreſs could be had. Such was the inſatiable avarice of theſe Roman Rakehels, prolling, and polling, whereſoever they came, with their proviſions and exactions out of meaſure, and never ſatisfied. Inſomuch that here in England, whoſoever lacked, their Barns were always full of Corn; and what penury ſoever pinched the people, they were ſure to have enough. And theſe importunate Exactions and Contributions of theſe Italian Harpies, beſides the Peter-pence, beſides the common Tribute, daily more and more increaſed, to the great grievance of the Realm, inſomuch that the wealth of this Land was almoſt clean ſucked up, and tranſlated to the Court of Rome. Neither was the King ignorant hereof, but could not help the matter. Wherefore it was deviſed by ſome of the Nobles (as appeareth in the ſtory of Pariſienſis) this foreſaid year, An. 1231. that certain Letters, under the pretenſed colour of the Kings Authority, ſhould be ſent abroad, willing and commanding, that ſuch Corn and Grain with other Revenues, as were taken up for the Pope, ſhould be ſtaid and forth coming by a certain day in the ſaid Letters appointed; the which Letters are thought to proceed chiefly by the means of Hubert Lord Chief Juſtice of England, who then, next under the King, ruled the moſt Affairs of the Realm. The words and contents of the Letters be theſe:

Ex Matt Paſſ. pag. 79

Hubert Lord Chief Juſtice a worker againſt the Pope.

After

The Copy of the Letter written under the Kings Authority to reſtrain the Benefices of the Romans within the Realm.

AFter divers and ſundry Griefs and Oppreſſions which this Realm, as you know, hath ſuſtained by the Romaniſts, and yet doth, as well to the prejudice of the King himſelf, as alſo of the Nobility of the ſame, concerning the Advowſons of their Churches, and about their Tythes: who alſo go about to take from the Clerks and ſpiritual men their Benefices, and to beſtow them upon their own Nation and Country-men, to the ſpoil and confuſion both of us and our Realm: we therefore by our common conſents have thought good (although very late) now yet rather, than any longer to ſuffer their intollerable Oppreſſions and Extortions, to reſiſt and withſtand the ſame. And by the taking from them their Benefices through all England, in like manner to cut ſhort and bridle them, as they had thought to have kept under and bridled others: whereby they may deſiſt any longer to moleſt the Realm. Wherefore we ſtraitly charge and command you, that as touching the farming of their Churches, or elſe the rents belonging to them, which either you have preſently in your hands, or elſe do owe unto the ſaid Romaniſts, that from henceforth you be no more accountable to them, or elſe pay to them from henceforth the ſame. But that you have the ſaid your Rents and Revenues ready by ſuch a day, to pay and deliver unto our Procurators thereunto by our Letters aſſigned; and that all Abbots and Priors have the ſame in a readineſs at the time appointed, in their own Monaſteries: and all other Prieſts, Clerks and Lay-men, at the Churches of the Romaniſts, there ready to pay. And further, know ye for certainty, that if ye refuſe thus to do, all that you have beſides ſhall be by us burnt and ſpoiled. And beſides, look what danger we purpoſe ſhall fall upon them, the ſame ſhall light upon your Necks if you refuſe thus to do.

Farewell.

When this was done, they ſent their Letters abroad by certain Souldiers thereunto appointed, to the which Letters they had deviſed a new Seal with two Swords ingraved, and between the Swords was written, Ecce gladii duo, &c. Behold theſe two Swords, ready to take vengeance of all thoſe that ſhall withſtand the form and order in theſe Letters contained.

{Anno 1232.} A Roman Prieſt, Canon of Pauls, taken and robbed by Souldiers.

At that time the ſixteenth day before the Kalends of January, about the beginning of the year 1232, there was kept at S. Albans a great Conſiſtory of Abbots, Priors, Archdeacons, with divers both of the Nobility and Clergy by the Popes Commandment, for the Celebration of a Divorce between the Counteſs of Eſſex and her Husband. At the breaking up of which Conſiſtory, when every man was about to depart thence, there was a certain Clerk, whoſe name was Cincius a Roman, and alſo a Canon of Pauls in London, taken by ſome of the ſaid Univerſity not far off from Saint Albans, and was carried away from his company by the Souldiers. But Maſter John, Archdeacon of Norwich, a Florentine, hardly eſcaping from that company, got to London, where he hid himſelf, and durſt not be ſeen. Cincius after five weeks, when they had well emptied his bags, was ſafely ſent again without any more hurt to London.

The Barns of a Roman Parſon broke up, and the corn diſtributed to the poor.

Not long after this, about the beginning of January, the Barns of a certain beneficed man a Roman, and Parſon of Wingham, being full of Corn, were broke up by a like company of armed Souldiers, and the Corn brought out to be ſold and given away to the poor people. The Farmer ſeeing this, and not able to reſiſt, complaineth to the Sheriff of the Shire of this injury done to his Maſter, and of breaking the Kings peace: whereupon the Sheriff ſent certain of his men to ſee what was dome. Who coming to the empty Barns, and there finding the foreſaid Souldiers to them unknown, who had ſold away the moſt part of the Corn upon eaſie price, and ſome for charity had given to the poverty of the Country about, required of them what they were, that ſo durſt preſume to break the Kings peace. Whom the other then called ſecretly apart, and ſhewed them the Kings Letters Patents (pretending at leaſt the Kings Name and Seal) wherein was forbidden that no man ſhould preſume to ſtop or let them in that purpoſe. Whereof the Sheriffs Servants being certified, quietly returned from whence they came.

The Roman and Italian Parſons in England robbed of their rents and corn.

This coming to the knowledge of Roger Biſhop of London, he (with the aſſiſtance of other Biſhops) proceedeth in ſolemn Excommunication, firſt againſt them that robbed Cincius the Roman; then of them which ſpoiled the Barns of the Parſon of Wingham another Roman; thirdly, he Excommunicated them that forged the Letters and Seal of the King above ſpecified.

A general ſpoil of the Roman Parſons in England.

Neither yet, for all this, did that ſo ceaſe, but the ſame year about Eaſter next following, all the Barns in England, which were in the hands of any Roman or Italian, were likewiſe waſted, and the Corn ſold to the beſt Commodity of the poor Commons. Of the which, great Alms were diſtributed, and many times Money alſo with Corn together was ſparſed for the needy people to gather up. Neither was there any that would or durſt ſtand againſt them. As for the Romans and Italians themſelves, they were ſtricken in ſuch fear, that they hid themſelves in Monaſteries and Cells, not daring to complain of their Injuries received; but held it better to loſe rather their goods, than to loſe their lives. The Authors and Workers of this feat were to the number of fourſcore armed Souldiers; of whom the principal Captain was one naming himſelf William Withers, ſurnamed Twing.

This coming to the Popes knowledge, he was not a little ſtirred therewith, and ſendeth his Letters immediately to the King upon the ſame, with ſharp Threatnings, and imperious Commandments, charging him for ſuffering ſuch Villany within his Realm, ſtraitly injoyning him, under pain of Excommunication, to ſearch out the doers hereof with all diligence, and ſo to puniſh them that all others by them may take Example. Likewiſe he ſendeth the ſame Charge to Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the Abbot of Saint Edmund, to inquire in the South parts. Alſo to the Archbiſhop of York, and to the Biſhop of Durham, and to Maſter John, Canon of York, a Roman, to inquire in the North parts for the ſaid Malefactors, and after diligent Inquiſition made, to ſend up the ſame to Rome, there needs to appear before him, &c.

A ſumiſh Vicar of mild Chriſt.

Inquiſition made for the ſpoiling of the Popes corn.

Thus after earneſt Inquiſition made of all Parties, and Witneſſes ſworn and examined, many were found culpable in the matter, ſome that were Factors, ſome that were Conſenters, of whom ſome were Biſhops and Chaplains unto the King, ſome Archdeacons and Deans, with other Souldiers and Lay-men. Amongſt whom, certain Sheriffs and Under-Sheriffs, with their Servitors under them, were apprehended and caſt into priſon by the King. Many for fear fled and eſcaped away, who being ſought for, could not be found: but the principal of this number (as is aforeſaid) was ſuppoſed to be Hubertus Lord Chief Juſtice; who, both with the Kings Letters and his own, fortified the doers thereof, that no man durſt interrupt them. Moreover, in the ſame Society of them which were noted in theſe doings, was the ſame Robert Twing above mentioned, a comely young man and a tall Souldier: who of his own voluntary accord with five other Servitors, whom he took with him abroad to work that feat, came unto the King, openly proteſting himſelf to be the Author of that deed doing, and ſaid he did it for hatred of the Pope and the Romans, becauſe that by the Sentence of the Biſhop of Rome, and fraudulent Circumvention of the Italians he was bereaved of the Patronage of his Benefice, having no more to give but that one: wherefore to be revenged of that injury, he enterpriſed that which was done; preferring rather juſtly to be Excommunicated for a ſeaſon, than to be ſpoiled of his Benefice for ever. Then the King, and other Executers of the Popes commandment, gave him counſel, that ſeeing he had ſo incurred the danger of the Popes Sentence, he ſhould offer himſelf to the Pope to be abſolved of him again, and there to make his declaration unto him, that he juſtly and canonically was poſſeſſed of that Church. The King moreover with him ſent his Letters Teſtimonial unto the Pope, witneſſing with the ſaid Souldier, and inſtantly deſiring the Pope in his behalf, that he might with favour be heard. At the requeſt whereof, Pope Gregory afterwards both releaſed him of the Sentence, and reſtored unto him his Patronage, writing unto the Archbiſhop of York, that he might again injoy the right of his Benefice, in as ample manner as he did before it was taken from him.

Hubert de Burgo.

Robert Twing ſpoiled of his Benefice by the Romans.

Hubert de Burgo Lord Chief Juſtice, being one of them which held againſt the Romiſh Prieſts, as is afore ſignified, was therefore not a little noted of the Biſhops; who to requite him with the like deſpite again (after their their accustomed manner of practice) went about by subtil working to shake him out of the Kings favour. And first cometh Peter Bishop of Winchester to the King, grievously complaining of certain about the King; but especially of the foresaid Hubert the Kings Justice: insomuch that he caused him to be removed from his Office, notwithstanding he had the Kings Seal and writing for the perpetuity of the same, and procured Stephen Segrave to be placed in his Function. And after a few days, the King more and more incensed against him, called him unto account of all the Treasure which he was accountable for by his Exchequer-Office: also of all such debts by him due from the time of his Father, till his time: also of all the Lordships which were in the possession of William Earl of Pembroke, Chief Justice before him. Item, of the liberties which he did hold at that time in Forests, Warrens, Shires, and other places, how they were kept, or how they were made away. Of prizes likewise, also of losses committed through his negligence, and of wastes made contrary to the Kings profit, of his liberties how he did use them. Item, of Injuries and Damages wrought against the Clerks of Rome and other Italians, and the Popes Legates; for the redress whereof he would never adjoyn his counsel, according as pertained to his Office, being then Chief Justice of England. Also of Scutages, Gifts, Presents, scapes of Prisoners. Item, of Maritages which King John committed to his keeping at the day of his death, and which were also in his time committed unto him. To these Hubert answered, That he had King John's own hand to shew for his discharge, whoso approved his fidelity, that he never called him to any, but clearly discharged him from all such Counts. Whereunto answered again the Bishop of Winchester, saying, The Charter of King John hath no force after the death of him, but that ye may now be called to a reckoning of this King for the same.

The Biſhops go about to bring Hubert out of the Kings favour.

Objections laid against Hubert by the King.

Note, that in Winchester the Kings Charter is no longer in force than whilst he liveth.

Over and besides these, other greater Objections were laid to his charge by the King, as for sending and writing unto the Duke of Austria, that he might marry his Daughter, to the prejudice of the King, and of the Realm, disswading that she might not be given him. Item, for counselling the King not to enter into Normandy with his Army, which he had prepared for the recovery of Lands there belonging to his right, whereby great Treasure was there consumed in vain. Item, for corrupting the Daughter of the King of Scots, whom King John his Father committed unto his custody for him to marry. Item, for stealing from him a precious stone, which had a vertue to make him victorious in War, and for sending the same unto Leolin, Prince of Wales: and that by his Letters sent to the said Leolin, William Brues a Nobleman was caused there trayterously to be hanged, &c. These with other Crimes (whether true or false) were suggested to the King against the said Hubert by his Adversaries: whereunto he was required to answer by order of Law. Hubert then, seeing himself in such a strait, refused to answer presently, but required respite thereunto, for that the matters were weighty which the King objected to him, which was granted to him till the fourteenth day of September: but in the mean time, Hubert, being in fear of the King, fled from London to the Priory of Merton. And thus Hubert, who before for the love of the King, and defence of the Realm (saith mine Author) had got the hatred of all the Nobles of England, now being out of the Kings favour, was destitute of comfort on every side; save only that Lucas Archbishop of Dublin, with instant prayers and tears laboured to the King for him. By this example, and many like, is to be seen, how unstable and variable a thing the favour of mortal and mutable Princes is: to teach all such as have to do about Princes, how to repose and plant their trust, not in man, but in their Lord God, by him to find help in Christ the true Prince of all Princes, which never faileth. By like example was Clito Servant of King Alexander, Joab of King David, Belisarius of Justinian, Harpagus of Astiages, Cromwel of King Henry, with innumerable more, which in Histories are to be found.

Other Crimes objected to Hubert by the King.

Princes Favours not to be trusted unto.

When the day was come that this Hubert should answer, keeping amongst the Monks of Merton, he durst not appear. Then was it signified unto him from the King, that he should come up and appear in the Court, there to answer to his Charge. Whereunto he answered again, That he misdoubted the Kings anger, and therefore he did fly to the Church, as the uttermost Refuge to all such as suffer wrong; from whence he would not stir, till he heard the Kings wrath to be mitigated towards him. With this the King, moved and sore displeased, directed his Letters, in all hast to the Major of London, commanding him at the sight thereof to muster and take up all the Citizens that could bear Harness in the City, and to bring to him by force of Arms the foresaid Hubert either quick or dead out of Merton. Whereupon, the Major immediately, causing the great Bell to be rung, assembled together the people of London, and opening before them the Kings Letters, commanded them to prepare and arm themselves in all readiness to the executing of the Kings Will and Message.

The Kings Message to the Major of London.

The Citizens hearing this were therewith right glad and ready, for they were all in great hatred with Hubert, because of the Execution of Constantine their Citizen afore-mentioned. Notwithstanding, certain of the Citizens; namely, Andrew Buckerell, John Travers, and others more, men of more grave and sage discretion (wisely pondering with themselves, what inconvenience might rise hereof) went in haste to the Bishop of Winchester, lying then in Southwark, and, waking him out of his sleep, desired of him his counsel in that so sudden and dangerous distress, declaring unto him what peril might thereby insue as well to the Church of Merton, as also to the City, by the fury of the unordinate and fierce multitude, which will hardly be bridled from robbing and spoiling, neither will spare shedding of blood, &c. Unto whom again the bloody Bishop gave this bloody counsel (saith Parisiensis) Dangerous it is (quoth he) both here and there; but yet see that you obey and execute the Precept of the King, I counsel you plainly. At the which counsel of the Bishop, they, being amazed, went with an ill will about the business injoyned. But the people, inflamed with hatred, gladly coveted to be revenged, and to shed the blood of the said Hubert.

Old grudge born in mind.

Some wiser than some.

Good advisement of discreet Citizens.

Cruel counsel of Peter Bishop of Winchester.

¶ The cause, why Peter Bishop of Winchester was so cruelly set against the Justice, was partly for the damages he had done to the Roman Priests, as before is touched; partly also for the old grudge, because the King coming to his lawful age before (through the counsel of this Hubert) loosed himself from the government of the said Bishop, who had him then in custody. And thus rose up the grudge and displeasure of this Bishop towards him.

The cause of displeasure between Hubert and the Bishop of Winchester.

On the next morrow, the Londoners issuing out of the City, to the number of twenty thousand, set forth toward the Abbey of Merton, where Hubert was lying prostrate before the Altar, commending himself to God.

Hubert prostrate upon the ground commendeth himself to God.

In the mean season, while the Citizens were in their Journey, raging against the poor Earl of Kent, it was suggested to the King by Radulph Bishop of Chichester, and Lord Chancellor, that it was dangerous to excite up the vulgar and unruly multitude, for fear of Sedition; lest peradventure the rude and heady people, being stirred up, will not so soon be brought down again, when the King would have them. Moreover, what shall be said (quoth he) among the Frenchmen and other Nations, which of great things love to make them greater, and of evil things to make them worse than they are? but thus jestingly and mockingly: See what a kind Bird is the young King of England, which seeketh to devour his old Nurse, under whose wings he had been brought up and nourished in his youth. And thus the King, by the perswasion hereof, changing his counsel, sent in all hasty wise after the Army again, willing them to retract their Journey, and to retire. And thus the Londoners (although much against their wills) returned home, missing of their purpose. Wherein is to be observed another notable example of Gods working Providence. For when the King (saith the History) had sent by two Messengers or Pursivants to revoke and call back again the Army of the Londoners, going with greedy minds to shed the blood of the innocent Justice: one of the Messengers posting with all speed possible, with the Kings Letters, overtook the Army; and coming to the fore-ward where the Captains were, by vertue of the Kings Letters staid their course and bloody purpose, whereby they could proceed no further. But the other Messenger crafty and malicious, bearing hatred to the said Hubert, and rather wishing him to be slain than to be delivered, lingred by the way of purpose

A notable example of Gods juſt puniſhment, ſtriking with death, him that ſeeketh the death of another.

purpoſe (although being commanded to make haſte) and when he came, went only but to the middle ſort; more like a Meſſenger meet to ſerve a dead mans arrant, than to ſerve the turn of them which be alive. And ſo in like manner, by the juſt hand of God it fell upon him. For the ſame Meſſenger ſtumbling with his Horſe, riding but a ſoft or foot paſe, and rather walking than riding, fell down backward from his Horſe back, and there brake his neck and died. This merciful meſſage of the King was (as is ſaid) ſent by the inſtigation of Radulph Biſhop of Chicheſter, Lord Chancellor (a vertuous and a faithful man) and one that could skill to have compaſſion on the miſeries of Men. Of whom was declared before, that he, being elected Archbiſhop of Canterbury, would not give one half-penny to their expences by the way, to get his Election confirmed by the Pope: and afterward by the ſaid Pope was defeated and fruſtrated of his Election, as relation was made afore. And thus through Gods Providence, by the means of the Kings Letters, the Army returned, and Hubert's life (contrary to his expectation) was preſerved.

Commendation of Radulph Biſhop of Chicheſter

The Archbiſhop of Dublin again maketh intercеſſion for Hubert.

After this, the Archbiſhop of Dublin, with much labour and great ſute, intreated and obtained of the King to grant unto the ſaid Hubert, reſpite till the twelfth day of January, to provide himſelf of his anſwer to ſuch things as were commenſed againſt him. Then Hubert, truſting to enjoy ſome ſafety by the Kings permiſſion to him granted, to breath himſelf a little, and to walk abroad, took his journey towards S. Edmundsbury, where his Wife was; and, paſſing through the Country of Eſſex, was inned there in a certain Town belonging to the Biſhop of Norwich. Whereof when the King was certified, fearing leſt he would raiſe up ſome commotion in the Realm, ſendeth in haſty anger after him Sir Godfride Crancombe Knight, with three hundred Men; commanding under pain of Hanging, that they ſhould apprehend him, and bring him to the Tower of London: which commandment to accompliſh, there lacked no haſte. Hubert having intelligence of their coming (riſing out of his Bed, naked as he was) ran unto the Chappel ſtanding near unto the Inn, where he holdeth with the one hand the Croſs, with the other hand the Sacrament of the Lords Body. Then Godfrid with his foreſaid armed Souldiers, entring into the Chappel, willed him to come out. Which when he would not, with violent hands he drew him out of the Chappel, and taking the Croſs and the Sacrament out of his hands, faſt bound him with Fetters and Gives under the Horſe belly, and brought him, as they were commanded, to the Tower. And ſo certifying the King what they had done (who then tarried up waking for them) he rejoiced not a little thereat, and went merry to his Bed.

Hubert flyeth to the Church for his refuge.

Hubert violently drawn out of the Church. Hubert caſt into the Tower of London.

The next morrow following after, Roger Biſhop of London, having knowledge how and in what order he was taken violently out of the Chappel, cometh unto the King, blaming him boldly, for violating the peace of holy Church, and proteſted, that unleſs the party were looſed again, and ſent to the Chappel from whence he was drawn, he would enter Sentence of Excommunication againſt all the deed doers.

The King blamed for breaking the peace of holy Church

The King as he did not deny his tranſgreſſion herein, ſo he ſendeth him (albeit againſt his will) out of the Tower unto the ſaid Chappel again, and by the ſame Souldiers which brought him out before. Which done, he giveth in ſtraight charge and commandment under pain of hanging, to the Sheriffs of Herford and Eſſex, that they in their own perſons, with the ſtrength of both Shires ſhould watch and compaſs about the Chappel, and ſee that the ſaid Hubert no ways might eſcape. Which commandment of the King was accompliſhed with all diligence. But Hubert took all this patiently, and continued in the Chappel praying both night and day, and commending his cauſe unto the Lord, whom he deſired ſo to deliver him from that inſtant danger, as he always ſought the Kings Honour by his faithful and truſty ſervice. And as he continued in his prayer, ſo the King continuing in his rage, commanded that no Man ſhould intreat for him, or make any mention of him in his preſence. Notwithſtanding yet, Lucas Archbiſhop of Dublin, his true and almoſt only friend, ceaſed not to pray and weep to the King for him, deſiring the King at leaſt to intimate to him what he purpoſed ſhould be done with Hubert. Whereunto the King anſwering, ſaid, That of theſe three things one he ſhould chuſe, Whether he would abjure the Realm of England for ever, or be condemned unto perpetual Priſon, or elſe confeſs himſelf openly to be a Traitor? But Hubert hereunto ſaid, that he would chuſe none of theſe Articles, as who knew himſelf neither guilty nor worthy of any ſuch confuſion: but, to ſatisfie ſomewhat the mind of the King, he would be contented to depart the Realm for a ſeaſon, but to abjure the Realm he would not ſo do.

The King compelled to ſend Hubert again to his Sanctuary.

Example of a conſtant friend in the time of need.

Three things put to Hubert to chooſe.

In this mean time it befel that Ranulphus Earl of Cheſter and of Lincoln, one of his ſoreſt enemies died. Hubert all this while remained in the Chappel incloſed and guarded about with the power (as is ſaid) of two Shires, and ſo continued, till at length, by the commandment of the King, his two Serviters, which miniſtred unto him within the Chappel, were taken from him. Then Hubert ſeeing no other remedy, but there to ſtarve for famine, offered himſelf of his own accord to the Sheriffs, ſaying, That he would put himſelf rather in the Kings mercy, than there deſperately to periſh for hunger. And ſo was he taken, and being faſt bound in Fetters, was brought again and clapped, by the Kings commandment, in the Tower of London.

Hubert yieldeth himſelf to the Sheriffs.

Hubert reduced again to the Tower.

Not long after this, word was brought unto the King by certain, that the ſaid Hubert had much Treaſure lying in the Houſe of the new Templars in London. Whereupon the King, to try out the truth thereof, ſendeth for the Prior or Maſter of the Houſe; who, not daring to deny, confeſſed that there was indeed Treaſure brought into the Houſe, but the quantity and number thereof he could not tell. The King, deſirous to ſeize upon the Treaſure, required and charged the Maſter with his Brethren, with threatning words, to bring forth the Treaſure to him, ſaying, that it was taken and ſtoln out of his Treaſury. But they anſwered again, That the Treaſure was committed with truſt and faith unto their hands, and therefore they neither would nor ought to let it go out of their hands, being truſted withal, without the aſſent of him which committed the ſame unto them. When the King could get no other anſwer, at their hands, neither durſt ſhew any further violence againſt them, he ſendeth unto Hubert in the Tower, requiring of him the foreſaid Treaſures. To whom he, anſwering again mildly, yielded both himſelf, his Treaſures, and all that ever he had, unto the Kings will and pleaſure; and ſo, ſending word unto the Maſter and Brethren of the Temple, willeth them to take all the Keies, and deliver the Goods, with all that there was, unto the King, who receiving the ſame, and taking an Inventory of that which was received, cauſed it to be brought unto his Treaſury; whereof the number both of the Plate, of Coin, and of the Jewels, was of Price unknown. The enemies of Hubert, ſuppoſing thereby to take advantage againſt him to bring him to his end, came with open complaint unto the King, crying out againſt Hubert, That he was a Thief, a Traitor, and a robber of the Kings treaſure, and therefore by right was worthy to be hanged, and thus cried his accuſers daily in the Kings ear. But the hearts of Kings (ſaith the wiſe Man) are in the hands of the Lord, to be ruled, not after Mans will, but as it pleaſeth God to direct them. And ſo this King having now his will and fill upon poor Hubert, and ſomewhat coming more unto himſelf, anſwered again in this wiſe, That there was no ſuch need to deal ſo ſtraitly with him, who from the time of his youth firſt ſerved mine Uncle King Richard, then my Father King John, in whoſe ſervice (as I heard ſay) beyond the Seas, Parisienſis, pag. 81. he was driven to eat his Horſe. And in my time hath ſtood ſo conſtantly in defence of the Realm againſt foreign Nations, who kept the Caſtle of Dover againſt King Lewis, and vanquiſhed the Frenchmen upon the Seas, alſo at Bedford and at Lincoln hath done ſuch ſervice. And though againſt me he hath dealt any thing untruly, which yet is not evidently proved; yet he ſhall never be put by me to ſo villanous a death. I had rather be counted a King fooliſh and ſimple, than to be judged a Tyrant or ſeeker of bloud, eſpecially of ſuch as have ſerved me and mine Anceſters, in many perils ſo dangerouſly, weighing more the few evils which yet be not proved, than ſo many good deſerts of his evident and manifeſt ſervice done both to me and to the whole Realm, &c. And thus the King, ſomewhat relenting to poor Hubert his old Servant, granted unto him all ſuch Lands as he had given by King John his Father, and whatſoever elſe he had by his own purchaſe.

The Kings mind relenteth toward Hubert.

Thus Hubert after long trouble, a little cheered with ſome piece of comfort, ſet Lawrence his truſty friend that never left him, one that belonged to St. Albans, to be his Steward and Overſeer of thoſe poſſeſſions granted unto him by the King. And ſhortly upon the ſame, after the Kings mind was ſeen thus ſomething to relent, the envy alſo of the Nobles, being now partly ſatisfied, began to turn to mercy; inſomuch that four Earls, to wit, Earl Richard the Kings Brother, William Earl of Warreine, Richard Earl Marſhal, and William Earl of Ferris, became ſureties to the King for him. Upon whoſe ſurety he was transferred to the Caſtle of Devizes, where he was under the keeping of four Souldiers by them appointed, having the liberty of that Caſtle. But the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who always hunted after the life of Hubert, craftily cometh unto the King, and delireth the cuſtody of the Caſtle, making no mention of Hubert, to the intent that by the keeping thereof he might the ſooner diſpatch him. Hubert having thereof ſome inkling, breaketh the matter to two of his ſervants; who with compaſſion tendring his miſery, watched their time (the Keepers being aſleep) and conveyed him by night on their backs, fettered as he was, into the Pariſh-Church of the Town, and there remained with him. The Keepers when they miſt their priſoner, were in great perplexity, and after diligent ſearch finding him at length where he was in the Church, with violent force drew him from thence to the Caſtle again. For the which injury to the Church, the Biſhop of Sarum, underſtanding the order of the matter, cometh to the Caſtle where the Keepers were, and required that Hubert ſhould be brought again into the Church from whence he was taken. Which when the Keepers denied to do, ſaying, they would rather he ſhould hang than they; then the Biſhop gave ſentence of Excommunication againſt them. Which done, he with the Biſhop of London, and other Biſhops, goeth immediately unto the King, complaining of the injury done unto Hubert, and eſpecially of the contumely againſt Holy Church; neither would they leave the King before they had obtained that he ſhould be reduced again into the Church, and ſo he was. It was not long after, but the King in great diſpleaſure ſendeth to the Sheriff of the Shire to keep him well watched in the Church, till either he came forth, or there periſhed with famine.

Hubert conveyed out of the Caſtle into the Pariſh Church.

Hubert again taken out of the Church, and brought back to the Caſtle.

Hubert delivered out of priſon and carried into Wales.

It befell in the mean ſeaſon that great diſſention roſe between the King and the Nobles of the Realm; by reaſon whereof Hubert was taken and carried away by Richard Earl Marſhal into Wales, and there remained until the King at length was reconciled with his Nobles, and ſo received (with the reſt) the ſaid Hubert again into his favour. Ex Matthæo Pariſienſi, & ex Floribus Hiſtoriarum. Of the which diſſention more ſhall be ſhewed (Chriſt willing) hereafter.

Roger Biſhop of London goeth to Rome to purge himſelf before the Pope.

As the beginning of this trouble of Hubert firſt ſprang of vexing the Popes Barns; ſo likewiſe Roger Biſhop of London, ſuſpected for the ſame cauſe, was enforced to travel up to Rome, there to purge himſelf before the Pope. Where after much money conſumed, and robbed alſo by the way, he got nothing elſe but loſt his labour, and ſo came home again. Who then doing the part of a good Biſhop, after his return from Rome attempted to expell and exclude out of his Dioceſs all thoſe Italian Uſurers called, as before ſaid, Caurſini. Theſe Caurſinites coming with the Popes Legates into England, and lending their money to Religious Houſes, to Colledges and Churches, had their Debters bound unto them in ſuch ſort as was much vantageable to them, and much injurious to the other, as in the form of their Obligations in the Story of M. Pariſienſis is largely expreſſed, fol. 65. Againſt theſe Caurſinites the Biſhop of London being worthily inflamed with zeal of juſtice, firſt with loving admonition went about to reclaim them for the wealth of their ſouls, afterward with ſharp words began to charge them. But they diſregarding Chriſtian counſel, and deſpiſing the Biſhops threatnings, would not leave the ſweetneſs of their occupation. Wherefore the Biſhop proceeding unto the ſentence of Excommunication, preciſely and diſtrictly charged them to depart his Dioceſs. But they again being confident and imboldened upon the Popes defence, not only ſet at light his Excommunication, but alſo wrought ſuch ways with the Pope that they cauſed the ſaid Biſhop of London, being both aged and ſickly, to be cited peremptorily to appear beyond the Seas, there to anſwer to ſuch objections as they ſhould infer againſt him. And thus the Biſhop minding rather to cover than to open the faults of the Church, and partly being let with infirmity and age, was compelled to let the cauſe fall.

Uſurers Excommunicated and expelled by the Biſhop of London.

Excommunication well uſed againſt Uſurers.

And thus much of the Popes Merchants here in England, which were not ſo buſie here for their part, but the Pope, the great Maſter of theſe Merchant Uſurers, was as buſie for his. And although his Barns here in England were deſtroyed, and his bank ſomething decayed, yet he thought to win it up another way; for he proclaimed the ſame year a general Viſitation through all the Religious Houſes, exempt or not exempt, univerſally pertaining to his juriſdiction; where by the cruel dealing of the Viſitors, many were compelled to appeal and to travel up to Rome, to the great expences of their money, and filling the Popes Coffers. But as touching this Viſitation, to make ſhort (ſaith the Story) it tended not to any reformation ſo much as to the deformation of univerſal order. Et Pariſi.

The general Viſitation of the Pope through all Religious Houſes.

Dum omnes, qui in diverſis orbis partibus uſicam Benedicti ſecuti fuerant regulam, per novas conſtitutiones ita inveniantur ubique diſcordes, quod ex omnibus cœnobiis, vel aliis religioſorum Eccleſiis vix duo habeantur in norma vivendi concordes: that is, While all they which before through all parts of the world followed only the rule of Benedict, now through new deviſed conſtitutions are found in all places ſo divided and divers, that of all Monaſteries, and other Churches of Religion, ſcarce may two be found, which do agree in one rule and inſtitution of life.

The great diverſity among Religious Orders noted.

All this while that Hubert above mentioned was ſecluded from the King, Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter bare all the rule, and above all other alone was accepted. This Biſhop being in ſuch principal favour with the King, as by whoſe counſel all things were adminiſtred, removed the natural Servitors, that were Engliſhmen, out of their Offices, and placed other ſtrangers, namely, of Pictavia, and of other Countries in their rooms. Among whom was thruſt out William Under-marſhal, which ſupplied the room of Richard Great Lord Marſhal of England; for the which cauſe the ſaid Lord Richard was migfitily offended. Alſo Walter, Treaſurer of the Kings houſe was not only expelled, but alſo mercet at an hundred pounds, and put from all his holds and munitions, which he had by the Kings Patent granted to him.

Old Servitors of the King put out and diſcharged.

Moreover by the counſel of the ſaid Biſhop of Wincheſter, all the old Counſellers, as well Biſhops, as other Earls and Barons, and all the Nobles were rejected from the King in ſuch ſort, that he would hear and follow no mans counſel, but only the ſaid Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and his Couſin Peter de Rivallis. Whereby it came to paſs, that all the greateſt holds and munitions in the Realm were taken from the old Keepers, and committed to the cuſtody of the ſaid Peter. Then the Biſhop of Wincheſter, to plant and pitch himſelf more ſtrongly in the Kings favour, adjoyned to his fellowſhip Stephen Seagrave ſucceeding in the place of Hubert the Juſtice: alſo Robert Paſlew, who had the keeping of the Treaſure under the foreſaid Peter Rivall. So by theſe three all the affairs of the Realm were ordered. Moreover, to make their party more ſure, by them it was provided, that Souldiers and Servitors from beyond the Sea, as Pictavians and Britains were ſent for, to the number of two thouſand, which were placed partly about the King, partly were ſet in Caſtles and Holds within the Realm, and had the overſight and Government of Shires and Baronies, who then oppreſſed the Nobles of the Land, accuſing them to the King for Traytors; whom the ſimple King did lightly believe, committing to them the cuſtody of his Treaſures, the ſitting in Judgments, and the doing in all things. And when the Nobles, thus oppreſſed came to complain of their injuries to the King, by the means of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, their cauſe was nothing regarded; inſomuch that the ſaid Wincheſter moreover accuſed certain Biſhops alſo to the King, ſo that he did fly and ſhun them as open Traytors and Rebels.

The King forſaketh his Nobles and flicketh to ſtrangers.

Theſe

KING 2 Hen. 3

Richard Earl Marſhal admoniſheth the King.

Theſe things ſtanding thus out of order, Richard the Noble Marſhal of England, with others of the Nobles joining with him, ſeeing theſe oppreſſions and injuries daily growing contrary to the Laws and Wealth of the Realm, came to the King, and blamed him for retaining ſuch perverſe Counſel about him of the Pictavians and other Foreigners, to the great prejudice of his natural Subjects, and of the liberties of the Realm; humbly deſiring and beſeeching him, that he, with as much ſpeed as might be, would reform and redreſs ſuch exceſſes, whereby the whole Realm ſeemed to lie in danger of ſubverſion. Otherwiſe, if he refuſed to ſee correction thereof, he with other Peers and Nobles, would withdraw themſelves from his Counſel, ſo long as he maintained the ſociety of thoſe foreigners and ſtrangers about him.

The diſdainful anſwer of the Biſhop of Wincheſter to the Nobles.

To this Peter Wincheſter, anſwering again, ſaid, That the King right well might call unto him what foreigners and ſtrangers him liſted, for the defence both of his Kingdom, and of his Crown; and what number of them he would, as by whom he might be able to bridle his proud and rebellious Subjects, and ſo to keep them in awe and good order. When the Earl and the Nobles could get no other anſwer of him, in great perturbation they departed, promiſing among themſelves, in this caſe, which ſo touched the ſtate of the whole Realm, they would conſtantly joyn together, to the parting of their life.

Wicked Council about a K.

After this, the foreſaid Petrus Biſhop of Wincheſter, with his complices, ceaſed not by all means to inflame the Kings heart to hatred and contempt of his natural People, whom they ſo vehemently perverted, that he counting them no other than his enemies, ſought by all diligence the utter deſtruction of them, ſending daily for more Garriſons of the Pictavians, that in ſhort ſpace, they repleniſhed well-near the whole Land, whoſe defence the King only truſted unto; neither was any thing diſpoſed in the Realm, but through the guiding of this Peter, and of the Pictavians.

Petrus de Rupibus, Biſhop of Wincheſter perverter of the King.

The King, thus guarded and ſtrengthened with theſe foreign aliens and ſtrangers, proclaimed a Parliament to be holden at Oxford, where the Nobles were warned to be preſent. They conſidering the indignation of the King conceived, would not appear. Again they were required the firſt, ſecond and third time to preſent themſelves. The Aſſembly proceeded, but they came not, for whom the King looked. In this Aſſembly or Parliament, it was plainly told the King by a Dominick Frier preaching before him, that unleſs he removed from him the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Peter Rival his Kinſman, he ſhould not, neither could long enjoy peace in his Kingdom. This although it was bluntly ſpoken of the Frier againſt the Biſhop, yet this remedy he had; the Frier had nothing to loſe. Yet was there another Chaplain of the Court, who perceiving the King ſomewhat mitigated by the former preaching, and after a Courtlike dexterity handling his matter, being a pleaſant conceited man, thus merrily came to the King asking a queſtion, What was the thing moſt pernicious and dangerous of all other things to them that travel by the Seas? That, ſaid the King, is beſt known to ſuch as travel in that kind of Traffick. Nay (ſaith he) this is eaſie to be told. The King demanding what it was, Forſooth (quoth he) Stones and Rocks; alluding merrily (but yet truly) to the Biſhop of Wincheſter whoſe name and ſirname was Petrus de Rupibus, for ſo Petræ in Latin ſignifieth Stones and Rupes Rocks. Notwithſtanding, the King either not perceiving the meaning, or not amending the fault, again ſendeth to his Nobles, to have them come and ſpeak with him at Weſtminſter. But they fearing ſome train to be laid for them, refuſed to appear, ſending plain words to the King by ſolemn Meſſage, That his Grace without all delay ſhould ſeclude from him Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and other Aliens of Pictavia, or if he would not, they with the common aſſent of the Realm, would diſplace him with his wicked Counſellors from his Kingdom, and have within themſelves tractation for chuſing a new King.

A merry Apothegme of the Kings Chaplain.

The meſſage of the Nobles to the King.

The King at the hearing of this Meſſage being mightily moved, partly to fear, partly to indignation, eſpecially having the late example of King John his Father before his eies, was caſt in great perplexity, doubting what was beſt to be done. But Wincheſter with his wicked counſel, ſo wrought with the King, that he proceeded with all ſeverity againſt them; inſomuch that in that time, the ſparkles of poiſoned counſel, kindling more and more, grew to a ſharp Battel between the King and Richard Earl Marſhal, with other Nobles, to the great diſquietneſs of the whole Realm. The which War was preſignified by terrible thundring and lightning heard all England over in the Month of March, with ſuch abundance of Rain and Flouds growing upon the ſame, as caſt down Mills, overcovered the Fields, threw down Houſes, and did much harm through the whole Realm.

War raiſed by the King againſt his Nobles.

Great Thunders and Flouds in England.

To proſecute here at large the whole diſcourſe of this War between the King and the Earl Marſhal, which continued near the ſpace of two years, to declare all the parts and circumſtances thereof; what troubles it brought, what damages it wrought unto the whole Realm, what truces were laid, what ſlaughter of men, what waſte of whole Countries inſued from Wales unto Shrewsbury, how the Marſhal joyned himſelf with Leolin Prince of Wales, how the Pictavians were almoſt all ſlain and deſtroyed, how the King was diſtreſſed, what forgery wily Wincheſter wrought by the Kings Letters to intrap the Marſhal, and to betray him to the Iriſhmen, amongſt whom he was at length ſlain; all this I refer to other Authors, who at large do intreat of the ſame, as Matth. Pariſienſ. Florilegus, and ſuch others. This is to be noted and obſerved (which rather pertaineth to our Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory) to ſee what ſedition and continual diſquietneſs was in thoſe days among all Chriſtian People almoſt, being under the Popes Catholick obedience: but eſpecially to mark the corrupt Doctrine then reigning; it is to be marvelled, or rather lamented, to ſee the King and the People then ſo blinded in the principal Point and Article of their Salvation, as we find in Stories, which making mention of a Houſe or Monaſtery of Converts, builded the ſame year by the King at London, do expreſs in plain words, that he then did it, Pro redemptione animæ ſuæ & Regis Johannis patris ſui, & omnium anteceſſorum ſuorum: that is, For the redemption of his ſoul, of the ſoul of King John his Father, and for the ſouls of all his anceſtors, &c. Whereby may be underſtood in what palpable darkneſs of blind ignorance the ſilly ſouls redeemed by Chriſt were then inwrapped, which did not know, nor yet were taught the right Doctrine and firſt Principles of their Redemption. Ex Matthæo Pariſienſi, pag. 86.

Monaſteries builded. Pro redemptione animæ

Mention was made a little before of diſſolving the election of John Prior of Canterbury, which was choſen by the Monks to be Archbiſhop of the ſaid Church of Canterbury, but by the Pope was defeated. After whom one John Blund was elected, who travelling up to Rome this year, Anno 1233. to be confirmed of the Pope, was alſo repealed and unelected again, for that it was thought in England, and ſo complained of to the Pope, that he had received of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter a thouſand Marks, and had another thouſand promiſed him of the ſaid Wincheſter. Who by his Mony thought to make him of his ſide, and alſo wrote unto the Emperor to help forward his promotion in the Court of Rome. Notwithſtanding, both he with his giving, and the other with his taking of Bribes, were both detected and diſappointed of their purpoſe. For the Pope hating then the Emperor, for the ſame cauſe, admitted not the Election; pretending the cauſe, for that he was proved to hold two Benefices without his diſpenſation. After whom, by the commandment of the Pope, one Edmund Canon of Salisbury was ordained Archbiſhop, and had his Pall ſent to him from the Pope. Which Edmund after, for his vertues, was canonized of the Popiſh Monks there for a Saint, and was called S. Edmund. About which time alſo Robert Groſthead was made Biſhop of Lincoln.

John Archbiſhop of Canterbury elected by the Chapter, again unelected by the Pope.

Corruption of Bribes.

Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury & S. Edmund canonized. R. Lert Groſthead made Biſhop of Lincoln.

This Edmund accompanied with other Biſhops, during this trouble between the King and his Nobles, being in Council at Weſtminſter, in the year next inſuing, which was 1234. came uttering their minds boldly in the name of the Lords, and declaring unto the King as became his faithful ſervants, that his Counſel, which then he followed, was not ſound nor ſafe, but cruel and dangerous, both to him, and to the ſtate of the Realm, meaning the counſel of Peter Wincheſter, and of Peter Rival, with other adherents.

Anno 1234.

Faithful counſel of the Biſhop given to the King.

The counſel of Wincheſter and ſuch other Biſhops about the K. diſproved for certain cauſes.

1. FIrſt and Imprimis, For that they hate and contemn the Engliſh Nation, calling them Traitors and Rebels, and turning the Kings heart from the love of his natural Subjects, and the hearts of them from him, as appeareth by the Earl Marſhal and others, ſowing diſcord among them.

2. Item, By the ſaid counſel, to wit, by the foreſaid Biſhop and his fellows, King John the Kings Father, loſt firſt the hearts of his Barons, after that loſt Normandy, and afterwards, other Lands alſo, and in the end waſted all his Treaſure, ſo that ſince that time the regiment of England had never any quiet after.

3. By the ſaid counſel alſo, in their time and memory, the Kingdom of England had been troubled and ſuſpended, and in concluſion, ſhe that was before the Prince of Provinces, became Tributary; and ſo War inſuing upon the ſame, the ſaid King John his Father incurred great danger of death, and at laſt was extinguiſhed, lacking both peace of his Kingdom and of his own heart.

4. Item, By the ſaid counſel the Caſtle of Bedford was kept long time againſt the King, to the great loſs both of Men and Treaſure, beſide the loſs of Rupella, to the ſhame of the Realm of England.

5. Moreover, Through their wicked counſel, at this preſent, great perturbation ſeemed to hang over the whole Realm; for elſe if it had not been for their counſel, and if that true juſtice and judgment might have been miniſtred unto the Kings Subjects, theſe tumults had never been ſtirred, and the King might have had his Land unwaſted, and his treaſure unconſumed.

6. Item, In that Faith and Allegiance, wherewith they were obliged unto him, they proteſted unto him, that the ſaid his Council, was not a Council of peace, but of diviſion and diſquietneſs, to the end that they which otherwiſe by peace could not aſpire, by diſturbing and diſheriting others, might be exalted.

7. Item, For that all the Caſtles, Forts, Munitions, alſo all the Officers of the Exchequer, with all other the greateſt Eſcheats of the Realm, were in their hands, of the which if the King would demand account, he ſhould prove how true they were.

8. Item, For that neither by the Kings Seal, nor Commandment, except it bare withal the Seal of Peter Rival, almoſt any buſineſs of any weight could be diſpatched in the Realm, as though they counted their King for no King.

9. Furthermore, by the foreſaid Counſel, the natural Subjects and Nobles of the Realm, were baniſhed the Court, which was to be feared would grow to ſome inconvenience both to the King and to the Realm; forſomuch as the King ſeemed more to be on their ſide, than they of his, as by many evident conjectures may appear.

10. Item, It was not well to be taken and liked, the ſaid Council ſtanding of Strangers and Aliens, that they ſhould have in their power both the Kings Siſter, and many other Noblemens Daughters, and other Women marriageable, with the Kings Wards and Marriages, which they beſtowed and divided among themſelves, and Men of their affinity.

11. Alſo, The ſaid Council regarding neither the Laws, nor Liberties of the Realm, confirmed and corroborated by Excommunication, did confound and pervert all Juſtice: wherefore it was to be feared, that they would run under Excommunication, and the King alſo, in communicating with them.

12. Item, Becauſe they kept neither Promiſe nor Faith, nor Oath with any perſon, neither did obſerve any Inſtrument made never ſo formal by Law, nor yet did fear any Excommunication; wherefore they were to be left for People deſperate, as which were departed from all truth and honeſty.

Theſe things (ſaid the Biſhops) we as your faithful Subjects before God and Men, do tell and advertiſe your Grace, deſiring and beſeeching you, that you will remove and ſeclude from you ſuch counſel: and as the cuſtom is of all other kingdoms to do, that you will ſo govern in like manner your Kingdom by your own natural Liege People, and ſuch as be ſworn unto you of your own Realm. For thus (ſaid they) in verity we denounce unto you, that unleſs in ſhort time you will ſee theſe things reformed, we, according to our duty, will proceed by the cenſure of the Church againſt you, and all others that gainſtand the ſame, tarrying no other thing, but only the conſecration of this our reverend Archbiſhop.

Excommunication denounced by the Biſhops againſt the King.

Theſe words of the Biſhops thus ſaid and finiſhed, the King required a little time of reſpite, wherein to adviſe with himſelf about the matter, ſaying, That he could not in ſuch a ſudden, remove from him his Council, before he had entred with them account of his Treaſure committed to them; and ſo that Aſſembly brake up.

The Kings anſwer to the Biſhops.

It followed then after this communication ſo broken up, that the King reſorted to the parts of Northfolk, where coming by Saint Edmundsbury, where the Wife of Hubert the Juſtice was, he being moved with zeal of pity toward the Woman, who very humbly behaved her ſelf to the King, did grant her eight Mannors, which her Husband before with his Mony had purchaſed, being then in the cuſtody and poſſeſſion of Robert Paſſew, one of the Kings new Counſellors aboye ſpecified. It was not long after this, but Edmund the Archbiſhop was inveſted and conſecrated in the Church of Canterbury; who ſhortly after his Conſecration, about the Month of April, coming with his Suffragans to the place of Council, where the King with his Earls and Barons was aſſembled, opened to him the cauſe and purpoſe of his coming, and of the other Prelats, which was, to put him in remembrance of their former talk had with him at Weſtminſter; denouncing moreover to him expreſly, that unleſs with ſpeed he would take a better way, and fall to a peaceable and godly agreement with the true and faithful Nobles of his Realm, he incontinently, with the other Prelats there preſent, would paſs with the Sentence of Excommunication againſt him, and againſt all them that would be enemies to the ſame peace, and maintainers of diſcord.

The pity of the K. toward the Wife of Hubert.

Edmund conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which was afterward canonized by Pope the 4th for a Saint.

Excommunication rightly practiſed.

The King, after he heard the meaning of the Biſhops, with humble and gentle language anſwered them again, promiſing to condeſcend to them in all things. Whereupon within few days after, the King, coming to ſome better remembrance of himſelf, commanded the forenamed Biſhop of Wincheſter to leave the Court, and to return home to his Biſhoprick, there to attend unto the ſpiritual charge and care of his Flock committed to him. Moreover, he commanded Peter Rival the Biſhops Coſin, (ſome Stories ſay his Son) who had then the diſpoſing of all the affairs of the Realm, to render unto him his Caſtles, and to give account of all his Treaſures, whereof he had the keeping, and ſo to void the Realm, ſwearing moreover unto him, but for that he was beneficed, and was within Orders of the Church, elſe he would have cauſed both his eyes to be pluckt out of his head.

The Kings promiſe to the Biſhops.

Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter diſcharged out of the Court.

Peter Rival called to account of the Kings Treaſures.

He expelled likewiſe the Pictavians out of the Court, and from the cuſtody of his munitions, ſending them home into their Country, and bidding they ſhould no more ſee his face. And thus the King, wiſely diſpatching himſelf of his wicked Counſellors, firſt did ſend Edmund the Archbiſhop with the Biſhops of Cheſter and of Rocheſter, into Wales to Leolin, and to Richard Earl Marſhal and others, to intreat with them of peace. Alſo he received to his ſervice again Men of his natural Country, to attend about him, offering himſelf willing to be ruled by the counſel of the Archbiſhop and the Biſhops, by whoſe prudence he truſted his Realm ſhould be reduced again to a better quietneſs.

Pictavians and Strangers, ſent home by the King unto their Country.

Reconciliation fought betweeen the K. and the Nobles.

But in the mean time, while theſe things were doing in England, the foreſaid Richard Earl Marſhal, by the falſhood of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Peter Rival, forging the Kings Letters to the Iriſhmen againſt him, and partly by the conſpiracy of Gilbert de Mariſco, being circumvented by the Iriſhmen in War, and there taken and wounded, was by them, through the means of this Surgeon ſlain.

Richard Earl Marſhal fraudulently circumvented and ſlain in Ireland.

Great ſlaughter the ſame time was of them which were called Catini, about the parts of Almain. Theſe Catini were eſteemed of Pope Gregory and the Papiſts to be Hereticks; but what their opinions were, I find it not expreſſed, In Pariſ.

Catini ſlain about Almain, judged of the Papiſts for Hereticks.

In

Albingenſes ſlain in Spain by the Pope's ſetting on.

In like ſort the Albingenſes afore mentioned, recounted alſo of the Popes flock to be Hereticks, with their Biſhops, and a great number and company of them were ſlain by the commandment of Pope Gregory at the ſame time, in a certain Plain in Spain, Ex Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 87.

The King lamenteth the death of Richard Earl Marſhal.

How the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with other two Biſhops, were ſent into Wales, for intreaty of peace, ye heard before. At whoſe return again, after the time of Eaſter, the King going toward Gloceſter to meet them by the way, as he was in his journey at Woodſtock, there came Meſſengers of Ireland, declaring to the King, the death of Richard Earl Marſhal, and the order thereof, through the forged Letters of Wincheſter, and others: whereat the King made great lamentation and mourning, to the great admiration of all them that were by, ſaying and complaining, that he left not his like in all the Realm again.

The ſaying of Leolin King of Wales.

After this the King proceeding in his journey came to Gloceſter, where the Archbiſhop with the other Biſhops, coming to the King, declared to him the form and condition of peace, which they had concluded with Leolin, which was this: If the King would be reconciled before with the other Nobles with whom he was confederate, ſuch as the King had baniſhed out of his Realm, to the end that the concord might be the more firm between them. Thus (ſaid they) was Leolin contented, although with much ado and great difficulty, to receive the League of Peace, ſaying and proteſting this unto them, That he feared more the Kings Alms, than all the Puiſſance both of him, and of all his Clergy within England.

The fear of K. Henry more feared than his [illegible].

Peace concluded between the King and the Nobles.

This done, the King there remaining with the Biſhops, directed his Letters to all the Exiles and baniſhed Lords, and to all his Nobles, that they ſhould repair to him about the beginning of June, at Gloceſter; promiſing to them his full favour, and reconcilement to them and to their heirs, and that they ſhould ſuſpect no fraud therein, they ſhould have their ſafe conduct by the Archbiſhop and Biſhops.

Hubert Earl of Kent reſtored again to the King's favour.

Whereupon, through the mediation of the ſaid Archbiſhop and the Biſhops, firſt cometh to the King, Hubert Earl of Kent, offering himſelf to the Kings good will and favour. Whom the King, with chearful countenance, received and embraced, reſtoring him, not only to his favour, but alſo to his Houſhold and Counſel, with his Livings and Poſſeſſions, from which he had been diſſeized before. Then Hubert, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, gave praiſe and glory to God, by whoſe gracious Providence he, being ſo marvelouſly preſerved from ſo great diſtreſſes and tribulations, was again ſo happily reconciled to the King and his faithful friends. After him, in like ſort, came in Gilbert Baſſet a Nobleman, Richard Sward, alſo Gilbert the Brother of Richard Marſhal that was ſlain; which Gilbert recovered again his whole inheritance, as well in England as in Ireland, doing his Homage to the King, and his ſervice due for the ſame; to whom alſo was granted the office of the high Marſhal Court, belonging before to his Brother Richard.

Hubert giveth thanks to God.

Falſhood & Murther cometh out.

In the ſame counſel or communication continuing then at Gloceſter, the ſaid Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, bringing the forged Letters, wherein was betrayed the life of Richard Earl Marſhal, ſealed with the Kings Seal, and ſent to the Great Men of Ireland, read the ſame openly, in the preſence of the King and all the Nobles. At the hearing whereof, the King, greatly ſorrowing and weeping, confeſſed there in truth, that being forced by the Biſhop of Wincheſter and Peter de Rivallis, he commanded his Seal to be ſet to certain Letters preſented unto him, but the tenor thereof, he ſaid and ſwore he never heard. Whereunto the Archbiſhop anſwering again, deſired the King to ſearch well his Conſcience; and ſaid, That all they which were procurers, or of knowledge of thoſe Letters, were guilty of the death of the Earl Marſhal, no leſs than if they had murthered him with their own hands.

Kings many times abuſed by wicked counſel.

The Biſhop of Wincheſter called to his anſwer.

Then the King, calling a Councel, ſent his Letters for the Biſhop of Wincheſter, for Peter Rival, Stephen Segrave, and Robert Paſſelew, to appear and yield account for his treaſures unto them committed, and for his Seal by them abuſed. But the Biſhop and Rival, keeping themſelves in the Sanctuary of the Minſter Church of Wincheſter, neither durſt nor would appear. Stephen Segrave, who ſucceeded after Hubert the Juſtice, and was of the Clergy before, after became a Lay-man, and now hiding himſelf in Saint Mary's Church in the Abby of Leiceſter, was turned to a Clerk again. Robert Paſſelew covertly hid himſelf in a certain Cellar of the New Temple, ſo ſecretly, that none could tell where he was, but thought he was gone to Rome. At length, through the foreſaid Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, means was made, that a dilatory day was granted by the King for them to anſwer. At which day, firſt appeared Peter de Rivallis, then Stephen Segrave, after him Robert Paſſelew, each of them ſeverally, one after another, ſhewed themſelves; but not able to anſwer for themſelves, like Traitors they were reproved, and like Villains were ſent away. Ex Matth. Pariſ. fol. 91.

Peter Rival Stephen Segrave, Robert Paſſelew, called to their anſwers.

Variance between Pope Gregory the Ninth, and the Romans.

Variance between the Pope & and the Citizens of Rome.

WHILE peace thus between the King and the Nobles was reconciled in England, diſſention and variance the ſame time and year began in Rome, between the Pope and the Citizens of Rome. The cauſe was, for that the Citizens claimed by old cuſtome and law, that the Biſhop of Rome might not excommunicate any Citizen of the City, nor ſuſpend the ſaid City with any interdiction for any manner exceſs.

The alledgation of the Romans.

To this the Pope anſwered again, Quod minor Deo eſt, ſed quolibet homine major (to uſe the very words of mine Author) Ergo, major quolibet cive, næ etiam Rege, vel Imperatore, &c. That is, that he is leſs than God, but greater than any Man: Ergo, Greater than any Citizen, yea alſo, greater than King or Emperor. And forſomuch as he is their ſpiritual Father, he both ought, and lawfully may chaſtiſe his children when they offend, as being ſubjected to him in the Faith of Chriſt, and reduce them into the way again when they ſtray out of courſe.

The Popes Anſwer.

Moreover, The Citizens alledge again for themſelves, that the Poteſtates of the City, and Senators do receive of the Church of Rome yearly Tribute, which the Biſhops of Rome were bound to pay to them, both by new and alſo ancient Laws. Of the which yearly Tribute they have been ever in poſſeſſion before this preſent time of this Pope Gregory the Ninth.

The ſecond allegation of the Romans.

The Pope bound to pay to Rome yearly Tribute.

Hereunto the Pope anſwered and ſaid, that although the Church of Rome in time of Perſecution, for their defence and cauſe of peace, was wont to reſpect the head Rulers of the City with gentle rewards, yet ought not that now to be taken for a cuſtome; for that cuſtome only ought to ſtand, which conſiſteth not upon examples, but upon right and reaſon.

The Pope repleth.

Further and beſides, the Citizens ſaid that they, at the commandment of the Senators, would appropriate their Country with new and larger limits, and intranchiſe the ſame, being inlarged with fines and borders.

The third cauſe and allegation of the Romans.

To this the Pope again made anſwer, that certain Lordſhips, and Cities and Caſtles, be contained within the compaſs of the ſaid limits, as the City Viterbium and Montcaſter, which they preſume to appropriate within their Precinct; but to aſcribe to them, and uſurp that which pertaineth to others, is againſt right and juſtice.

The Popes anſwer.

For theſe and ſuch other controverſies riſing between the Pope and the Romans, ſuch diſſention kindled, that the Pope with his Cardinals, leaving the City of Rome, removed to Perusium (as partly before is recited) thinking there to remain and to plant themſelves; but the Romans prevailing againſt him, overthrew divers of his Houſes in the City, for the which he did excommunicate them. The Romans then flying to the Emperor, deſired his aid and ſuccour; but he, belike to pleaſure the Pope, gathering an Army, went rather againſt the Romans. Then the Popes Army, whoſe Captains were the Earl of Tholouſe (to purchaſe the Popes favour) and Peter the foreſaid Biſhop of Wincheſter, (whom the Pope for the ſame end had ſent for from England, partly for his Treaſure, partly for his practice and ſkill in feats of War) and the Emperors Hoſt joyned together, and bordering about the City of Rome, caſt down the Caſtles or Manſions belonging to the Citizens round about the Suburbs, to the number of eighteen, and deſtroyed all their Vines and Vineyards about the City. Whereat the Romans being not a little offended, braſt out of the City with more heat than order, to the number of 100000 (as the ſtory reporteth) to deſtroy Viterbium the Popes City with Sword and Fire. But the multitude, being un-ordered, and out of Battel-ray, and unprovided for jeopardies which by the way might happen, fell into the hands of their enemies, who were in wait for them, and of them deſtroyed a great number; ſo that on both parts were ſlain to the view of 30000; but the moſt part was of the Citizens. And this diſſention thus begun, was not ſoon ended, but continued long after.

A great ſlaughter of the Romans by the Pope. Ex Pariſi. pag. 92.

By theſe and ſuch other ſtories, who ſeeth not how far the Church of Rome hath degenerated from the true image of the right Church of Chriſt, which by the rule and example of the Goſpel, ought to be a Daughter of peace, not a Mother of debate, not a revenger of her ſelf, nor a ſeeker of Wars; but a forgiver of injuries, humbly and patiently referring all revenge to the Lord; not a raker for riches, but a winner of ſouls; not contending for worldly maſterſhip, but humbling themſelves as ſervants; and not Vicars of the Lord, but jointly like Brethren ſerving together, Biſhops with Biſhops, Miniſters with Miniſters, Deacons with Deacons; and not as Maſters, ſeparating themſelves by ſuperiority one from another; but briefly communicating together in Doctrine and Counſel, one particular Church with another; not as a Mother, one over another, but rather as a Siſter Church one with another, ſeeking together the glory of Chriſt, and not their own. And ſuch was the Church of Rome firſt in the old ancient beginning of her primitive ſtate, eſpecially while the croſs of perſecution yet kept the Biſhops and Miniſters under in humility of heart, and fervent calling upon the Lord for help; ſo that happy was that Chriſtian then, which with liberty of Conſcience only might hold his life, how barely ſoever he lived. And as for the pride and pomp of the World, as ſtriving for Patrimonies, buying of Biſhopricks, gaping for Benefices, ſo far was this off from them, that then they had little leiſure, and leſs luſt ſo much as once to think upon them. Neither did the Biſhops then of Rome fight to be Conſuls of the City, but ſought how to bring the Conſuls unto Chriſt, being glad if the Conſuls would permit them to dwell by them in the City. Neither did they then preſume ſo high, to bring the Emperors necks under their Girdles, but were glad to ſave their own Necks in any corner from the Sword of the Emperors. Then lacked they outward peace, but abounded with inward conſolation, Gods Holy Spirit mightily working in their hearts. Then was one Catholick unity of truth and doctrine amongſt all Churches againſt Errors and Sects. Neither did the Eaſt and Weſt, nor diſtance of place divide the Church; but both the Eaſt-Church and Weſt-Church, the Greeks and Latins made all one Church. And albeit there were then five Patriarchal Sees appointed for order ſake, differing in Regions, and peradventure alſo, in ſome Rites one from another; yet all theſe conſenting together in one unity of Catholick Doctrine, having one God, one Chriſt, one Faith, one Baptiſm, one Spirit, one Head, and linked together in one bond of Charity, and in one equality of Honour, they made altogether one Body, one Church, one Communion, called one Catholick Univerſal and Apoſtolick Church. And ſo long as this knot of charity and equality did joyn them in one unity together, ſo long the Church of Chriſt flouriſhed and increaſed, one ready to help and harbour another, in time of diſtreſs, as Agapetus and Vigilius flying to Conſtantinople, were there aided by the Patriarch, &c. So that all this while, neither foreign enemy, neither Saracen, nor Soldan, nor Sultan, nor Caliphа, nor Coraſmine, nor Turk, had any power greatly to harm it.

The Church of Rome degenerated from the image of the true Church.

Catholick.

The ſchiſm betvveen the Greek Church and the Church of Rome.

Equality Mother of concord.

But through the malice of the enemy, this Catholick unity did not long continue, and all by reaſon of the Biſhop of Rome, who not contented to be like his Brethren, began to extend himſelf, and to claim ſuperiority above the other four Patriarchal Sees, and all other Churches in the world. And thus as equality amongſt Chriſtian Biſhops was by pride and ſingularity oppreſſed, ſo unity began by little and little to be diſſolved, and the Lords Coat, which the Souldiers left whole, to be divided. Which Coat of Chriſtian unity, albeit of long time it hath bin now ſeamript before by the occaſion aforeſaid; yet notwithſtanding, in ſome piece it held together in ſome mean agreement, under ſubjection to the See of Rome, till the time of this Pope Gregory the Ninth, Anno 1230. at which time this rupture and ſchiſm of the Church brake out into a plain diviſion, utterly diſſevering the Eaſt Church from the Weſt Church upon this occaſion.

The cauſe and occaſion why the Greek Church utterly brake from the Romish.

There was a certain Archbiſhop elected to an Archbiſhoprick among the Grecians; who, coming to Rome to be confirmed, could not be admitted unleſs he promiſed a great ſumm of Mony. Which when he refuſed to do, and deteſted the execrable Simony of the Court of Rome, he made his repair home again to his own Country unconfirmed, declaring there to the whole Nobility of that Land, the caſe how it ſtood. For the more confirmation whereof there were others alſo, which coming lately from Rome, and there had proved the ſame or worſe, came in and gave teſtimony to his ſaying. Whereupon all the Churches of the Grecians, the ſame time hearing this, departed utterly away from the Church of Rome, which was in the days of this Pope Gregory the Ninth. Inſomuch that the Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, coming afterward to the General Council at Lions, there openly declared, that whereas before time he had under him above thirty Biſhopricks and Suffragans, now he had not three; adding moreover that all the Grecians, and certain others, with Antioch and the whole Empire of Romania, even to the Gates almoſt of Conſtantinople, were gone from the obedience of the Church of Rome, &c. Mat. Pariſ. fol. 112. & fol. 186.

Mat. Pariſ. fol. 112. All Grecia gone from the obedience of the Church of Rome.

Mat. Pariſ. fol. 188.

By the occaſion of which ſeparation aforeſaid of the Grecians from Pope Gregory, it happened ſhortly after, being the year of our Lord 1237. that Germanus Archbiſhop and Patriarch of Conſtantinople wrote to the ſaid Pope Gregory the Ninth, humbly deſiring him to ſtudy and ſeek ſome means of unity, how the ſeamleſs Coat of the Lord Jeſus thus lamentably rent, not with hands of Souldiers, but by diſcord of Prelats, may be healed again; offering this moreover, that if he will take the pains to ſtir out, he for his part, notwithſtanding his old age and feeble body, would not refuſe to meet him in the mid-way, to the intent that the truth on both ſides being debated by the Scriptures, the wrong part may be reduced, the ſlander ſtopped, and unity reformed between them.

Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople writeth to Pope Gregory the Ninth.

This requeſt of the Patriarch, as it was both godly and reaſonable, ſo it had been the Biſhops part again with like humility to have condeſcended to the ſame, and to have been glad with all his might to help forward the reformation of Chriſtian unity in the Church of Chriſt, and ſo to have ſhewed himſelf the ſon of peace: but the proud Biſhop of Rome, more like the ſon of diſcord and diſſention, ſtanding ſtill upon his Majeſty, refuſed thus to do: but writing again anſwer to his Letters, with great diſdain, ſeeking nothing elſe, but only how to advance his See above all other Churches; and not only that, but alſo ſhortly after ſent forth his Preaching Friers, to move all Chriſtians to take the ſign of the Croſs, and to fight againſt the Grecians no otherwiſe than againſt the Turks and Saracens: Inſomuch that in the Iſle of Cyprus many good Men and Martyrs were ſlain for the ſame, as by the Letters of the ſaid Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople is to be ſeen.

The Pope ſetteth the Weſt Church to fight againſt the Eaſt Church. Mat. Pariſ. fol. 112.

The tenor of the which Letter to the Pope, with the Popes anſwer again to him, being long and tedious to read, are extant in the Hiſtory of Mat. Pariſienſis, there to be ſeen and found. The ſummary effect whereof, notwithſtanding, I thought here briefly to notifie for the ſimple and unlearned multitude, which, underſtanding not the Latin, may hereby perceive the fault of this Schiſm, not ſo much to reſt in the Greek Church, as in the Church of Rome, as by the Contents of his Letter may appear.

The effect of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople his Letter to Pope Gregory the Ninth.

The Letter of Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople to Pope Gregory the Ninth, An. 1237.

IN the which Letter the ſaid Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople, writing to Pope Gregory, firſt after his reverend Salutation and Preamble following upon the ſame, entring then towards the matter, ſheweth the occaſion of his writing, which was by five obſervant Friers repairing that ways; whom he gently receiving into his houſe, had conference with them touching this diſcord between the two Churches, how it might be reduced again to unity; and afterwards perceiving the ſaid Friers to make their journey towards Rome, he thought therefore by them to write his Letters. Wherein he firſt lamenting this diviſion in the houſe of God, and reciting the inconveniences which come thereof, by the example of Judah and Iſrael, Jeruſalem and Samaria, Cain and Abel, Eſau and Jacob, alſo of other ſuch like, both private and publick Societies, where Brother fighteth againſt Brother, like as amongſt fiſhes the greater devoureth the leſſer; he proceedeth then further gently to exhort Pope Gregory to the ſtudy of unity.

He ſheweth the inconvenience of diſcord.

And forſomuch as the Pope had accurſed (belike) thoſe Churches of the Greeks before, he therefore taking his ground upon the words of St. Paul, (Gal. 1.) where he accurſeth every ſuch perſon and perſons whatſoever they be, either Man or Angel of Heaven that ſhall preach any other Goſpel than hath been preached, &c. willeth the Pope to ſtand with him upon the ſame ground of the Apoſtles curſe; ſo that if the ſtroke of that curſe have light upon him or his Churches, he deſireth him to ſhew the wound, and to help to wipe away the blood, to miniſter ſome ſpiritual implaiſter, to bind up the ſore, and to ſave his Brethren from periſhing which lay in danger, according to the ſaying of the wiſe man, A brotherly friend is tried in adverſity, &c.

Solomon.

Whether the Church of the Greeks or the Popes Church lyeth more under the danger of Gods curſe.

But if we (ſaith he) of the Greek Church be free from the ſtripe of this curſe of the Apoſtle, and that you Italians and of the Latin Church be ſtricken therewith, and lye thereby in danger of deſtruction, I truſt that you through ignorance and wilful obſtinacy will not ſo ſuffer your ſelves to be ſeparated from the Lord, but rather will ſuffer a thouſand deaths before, if it were poſſible for a man ſo often to die.

And as touching this great diſcord between us, if either contrariety of Doctrine, or ſwerving from the ancient Canons, or diverſity of Rites received of our forefathers be any cauſe thereof, we here take Heaven and Earth to witneſs, that we for our parts are ready, and deſire alſo, upon due trial of profound truth by Gods Word, and invocation of the Holy Ghoſt, to joyn hands with you, or you to joyn with us. But to ſay the very truth, and to tell you plain, this we ſuppoſe, that many mighty and noble Potentates would ſooner incline to your obedience, were it not that they feared your unjuſt oppreſſions, your inſatiable exactions, and inordinate proviſions wherewith you wring your ſubjects. By reaſon whereof have riſen amongſt us cruel wars, one fighting againſt another, deſolation of Cities, Bulls and Interdictions ſet upon Church-doors, diviſion of Brethren, and Churches of the Grecians left without ſervice, where God ſhould be praiſed. So that now only one thing lacketh, which I believe to be predefined and appointed from above long before to us Grecians, the time I mean of Martyrdom, which alſo now haſteneth faſt upon us, that the Tribunal of Tyrants ſhould be opened, and the ſeats of torments be ſet, that the blood of Martyrs ſhould be ſpilled, and we brought to the ſtage of Martyrdom, to fight for the Crown of Glory.

The Greeks afraid of the Popes oppreſſions.

The Patriarch of Conſtantinople propheſieth of the Martyrdom and ſlaughter of the Grecians

This that I do ſpeak, and wherefore I ſpeak it, the noble Iſland of Cyprus doth already know and feel which hath made many new Martyrs, and hath ſeen valiant Souldiers of Chriſt, which of long time before, paſſing by water and teare of ſorrow, now at laſt have alſo paſſed through fire, and ſo entred into the Heavenly reſt. How ſay you, be theſe good and ſeemly, O holy Pope, the ſucceſſor of Saint Peter the Apoſtle? Is this the bidding of that good Peter, the meek and humble Diſciple of Chriſt? Doth he thus inſtruct the Seniors and Elders in his Epiſtle, where he writeth in this wiſe? The Elders which are among you, I beſeech, which am alſo a fellow Elder with them, and witneſs of the ſufferings of Chriſt, and alſo a partaker of the glory that ſhall be opened: Feed the flock of God which is amongſt you, having care and overſight of it, not of coaction as compelled againſt your wills, but willingly of your own accord; not for filthy lucre ſake, but freely and heartily; neither as bearing Dominion and Lordſhip over the Church, but ſhewing your ſelves as an example to the flock: and when the chief Paſtor ſhall appear, you ſhall receive an incorruptible Crown of eternal glory, &c. And this is the Doctrine of Peter, as they ſhall ſee, which do not obey it. As for us, the other part of the ſaid Epiſtle is ſufficient: wherein he willeth them to rejoice which are in heavineſs through manifold temptations, that the trial of their faith being much more precious than gold that periſheth, and is tried in fire, may be their laud, honour, and glory, at the appearing of the Lord Jeſus, &c. But bear with me I pray you (O holy Father, and of all your Predeceſſors moſt meek) and ſuffer my words though they be ſomething ſharp, for they be ſighings of a ſorrowful heart.

The tyranny and avarice of the Pope chaſtened by the words of St. Peter.

1 Pet. 5.

1 Pet. 1.

Wherefore gird about your loyns with fortitude, and light up the candle of your diſcretion, and ſeek the Groat that is loſt, of the unity I mean, of faith. And we will alſo with like compaſſion joyn with your Holineſs, and I will not ſpare this weak body of mine, in pretending any excuſe either of age or length of the way: for the more laborious the travel is, the more Crowns it bringeth. And St. Paul ſaith, Every man ſhall receive reward according to his travel, &c.

He exhorteth the Pope to come and meet with him, that they might confer together about the unity of faith.

Neither are we ignorant (if it pleaſe your Holineſs) that like as we Grecians for our parts, do labour in all reſpects to keep and obſerve the ſincerity of true faith and doctrine, not to err, ne ſwerve in any part or point from the ſtatutes of the bleſſed Apoſtles and ancient Fathers: ſo the Church likewiſe of old Rome doth for her part labour alſo (we know well) to follow the ſincere verity of Chriſtian Doctrine, and thinketh her ſelf to err in nothing, nor to need any remedy or reformation. And this we know is the judgment and ſaying of both the Churches, as well of the Greeks, as of the Latins. For no man can ſee any ſpot in his own face, without he ſtoop down to the glaſs, or elſe be admoniſhed by ſome other, whether his face be blotted or no. Even ſo have we many great and fair glaſſes ſet before us: Firſt, the clear Goſpel of Chriſt, the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, and Divinity-Books of ancient Writers. Let us therefore look in them well; they will ſhew every mans mind and judgment, whether he go right or wrong. The God of Peace tread down Satan ſpeedily under our feet. The Author of Peace confound the ſower of Diſcord. He that is the cauſe of all goodneſs deſtroy the hater of all that which is good, and which giveth cauſe of offence and ſlander. And he which is God of all joy and peace, ſend to us, which are the ſhepherds of his ſheep reaſonable, the Angel of Peace, and the Meſſenger of great glad tidings, as he did in the Nativity of Chriſt, to the ſhepherds of brute ſheep and unreaſonable, and make us worthy to ſing that joyful ſong of Gods praiſe, Gloria in excelſis Deo, & in terra pax, hominibus bona voluntas; and to receive one another with an holy kiſs. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the peace of God the Father, and the Communion of the Holy Spirit be with you always: Amen.

The Greek Church found and ſincere in Doctrine.

He exhorteth the Church of Rome to look her face in Gods Glaſs, that is, to try their Doctrine by Gods Word.

Another

Another Epiſtle of the ſaid Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and Primate of the Greek Church, to the Cardinals of Rome.

Another Letter of Germanus Patriarch of Conſtantinople to the Cardinals.

ANother Letter the ſaid Germanus, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, wrote alſo the ſame time to the Popes Cardinals, wherein he firſt commendeth them for their wiſdom and counſel, and ſheweth what utility cometh by good counſel giving. Forſomuch as God (ſaith he) many times, that which he hideth from one, inſpireth to another, ſo that that good thing which by the Almighty God is ſunderly diſpenſed to divers, through common counſel and conference ſpreadeth to the publick utility of many, &c. After this eftſoons he beginneth to exhort them, that they like charitable Miniſters, and diſcreet Counſellors, will take in hand the Spiritual armor of God, to caſt down the ſtop and partition-wall of the old diſcord between the Greek and Latin Church, and that they will be a means to the Biſhop of Rome, that they which ſo long have been diſſevered by diſſention, may now be conjoyned in unity of peace, in brotherly charity and communion of faith.

Concerning which matter I have (ſaith he) already written to his Holineſs. And now I beſeech the King of Heaven, which took the ſhape of a ſervant to help his miſerable ſervants, and was exalted upon the Croſs, to raiſe them up which were fallen into the profundity of deſolation, that he will vouchſafe to put from your hearts all elation of mind, extolling it ſelf over and above the unity of your brethren and fellow ſervants, and to lighten your conſciences with the true light of underſtanding, that we may altogether agree in one, and that there be no ſchiſm amongſt us. Let us therefore, as we are inſtructed, ſo abide in one mind, that it be not ſaid of us, as it was of the Corinthians before us, I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, I of Cephas, and I of Chriſt: but that all we, as we hold the name of Chriſt, and are all called Chriſtians, ſo may alſo abide in that wherein we are inſtructed, in one mind, that is, to follow love and charity in Chriſt Jeſus, having always in our hearts the words of the Apoſtle, ſaying, One Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm.

1 Cor. 1.

And now to be plain with you in that I have to ſay, I ſhall deſire you not to be offended with me in uttering the truth as a friend unto you. The words (ſaith Solomon) of a wiſe man telling truth, be like to nails which be driven in deep: And truth for the moſt part breedeth enemies. And therefore though I am partly afraid, yet will I ſimply confeſs the truth unto you. Certes this diviſion of Chriſtian unity amongſt us, proceedeth of no other cauſe but only of the tyranny, oppreſſion, and exactions of the Church of Rome, which of a mother is become a ſtepdame, and hath put her children from her whom long time ſhe nouriſhed (after the manner of a ravening bird, which driveth her young from her) which children how much the more humble and obedient they are to her, the leſs ſhe eſteemeth them, and treadeth them under foot, not regarding the ſaying of the Goſpel, Whoſo humbleth himſelf ſhall be exalted.

The tyranny and oppreſſion of the Church of Rome is the only cauſe of breaking unity betweeen the Greek Church and the Latin.

Let modeſty therefore ſomething temper you, and let the avarice of the Court of Rome, although it cannot wel out of the fleſh which is bred in the bone, yet ſurceaſe a while, and let us together condeſcend to the trial of the truth; which truth being found out on both ſides, let us conſtantly embrace the ſame.

Luk. 18.

For why we have been altogether ſometimes both Italians and Grecians in one faith, and under the ſame Canons, having peace each with other, and defending one another, and confounding the enemies of the Church. At what time many flying out of the Weſt parts (whileſt that the tyranny of the Hereticks indured) made their concourſe to us, and were received; and part fled unto you, that is, old Rome, as to a ſtrong tower of refuge, and ſo received they comfort in both places, and one Brother was thus received into the boſom of another, by mutual love for their defence.

The old amity and concord betweeen the Eaſt Church and the Weſt.

Then after when Rome had been often diſtreſſed by the barbarous and heathen Nations, the Grecians were ever ready to reſcue and deliver them. Did not Agapetus and Vigilius flee unto Conſtantinople by reaſon of the diſſentious then at Rome, and being honourably received, were here defended under our protection? althoughthe like kindneſs was never yet ſhewed of your part to us again in our like neceſſities. Notwithſtanding, we ought to do good to them alſo that be ungrateful; for ſo doth the Sea participate her ſmooth and calm tides even unto the Pirates. And ſo God cauſeth the Sun to ſhine upon the juſt and unjuſt. But (alas for ſorrow) what bitter diviſion is this, that hath thus ſequeſtred us aſunder? One of us detracteth another, ſhunning the company one of another, as the damnation of his ſoul. What a mortal hatred is this come among us? If you think we are fallen, then do you help to lift us up, and be not to us a ſtumbling block to our bodily ruin, but helpers unto the Spiritual reſurrection of our ſouls. So ſhall we acknowledg our ſelves bound unto you to give you condign thanks accordingly.

Agapetus and Vigilius fled to Conſtantinople for ſuccour.

But if the blame and firſt original of this offence proceedeth from Rome, and the Succeſſors of Peter the Apoſtle; then read ye the words of St. Paul to the Galathians, ſaying, When Peter came to Antioch I withſtood him in the face, becauſe he was to be rebuked, &c. Howbeit this reſiſtance was no cauſe of any diſcord, or breach between them, but the cauſe father of further ſearch and profounder diſputations, provoking temporal agreement. For they were faſt joyned together in the bond of charity in Chriſt, agreeing in faith and conformity of Doctrine, ſeparated by no ambition or avarice. In which points would God we alſo were like unto them! This to us in our minds gendreth a great offence, that you gaping ſo greedily after terrene poſſeſſions, ſcrape together all that you can ſcratch and rake. You heap up gold and ſilver, and yet pretend that you be the Diſciples of him which ſaid, Gold and ſilver I have none, &c. You make whole Kingdoms Tributary to you, and Kings and Princes your vaſſals. You augment your money by uſury, and by feats of Merchandize. You unteach by your deeds that which you teach in words.

Paul rebuketh Peter. Gal. 2.

Act. 3.

The miſery of the Kingdom of England, and other more which were made Tributary to the See of Rome.

The immoderate avarice of the Court of Rome.

Moderate your ſelves therefore with more temperance, that you may be an example to us and to all the world. You ſee how good a thing it is one Brother to help another. Only God alone needeth no help or counſel, but men need to be holpen one of another. And were it not that I do reverence the bleſſed Apoſtle Peter, the chief of Chriſts Apoſtles, the Rock of our faith; I would here put you in remembrance how greatly this Rock was ſhaken and removed from the foundation at the ſight of a ſilly woman; and Chriſt of his ſecret purpoſe permitted the ſame, which by the crowing of the Cock brought him again to remembrance of that which was foretold him, and raiſed him from the ſlumber of deſperation. Then he being thus waked, waſhed his face with tears, confeſſing himſelf before God and all the world, to be a true pattern of repentance, which before bare the Keys of the Kingdom, as ſaying thus unto us, May not he which falleth, riſe again? Oh you which are fallen, riſe up and behold me, and hearken unto me, travelling towards Paradiſe; the Gate whereof to open, I have received power.

Peters faith ſhaken.

Peter an example of repentance.

And thus do I write unto you, not for any inſtruction, but only to put you in remembrance: for I know how God hath indued you with all wiſdom and knowledg, as Solomon ſaith, Give only occaſion to the wiſe, and he will learn wiſdom: Teach the juſt man, and he will be glad to take inſtruction,

This one thing more I will ſay, and ſo make an end: There be great and mighty Nations that are of like mind and opinion with us. Firſt, the Ethiopians that inhabit the chiefeſt part of the Eaſt. After that the Syrians, and other more of greater number than they, and more diſpoſed to vertue, as the Hiberi Alani, Gothi, Charari, with innumerable people of Ruſſia, and the Kingdom of great Victory of the Vulgarians. And all theſe are obedient unto us as their Mother-Church, perſiſting hitherto conſtantly in the ancient and true Orthodox faith immoveable.

Chriſtian Countries and Nations in the Eaſt parts which are not under the Biſhop of Rome.

The God of all holineſs which for our ſakes became Man, and which only is the Head of his Church and Congregation, vouchſafe to gather us again together in unity, and grant that the Grecian Church together with her ſiſter-Church of old Rome, may glorifie the ſame Chriſt, the Prince of Peace, by the unity of faith, to the reſtitution of ſound and wholſome Doctrine, wherein many years agone they have agreed and were united. God grant unto you brotherly charity, and the hand of the moſt mighty God govern govern you all (holy Cardinals) till that joyfully ye arrive in the haven of everlaſting tranquillity. The grace of God be with you all, Amen. Ex Mat. Pariſienſ. fol. 111.

The Pope proclaimeth war againſt the Greek Church. The Archbiſhop of Antioch and Conſtantinople Excommunicate the Pope.

Shortly after the ſending of theſe Letters, Pope Gregory prepared to ſend men of War, ſigned with the Croſs, to fight againſt the Grecians; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Antioch, with the ſaid Germanus ſolemnly Excommunicated the Pope, after he firſt had Excommunicated them: Pariſ. fol. 118. In the mean time by the tenor of theſe Letters of the Patriarch ſent to the Pope and to the Cardinals, it is evident to all men that have eyes in their heads to ſee? Firſt, how the whole Univerſal Church of Chriſt from the Eaſt parts to the Weſt, in ancient times were altogether united in one conſent of Doctrine, and linked together in brotherly charity, one Church brotherly to help another, both with temporal aid and ſpiritual counſel, as caſe required. Neither was then any one Mother-Church above other Churches, but the whole Univerſal Church was the Mother-Church and Spouſe of the Lord to every faithful believer. Under which Univerſal Church in general were comprehended all other particular Churches in ſpecial, as ſiſter Churches together, not one greater than another, but all in like equality, as God gave his gifts ſo ſerving one another, ever holding together the unity of faith and ſiſterly love. And ſo long was it and rightly might ſo be called the Catholick Church, having in it true unity, univerſality, and free conſent. Unity in Doctrine, univerſality in communicating and joyning together of voices, conſent in ſpirit and judgment. For whatſoever was taught at Rome touching Faith and Salvation, it was no other than was taught at Antioch, Syria, &c.

Five Notes to be conſidered.

The firſt Note.

The true Catholick Church what it was, and what.

Unity, Univerſality, Conſent.

Secondly, How in proceſs of time, through occaſion of the Biſhops of Romes tyranny and violent oppreſſion, this ring of Equality being broken, all flew in pieces, the Eaſt Church from the Weſt, the Greeks from the Latins, and that which was one before, now was made two; unity turned to diviſion, univerſality to ſingularity, and free conſent to diſſention.

The ſecond Note.

Thirdly, Here is alſo to be noted after this pitiful breach of Equality, how many and what great Nations departed from the Communion of the Church of Rome, and eſpecially about this time above ſpecified of Pope Gregory the Ninth, Anno 1230, ſo that both before and after that time many Councils were holden, and many things concluded in the Weſt Church, whereunto the one half of Chriſtendom lying in the Eaſt parts, did never agree; and contrary, many Councils holden with them, which in the Latin Church were not received. So that the Church now as ſhe loſt the benefit of univerſal conſent, ſo alſo ſhe loſt the name Catholick. Whereupon this queſtion is to be asked, that when the Council of Lateran, under Pope Innocent the Third, ordained the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, and Auricular Confeſſion here in the Weſt Church, without the free conſent of the Eaſt Church, whether the ſame Doctrine is to be counted Catholick or not?

The third Note.

The Church hath her name of Catholick, whereby and when. Whether the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, made without the free conſent of the Eaſt Churches, be Catholick or no?

Fourthly, In the departing of theſe Churches from the Biſhop of Rome, here alſo is to be noted that the ſame Churches of the Greeks, notwithſtanding they ſequeſtred themſelves, and fell out with the Church of Rome, and that juſtly, yet they kept their unity ſtill with their God, and received ſtill the true ὀρθοδοξίαν, that is, The true and ſincere Doctrine of Faith, ready to debate and try the truth of their Religion by the Scriptures, as they here in their own writings deſire to have the truth examined, according as ye have heard. Wherefore the Church of Rome hath done them open wrong, which being offered ſo gently to try and to be tried by the truth of Gods Word, not only would ſtand to no trial, nor abide conference, but alſo hath Excommunicated them as Hereticks, which appear here to be more orthodox Chriſtians than they themſelves.

The fourth Note.

Fifthly, Theſe things thus ſtanding, then have we to conclude that the Church of Rome falſly pretendeth it ſelf Catholick: For if the name of Catholick muſt needs import an univerſal conſent of the whole, how can that be Catholick where the conſent of ſo many famous and true Chriſtian Churches hath been lacking; and furthermore, where the conſent that hath been amongſt themſelves hath rather been coacted than any true or free conſent? Which is eaſie to be proved: for let theſe Fires and Fagots ceaſe, let Kings and Princes leave to preſs their Subjects with the Popes obedience; let the Scripture and the Biſhops alone every one in his own Dioceſs to govern their flock after the rule of Gods Word, and how few be there in this Weſt end of the world (trow you) that would not do the ſame that theſe Grecians, Ethiopians, and Syrians, have done before us? And thus much by the occaſion of this Patriarchs Letters ſent to Pope Gregory concerning the Grecians.

The Church of Rome proved not to be Catholick.

The proceedings of Rome ſtand upon no free conſent but are coacted.

The fifth Note.

The miſerable ſtate of the Weſt parts of Chriſtendom under the Pope.

Whoſe doings when I conſider, as I cannot but commend their wiſdom, and judg their ſtate happy and bleſſed, in ſhaking off from their necks the miſerable yoke of the Popes tyranny; ſo on the other ſide conſidering with my ſelf the wretched thraldom of theſe our Churches here in the Weſt part of the world under the Biſhop of Rome, I cannot tell whether more to marvel or to lament their pitiful ſtate, who were brought into ſuch oppreſſion and ſlavery under him, that neither they could abide him, nor yet durſt caſt him off. So untolerable were his exactions, ſo terrible was his tyranny, his Suſpenſions and Excommunications much like to a mad mans Dagger, drawn at every triſle, that no Chriſtian patience could ſuffer it, nor Nation abide it. Again, ſo deep did he ſit in their conſciences, they falſly believing him to have the authority of St. Peter, that for conſcience ſake neither King nor Ceſar durſt withſtand him, much leſs poor ſubjects once mute againſt him. And although his takings and ſpoilings, namely in this Realm of England, were ſuch that neither the Laity nor Spiritualty could bear them; yet was there no remedy, bear them they muſt, or elſe the Popes ſentence was upon them, to curſe them as black as pitch.

The Popes Excommunications like to a fools Dagger. The falſe perſvaſion of the Popes Supremacy cauſe of much wret chedneſs.

In reading the Hiſtories of theſe times, any good heart would lament and rue, to ſee the miſerable captivity of the people what they ſuffered under this thraldom of the Biſhop of Rome, whereof part hath been ſhewed before, more (God willing) ſhall follow hereafter, and ſome part preſently I mind to expreſs.

A brief Table or Declaration of the Popes unreaſonable Gatherings, Exactions, and oppreſſions in the Realm of England.

A brief Table of the Popes ſpoiling and getting of Benefices in the day of K. Henry the third.

AND firſt to begin with the Elections of the Biſhops, Abbots, Deans, and Priors within this Realm, it cannot be told what maſs of money grew to the Popes Coffers thereby, eſpecially in this Kings days; forſomuch as in his time lightly no Election happened either of Archbiſhop, Biſhop, Abbot, or any room of Dignity, but when the Covent or Chapter had choſen one to their mind, the King who had married a ſtranger, and ſought therefore to prefer ſtrangers, would ſet up another. By reaſon whereof when the other part was fain to appeal to Rome, and there to plead the caſe, no ſmall rivers of Engliſh money, beſides expences and travel by the way, went flowing to the Popes Sea. And although the Election went never ſo clear, yet the new Elect muſt needs reſpect the holy Father with ſome gentle reward, and further by his Oath was bound every three years, either in his own perſon or by another, to viſit Limina Apoſtolorum.

Money coming to the Pope by the Election of Hereford, and Abbot of S. Albans.

So in the houſe of St. Albans when John Herford was elected Abbot, their publick Election was not enough, but for the confirmation of the ſame, the Monks were fain to ſend Reinold the Phyſician, and Nicholas a Monk, to Rome with a ſufficient bag of money, through the mediation whereof the Election might ſtand, and the new Abbot was ſworn every third year by himſelf or another, to viſit the Doorſels of the Apoſtles.

8000 Marks given out of the Biſhoprick of Winchester to the Pope about the Election of William Rale, A. 1243.

Another ſuch like contention happened between the King and the Monks of Wincheſter, about the Election of William Rale, whom the Monks had choſen, but the King refuſed, willing to place a ſtranger, and therefore ſent to Rome his meſſengers, Theobald a Monk of Weſtminſter and Maſter Alexander a Lawyer, with no ſmall ſum of money to evacuate the Election of the foreſaid William Rale; commanding moreover, that the Gates of Wincheſter ſhould be ſhut againſt him, and that no man ſhould be ſo hardy there to receive him in the houſe. Whereupon the ſaid William being excluded, after he had laid his curſe upon the whole City of Wincheſter, made his repair to

Rome,

Rome, where for eight hundred Marks being promiſed to the Pope, his Biſhoprick (ſpite of the Kings heart) was confirmed, and he received. Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 164. & 240.

After the death of Stephen Langton Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ye heard before how the Monks had elected Walter a Monk of Canterbury. But the King to ſtop that Election, ſent up his Proctors Mr. Alexander Stanes, and Mr. Henry Sandford Biſhop of Rocheſter to the Pope, to evacuate that Election, and to place Richard Chancellor of Lincoln. Which Proctors perceiving at firſt how hard and unwilling the Pope and Cardinals were thereunto, and conſidering how all things might be bought for money; rather than the King ſhould fail of his purpoſe, they promiſed on the Kings behalf to the Pope, for maintaining his Wars againſt Frederick the Emperor, a Diſm or tenth part of all the Moveables in the Realm of England and of Ireland. At the contemplation of which money the Pope eſtſoons thinking to paſs with the King, began to pick quarrels with the foreſaid Walter, for not anſwering rightly to his Queſtions about Chriſts deſcending to Hell, making of Chriſts Body on the Altar, the weeping of Rachel for her Children, ſhe being dead before; about the ſentence of Excommunication, and certain cauſes of Matrimony. His anſwers whereunto when they were not to the Popes mind, he was therefore put back, and the Kings man preferred, which coſt the whole Realm of England and Ireland the tenth part of their Moveable Goods, by reaſon whereof, what money was raiſed to the Popes Gazophylacium, I leave to the eſtimation of the Reader, An. 1229. Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 71.

The tenth part of all Moveables in England and Ireland given to the Pope. 1229

Ex Mat. Pa. fol. 71. b.

And yet for all this the ſaid Richard, the coſtly Archbiſhop of Canterbury, within leſs than two years after, falling out with the King about the Caſtle and Lordſhip of Tunbridge, went and complained of him to the Pope. In the traverſe whereof it coſt the King a great piece of money beſides, and yet miſt he his purpoſe. In the which journey the ſaid Archbiſhop in his return homeward, by the way departed, Ann. 1231.

Money ſpent at Rome between the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Of the like diſſention ye heard before between the King and the Covent of Durham, for not chuſing Mr. Lucas the Kings Chaplain, whom the King offred to be their Biſhop. About the ſute whereof, when much money was beſtowed on both ſides welfavouredly, the Pope defeating them both, admitted neither M. William, nor M. Lucas, but Ordained the Biſhop of Sarum to be their Biſhop, An. 1228. Ex Pariſ.

The coſtly Election of the Biſhop of Durham.

Between the Monks of Coventry, and the Canons of Lichfield roſe another like quarrel, which of them ſhould have the ſuperior voice in chuſing their Biſhop. In which ſute after much money beſtowed in the Court of Rome, the Pope to requalifie again each part with ſome retribution for their money received, took this order indifferently between them, that each part by courſe ſhould have the chuſing of their Biſhop. An. 1228. Ex Pariſ. fol. 68.

Money coming to the Pope for the Election of the Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield.

What buſineſs fell likewiſe between Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Monks of Rocheſter, about the Election of Richard Wendour, to be their Biſhop? And what was the end? Firſt, the Archbiſhop was fain to travel himſelf to the Pope, and ſo did the Covent alſo ſend their Proctors. Who belike being better monied, weighed down the cauſe, ſo that the good Archbiſhop in that cauſe againſt the Monks, and partly in another cauſe againſt the Earl of Arundel, was condemned of the Pope in a thouſand Marks. Whereof the greateſt part (no doubt) redounded to the Popes Coffers, An. 1238. Mat. Pariſ. fol. 114.

Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury condemned at Rome in a 1000 Marks.

After the returning of the ſaid Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury again from Rome, it chanced that the Monks of Canterbury had elected their Prior without his aſſent; for the which he did Excommunicate the Monks, and evacuate their Election. Not long after this, the Popes Exactors went about to extort from the Churchmen the fifth part of their Goods to the Popes uſe, fighting then againſt the Emperor. This cruel exaction being a great while reſiſted by the Prelates and Clergy, at length the foreſaid Archbiſhop, thinking thereby to get the victory againſt the Monks, was contented to grant to the ſaid exaction, adding moreover of his own for an overplus 800 Marks; whereupon the reſt of the Clergy was fain to follow after, and contribute to the Popes Exactors, Ann. 1240. Ex Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 132. b.

The fifth part of all the clergy granted to the Pope.

In the Church of Lincoln (whoſe See before the Conqueſt was in Dorceſter, and afterwards by William Rufus tranſlated from thence to Lincoln) roſe a grievous contention between Robert Groſthead then Biſhop, and the Canons of the Cathedral Church about their Viſitation, whether the Biſhop ſhould viſit them, or the Dean; which matter being put unto Arbitrators, could not ſo be compoſed, before the Biſhop and the Chapter, after their Appeal made unto the Pope, went both unto Rome, and there after they had well waſted their purſes, they received at length their anſwer, but paid full ſweetly for it, An. 1239. Par. fol. 119.

Great expence of money in the Court of Rome between the Biſhop of Lincoln and the Cathedral Church.

At what time the Canons of Chicheſter had elected Robert Paſſelew to their Biſhop, at the Kings requeſt the Archbiſhop with certain other Biſhops, taking part againſt the Kings Chaplain, repelled him, and ſet up Richard Wetch. Upon this, what ſending and going there was [illegible] and what money beſtowed about the matter, as well of the Kings part as of the Biſhops; read the Story thereof in Mat. Pariſ. 182, 184, 186.

Money coming to the Pope between the Biſhop of Lincoln and [illegible] within his Dioceſs.

Robert Groſthead Biſhop of Lincoln (of whom relation was made before) having a great care how to bring the priviledg Orders of Religious Houſes within his Precinct, under his ſubjection and diſcipline, went unto Rome, and there with great labour and [illegible] money (as the Story ſaith) procured of the Pope a Mandate, whereby all ſuch Religious Orders were commanded to be under his power and obedience. Not long after the Monks not abiding that (who could ſoon weigh down the Biſhop with money) ſent their Factors to the Pope, who with their golden eloquence ſo perſwaded him, and ſtirred his affections in ſuch ſort, that ſoon they purchaſed to themſelves freedom from their ordinary Biſhop. Whereof Robert Groſthead having intelligence, made up to Rome, and there complaining to the Pope, declared how he was diſappointed and confounded in his purpoſe, contrary to promiſes and aſſurance made to him before. Unto whom Pope Innocent looking with a ſtern countenance, made this anſwer again, Brother (ſaid he) what is that to thee? Thou haſt delivered and diſcharged thine own ſoul. It hath pleaſed us to ſhew favour unto them. Is thine eye ill, for that I am good? And thus was the Biſhop ſent away with a flea in his ear, murmuring with himſelf, yet not ſo ſoftly, but that the Pope heard him ſay theſe words: O money, money, what canſt not thou do in the Court of Rome? Wherewith the Pope being ſomewhat pinched, gave this anſwer again, O ye Engliſhmen, Engliſhmen, of all men moſt wretched, for all your ſeeking is how ye may conſume and devour one another, &c. Ann. 1250. Ex Pariſ. fol. 230.

How pretily the Pope can take with both hands.

Money may do much at Rome.

The Popes anſwer to Robert Groſthead.

It happened moreover the ſame year that the ſaid Robert Groſthead Excommunicated and deprived one Ranulphus, a beneficed perſon in his Dioceſs, being accuſed of incontinency, who after the term of forty days, refuſing to ſubmit himſelf, the Biſhop wrote to the Sheriff of Rutland to apprehend him as Contumax. Which Sheriff, becauſe he deferred or refuſed ſo to do (bearing favour to the party) and being therefore ſolemnly Excommunicate by the Biſhop, uttered his complaint to the King. Whereat the King taking great diſpleaſure with the Biſhop for Excommunicating his Sheriff, and not firſt making his complaint to him, ſendeth forth with a ſubſtantial meſſenger (M. Moneta) ſuch as he was ſure would ſpeed, unto Pope Innocent, by virtue of whoſe words the Pope, eaſie to be intreated, ſendeth down a Proviſo to the Abbot of Weſtminſter, charging that no Prelate nor Biſhop in the Realm of England, ſhould moleſt or enter action againſt any of the Kings Bailiffs or Officers, in ſuch matters as to the Kings juriſdiction appertained. And thus was the ſtrife ended, not without ſome help and heap of Engliſh money; ſo that no wind of any controverſie here ſtirred in England, were it never ſo ſmall, but it blew ſome profit for the Popes advantage, Ann. 1250. Ex Pariſ. fol. 231.

Juſtice perverted by the Popes authority for money.

In like manner no little treaſure grew to the Popes Coffers by the Election of Boniface, the Queens Uncle, a Frenchman, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Anno 1243, and of Ethelmare, the Queens Brother to be Biſhop of Wincheſter againſt the wills of the Prior and Covent there, Anno 1250, beſides many ſuch other Eſcheats, which made England poor, and the Pope rich.

Money coming to the Pope by the Election of Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of Ethelmare Biſhop of Wincheſter, both ſtrangers and Frenchmen.

I come now ſomething likewiſe to touch briefly of the Popes Diſpenſations, Proviſions, Exactions, Contributions and {KING Hen. 3.} and Extortions in England in this Kings days; for to diſcourſe all, it is not one Book will hold it.

Marriage with Elenor the Kings ſiſter, a Nun, diſpenſed by the Pope for money.

Simon Montfort Earl of Leiceſter had married Elenor the Kings Siſter, and Daughter of King John, who by report of Stories had taken the Mantel and Ring. Wherefore the King, and his Brother Richard Earl of Exceſter, were greatly offended with the marriage; which the Earl Simon ſeeing, made a hand of money, and poſting over to Rome, after he had talked a few words in Pope Innocents ear, the marriage was good enough; and Letters were ſent to Otho the Popes Legate here, to give ſentence ſolemnly with the Earl. Notwithſtanding the Dominick Friers, and other of the like Religious fraternity, withſtood that ſentence of the Pope ſtoutly, ſaying, that the Popes Holineſs was therein deceived, and ſouls in danger; that Chriſt was jealous over his wife; and that it could not be any wiſe poſſible that a woman which had vowed Marriage with Chriſt, could afterward marry with any other, &c. Anno 1238. Ex Pariſi. fol. 114.

What inconvenience cometh by the Popes Diſpenſations.

As there was nothing ſo hard in the wide world, wherewith the Pope would not diſpenſe for money; ſo by the ſaid Diſpenſations much miſchief was wrought abroad. For by reaſon thereof the people truſting upon the Popes Diſpenſation, little regarded what they did, what they promiſed, or what they ſware. As well appeared by this King Henry the Third; who being a great exactor of the poor Commons, as ever was any King before him or ſince, and thinking thereby to win the people ſooner to his devotion, moſt faithfully promiſed them once or twice, and thereto bound himſelf with a ſolemn Oath, both before the Clergy and Laity, to grant unto them the old Liberties and Cuſtoms as well of Magna Charta, as Charta de Foreſta, perpetually to be obſerved. Whereupon a Quindecim was granted to the King. But after the payment was ſure, the King truſting by the Popes Diſpenſation for a little money to be diſcharged of his Oath and Covenant, went from that he had promiſed and ſworn before.

Wilful perjury maintained by the Popes Diſpenſations.

In like manner the ſaid King another time, being in need of money, ſigned himſelf with the Croſs, pretending and ſwearing deeply in the face of the whole Parliament, that he would himſelf perſonally fight in the Holy Land againſt the Saracens. But as ſoon as the money was taken, ſmall care was had for performance of his Oath, being ſo put in the head by certain about him, that he needed not to paſs of that perjury, forſomuch as the Pope for an hundred pounds or two, would quickly diſcharge him thereof. Ex Pariſ. fol. 273.

Enormities which ſpring out of the Popes Diſpenſations.

Out of the ſame corrupt ſpring of theſe Popiſh Diſpenſations, have proceeded alſo many other foul abſurdities. For where many young men were in thoſe days which enjoyed Benefices, and were no Prieſts, and when by the procurement of Robert Groſthead, Biſhop of Lincoln, the ſaid young men ſhould be forced, whether they would or not, to enter Orders, they laying their purſes together, ſent to Rome, and obtained of the Pope a Diſpenſation to remain ſtill as they were, that is, to have the fruits of Benefices to find them at School or Univerſity, and yet themſelves neither Miniſters to take charge, nor yielding any ſervice for their profits taken. Ex Matth. Pariſienſ. fol. 256. Beſides innumerable heaps of enormities more, proceeding of the Popes Diſpenſations, as diſpenſing one man to have ſundry Biſhopricks, to incroach Pluralities of Benefices, to make children Parſons, to legitimate Baſtards, with ſuch other like; the particulars whereof for brevity ſake, I do omit to further opportunity.

The intolerable oppreſſion of the Realm of England by the Popes Exactions and Contributions, and other ſleights uſed in the time of King Henry the Third.

The miſerable impoveriſhing of the Realm by the Popes proviſions and contributions.

ALthough theſe emoluments, thus riſing daily to the Popes purſe by Simony and Bribery, by Elections and Diſpenſations, might ſeem ſufficient to ſatisfie his greedy appetite; yet ſo inſatiable was the avarice of that See, that he not yet contented herewith, over and beſides all this, ſent every where almoſt ſome Legate or other into this Realm to take for his advantage. Inſomuch that during all this Kings time, the Realm was never lightly without ſome of the Popes Ligiers, with all violence exacting and extorting continual proviſions, contributions, and ſums of money to be levied out of Cels, Abbies, Priories, fruits of Benefices, and Biſhopricks, and alſo Laymens purſes, to the miſerable impoveriſhing both of the Clergy and Temporality, as hereunder followeth.

Cardinal Otho Legate in England. The receiving of Otho the Popes Legate into the Realm.

Firſt, after Pandulphus was ſent into this Realm Cardinal Otho, procured by the King without the aſſent of his Nobles, to the intent to aſſiſt him in certain affairs he had to do. At receiving of which Legate, great preparation was made; many rich and precious gifts in Scarlet, in Plate, in Jewels, in Money and Palfrys, were given him. Whom the King alſo himſelf went as far as the Sea-ſide to to receive, bowing down his head in low courteſie to the Cardinals knees. To whom alſo the Biſhop of Winche-ſter for his part gave towards keeping of his houſe, fifty fat Oxen, an hundred ſemes of Wheat, and eight great veſſels of pure Wine. This Legate at his firſt coming, beginneth firſt to beſtow ſuch Benefices, as he found vacant, upon them whom he brought with him, without reſpect whether they were meet or unmeet. Ex Pariſienſi, fol. 103. {Anno 1237.}

After this the Pope hearing how the Nobles and Commons of the Realm began to ſtomack the Cardinal for his exceſſive Procurations and Exactions, ſent for him home; but the King by reaſon he ſtood in fear of his Nobles, and thought to have a ſtay by the Cardinal againſt all occurrents, intreated him to ſtay while he wrote to the Pope to obtain further licenſe for him to tarry; and ſo he did, not without ſome Engliſh money ye may be ſure.

Otho the Legate ſeeketh to come into Scotland.

In this mean time of vacation, Otho thinking to loſe no time, but to gather alſo ſome crums in Scotland, made as though he would ſet things there in order, which were in the Church of Scotland, to be reformed, and ſo cometh to the King of Scots, being then in York with King Henry, to have leave to enter. Unto whom the King thus made anſwer, that he never ſaw to his remembrance, any Popes Legate in his Land, neither was there any ſuch need (God be praiſed) for ſuch to be ſent for. Matters there were well enough, and needed no help of his. And as he could never learn neither in the days of his Father, or any his Predeceſſors, that any ſuch entrance to any Legate was granted; ſo he for his part would not now begin. But yet notwithſtanding forſomuch as I hear (ſaid he) that you are a good man, this I tell you before, that if you will needs adventure in, do it warily, and take heed to your ſelf, leſt it happen to you otherwiſe than I would wiſh; for they be a ſavage and unruly people, given much to murther, and ſhedding blood, whom I my ſelf am ſcarce able to bridle; ſo that if they fall upon you, I ſhall not be able to help you. And how they alſo invaded me, and ſought to expell me from my Kingdom, ye heard of late. And therefore I warn you before, take heed betime what you think beſt to do. After the Cardinal heard the King ſpeak theſe words, he pluckt in his horns, and durſt proceed no further, but kept him ſtill by the ſide of King Henry. Notwithſtanding ſhortly after, the ſame Legate coming to the borders of Scotland, there called the Biſhops to him, and ſo when he had well filled his Bags, came back again, Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 106. 123. b.

The King of Scots his anſwer to Cardinal Otho.

The Realm of Scotland hitherto never troubled with any Popes Legate.

Cardinal Otho ſtopped from going into Scotland.

It was not long after but licenſe came from Pope Gregory to his Legate Otho, for his longer abode here in the Realm (as welcome as water in the Ship) with new authority alſo to proceed in the Popes affairs. Who firſt ſhewing to the Biſhops and the Clergy his Letters of longer tarrying, required of them, forſomuch as no man (ſaid he) warreth of his own charges, to be ſupported with new procurations; which was to have of every able Church four Marks; and where one Church was not able to reach thereto, that other Churches ſhould joyn with to make the ſaid money. Notwithſtanding the Biſhops a great while ſtood in the denial thereof. Pariſ. fol. 123, 128, 132.

Oppreſſions of the Cardinal Otho the Popes Legate.

Beſides he aſſembled together all the Black Monks of St. Benedicts Order, giving to them ſtrict Orders, which ſhortly after for money he releaſed to them again. Pariſ. fol. 116, 119. {Anno 1238.}

More-

Moreover, by the ſaid Otho,and other the Popes Exactions,with ſpecial Bulls directed down for the ſame,collation of Benefices being taken out of the hands of the Patrons, were give to light and vile Runnagates, coming from Italy and other places, ſuch as pleaſed the Pope and his Legate to beſtow them upon, to the great prejudice of the ancient liberty and right of the true Patrons thereof. Whereupon the Earls, and Barons, and Nobles of the Realm, addreſſed Letters unto Pope Gregory by Sir Robert Twing Knight, for redreſs of ſuch wrongs and injuries; who otherwiſe ſhould be forced (they ſaid) to invocate the ſuccour of their King, who both was able, and was no leſs willing, according to his duty (they truſted) to reform ſuch enormities, and to defend the liberties of his Realm. The tenor of whoſe writing is to be read in *Matt.Pariſ. fol.*128.a.

The Nobles of England write to Pope Gregory for collation of Benefices wreſted out of their hands.

Not long after the ſame, in the Year of our Lord 1240. came a new precept from Pope Gregory, by Petrus Rubeus the Popes Nuncio, to the foreſaid Otho, that all Beneficed Men of the Clergy, as well in England as in France, ſhould pay to the Pope the fifth part of their Revenues. Whereupon when the Clergy Men made their complaint to the King, ſeeking to be relieved by him; the King anſwered them again, that he neither would, nor durſt ſtand againſt the Pope in any caſe, and ſo without all hope of ſuccour ſent them away, Pariſ. fol. 132. Then were the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots and Prelates of the Church commanded to aſſemble together at Reading, there to hear the Popes pleaſure and commandment concerning the payment of this fifth part, where in the end, thus the matter concluded; that the Prelates deſired a further time to be given them to adviſe upon the matter; and for that ſeaſon the Aſſembly brake up, *Pariſ.*122. Notwithſtanding at laſt, after many excuſes and exceptions laid in by the Clergy; Firſt, That becauſe the mony was gathered to fight againſt the Emperor, they ought not to contribute their mony, contrary to the liberties of the Church. Item, Forſomuch as they had paid a tenth not long before unto the Pope, upon condition that no more ſuch payments ſhould be required of them, much leſs now the fifth part ſhould be exacted of them, becauſe an action twice done, maketh a cuſtom. Item, Seeing they had oftentimes to repair unto the Court of Rome, if they ſhould give this mony againſt the Emperor, it would turn to their danger coming through his Land. Item, Seeing their King had many enemies, againſt whom they muſt needs relieve the King with their mony, they could not ſo do if the Realm were thus impoveriſhed, &c. All which excuſes, with divers other more notwithſtanding, they were compelled at length to conform themſelves to the Popes good pleaſure, through the example given of Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who to obtain his purpoſe againſt the Monks of Canterbury (with whom he was then in ſtrife) began firſt to yield to the Legates 800 Marks for his part, whereby the reſt alſo were fain to follow after. Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 132,136.

Excuſes of the Clergy, why they would not contribute to the Pope.

Furthermore, the ſame year, the Pope agreed ſo with the People of Rome, that if they would aid him againſt Frederick the Emperor, look what Benefices were to be given in England, the ſame ſhould be at their arbitrement to be beſtowed upon their Children. Whereupon commandment was ſent to the foreſaid Edmund Archbiſhop, to the Biſhops of Lincoln and Sarum, that all the Collations of Benefices within the Realm ſhould be ſuſpended, till proviſion were made for three hundred Children of the Citizens of Rome to be firſt ſerved. Upon the which ſo miſerable requeſt, the ſaid Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for ſorrow to ſee the Church ſo oppreſſed, departed the Realm, and ſo continued in France, and died at Pontiniac: *Ex Mat.Par.fol.*134.b. Which Edmund was afterward made a Saint, and canonized by Pope Innocent the fourth.

Three hundred Children of Rome placed in Benefices in England.
Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury departeth the Realm, and dieth in Exile.

This done, then went Petrus Rubeus the Popes Nuncio, and Ruffinus into Scotland, from whence they brought with them three thouſand Pounds to the Popes uſe about Alhollontide the ſame year. At which time moreover, cometh another Harpax from the Pope to England, named Mumelius, bringing with him three and twenty Romans here into the Realm to be beneficed. Thus, what by the King on the one ſide, and what by the Cardinal Otho, Petrus Rubeus, Ruffinus and Mumelius on the other ſide, poor England was in a wretched caſe. Matth. Pariſienſ. fol. 137.

Three thouſand pounds to the Popes uſe.
Romans 23 brought to England to be beneficed.

Another pretty practice of the Pope to prol for mony, was this: The foreſaid Petrus Rubeus, coming into Religious Houſes, and into their Chapters, cauſed them to contribute to the Popes Holineſs, by the example of this Biſhop and that Abbot, pretending that he and he, of their own voluntary devotion, had given ſo much and ſo much, and ſo ſeduced them. *Pariſ.fol.*134. Alſo the Pope craftily ſuborned certain Friers, authorized with full Indulgence, that whoſoever had vowed to fight in the Holy Land, and was diſpoſed to be releaſed of his Vow, needed not to repair to Rome for Abſolution, but paying ſo much mony as his charges would come to going thither, he reſorting to the ſaid Friers, might be aſſoiled at home.

The Pope for mony releaſeth Chriſtians of their Vow.

This paſſed in the year 1240. Now all theſe troubles laid together, were enough to vex the meekeſt Prince in the World; whereto by way of acceſs to the Kings further moleſtation, he had much ado with the Prelates and Clergy Men of his Realm, who were always tampering with his Title, eſpecially in their Aſſemblies and Councils; to whom the King, to reſtrain them from that preſumption, did both ſend and write, as appeareth by this evidence of Record, Rex miſit Galfridum de Langley, &c. That is, The King ſent Geoffry Langley to the Archbiſhop of York, and to other Biſhops purpoſed to meet at Oxford, to appeal for him, leſt, in the ſaid Council there called, they ſhould preſume to ordain ſomething againſt his Crown and Dignity. This was done in the year of our Lord 1241. In which year alſo came a commandment Apoſtolical to the Houſe of Peterborough, that they at the Popes contemplation muſt needs grant him ſome Benefice lying in their donation, the fruits whereof were worth at leaſt an hundred Pounds, and if it were more it ſhould be the better welcome; ſo that they ſhould be as the Farmers, and he to receive the profits. In fine, the Covent excuſed themſelves by the Abbot, being then not at home. The Abbot, when he came home, excuſed himſelf by the King, being the Patron and Founder of the Houſe. The King being grieved with the unreaſonable ravening of theſe Romaniſts, utterly forbad any ſuch example to be given. *Ex Pariſienſ. fol.*143. But what happened? The Abbot being therefore accuſed to the Pope by one of the Legates, and coming up about four years after, in the time of Pope Innocent, to the Council of Lions, was ſo rated and reviled, and ſo ſhamefully thruſt out of the Popes Court, that for ſorrow he fell ſick upon the ſame, and there died. *Pariſ. fol.*184.

The Archbiſhop of York ſhould ordain nothing againſt the K. Turris Lond.
Mumelius another meſſenger of the Pope.
Abbot of Peterborough thruſt out of the Popes Court.

In the time of which Council of Lions, Pope Innocent the fourth (forſomuch as the inſtrument or obligation, whereby the Realm of England ſtood Tributary to the Pope, was thought to be burned in the Popes Chamber a little before) brought forth either the ſame, or another Chart like unto it, whereunto he ſtraitly charged and commanded every Engliſh Biſhop, being there preſent at the Council, ſeverally to ſet to his Hand and Seal. Which unreaſonable petition of the Pope, albeit it went ſore againſt the hearts of the Biſhops, yet (ſee in what miſerable ſubjection the Pope had all the Biſhops under him) none of them durſt otherwiſe do, but accompliſh the Popes requeſt therein, both to their own ſhame, and prejudice to the publick freedom of the Realm. Amongſt which Biſhops, the longeſt that held out, and laſt that put to his Seal, was the Biſhop of London. Which act when the King and the Nobility underſtood, they were mightily and worthily therewithall offended. Ex Pariſ. fol. 192. Anno 1245.

The obligation of K. John's Tribute to the Pope burned.
The Biſhops of England put their Hands and Seals to the Popes Bill.

After what time Cardinal Otho was ſent for by Pope Gregory in all haſte to come to the General Council, two other in his room here remained, whoſe Names were Petrus Rubeus, and Petrus de Supino. Of whom the one, bearing himſelf for the Popes Kinſman, brought out his Bills and Bulls under the Popes Authority, to ſuch an Abbot, or to ſuch a Prior, or to ſuch and ſuch a Biſhop, and ſo extorted from them a great quantity of Gold and Silver. The other, to wit, Petrus de Supino ſailed to Ireland, from whence he brought with him a thouſand and five hundred Marks to the Popes uſe, An. 1241. *Ex Par.fol.*247.b. All which mony notwithſtanding, gotten by both the Collectors, in the carriage of it up to Rome, about the death of Pope Gregory, happned into the hands of Frederick the Emperor; who cauſed it again to be reſtored, as near as he could, to them of whom it was taken. Pariſ. fol. 151.

M. Martinus another Meſſenger for the Popes money. An. 1244.

After theſe came in then M. Martinus a new Merchant from the new Pope Innocent the fourth, An. 1244. armed with full power to ſuſpend all Prelates in England from giving Benefices, till the Popes Kinſmen were firſt preferred. Neither would he take the fruits of any Benefice, unleſs it were above the value of thirty Marks. At his firſt coming, he required of Prelates and eſpecially of Religious Houſes to furniſh him with Horſes and Palfraies, ſuch as were convenient for the Popes eſpecial Chaplain and Legate to ſit upon; alſo with Plate, Raiment, Proviſion for his Kitchen and Cellar, &c. and ſuch as denied, or excuſed, he ſuſpended; as the Abbot of Malmesbury, and the Prior of Merton. All Prebends that were void he ſought out and reſerved them for the Popes behoof; among which was the golden Prebend of Sarum, belonging to the Chancellor of the Quire, whom he preferred to the Biſhoprick of Bath, and ſo ſeized upon the Prebend being void, againſt the wills both of the Biſhop and the Chapter. Pariſ. fol. 167, 180. Moreover, he brought with him blanks in paper and parchment, ſigned in the Popes Chamber with his ſtamp and Seal; wherein he might afterward write to whom, and to what he would, Pariſ. fol. 178. b. requiring furthermore of the King, in the Popes behalf, to help his Holineſs with a contribution to be taxed amongſt his Clergy, at leaſt of 10000 Marks, Ibid. And to the end that the Pope might win the King ſooner to his devotion, he writeth in the Kings behoof to the Nobles and Commons of the Realm, that they ſhould not fail, upon pain of his great Curſe, to confer ſuch Subſidy of money to the ſubvention of the King, as he then had demanded of them; but they ſtood ſtiff in not granting to him.

Exaction of the Popes Legate upon the Clergy of England.

Contribution of 10000 Marks for the Pope.

The Pope craftily holdeth with the King, that the King might hold with him.

While the inſatiable avarice of the Pope thus made no end in gathering riches and goods together in England; the Nobles and Barons, with the community as well of the Clergy as the Laity, weighing the miſerable ſtate of the Realm, and namely, of the Church, which now neither had liberty left them to chuſe their own Miniſters, nor yet could enjoy their own Livings, laid their heads together, and ſo exhibited an earneſt intimation to the King; beſeeching him to conſider the pitiful affliction and profeſſion of his Subjects under the Popes extortion, living in more thraldom than ever did the people of Iſrael under Pharoah. Whereupon the King beginning at laſt to look up, and to conſider the injuries and wrongs received in this Realm, through the avarice of the Court of Rome, directeth to Pope Innocent the fourth this Letter, in tenor as followeth.

Intimation given to the King, touching the Importable oppreſſion of the Realm by the Pope.

The Kings Letter to Pope Innocent the fourth.

King Hen. 3's Letter to the Pope. The King offereth to kiſs the Popes feet.

SAnctiſſimo in Chriſto Patri, ac Domino, Innocentio, Dei gratia ſummo Pontifici, Henricus eadem gratia Rex Angliæ, &c. Salutem & pedum oſcula beatorum, &c.

To the moſt Holy Father in Chriſt, and Lord, Innocent, by the Grace of God chief Biſhop, Henry by the ſame Grace King of England, &c. Greeting, and kiſſings of his bleſſed feet. The more devout and obſequious the Son ſheweth himſelf in obeying the Fathers will, the more favour and ſupportation doth he deſerve to find at his Fathers hands again. This therefore I write, for that whereas both we and our Realm have ever and in all things been hitherto at the devotion and commandment of your Fatherhood; and that although, in ſome certain affairs of ours and of our Kingdom, we have found your Fatherly favour and grace ſometimes propitious unto us, yet in ſome things again, as in proviſions given and granted to your Clerks of Foreign Nations, both we and our Kingdom have felt no ſmall detriment. By reaſon of which proviſions, the Church of England is ſo ſore charged and burthened, that not only the Patrons of Churches, to whom the Donations thereof do appertain, are defrauded of their right, but alſo many other good works of Charity thereby do decay; for that ſuch Benefices, which have been mercifully beſtowed upon Religious Houſes to their ſuſtentation, are now waſted and conſumed by your proviſions.

Meſſage received by the Pope in the Realm of England.

The Popes proviſions.

Wherefore forſomuch as your See Apoſtolick ought to be favourable to all that be petitioners to the ſame, ſo that no perſon be wronged in that which is his right, we thought therefore to be ſuters to your Fatherhood, moſt humbly beſeeching your Holineſs, that you will deſiſt and ſurceaſe for a time from ſuch proviſions to be exacted. In the mean ſeaſon, it may pleaſe your Fatherhood, we beſeech you, that our Laws and Liberties (which you may rightly repute none other but your own) you will receive to your tuition, to be conſerved whole and ſound, nor to ſuffer the ſame by any ſiniſter ſuggeſtion in your Court to be violated and infringed. Neither let your Holineſs be any whit moved therefore with us, if in ſome ſuch caſes as theſe be, we do or ſhall hereafter reſiſt the tenor of your commandments; forſomuch as the complaints of ſuch, which daily call upon us, do neceſſarily inforce us thereunto; which ought, by the charge of this our Office and Kingly dignity committed to us of Almighty God, to foreſee that no Man in that which is their right be injured, but truly to miniſter juſtice to every one, in that which duly to him appertaineth. This Letter was ſent the eight and twentieth year of the Kings Reign. Ex Pariſienſi, fol. 172.

The Kings too much ſubjection to the Pope.

A Man would think that this ſo gentle and obedient Letter of the King to the Pope would have wrought ſome good effect in his Apoſtolical breaſt, to withdraw his proviſions, and to have tendered the Kings ſo reaſonable and honeſt requeſt: but how little all this prevailed to ſtop his inſatiable greedineſs and intolerable extortions and oppreſſions, the ſequel well declareth. For beſides that, ſhortly after the Pope ſent M. Martin with blanks, being bulled for contribution of 10000 Marks, in all haſte to be paid alſo, even immediately upon the receiving of this Letter. It followeth in mine author, that the ſaid Pope Innocent the fourth, after all this great ſubmiſſion of the King, and ſo manifold benefits, and payments yearly out of his Realm received, was not aſhamed to take of David, Prince of North Wales, five hundred Marks by year, to ſet him againſt the King of England, and exempted him from his fealty and obedience due to his own Liege Lord and King, to whom both he and all other Welch-men had ſworn their ſubjection before, as by the ſeals and obligations as well of that David himſelf, as other Welch Lords in this be half doth appear: In Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 172.

Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 172.

The Pope ſetteth Welchmen againſt the King of England.

Neither did M. Martinus in the mean while ſlip his buſineſs, in making up his market for the Popes money of ten thouſand Marks, but ſtill was calling upon the Prelates and Clergy. Who, firſt excuſing themſelves by the abſence of the King and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, afterward being called again by new Letters, made their anſwer by the Dean of Pauls their Prolocutor:

Contribution required of the Pope with their excuſes and reaſons againſt the ſame.

Firſt, That the poverty of the Realm would not ſuffer them to conſent thereto.

Item, Whereas they had given before a contribution to Cardinal Otho, for paying of the Popes Debts, and knew the ſaid money to be imployed to no ſuch end as it was demanded for, more cauſe they had now to miſdoubt, leſt this contribution in his hands, which was a much more inferior meſſenger than the Cardinal, would come to the ſame or a worſe effect.

Item, If they ſhould now agree to a new contribution, they feared leſt it would grow to a cuſtom, ſeeing that one action, twice done, maketh a cuſtom.

Item, Forſomuch as a general Council is ſhortly looked for, where every Prelate of the Realm muſt needs beſtow both his travel and expences, and alſo his preſent to the Pope, if the Prelates now ſhould be bound to this tax, they were not able to abide this burthen.

Item, Seeing it is alledged, That the Mother Church of Rome is ſo far in debt, reaſon and right it were, that the Mother ſo oppreſſed ſhould be ſuſtained of all her devout Children meeting together in the general Council; where as by helps of many, more relief might come than by one Nation alone.

Item, Laſt of all, they alledged, That for fear of the Emperor and his threatnings, they durſt not conſent to the ſaid contribution.

While theſe things were thus in talk between the Popes Prieſts and the Clergy of England, cometh in

John Mariſcal and other Meſſengers from the King, commanding in the Kings name, that no Biſhop, that held his Baronage of the King, ſhould infeft his Lay-fee to the Court of Rome, which they ought only to him, &c. Pariſ. fol. 139. An. 1243.

The Ports of England laid to ſtop the Popes Letters, yet all would not ſerve.

Not long after this, in the year of our Lord 1245. the whole Nobility of the Realm by general conſent, and not without the Kings knowledge alſo, cauſed all the Ports by the Sea ſide to be laid, that no Meſſenger with the Popes Letters and Bulls from Rome ſhould be permitted to enter the Realm, whereunto ſome were taken at Dover and there ſtayed. Notwithſtanding when complaint thereof was brought to the King by M. Martinus the Popes Legate, there was no remedy but the King muſt needs cauſe theſe Letters to be reſtored again and executed to the full effect, Pariſ.

Sixty thouſand Marks yearly going out of England to the Pope and his Italian Clerks.

Then the King upon advice cauſed a view to be taken through every ſhire in England, to what ſum the whole reveneues of the Romans and Italians amounted, which by the Popes Authority went out of England: the whole ſum whereof was found yearly to be threeſcore thouſand Marks, to the which ſum the revenues of the whole Crown of England did not extend, Ex Mat. Pariſ. fol. 185. a.

The Nobles then underſtanding the miſerable oppreſſion of the Realm, being aſſembled together at Dunſtable for certain cauſes, ſent one Fulco in the name of the whole Nobility, unto M. Martinus the Popes Merchant with this Meſſage; That he indelaiedly upon the ſame warning ſhould prepare himſelf to be gone out of the Realm, under pain of being cut all to pieces. At which Meſſage the Legate being ſore agaſt, went ſtraight to the King, to know whether his conſent was to the ſame or not. Of whom when he found little better comfort, he took his leave of the King, who bad him adieu in the Divels name (ſaith Matth. Pariſ.) and thus was the Realm rid of M. Martinus. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 185. b. An. 1245.

M. Martin the Popes Legate ſent out of England in the divels name.

The Pope in diſpleaſure with the King of England.

As ſoon as Pope Innocent had hereof intelligence by the complaint of his Legate, he was in a mighty rage. And furthermore, remembring how the French King and the King of Arragon not long before had denyed him entrance into their Land, and being therefore in diſpleaſure with them likewiſe, he began in great anger to knit his brows, and ſaid, It is beſt that we fall in agreement with our Prince, whereby we may the ſooner bring under theſe little petty Kings; and ſo the great Dragon being pacified, theſe little Serpents we ſhall handle at own own pleaſures as we liſt.

Iſtos regulos The proud words of the Pope againſt the French King and the King of England.

After this, immediately then followed the General Council of Lions, to the which Council the Lords and States of the Realm, with the conſent of the Commonalty, ſent two Bills: one containing a general ſupplication to the Pope and the Council; the other with the Articles of ſuch grievances which they deſired to be redreſſed, whereof relation is made ſufficiently before. The other Bill of the ſupplication, becauſe it is not before expreſſed, I thought here to exhibite for two cauſes: Firſt, That Men now in theſe days may ſee the pitiful blindneſs of thoſe ignorant days, wherein our Engliſh Nation here did ſo blindly humble themſelves and ſtand to the Popes courteſie, whom rather they ſhould have ſhaken off, as the Grecians did. Secondly, That the pride of the Pope might the better appear in his colours, who ſo diſdainfully rejected the humble ſute of our Lords and Nobles, when they had much more cauſe to diſdain rather, and to ſtamp him under their feet. The tenor of the ſupplication was this.

{Anno 1245} The Copy of the Supplication written in the names of all the Nobles and Commons of England, to Pope Innocent the fourth, in the General Council at Lions, Anno. 1245.

To the Reverend Father in Chriſt Pope Innocent, Chief Biſhop, the Nobles, with the whole Commonalty of the Realm of England ſendeth commendation with kiſſing of his bleſſed feet.

The ſupplication of the Lords and Commons of England to the Pope.

OUR Mother the Church of Rome we love with all our hearts, as our duty is, and covet the increaſe of her honour with ſo much affection as we may, as to whom we ought always to flie for refuge, whereby the grief, lying upon the Child, may find comfort at the Mothers hand, Which ſuccor the Mother is bound ſo much the rather to impart to her Child, how much more kind and beneficial ſhe findeth him in relieving her neceſſity. Neither is it to be ſaid our Mother unknown, how beneficial and bountiful a giver the Realm of England hath been now of long time for the more anfolifying of her exaltation, as appeared by your yearly Subſidy, which we term by the name of Peter-pence. Now the ſaid Church not contented with this yearly Subſidy, hath ſent divers Legates for other contributions, at divers and ſundry times to be taxed and levied out of the ſame Realm: all which contributions and taxes notwithſtanding have been lovingly and liberally granted. {KING Hen. 3}

Furthermore, neither is it unknown to your Fatherhood, how our fore-fathers, like good Catholicks both loving and fearing their Maker, for the ſouls health as well of themſelves, as of their Progenitors and Succeſſors alſo, have founded Monaſteries, and largely have indowed the ſame, both with their own proper Lands, and alſo Patronages of Benefices, whereby ſuch Religious perſons, profeſſing the firſt and chiefeſt perfection of Holy Religion in their Monaſteries, might with more peace and tranquility occupy themſelves devoutly in Gods Service, as to the Order appertained: and alſo the Clerks, preſented by them into their Benefices, might ſuſtain the other exterior labours for them in that ſecond Order of Religion, and ſo diſcharge and defend them from all hazards: ſo that the ſaid Religious Monaſteries cannot be defrauded of thoſe their Patronages and Collations of Benefices, but the ſame muſt touch us alſo very near, and work intolerable griefs unto our hearts.

The ſuperſtitious founding of Monaſteries in England, &c.

And now ſee, we beſeech you, which is lamentable to behold, what injuries we ſuſtain by you and your predeceſſors, who not conſidering thoſe our Subſidies and Contributions above remembred, do ſuffer alſo your Italians, and Foreigners (which be out of number) to be poſſeſſed of our Churches and Benefices in England, pertaining to the right and Patronage of thoſe Monaſteries aforeſaid: which Foreigners, neither defending the ſaid Religious perſons, whom they ought to ſee to, nor yet having the language, whereby they may inſtruct the flock, take no regard of their ſouls, but utterly leave them of wild Wolves to be devoured. Wherefore it may truly be ſaid of them, that they are no good ſheepherds, whereas neither they know their ſheep, nor the ſheep do know the voyce of their ſheepherds, neither do they keep any Hoſpitality, but only take up the rents of thoſe Benefices, carrying them out of the Realm, wherewith our Brethren our Nephews, and our Kinſfolks might be ſuſtained, who could and would dwell upon them, and imploy ſuch exerciſes of mercy and Hoſpitality as their duty required. Whereof a great number now for meer neceſſity are Laymen, and fain to flie out of the Realm.

Injuries received in England by the Pope.

Benefices in England wickedly given away to Italians.

And now to the intent more fully to certifie you of the truth, ye ſhall underſtand that the ſaid Italians and ſtrangers receiving of yearly rents out of England not ſo little as threeſcore thouſand Marks, by year, beſides other Avails and Exciſes deducted, do reap in the ſaid our Kingdom of England more emolluments of meer rents, than doth the King himſelf being both tutor of the Church, and governour of the Land.

Threeſcore thouſand Marks yearly given to Italians out of the Church of England.

Furthermore, whereas at the firſt Creation of your Papacy we were in good hope and yet are, that by means of your Fatherly goodneſs we ſhould enjoy our Franchiſes, and free Collation of our Benifices and Donatives, to be reduced again to the former ſtate, now cometh another grievance which we cannot but ſignifie unto you, preſſing us above meaſure, which we receive by M. Martin; who entring late into our Land without leave of our King, with greater power than ever was ſeen before in any Legate, although he beareth not the ſtate and ſhew of a Legate, yet he hath doubled the doings of a Legate, charging us every day with new Mandates, and ſo moſt extreamly hath oppreſſed us: firſt, in beſtowing and giving away our Benefices, if any were above thirty Marks, as ſoon as they were vacant, to Italian perſons.

Italians received more in this Land of meer rents, than did the Kings Crown is.

Deteſtable dealings of the Popes Legate in England.

Secondly, after the deceaſe of the ſaid Italians, unknowing to the Patrons, he hath intruded other Italians therein, whereby the true Patrons have been ſpoiled and defrauded of their right.

Thirdly,

KING Hen. 3

Thirdly, The ſaid M. Martinus, yet alſo ceaſeth not to aſſign and confer ſuch Benefices ſtill unto the like Perſons; and ſome he reſerveth to the Donation of the Apoſtolical See; and extorteth moreover from Religious Houſes immoderate Penſions; Excommunicating and Interdicting whoſoever dare gain-ſtand him.

Complaint of M. Martin the Popes Legate.

Wherefore, foraſmuch as the ſaid M. Martin hath ſo far extended his Juriſdiction, to the great perturbation of the whole Realm, and no leſs derogation to our Kings Privilege, to whom it hath been fully Granted by the See Apoſtolick, that no Legate ſhould have to do in his Land, but ſuch as he by ſpecial Letters did ſend for: with moſt humble Devotion we beſeech you, That as a good Father will always be ready to ſupport his Child, ſo your Fatherhood will reach forth your hand of compaſſion to relieve us your humble Children from theſe grievous Oppreſſions.

King Henry the third uſed every day to hear three Maſſes by note.

And although our Lord and King, being a Catholick Prince, and wholly given to his Devotions and Service of Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, ſo that he reſpecteth not the health of his own Body, will fear and reverence the See Apoſtolick, and, as a Devout Son of the Church of Rome, deſireth nothing more than to advance the Eſtate and Honour of the ſame: yet we which travel in his Affairs, bearing the heat and burden of the day, and whoſe duty, together with him, is to tender the preſervation of the publick Wealth, neither can patiently ſuffer ſuch Oppreſſions, ſo deteſtable to God and man, and grievances intolerable, neither by Gods Grace will ſuffer them, through the means of your godly remedy, which we well hope and truſt of you ſpeedily to obtain. And thus may it pleaſe your Fatherhood, we beſeech you to accept this our Supplication, who in ſo doing ſhall worthily deſerve of all the Lords and Nobles, with the whole Commonalty of the Realm of England, condigne and ſpecial thanks accordingly. An. 1245. Ex Mat. Pariſ. Fol. 388.

The ſtout words of the Lords to the Pope.

The Supplication of the Engliſh Nation took no place with the Pope.

This Supplication being ſent by the hands of Sir R. Bigot, Knight, and W. de Powick, Eſq; Henry de la Mare, with other Knights and Gentlemen, after it was there opened and read, Pope Innocent, firſt keeping ſilence, deferred to make anſwer thereunto, making haſt to proceed in his deteſtable Excommunication and Curſe againſt the good Emperor Frederick. The which Curſe being done, and the Engliſh Ambaſſadors waiting ſtill for their anſwer; the Pope told them flat they ſhould not have their requeſt fulfilled. Whereat the Engliſh-men, departing in great anger, Sware with terrible Oaths, That they would never more ſuffer any Tribute, or Fruits of any Benefices, namely, whereof the Noble men were Patrons, to be paied to that inſatiable and greedy Court of Rome, worthy to be deteſted in all Words. Ex. Mat. Pariſ. fol. 193.

The Engliſh Ambaſſadors grieved with the Pope.

The Pope in an anger with England.

The Biſhops of England ſet their Seals to the Popes Tribute.

The Pope hearing theſe words, albeit making then no Anſwer, thought to watch his time, and did. Firſt, incontinent upon the ſame, during the ſaid Council, he cauſed every Biſhop of England to put his Hand and Seal to the Obligation made by King John for the Popes Tribute, as is above ſpecified; Threatning moreover, and ſaying, That if he had once brought down the Emperor Frederick, he would bridle the inſolent Pride of England well enough.

¶ But here by occaſion of this Council at Lions, that the Reader may ſee upon what ſlippery uncertainty and variableneſs the ſtate of the King did depend; it is material here to interlace the form of a Letter ſent by Henry the third to the Prelates of his Land, before they were tranſported over Sea to Lions; wherein may be gathered, that the King doubted they would be ſhoving and heaving at his Royalty; and therefore directed theſe Letters unto them, otherwiſe to prepare their affections: the tenor whereof followeth:

A Letter of charge to the Prelates of England, purpoſed to Aſſemble in the Council at Lions, that they ſhould ordain nothing, &c. to their Kings prejudice.

Paris. Lond.

REX Archiepiſcopis, Epiſcopis, & omnibus aliis Prælatis terræ ſuæ Angliæ, conventuris ad concilium Lugdunenſe, ſalutem. Vinculo juramenti nobis (ut noſtis) adſtricti, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

The King to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and to all other Prelates of his Land of England, appointed to meet at a Council at Lions, Greeting: You are (as you know) bound unto us by Oath, whereby you ought to keep all the fealty that you can unto us in all things, concerning our Royal Dignity and Crown. Wherefore we command you upon the fealty and allegiance wherein you are firmly bound unto us, injoyning that you do your uttermoſt endeavour, as well to get as to keep, and alſo to defend the right of us and our Kingdom. And that neither to the prejudice of us, or of the ſame Kingdom, nor yet againſt us or our rights, which our predeceſſors and we by ancient and approved cuſtom have uſed, you preſume to procure or attempt any thing in your Council at Lions: nor that you give aſſent to any that ſhall procure or ordain ought in this caſe, upon your Oath aforeſaid, and the loſs of your Temporalities, which you hold of us. Wherefore in this behalf ſo behave your ſelves, that for your good dealing and vertue of thankfulneſs, we may rather ſpecially commend you, than for the contrary by you attempted (which God forbid) we reprove your unthankfulneſs, and reſerve vengeance for you in due time. Witneſs my ſelf, &c. the nine and twentieth year of our Reign.

¶ In like ſort wrote he to the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, &c. of Ireland and Gaſcoigne.

Anno 1246

After this Council ended, in the beginning of the next year following, Anno 1246, Pope Innocent came to Cluniack, where was then appointed a ſecret meeting or colloquie between the Pope and Lewis the French King (who was then preparing his Voyage to Jeruſalem) in which colloquie the Pope ſought all means to perſwade the French King, in revengement of his injury, to War Contra regulum, (as he termed him) that is, againſt the weak and feeble King of England, either to drive him utterly from his Kingdom, or elſe to damnify him, whereby he ſhould be conſtrained, whether he would or no, to ſtoop to the Popes will and obedience; wherein he alſo would aſſiſt him with all the Authority he could. Nevertheleſs, the French King to this would not agree. Firſt, for the conſanguinity that was between them (for their two Queens were Siſters.) Alſo for the Truce that they had taken. Thirdly for fear of the Emperor, leſt he ſhould take his part. Item, for that it could not be without the much ſpilling of Chriſtian blood. And laſtly, becauſe he was preparing his Voyage to the Holy Land, where his coming was already looked for. And thus the French King, denying the Popes bloody requeſt, refuſed not only to enter War againſt the King and the Realm of England, but alſo ſhortly after concluded with him longer Truce, Anno 1246. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 196. b.

The Pope ſtirreth Lewis the French King to War againſt the King of England.

Lewis the French King refuſeth to War againſt England.

Straight upon the neck of this followed then the exaction of Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that he had bought of the Pope; which was to have the firſt years Fruits of all Benefices and Spiritual Livings in England for the ſpace of ſeven years together, until the Sum ſhould come to Ten thouſand Marks. Whereat the King firſt was greatly grieved. But in concluſion, he was fain at laſt to agree with the Archbiſhop; and ſo the mony was gathered. Pariſ. Fol. 197.

The firſt years Fruits for ſeven years gathered of all Benefices for the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Over and beſides all other exactions wherewith the Pope miſerably oppreſſed the Church of England, this alſo is not to be ſilenced, how the Pope, ſending down his Letters from the See Apoſtolick, charged and commanded the Prelates to find him ſome ten, ſome five, and ſome fifteen able men well furniſhed with Horſe and Harneſs for one whole year, to fight in the Popes Wars. And leſt the King ſhould have knowledge thereof, it was injoyned them under pain of Excommunication, that they ſhould reveal it to none, but to keep it in ſecret only to themſelves: Ex. Pariſienſi, Fol. 200.

The Prelates of England charged to find Horſe and Harneſs for the Popes War.

A ſubtil practice of the Pope.

The Pope yet notwithſtanding, partly being laboured by Suters, partly of his own mind thinking good ſomewhat to give to the King and People of England, as Fathers are wont to give ſomething to their Babes to play withal to keep them ſtill, ſent down this releaſement to the King, that hereafter whenſoever any of the Popes Nephews, or of his Cardinals were to be Beneficed in any Church of England, either he or the Cardinals ſhould firſt make the King privy thereto, and inſtantly crave his good will in obtaining the procuration, or elſe the ſame to ſtand in no effect, Pariſ. 202. Howbeit all this ſeemed to be done but of a policy, to get the Kings favour, whereby he might be ſuffered more freely to paſs with greater exactions, as afterward appeared.

The Popes ſlie laid for more money.

A new Law of the Pope to ſriſe upon all the goods of Clergy men that dye inteſtate.

For when the foreſaid Pope Innocent the fourth had knowledge at the ſame time of certain rich Clerks leaving great ſubſtance of money, which dyed inteſtate, as of one Robert Hailes, Archdeacon of Lincoln, which dyed leaving thouſands of Marks and much Plate behind him, all which, becauſe no Will was made, came to Temporal mens hands: alſo of M. Almarike, Archdeacon of Bedford, being found worth a great ſubſtance when he dyed; and likewiſe of another, M. John Hotoſp, Archdeacon of Northampton, who dyed ſuddenly inteſtate, leaving behind him five thouſand Marks, and thirty ſtanding pieces of Plate, with other infinite Jewels beſides: he ſent forth upon the ſame a Statute to be proclaimed in England, that whatſoever Eccleſiaſtical perſon henceforth ſhould deceaſe in England inteſtate, that is, without making his Will, all his goods ſhould redound to the Popes uſe. Pariſ. fol. 203.

A note of certain Eccleſiaſtical perſons dying in England worth great ſubſtance.

Furthermore, the Pope, not yet ſatisfied with all this, addreſſeth new Letters to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and to W. Biſhop of Norwich, for gathering up amongſt the Clergy, and Religious Houſes in England, ſix thouſand Marks to the behoof of the Holy Mother Church, without any excuſe or delay, by vertue of obedience. Which tallage being greatly grudged of the Clergy, when it came to the Kings ear, he eftſoons directeth contrary Letters to all the Prelates and every one of them, commanding them upon forfeiting their Temporalities to the King, that no ſuch Subſidy-money ſhould be gathered or tranſported out of the Realm. But the Pope again hearing hereof, in great anger writeth to the Prelates of England, that this collection of money, upon pain of Excommunication and ſuſpenſion, ſhould be provided, and brought to the new Temple in London, by the Feaſt of the Aſſumption next enſuing.

Six thouſand marks to be gathered of the Clergy of England for the Pope.

The King beginneth to withſtand the Pope, but durſt not hold out.

The Pope in a chafe.

And furthermore, forſomuch as he perceived the King to go about to gainſtand his proceedings, taking thereat great diſdain, he was about the ſame time to interdict the whole Land. To whom then one of his Cardinals called Johan. Anglicus, an Engliſh-man born, ſpeaking for the Realm of England, deſired his Fatherhood for Gods cauſe to mitigate his moody ire, and with the bridle of temperanee to aſſwage the paſſion of his mind: which (ſaid he) to tell you plain, is here ſtirred up too much without cauſe. Your Fatherhood (quoth he) may conſider that theſe days be evil. Firſt, the Holy Land lyeth in great perils to be loſt. All the Greek Church is departed from us. Frederick the Emperor is againſt us, the mightieſt Prince this day in all Chriſtendom. Both you and we which are the Peers of the Church, are baniſhed from the Papal See, thruſt out of Rome, yea, excluded out of all Italy. Hungary, with all Coaſts bordering about it, looketh for nothing but utter ſubverſion by the Tartarians. Germany is waſted and afflicted with inward Wars and tumults. Spain is fierce and cruel againſt us, even to the cutting out of the Biſhops Tongues. France by us is ſo impoveriſhed, that it is brought to beggery, which alſo conſpireth againſt us. Miſerable England being ſo often plagued by our manifold injuries, even much like to Balaams Aſs, beaten and bounſt with ſpurs and ſtaves, beginneth at length to ſpeak and complain of her intolerable griefs and burthens, being ſo wearied and damnified, that ſhe may ſeem paſt all recovery; and we after the manner of Iſmael, hating of Men, provoke all Men to hate us, &c. Ex Pariſienſi, fol. 207.

The words Johannes Anglicus Cardinal to the Pope.

The miſerable troubles of Chriſtendom.

Of Spain he meaneth, becauſe the King of Aragon a little before had cut off the tongue of a certain Biſhop that did reprehend him.

Pariſ. fol. 207.

For all theſe words of Johannes Anglicus his Cardinal, the Popes Cholerick Paſſion could not yet be appeaſed, but forthwith he ſendeth commandment with full authority to the Biſhop of Worceſter, That in caſe the King would not ſpeedily ſurceaſe his Rebellion againſt his Apoſtolical proceedings, he would interdict his Land. So that in concluſion, the King, for all his ſtout enterpriſe, was fain to relent at laſt, and the Pope had his money, Anno. 1246. Ex Pariſienſi. fol. 204.

Power given to the Biſhop of Worceſter to interdict the Land

The King fain to relent to the Pope.

Ye heard before of the Greek Churches, under the Empire of Conſtantinople, how they ſequeſtred themſelves from the company of the Romiſh Church. Inſomuch that Germanus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and the Archbiſhop of Antioch did Excommunicate the Biſhop of Rome. And after the ſaid Germanus another Biſhop of Conſtantinople, at the Council of Lions, proteſted, That whereas before were thirty Suffragans belonging to that Province, now there were not three that held with the Church of Rome. And this breach, albeit it chiefly braſt out in the time of Pope Gregory the ninth, Anno. 1230. to open War and bloodſhed, yet the ſame had begun, and ſo continued long before in ſuch ſort as in the time of Pope Innocent the third, if any Prieſt had ſaid Maſs in their Churches, they would waſh the Altar afterwards; as appeareth by the Acts of the Lateran Council, Capit. 4. Wherefore Pope Innocent now (as his other predeceſſors had done before) bearing an old grudge againſt thoſe Churches of the Greeks, and neither willing by Conference to try with them, nor able by Learning to match with them, thought by force of Arms to ſubdue them, and ſent the Provincial of the Gray-Friers, with other Aſſociates of the ſame Order, into England with his Precept Authentical, containing in it theſe Articles.

Of this diviſion read before.

KING Hen. 3

The Grecians uſed to waſh their Altars, if any Latin Maſs had been ſaid upon them. Ex ill. concil. Lateranenſi, &c.

1. FIrſt, That the ſaid Provincial, or his Friers, ſhould inquire upon all Uſurers being alive; and of all ſuch evil gotten goods, gained per uſurariam pravitatem, ſhould make attachment for the uſe and preparation for this War againſt the Greeks, Excommunicating all them by diſtrict cenſures of the Church that repugned againſt it.

Goods gotten by Uſury, attached for the Pope.

Excommunication abuſed.

2. That all they which took the badge of the Croſs, for the recovery of the ſaid Empire of the Greeks, or with Goods and Cattel would help ſufficiently unto the ſame, ſhould be abſolved of all their ſins.

Falſe Abſolution of ſins.

3. Item, That all the goods left in the Teſtaments of them that were departed, being gotten by Uſury, ſhould be taken up to the Subſidy of the Empire aforeſaid, and whoſoever repugned againſt the ſame, ſhould be Excommunicated.

Uſuraria pravitas.

4. Item, That ſuch goods as in the Teſtaments of the dead were left, or which ſhould be left three next years to come, for reſtitution of ſuch goods as the dead had evil gotten, they ſhould take up for the Subſidy of the Empire aforeſaid, Excommunicating, &c.

Goods left in dead Mens Wills for reſtitution, converted to the Pope.

5. Item, Such goods as were left to be diſtributed in godly uſes, after the arbitriment of Executors, by the Wills of the dead, or were not in their Wills deputed to any certain places or perſons named, nor yet were beſtowed by the ſaid Executors to the foreſaid uſes, they ſhould collect to the uſe and Subſidy aforeſaid, and give Certificate to the See Apoſtolick of the quantity thereof, Excommunicating all repugners and rebellers againſt the ſame.

Goods bequeathed in dead Mens Wills converted to a War againſt the Grecians

6. Item, That they ſhould diligently inquire of ſuch Mens goods evilly gotten or evilly come by, as were alive, and them they ſhould attach for the Subſidy aforeſaid, in caſe the party, which ought to be ſatisfied for thoſe goods evilly gotten, could not be found, giving Certificate thereof, and Excommunicating, &c.

Goods ill gotten given to the Pope.

7. Item, That the ſaid Provincial, or his Friers, ſhould have full power to abſolve thoſe that were Excommunicated, which wittingly had done any fraud touching the Collection aforeſaid, ſo that the ſaid perſons did make due ſatisfaction to the deputies aforeſaid, Ex Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 205.

Abſolution for money.

What Man having eyes is ſo blind which ſeeth not theſe execrable dealings of the Pope to be ſuch, as would cauſe any Nation in the world to do as the wiſe Grecians did, and perpetually to abrenounce the Pope, and well to conſider the uſurped authority of that See not to be of God? But ſuch was the rude dulneſs then of miſerable England, for lack of learning and godly knowledge, that they feeling what burthens were laid upon them, yet would play ſtill the Aſs of Balaam, or elſe the Horſe of Eſop, which receiving the bridle once in his mouth, could afterward neither abide his own miſery, nor yet recover liberty. And ſo it fared with England under the Popes thraldom: as partly by theſe ſtories above hath been declared, partly by other in like caſe following is to be ſeen.

For ſo it followeth in the Hiſtory of the ſaid Mat. Pariſ. how the Pope taking more courage by his former abuſed boldneſs, and perceiving what a tame Aſs he had to ride upon, ceaſed not thus, but directed a new Precept the ſame year,

An unreaſonable exaction of the Pope.

KING Hen. 3 year, 1246. to the Prelates of England, commanding by the Authority Apoſtolick, That all Beneficed Men in the Realm of England, which were reſident upon their Benefices, ſhould yield to the Pope the third part of their goods, and they which were not reſident ſhould give the one half of their goods, and that for the ſpace of three years together; with terrible comminations to all them that did reſiſt: and ever with this clauſe withal, Non obſtante, which was like a Key that opened all Locks. Which ſum caſt together, was found to amount to 60000 pounds; which ſum of mony could ſcarce be found in all England to pay for King Richards Ranſom, Pariſ. fol. 207. The execution of this Precept was committed to the Biſhop of London, who conferring about the matter with his Brethren in the Church of Pauls, as they were buſily conſulting together, and bewailing the importable burthen of this contribution, which was impoſſible for them to ſuſtain, ſuddenly cometh in certain Meſſengers from the King, Sir John Lexinton Knight, and M. Lawrence Martin the Kings Chaplain, ſtraitly in the Kings name forbidding them in any caſe to conſent to this contribution, which ſhould be greatly to the prejudice and deſolation of the whole Realm, Pariſ. fol. 207.

Non obſtante

Threeſcore thouſand pound exacted of the Clergy to be paid to the Pope.

This being done, about the firſt day of December in the year above ſaid, ſhortly after in the beginning of the year 1247. about February the King called a Parliament, where by common advice it was agreed, That certain Ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Rome, to make manifeſt to the Court of Rome the exceeding grievances of the Realm, delivering moreover theſe Letters to the Pope in the name both of the Temporalty and alſo of the Clergy, as here followeth.

A Parliament.

Another Letter ſent to Pope Innocent the fourth, in the names of the whole Clergy and Commonalty of England, Anno 1247.

A Letter ſent to the Pope in the name of all the Eſtates and Commonalty of the Realm.

SAnctiſſimo Patri in Chriſto, ac Domino Innocentio, Dei providentia ſummo Pontifici; univerſitas cleri & populi per Provintiam Cant. conſtituti devota pedum oſcula beatorum. Cum Anglicana Eccleſia, &c. To the moſt holy Father in Chriſt, and Lord Innocent, by Gods Providence Chief Biſhop; the whole Commonalty both of the Clergy and Laity within the Province of Canterbury ſendeth devout kiſſings of his bleſſed feet. Like as the Church of England, ſince it hath firſt received the Catholick Faith, hath always ſhewed her ſelf faithful and devout in adhering to God, and to our Holy Mother the Church of Rome, ſtudying with all kind of ſervice to pleaſe and to ſerve the ſame, and thinking never otherwiſe to do, but rather to continue and increaſe as ſhe hath begun: even ſo now the ſame Church, moſt humbly proſtrate before the feet of your Holineſs, intirely beſeecheth your Clemency to accept her petition, in ſparing this impoſition of money, which ſo manifold ways for the ſubvertion of other Nations, by the commandment of your Holineſs, is laid upon us: conſidering that not only it is importable, but alſo impoſſible which is injoyned us. For although our Country ſometimes yieldeth forth fruit for the neceſſary ſuſtentation of the inhabitants, yet it bringeth forth neither gold nor ſilver, neither were able to bring forth of long time ſo much as now adays is required. Which alſo being burdened and overcharged of late days with another ſuch like impoſition, but not ſo great as this, is not able any whit to anſwer unto that which is exacted.

More Gold given in giving to the Church ſo much.

Furthermore, beſides this commandment of your Holineſs, there is required of the Clergy a ſubſidy for our temporal King, whoſe neceſſities neither poſſibly we can, nor honeſtly we ought to forſake, whereby he may both withſtand the Invaſion of the Enemy, and maintain the right of his patrimony, and alſo recover again that hath been loſt. In conſideration whereof, we have directed the bearers hereof to the preſence of your Holineſs with our humble ſupplication, to explain to you the dangers and inconveniencies which are like to inſue upon the premiſſes, which by no means we are able to ſuſtain, although notwithſtanding we know our ſelves by all bonds of Charity to be obliged to your devotion and obedience. And becauſe our general Community hath no Seal proper, we have ſigned therefore theſe preſents with the publick Seal of the City of London, &c. Ex Pariſienſi, fol. 209.

The like Letters were ſent alſo unto the Cardinals to the ſame effect. The Pope underſtanding theſe things, and perceiving that there was no thriving againſt ſuch a general conſent, and yet loth to forgo his ſweet harveſt, which he was wont to reap in England, craftily deviſed to ſend this anſwer again unto the King, much like to the ſame which he ſent before, which was, That although the Pope in time paſt, upon his own will and pleaſure to the importable grievance of the Realm of England, hath every where, and without reſpect, through the whole land made his proviſions in giving their Benefices unto his Italians, yet now, the Lord be praiſed, that tempeſt, ſaid he, is overblown: ſo that hereafter, if the Pope ſhall grant his proviſion for any of his Nephews or of his Cardinals, they ſhall come firſt and make their inſtant ſuit unto the King, without all inforcement, ſo that it ſhall ſtand wholly in the Kings free arbitriment to do herein what he thinketh good, &c. Mat. Pariſ. fol. 209. b.

The Popes anſwer again to the King of England.

This anſwer of the Pope albeit it was but a ſubtil ſhift for the time, yet neither did he long ſtand to that he had thus promiſed to the King. For ſhortly after, and within few days upon the ſame, and in the time alſo of the ſaid Parliament holden at Wincheſter, the Pope ſent two Engliſh Friers into the Realm, whoſe names were John and Alexander, with full authority, after the largeſt ſort, for new contributions. Who firſt pretending lowly ſubmiſſion to the King, while they had leave granted to range about the Realm, afterward, coming to the Biſhops and rich Abbots, ſhewed themſelves forth in their full authority, in ſuch ſort as they became rather Tyrants than Extortioners.

The Pope falſe of his promiſe.

Note the ſubtil practices of the Pope to get money.

Among others, coming to Robert Biſhop of Lincoln, who of all other bare a ſpecial mind to the Order of Obſervants, theſe two Friers as proud as Lucifer, bringing forth the terrible Mandate with the Popes Bulls, required and eke commanded under the Popes mighty Curſe, to have the gathering in his Dioceſs of ſix thouſand marks. Likewiſe of the Abbot of Saint Albans they required four hundred marks, under great penalty, and that in ſhort time to be paid.

The Biſhop, although well liking before that Order of thoſe Friers, yet ſeeing the impudent behaviour, and more impudent requeſt of thoſe Merchants, thus anſwered to them again, That this exaction (ſaving, ſaith he, the Popes authority) was never heard of before, and neither was honeſt, nor yet poſſible to be performed; and moreover, was ſuch as did not only concern him, but the whole publick ſtate of the Clergy, and of the whole Realm in general; and therefore it ſhould be abſurdly and raſhly done of him to give them anſwer herein, before the King and the reſt of the Council, with others to whom the matter generally did appertain, were made privy thereunto, &c. and ſo for that time he ſhook them off, Pariſ. fol. 210.

The Biſhop of Lincolne anſwer to the Friers the Popes Meſſengers.

Furthermore, as touching the Abbot of S. Albans, when he alſo alledged the ſame cauſes, he pretended moreover that he would appeal, and ſo did, to the Pope and his Cardinals. Whereupon immediately was ſent down from Pope Innocent another Legate called Johannes Anglicus, an Engliſh Frier and Cardinal, who, bringing down a new ſpecial precept to the foreſaid Abbot, cited him either to appear at London the morrow after S. Giles day, or to diſburſe to the uſe of the Pope the foreſaid four hundred marks. By reaſon whereof the Abbot was driven to ſend his Proctors again, with a new ſupplication, to the Pope at Lions; who in the end, through great inſtance of moneyed friends, agreed with the Abbot for two hundred marks, beſides his other charges born, and ſo was that matter compounded little to the Abbots profit, Pariſ. fol. 213.

The Abbot of S. Albans maketh great ſute to the Pope for the 400 marks that he ſhould pay.

This Johannes Anglicus was the more fierce againſt the Abbot, becauſe he received him not with ſuch reverence as he thought meet for the Popes Legate.

To recite all damages and grievances received by the Biſhop of Rome in this Realm of England, neither is any Hiſtory ſufficiently able to comprehend, nor if it were, unneth is there any that would believe it. Notwithſtanding to thoſe above declared, this own I thought to commit likewiſe to memory, to the intent that they which now live in this age may behold and wonder in themſelves to ſee into what miſerable ſlavery, paſſing all meaſure, not only the Subjects, but Kings alſo of this Realm were brought under the intolerable yoke of the Popes tyranny, which in thoſe days neither durſt any Man caſt off, nor yet was able to abide. As by this example inſuing, with infinite others like to the ſame may appear.

Example how this Realm of England was oppreſſed miſerably by the Pope.

In the year of our Lord 1248. after that Pope Innocent the fourth had taken ſuch order in the Realm, that all Prelates of the Church were ſuſpended from collation of any Benefice, before the Popes Kinſfolks and Clerks of Italy had been firſt provided for; it happned upon the ſame, that the Abbot of Abington had a commandment from the Pope, to beſtow ſome Benefice of his Church in all haſte to a certain Prieſt of Rome, which the Abbot, as an obedient Child unto his Father the Pope, was preſt and ready to accompliſh accordingly. But the Roman Prieſt, not contented with ſuch as fell next hand, would tarry his time, to have ſuch as were principal and for his own appetite, having a ſpecial eye to the Benefice of the Church of S. Helen in Abington, which was then eſteemed worth an hundred marks by year, beſides other vales and commodities belonging to the ſame: the Collation whereof the Prieſt required by the authority Apoſtolical to be granted unto him.

As this paſt on, it chanced at laſt the Incumbent to dye and the Benefice to be empty. Which eſtſoons being known, the ſame day cometh à commandment, with great charge from the King to the Abbot, to give the Benefice to one Aethelmare the Kings Brother by the Mothers ſide, who at the ſame time was poſſeſſed with ſo many Benefices, as the number and value thereof was unknown. The Abbot here being in great perplexity, and not knowing what to do, whether to gratifie his King or to obey the Pope, took counſel with his friends: who, well adviſing of the matter, gave him counſel to prefer the Brother of his Prince and Patron, ſo that the King would undertake to ſtand in his defence againſt the Pope, rather than the Romiſh Prieſt, whom always he ſhould have lying there as a ſpie and watcher of him, and like a thorne ever in his eye: and ſo the King aſſuring the Abbot of his undoubted protection, and indemnity againſt all harms, the Benefice was conferred forthwith to the Kings Brother.

The Roman Prieſt, not a little grieved thereat, ſpeedeth himſelf in all haſte to the Biſhop of Rome, certifying him what was done, and partly alſo (as the manner is of Men) making it worſe than it was. Upon whoſe complaint the Pope eſtſoons in great anger cited up the Abbot perſonally to appear before him, to anſwer to the crime of diſobedience. The Abbot truſting upon the Kings promiſe and protection (which neither could help him in that caſe, niether durſt oppoſe himſelf againſt the Pope) being both aged and ſickly, was driven to travel up to the Court of Rome, in great heavineſs and bitterneſs of mind. Where in concluſion, after much vexation and bitter rebukes, beſides great expences, he was fain to ſatiſfie the Pope after his own will, compounding to give him yearly fifty marks in part of making him amends for his treſpaſs of diſobedience, Ex Matt. Pariſ. fol. 222.

The Abbot of Abington cited to appear before the Pope.

The Abbot of Abington condemned in 50 marks for denying of an Engliſh Benefice to an Italian the Popes Nephew.

To this alſo may be added another like fact of the Pope, as outragious as this, againſt the Houſe of Binham. For when the Benefice of Weſtle in the Dioceſs of Ely was void by the death of the Incumbent, who was an Italian and one of the Popes Chamber, the Donation of which Benefice belonged to the Priory of Binham; another Italian which was a Baſtard and unlearned, born in the City of Genoa, called Heriggetto de Malchano de Valta, brought down the Popes Letters to M. Berardo de Nympha, the Popes Agent here in England, with ſtrict charge and full authority, commanding him to ſee the ſaid Benefice to be conferred in any caſe to Heriggetto. Yea, and though the Benefice had been given already, yet notwithſtanding the poſſeſſor thereof ſhould be diſplaced, and the ſaid Heriggetto preferred: Yea alſo Non obſtante, that the ſaid Pope himſelf had before given his grant to the King and Realm of England, That one Italian ſhould not ſucceed another in any Benefice there; yet for all that the ſaid Heriggetto upon pain of Excommunication to be placed therein, Ex Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 240.

A deteſtable extortion of the Pope uſed againſt the Priory of Binham.

And thus much hitherto of theſe matters, through the occaſion of the Eaſt Churches and the Grecians, to the intent all Men that read theſe Stories, and ſee the doings of this Weſtern Biſhop, may conſider what juſt cauſe theſe Grecians had to ſeclude themſelves from his ſubjection, and Communion. For what Chriſtian Communion is to be joyned with him which ſo contrary to Chriſt and his Goſpel ſeeketh for worldly Dominion, ſo cruelly perſecuteth his Brethren, ſo given to avarice, ſo greedy in getting, ſo injurious in oppreſſing, ſo inſatiable in his exactions, ſo malicious in revenging, ſtirring up Wars, depriving Kings, depoſing Emperors, playing Rex in the Church of Chriſt, ſo erronious in Doctrine, ſo abominably abuſing Excommunication, ſo falſe of promiſe, ſo corrupt in life, ſo void of Gods fear: and briefly, ſo far from all the parts of a true Evangelical Biſhop? For what ſeemeth he to care for the ſouls of Men, which ſetteth in Benefices Boys and outlandiſh Italians: and further, one Italian to ſucceed another, which neither did know the language of the flock, nor once would abide to ſee their faces? And who can blame the Grecians then for diſſevering themſelves from ſuch an oppreſſor and giant againſt Chriſt?

The miſeries that have riſen in England through ſubjection under the Church of Rome.

England plagued by the Pope when it needed not.

Whoſe wiſe example if this Realm had then followed, as they might, certes our predeceſſors had been rid of an infinite number of troubles, injuries, oppreſſions, wars, commotions, great travels and charges, beſides the ſaving of innumerable thouſands of pounds, which the ſaid Biſhop full falſly had raked and tranſported out of this Realm of ours. But not to exceed the bounds of my Hiſtory, becauſe my purpoſe is not to ſtand upon declamations, nor to dilate common places, I will paſs this over, leaving the judgment thereof to the further examination of the Reader. For elſe if I liſted to proſecute this Argument ſo far as matter would lead me, and truth peradventure would require me to ſay, I durſt not only ſay, but could well prove the Pope and Court of Rome to be the only fountain and principal cauſe, I ſay not only of much miſery here in England, but of all the publick calamities and notorious miſchiefs which have happned theſe many years through all theſe Weſt parts of Chriſtendom, and eſpecially of all the lamentable ruine of the Church, which not only we, but the Grecians alſo this day do ſuffer by the Turks and Saracens. As whoſoever well conſidereth by reading of Hiſtories the courſe of times, and vieweth withal the doings and acts paſſed by the ſaid Biſhop of Rome, together with the blind leading of his Doctrine, ſhall ſee good cauſe not only to think, but alſo to witneſs the ſame. Only one Narration touching this Argument, and yet not tranſgreſſing the Office of my Hiſtory, I mind (the Lord willing) to ſet before the Readers eyes, which happned even about this preſent time of this King Henry's Reign, in the year of our Lord, 1244.

The Pope and Court of Rome the principal cauſe of all the publick calamities through Chriſtendom.

In the which year it chanced, that Lewis the French King, Son to Queen Blanch, fell very ſore ſick, lying in a ſwound or in a trance for certain days, in ſuch ſort as few thought he would have lived, and ſome ſaid he was gone already. Among others, there was with him his Mother, who ſorrowing bitterly for her Son, and given ſomewhat (as commonly the manner of Women is) to ſuperſtition, went and brought forth a piece of the Holy Croſs, with the Crown and the Spear; which piece of the Holy Croſs Baldwinus Emperor of Conſtantinople (whom the Grecians had depoſed a little before for holding with the Biſhop of Rome) had ſold unto the French King for a great ſum of money, and bleſſing him with the ſame, alſo laid the Crown and the Spear to his body, making a Vow withal in the perſon of her Son, That if the Lord would viſit him with health, and releaſe him of that infirmity, he ſhould be croſſed or marked with the Croſs, to viſit his Sepulchre, and there ſolemnly to render thanks in the Land which he had ſanctified with his blood. Thus as ſhe, with the Biſhop of Paris, and others there preſent were praying, behold the King, which was ſuppoſed of ſome to be dead, began with a ſigh to pluck to his arms and legs, and ſo ſtretching himſelf began to ſpeak, giving thanks to God, who from on high had viſited him, and called him from the danger of death. Which as the Kings Mother with others there took to be a great miracle wrought by the vertue of the Holy Croſs: ſo the King amending more and more, as ſoon as he was well recovered, received ſolemnly the badge of the Croſs, vowing for a Freewill Sacrifice unto God, that he, if the Counſel of his Realm would ſuffer him, would in his own perſon viſit the Holy Land: forgetting belike the rule of true Chriſtianity, where Chriſt teacheth us otherwiſe in the Goſpel,

KING Hen. 3

Goſpel, ſaying, That neither in this Mount nor in Samaria, nor at Jeruſalem the Lord will be worſhipped, but ſeeketh true worſhippers, which ſhall worſhip him in truth and verity, &c. An. 1244. Pariſienſi, fol. 182.

The French King croſſed to go to the Holy Land. Great preparation in France toward that Voyage.

After this was great preparation and much ado in France toward the ſetting forth to the Holy Land. For after the King firſt began to be croſſed, the moſt part of the Nobles of France, with divers Archbiſhops and Biſhops, with Earls, and Barons, and Gentlemen to a mighty number, received alſo the Croſs upon their Sleeves. Amongſt whom was the Earl Atrebacenſis the Kings Brother, the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Brabant, the Counteſs of Flanders with her two Sons, the Earl of Britain with his Son, the Earl of Barenſis, Earl of Sweſſon, Earl of St. Paul, Earl of Druis, Earl of Retel, with many Noble perſons more. Neither lacked here whatſoever the Pope could do, to ſet forward this holy buſineſs, in ſending his Legates and Friers into France, to ſtir the People to follow the King, and to contribute to his journey. Whereupon it was granted to the King, to gather of the Univerſal Church of France, by the Popes Authority, the tenth part of all their Goods for three years ſpace together, upon this condition, that the King likewiſe would grant to the Pope the twentieth part for ſo many years after, to be gathered of the ſaid Church of France. Which was agreed, An. 1246. Ex Matt. Pariſienſi, fol. 204. b.

ANNO 1247

Shortly after this, in the year of our Lord one thouſand two hundred forty and ſeven, followed a Parliament in France, where the King with his Nobles being preſent, there was declared how the King of Tartarians or Turks, hearing of the Voyage of the French King, writeth a Letter to him, requiring that he will become his ſubject. In the which Parliament the time was prefixed for taking their journey, which ſhould be after the Feaſt of St. John Baptiſt the very next year enſuing. Alſo they that were croſſed were ſworn to perſiſt in their purpoſe, and ſentence of the Popes great Curſe denounced to all them that went from the ſame: Matth. Pariſ. Fol. 211. Furthermore, for the better ſpeed in his journey, the King through all his Realm cauſed it to be Proclaimed, That if any Merchant or other had been injured at any time by the Kings Exactors, either by oppreſſion, or borrowing of Mony, let him bring forth his Bill, ſhewing how or wherein, and he ſhould be recompenced. At which time William Longſpath a worthy Warrier, with the Biſhop of Worceſter and certain other great men in the Realm of England, moved with the example of the French men, prepared themſelves likewiſe to the ſame journey.

The time of the King's Voyage appointed.

The French King ready to recompence all injuries done to his Subjects. William Longſpath with other Noble Engliſh-men prepared to the ſame Voyage.

Perſwaſions given to the French King to turn his Voyage.

The next year after this inſuing, which was 1248, the French King yet ſtill remaining in his purpoſed journey, Lady Blanch his Mother, alſo the Biſhop of Paris his Brother, with the Lords of his Council, and other Nobles, and his ſpecial Friends, advertiſed him with great perſwaſions to alter his mind, touching that ſo adventurous and ſo dangerous a journey, for that his Vow (ſaid they) was unadviſedly made, and in time of his ſickneſs, when his mind was not perfectly ſtabliſhed: and what jeopardies might happen at home it was uncertain; the King of England being on the one ſide, the Emperor on the other ſide, and the Pictavians in the midſt, ſo fugitive and unſtable: and as concerning his Vow, the Pope ſhould friendly diſpence with him, conſidering the neceſſity of his Realm, and weakneſs of his Body. Beſides all this, his Mother upon her bleſſing required him, his Brethren of all love deſired him to ſtay at home, and not in his Perſon to adventure; others might be ſent in his room, with no leſs Furniture to atchieve that Enterprize, and to diſcharge him of his Vow, eſpecially ſeeing at the making thereof his Senſes were feeble, his Body weak, and Reaſon, through ſickneſs and very death almoſt decaied.

The Kings Anſwer to his Lords saying downe and taking up his Croſs again.

ANNO 1248

To whom the King again, Forſomuch (ſaid he) as you ſay, that for feebleneſs of my Senſes I took this Vow upon me: Io therefore as you here will me, I lay down the Croſs that I took. And putting his hand to his Shoulder, he tare off the Badges of the Croſs, ſaying to the Biſhop, Here I reſign to you the Croſs wherewith I was ſigned. At the ſight whereof there was no ſmall rejoycing of all that were there preſent. To whom the King then, both altering his Countenance and his Speech, thus ſpake: My Friends (ſaid he) whatſoever I was then in my ſickneſs, now I thank God I am of perfect Senſe, and Reaſon ſound, and now I require my Croſs again to be reſtored unto me: ſaying moreover, That no Bread ſhould come in his Head, before he were Recognized again with the ſame Croſs, as he was before. At the hearing whereof all there preſent were attonied, ſuppoſing that God had ſome great matter to work, and ſo moved no more Queſtions unto him.

The French King ſetteth forth on his journey.

Upon this drew nigh the Feaſt of John Baptiſt, which was the time ſet for the ſetting forth. And now being in a readineſs, the King in few days after was entring his journey: but yet one thing lacked. For the King, perceiving the mortal variance between the Pope and good Frederick the Emperor, thought beſt firſt before his going to have that matter appeaſed, whereby his way both might be ſafer through the Emperors Countries, and alſo leſs jeopardy at home after his departure; and therefore upon the ſame, he took firſt his way to Lions, where the Pope was, partly to take his leave; but moſt eſpecially to make reconcilement between the Emperor and the Pope.

The French King deſireth to reconcile the Pope and the Emperor.

The Emperor Frederick purgeth himſelf to the Pope and Council.

Where is to be noted by the way, That as touching the good Emperor there was no let nor ſtay. Who rather ſought all means how to compaſs the Popes favour, and never could obtain it: inſomuch that before he ſhould be Excommunicated in the Council of Lions, he not only anſwered ſufficiently by Thadeus his Atturney, diſcharging himſelf againſt whatſoever Crimes or Objections could be brought againſt him; but ſo far humbled himſelf to the Pope and the Council, that for all detriments, damages, loſſes, or wrongs done of his part, what amends ſoever the Pope could or would require, he would recompence it to the uttermoſt. This would not be taken.

The ſubmiſſion of the Emperor.

The worthy offer of the noble Emperor.

Furthermore, if the Pope (he ſaid) could not abide his tarrying in his own Dominions and Empire, he would go fight againſt the Saracens and Turks, never to return into Europe again, offering there to recover the Lands and Kingdoms whatſoever did at any time belong to Chriſtendom, ſo that the Pope only would be contented that Henry his Son (which was then Nephew to King Henry here in England) ſhould be Emperor after him. Neither could this be admitted.

The Emperor offereth to put in the French King and King of England to be his Sureties.

Then he offered for truth of his Promiſe, to put in the French King and the King of England to be his Sureties, or elſe for trial of his cauſe to ſtand to their Award and Arbitrement. Neither would that be granted.

The Emperor deſireth to Anſwer for himſelf in the Council.

At laſt he deſired, that he might come himſelf and anſwer before the Council. But the proud Pope in no caſe would abide that, ſaying, That he did not yet find himſelf ſo ready and meet for Martyrdom, to have him to come thither to the Council; for if he did, he would depart himſelf, &c. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, Fol. 187.

The beginning of the Turks Victories over Chriſtendom.

This obſtinate rancor and diveliſh malice of Pope Innocent and his predeceſſor, againſt that valiant Emperor, and againſt the Grecians, what diſturbance and miſchief it wrought to the whole Church, what ſtrength it gave to the Saracens and Tartarians, how it impaired Chriſtian Concord, and weakned all Chriſtian Lands, not only the Hoſt of the French King did find ſhortly after, but Chriſtendom even to this day may and doth feel and rue. Neither can in Stories be found any greater cauſe which firſt made the Turks ſo ſtrong, to get ſo much ground over Chriſtendom as they have, than the Peſtilent working of this Pope, in Depoſing and Excommunicating this worthy Emperor. For as there was never Emperor of long time, which more Victorioully prevailed in bridling and keeping under theſe enemies of Chriſt, or would have done more againſt them; than the ſaid Frederick if he might have been ſuffered: ſo after the Depoſing and Excommunicating of him, when the French King neither would abide at home, as he was Counſelled, neither was yet able, without the help of others, to withſtand the force and multitude of the ſaid Saracens and Tartarians being now joyned together, neither yet could the Emperor be ſuffered by the Pope to reſcue the King: it followed thereof, that the good King being taken Priſoner, and all his Army deſtroyed, the Turks thereupon got ſuch a hand, and ſuch a courage againſt the Chriſtians, that ever ſince they have burſt in further upon us, and now have prevailed ſo far, as neither the power of the Pope, nor of all Chriſtendom is able to drive them out; as hereafter by ſequel of Stories is further to be declared.

In

Pope Innocent the fourth would not be reconciled with the Emperor.

In the mean time, to return where before we left, when the French King coming thus unto the Pope at Lions to intreat for the Emperor, could find no favour, he took his leave, and with great heavineſs departed, ſetting forward on his journey unto Marſilia, and ſo Sailed to the Iſle of Cyprus, where he remained all that Winter, ſo that falling into penury and lack of Victuals, he was fain to ſend to the Venetians and other Iſlands by, for help of Proviſion. The Venetians gently ſent unto him ſix great Ships laden with Corn, Wine, and other Victuals requiſite, beſides the relief of other Iſlands more. But eſpecially Frederick the Emperor, underſtanding of their want, ſo furniſhed the French Camp with all plenty of neceſſaries, that it had abundance. Whereupon the French King, moved with the kindneſs of the Emperor, wrote his ſpecial Letters to the Pope in the Emperors behalf, but the hard heart of the Pope would not relent. Blanchia the Kings Mother in France, hearing what the Emperor had done to her Son, ſent him moſt hearty thanks, with preſents and rewards manifold: Mat. Pariſ. Pag. 226.

The French Army relieved by the Emperor Frederick.

The French King again intreateth the Pope for the Emperor.

Damiata gotten again by French men.

In this mean time, about the beginning of October, the French men got Damiata, being the principal Fort or Hold of the Saracens in all Egypt, in the year one thouſand two hundred forty and nine. After the winning of Damiata, the Prince and People of the Saracens, being aſtonied at the loſs thereof, offered to the Chriſtians great ground and poſſeſſions more than ever belonged to Chriſtendom before, ſo that they might have Damiata to them reſtored again. But the pride of the Earl of Artois the Kings Brother, would in no caſe accept the offers of the Saracens, but requireth both Damiata and Alexandria the chief Metropolitan City of all Egypt, to be delivered unto them. The Saracens, ſeeing the pride and greedineſs of the French men, in no caſe would abide it: which turned afterwards to the great detriment of our Chriſtians, as in the end it proved. Ex Mat. Pariſ. Fol. 229.

The Pride of the Earl of Artois.

Death of certain of the French Captains in the way.

Firſt, in the Iſle of Cyprus, and in the journey before, died the Earl of Palatin, and one of the twelve Peers of France, alſo the Earl of St. Paul and Bleſſe, who had under him fifty Enſigns, which were all after his Death ſcattered abroad and diſperſed; alſo died Johannes de Denis a valiant Captain, with many other Noble Perſonages both Men and Women, which, by altering the Air and Diet, there deceaſed.

Anno 1250 Victory of the French men over the Saracens

The next year inſuing, which was 1250, about Aſhwedneſday, the French men, iſſuing out of their Tents by the City of Damiata, flew upon the Saracens which beſiged them, and ſo after a great number of the Enemies ſlain, with Victory and great Spoils, returned to their Tents again. Now within the City of Damiata was the Queen with her Ladies, the Popes Legate, and Biſhops, with a Gariſon of Horſmen and Footmen for the Defence of the City ſtrongly appointed. The next day, the French-men ſuppoſing to have the like hand of the Saracens, as they had the day before, gave a freſh aſſault upon them, but in that conflict the Saracens had ſo ſtrongly appointed themſelves, that the Frenchmen loſt ten times more than they got the day before, and ſo, after a great ſlaughter of their men, retired unto their Tents again. Whereupon the Saracens began to take great hearts and courage againſt our men, ſtopping alſo the paſſages round about the City of Damiata, that no Victuals could paſs unto them. In like manner the Soldan alſo, gathering all the Gallies about Alexandria and all the Land of Egypt, ſo incloſed the Seas, that no intercourſe ſhould be to them by Water.

French men diſcomfited by the Saracens.

The French men again well offered by the Soldan.

At length after long Talk and Conſultation between them on both ſides, the Soldan adviſed them betimes to reſign unto him the City of Damiata, with the Furniture which they found therein, and they ſhould have all the Country about Jeruſalem, with all the Captives of the Chriſtians, friendly reſtored unto them: wherewith the Chriſtians (ſaid he) ought to be contented, and to ſeek no further, but only to have the Land of Jeruſalem; which being granted to them, they ſhould not incroach into their Lands and Kingdoms, whereto they had no right. This form of Peace, as it liked well the meaner ſort of the poor Soldiers, and divers others of the ſaid Council and Nobility; ſo the proud Earl of Artois, the Kings Brother, in no caſe would aſſent thereto, but ſtill required the City of Alexandria to be yielded unto them. Which the Egyptians by no means would agree unto.

The Earl of Artois and the Popes Legate again refuſe the Form of Peace offered.

KING Hen. 3

From that time the French Army, being compaſſed by Sea and by Land, began every day more and more to be diſtreſſed for lack of Victuals and with Famine, being driven to that miſery, that they were fain to eat their own Horſes in the Lent-time, which ſhould have ſerved them unto other uſes. Neither could any Chriſtian, nor Frederick being Depoſed by the Pope, be able to ſend them any ſuccor. Furthermore, the more miſery the Chriſtians were in, the more fiercely did the Saracens preſs upon them on every ſide, deteſting their forward wilfulneſs. Inſomuch that divers of the Chriſtian Soldiers, not able to abide the affliction, privily conveyed themſelves, as they could, out of the Camp to the Saracens, who were gladly received and relieved, and ſome ſuffered ſtill to keep their Faith, ſome Marrying Wives amongſt them, and for hope of honour did Apoſtate to their Law, and ſo wrought ſo little harm to the Chriſtians. The Soldan, being perfectly inſtructed by theſe fugitives of all things belonging to the Kings Army, ſent him word in deriſion, asking where were all his Mattocks, Forks, and Rakes, his Scithes, Plowes and Harrows, which he brought over with him, or why he did not occupy them, but let them lie by him to ruſt and canker? All this and much more the King with his French-men were fain to take well in worth. It happened ſhortly after that this Soldan died, being Poyſoned of his own Servants; which was to the Chriſtians a more heaping of their miſeries. For albeit the ſaid Soldan had been a cruel Tyrant to the Chriſtians, yet was he hated of his own people, wherby his ſtrength was the leſs: after whom ſucceeded another much more cruel. Who as he was better loved, ſo he became much ſtronger, by a general confederacy of all the Saracens which were in the Eaſt parts, joyning now together. So that when the Chriſtians deſired now to have the form of Peace before proffered, he preciſely denied them. And ſo the French Hoſt, which at firſt began to be feared, by their pride and over-much greedineſs grew more and more in contempt amongſt their Enemies, and now was utterly deſpiſed.

Famine and miſery in the French Camp.

The French men Eat their Horſes in Lent-time.

The Soldan's Meſſage deriding the French men.

The Soldan dieth, a worſe followeth.

The French-men deſire again the Peace offered before and could not have it.

The Chriſtians, thus ſeeing all things to go backward with them, and how the Infidel Saracens daily did prevail, began to murmur againſt God, and ſome alſo, which were well ſetled before, to ſtagger in their Religion, caſting out theſe words of Infidelity: How is this (ſaid they) that the Lord hath left us, in whoſe cauſe we fight? How often within the time of remembrance have we been confounded by theſe Saracens and Infidels, who with ſhedding of our blood have injoyed great ſpoils and victories? Firſt this City of Damiata, which we Chriſtians had gotten dearly with effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian blood, afterwards we were conſtrained for nought to reſign up again. After that, the Army of the Templars, fighting for the Holy Temple againſt the Saracens, near to Antioch, was vanquiſhed, and the Standard-bearer ſlain in the fields. Again, within theſe few years, our French men, fighting in like manner againſt the Saracens at the City of Gazara, were put to the worſt, and many afterward out of Captivity Ranſomed, by Richard, Duke of Exceſter, Brother to the King of England, Henry the third. Then came in the Choſmorins ſent by the Soldan of Babylon, which by a wile Invaded the Chriſtians in the City of Jeruſalem, where almoſt all the Chriſtian Army being in the Holy Land, were deſtroyed. And now here our moſt Chriſtian King, together with the whole Nobility, is like to be in danger, utterly to be overthrown. And how is it that the Lord thus ſtandeth againſt us, and fighteth with them? Hath he more regard of them, than of us, &c? Matthæus Pariſ. fol. 231. Such murmuring words of an unſtable Faith many there began to caſt out, as taking diſpleaſure for their ſufferings: but not conſidering on the other ſide what Idolaters they were, what Pride and Diſcord was amongſt them, what Cruelty and Murther they had ſhewed at home in Perſecuting the poor Albingenſes, what Superſtition they firſt brought out with them, with what Idolatry they proceeded, putting their truſt in Maſſes, in the Popes Indulgences, in worſhipping of Images, and praying to Saints. And what helps then could they look for at Gods hand, which had Images in their Temples, to fight againſt them which had none? Or what marvel, if the Lord of Hoſts went not with their Army, committing ſuch Idolatry every day in their their Pavilions to their Sacramental Bread and Wine as they did, and fighting with the ſtrength of their own merits, and not only by the power of their Faith in Chriſt, which is only the Victory that overcometh the World? John 1. Finally, having in their Camp the Legate of him whom the Lord taketh to be his Enemy: as by example of Frederick the Emperor may be well perceived; who, after he was accurſed by Pope Gregory a little before, coming the ſame time in War againſt the Saracens in Paleſtina, Gods Bleſſing wrought ſo mightily with him, that without any blood-ſhed he recovered Jeruſalem, and ſet all the Country about it in great quietneſs, till at laſt the Popiſh Templars, which at the Popes ſetting on went about to betray him to the Soldan of Babylon, and ſo loſt all again by their own malicious miſchief, that the Emperor before had gotten. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi.

Victories over the Templars and Keepers of Jeruſalem.

But let us proceed further in this holy progreſs: The French King with his Army ſeeing himſelf diſtreſſed, and no good there to be done againſt the Soldan of Egypt, after he had ſufficiently Fortified the City of Damiata, with an able Gariſon left with the Duke of Burgundy, he removed his Tents from thence to go Eaſtward. In whoſe Army alſo followed William Longſpath (of whom mention was touched before) accompanied with a picked number of Engliſh Warriers retaining unto him: But ſuch was the diſdain of the French men againſt this William Longſpath and the Engliſh men, that they could not abide them, but flouted them after opprobrious manner, with Engliſh Tails, inſomuch that the good King himſelf had much ado to keep peace between them.

The original cauſe of this grudge between them began thus: There was, not far from Alexandria in Egypt, a ſtrong Fort or Caſtle, repleniſhed with great Ladies, and rich Treaſure of the Saracens: the which Hold it chanced the ſaid William Longſpath with his Company of Engliſh Soldiers to get, more by good luck and politick dexterity, than by open force of Arms, whereby he with his retinue were greatly enriched. When the French men had knowledge hereof, they, being not made privy thereto, began to conceive an heart-burning againſt the Engliſh Soldiers, and could not ſpeak well of them after that. It happened again, not long after, that the ſaid William had intelligence of a company of rich Merchants among the Saracens, going to a certain Fair about the parts of Alexandria, having their Camels, Aſſes, and Mules, richly Laden with Silks, precious Jewels, Spices, Gold and Silver, with Cart-loads of other Wares, beſides Victuals and other Furniture, whereof the Soldiers then ſtood in great need. He having ſecret knowledge hereof, gathered all the power of Engliſh men unto him that he could, and ſo by Night falling upon the Merchants, ſome he ſlew with their Guids and Conductors, ſome he took, ſome he put to flight. The Carts with the Drivers and with the Oxen, and the Camels, Aſſes and Mules, with the whole Carriage and Victuals he took and brought with him, loſing in all the Skirmiſh but one Soldier, and eight of his Servitors: of whom notwithſtanding ſome he brought home wounded to be cured.

This being known in the Camp, forth came the French men, which all this while loitered in their Pavilions, and meeting their Carriage by the way, took all the foreſaid Prey whole unto themſelves, rating the ſaid William and the Engliſh men, for ſo adventuring and iſſuing out of the Camp without leave or knowledge of their General, contrary to the Diſcipline of War. William, ſaid again, he had done nothing but he would anſwer to it, whoſe purpoſe was to have the ſpoil divided to the behoof of the whole Army: when this would not ſerve, he being ſore grieved in his mind, ſo cowardly to be ſpoiled of that, for the which he ſo adventurouſly had travelled, went to the King to complain. But when no reaſon nor complaint would ſerve, by reaſon of the proud Earl of Artois the Kings Brother, which upon deſpite and diſdain ſtood againſt him, he bidding the King farewell, ſaid he would ſerve him no longer. And ſo William de Longſpath with the reſt of his company, breaking from the French Hoſt, went to Achon. Upon whoſe departure then ſaid the Earl of Artois: Now is the Army of French men well rid of theſe tailed people. Which words, ſpoken in great deſpite, were evil taken of many good men that heard him: Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 233, 234.

Before the arriving of the French Army in the Land of Egypt, the Soldan of Babylon, having before intelligence of their coming, committed the cuſtody of Damiata unto a certain Prince of his whom he ſpecially truſted, committing alſo to his Brother the keeping of Kaira and Babylonia. It followed now after the taking of Damiata, that the Soldan of Babylon accuſed the Prince which had the cuſtody thereof, before his Nobles, of prodition, as giving the City unto the Chriſtians. Who notwithſtanding in judgment did ſufficiently clear himſelf, declaring how he was certified that the King would Land at Alexandria, and therefore bent all his power to prevent the Kings arrival there. But by diſtreſs of weather, he miſſing of his purpoſe, and the King Landing about Damiata, by reaſon thereof the City was taken unprovided, he notwithſtanding with his Company reſiſting as well as they might, till they could no longer, and ſo departed out, curſing (ſaid he) Mahomet and his Law. At which words the Soldan, being offended, commanded him to be had away as a Traytor and Blaſphemer, and to be Hanged, albeit he had ſufficiently purged himſelf by the judgment of the Court. His Brother which was the Keeper of Kaira and Babylonia, being therewith not a little grieved, and bearing a good mind to the Chriſtian Religion, deviſed in himſelf how to give the ſaid City of Kaira and Babylonia to the French King, and ſo in moſt ſecret wiſe ſent to the King, ſhewing his full purpoſe and what had happened: and furthermore inſtructing the King in all things how and what he ſhould do, and moreover requiring the Sacrament of Baptiſm, meaning indeed good Faith, and ſending alſo away all the Chriſtian Captives which he had with him in Priſon. The King, being glad hereof, ſent in all haſt for William Longſpath, promiſing a full redreſs of all injuries paſt; who, upon hope of ſome good luck towards, came at the Kings requeſt, and ſo joyned with the French power again.

The lamentable overthrow and ſlaughter of the French Army fighting againſt the Infidels, through the ſiniſter counſel of the Popes Legate.

TO make the Story ſhort, the King, ſetting forward from Damiata, directed his journey towards Kaira, ſlaying by the way ſuch Saracens as there were ſet to ſtop the Victuals from Damiata. The Soldan in the mean time hearing of the couragious coming of the French Hoſt, as being in great hope to Conquer all; ſent unto the King by certain that were next about him, offering to the Chriſtians the quiet and full poſſeſſion of the Holy Land, with all the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and more; beſides other infinite Treaſure of Gold and Silver, or what elſe might pleaſure them, only upon this condition, they would reſtore again Damiata, with the Captives there, and ſo would joyn together in mutual Peace and Amity. Alſo they ſhould have all their Chriſtian Captives delivered home, and ſo both Countries ſhould freely paſs one to another with their Wares and Traffick, ſuch as they luſted to adventure. Furthermore, it was alſo firmly affirmed and ſpoken, that the Soldan with moſt of his Nobles were minded no leſs than to leave the filthy Law of Mahomet, and receive the Faith of Chriſt, ſo that they might quietly enjoy their Lands and Poſſeſſions. The ſame day great quietneſs had entred (no doubt) in all Chriſtendom, with the end of much bloodſhed and miſery, had it not been for the Pope and his Legate, who (having commandment from the Pope, that if any ſuch offers ſhould come, he ſhould not take them) ſtoutly & frontoſe (as the words be of the Story) contradicens, in no wiſe would receive the conditions offered: Pariſ. fol. 233.

The fare offers of the Soldan to the French men, if they had had grace to take it.

The Pope and his Legate cauſe of all this miſchief.

Thus, while the Chriſtians unprofitably lingered the time in debating this matter, the Soldan in the mean time got intelligence of the compact between the Tribune of Kaira and the French King; whereupon he ſent in all haſt to the City of Kaira to apprehend the Tribune till the truth were fully tried, which ſeemed to him more apparent, for that the Chriſtian Priſoners were already delivered. Hereupon the Soldan being in ſome better hope, and leſs fear, refuſed that which before he had offered to the Chriſtians; albeit they with great inſtance afterward ſued to the the Soldan, and could not obtain it. Then the Soldan, being wholly bent to try the matter by the ſword, ſent to the Eaſt parts for an infinite multitude of Souldiers, giving out by Proclamation, that whoſoever could bring in any Chriſtian Mans head, ſhould have ten talents, beſides his ſtanding wages. And whoſoever brought his right hand ſhould have five. He that brought his foot ſhould have two talents for his reward.

The Earl of Artois with the third part of the Chriſtian Army paſſeth over the River Nilus.

After theſe things thus prepared on both ſides to the neceſſity of War, the King cometh to the great River Nilus, having gotten together many Botes, thinking by them to paſs over, as upon a ſure Bridge. On the other ſide the Soldan pitched himſelf to withſtand his coming over. In the mean time happned a certain Feaſt amongſt the Saracens, in which the Soldan was abſent, leaving his Tents by the water ſide. Which being foreſeen by a certain Saracen lately converted to Chriſt, ſerving with Earl Robert the Kings Brother, and ſhewing them withal a certain ſhallow Ford in the River of Nilus, where they might more eaſily paſs over; The ſaid Earl Robert and the Maſter of the Temple with a great power, eſteemed to the third part of the Army, iſſued over the River, after whom alſo followed William Longſpath with his band of Engliſh Souldiers. Theſe, being together joyned on the other ſide the water, incountered the ſame day with the Saracens remaining in the Tents, and put them to the worſe. After this Victory gotten, the French Earl ſurpriſed with pride and triumph, as though he had conquered the whole Earth, would needs forward, dividing himſelf from the main Hoſt, thinking to win the ſpurs alone. To whom certain ſage Men of the Temple giving contrary counſel, adviſed him not ſo to do, but rather to return and take their whole Company with them, and ſo ſhould they be more ſure againſt all deceits and dangers, which there might be laid privily for them. The manner of that people (they ſaid) they better knew, and had more experience thereof than he: alledging moreover, their wearied bodies, their tired Horſes, their famiſhed Souldiers, and the inſufficiency alſo of their number, which was not able to withſtand the multitudes of the Enemies, eſpecially at this preſent brunt, in which the adverſaries did well ſee the whole ſtate of their dominion now to conſiſt either in winning all, or loſing all: with other ſuch like words of perſwaſion. Which when the proud Earl did hear, being inflamed with no leſs arrogancy than ignorance, with opprobrious taunts he reviled them, called them cowardly daſtards, and betrayers of the whole Country, objecting unto them the common report of many, which ſaid, That the Land of the Holy Croſs might be won to Chriſtendom, were it not for the rebellious Templars, with the Hoſpitalars and their fellows, &c.

Good counſel given, but not followed.

The deſpiteful rebukes of Earl Robert to them that gave him good counſel.

To theſe contumelious rebukes when the Maſter of the Temple anſwered again for him and his fellows, bidding him diſplay his Enſigne when he would, and where he durſt, they were as ready to follow him, as he to go before them. Then began William de Longſpath the worthy Knight to ſpeak, deſiring the Earl to give ear to thoſe Men of experience, who had better knowledge of thoſe Countries and people than he had, commending alſo their counſel to be diſcreet and wholeſome, and ſo turning to the Maſter of the Temple began with gentle words to mitigate him likewiſe. The Knight had not half ended his talk, when the Earl, taking the words out of his mouth, began to fume and ſwear, crying out of theſe cowardly Engliſh-men with tails. What a pure Army (ſaid he) ſhould we have here, if theſe tails, and tailed people were purged from it? With other like words of great villany and much diſdain. Whereunto the Engliſh Knight anſwering again, Well, Earl Robert, ſaid he, whereſoever you dare ſet your foot, my ſtep ſhall go as far as yours; and as I believe, we go this day where you ſhall not dare to come near the tail of my Horſe: as in the event it proved true, Ex Matth. Pariſ. fol. 236.

The worthy anſwer of the Engliſh Knight to Earl Robert the Kings Brother.

In this mean time the French King, intending to advance forward his Army, thought beſt to ſend away ſuch as were feeble and lacked Armor, unto Damiatia by Boats. The Soldan, hearing thereof prepared a great number of Boats to be carried by Wain and Cart to the water ſide; which meeting them by the way, drowned and deſtroyed by wild-fire every one, ſo that of all that company of our Chriſtians, of whom ſome were burned, ſome ſlain, ſome drowned, not one eſcaped alive, ſave one only Engliſh-man, named Alexander Giffard; who, although he was ſore wounded in the chace in five places in his body, yet eſcaped to the French Camp, bringing word unto the King what was done. And this was upon the water.

A number of French Souldiers ſent to Damiata, drowned and ſlain by the way.

KING Hen. 3.

Now upon the Land, ſeeing Earl Robert would needs ſet forward, weening to get all the glory unto himſelf before the coming of the Hoſt; firſt they invaded a little Village or Caſtle which was not far off, called Manſor. The Country Boors, and Pagans in the Villages by, ſeeing the Chriſtians come, ran out with ſuch a main cry and ſhout, that it came to the Soldans hearing, which was nearer than our Men did think. In the mean while the Chriſtians, invading and entring into the Munition incircumſpectly, were pelted and paſhed with ſtones by them which ſtood above, whereby a great number of our Men were loſt, and the Army ſore maimed; and almoſt in diſpair. Then immediately upon the ſame cometh the Soldan with all his main power; who ſeeing the Chriſtians Army to be divided, and the Brother ſeparated from the Brother, had that which he long wiſhed for, and ſo incloſing them round about that none ſhould eſcape, had with them a cruel fight. Then the Earl began to repent him of his heady raſhneſs, but it was too late: who, then ſeeing William the Engliſh Knight doughtily fighting in the chief brunt of the Enemies, cryed unto him moſt cowardly to flie, ſeeing God (ſaid he) doth fight againſt us. To whom the Knight anſwering again, God forbid (ſaith he) that my Fathers Son ſhould run away from the face of a Saracen: The Earl then turning his Horſe fled away, thinking to avoid by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, and ſo taking the River of Thafnis, oppreſſed with Harneſs, was there ſunken and drowned. Thus the Earl being gone, the French Men began to deſpair and ſcatter. Then William de Longſpath, bearing all the force of the Enemies, ſtood againſt them as long as he could, wounding and ſlaying many a Saracen, until at length his Horſe being killed, and his legs maimed, he could no longer ſtand, who yet notwithſtanding, as he was down, mangled their feet and legs, and did the Saracens much ſorrow, till at the laſt after many blows and wounds, being ſtoned of the Saracens, he yielded his life. After the death of him, then the Saracens ſetting upon the reſidue of the Army, whom they had compaſſed on every ſide, devoured and deſtroyed them all, inſomuch that ſcarce one Man eſcaped alive, ſaving two Templars, one Hoſpitular, and one poor raſcal Souldier, which brought tydings hereof to the King.

Theſe things being known in the French Camp unto the King and his Souldiers; firſt of their drowning which were ſent to Damiata, then of their ruine and ſlaughter of the Army, with the Kings Brother by the Town of Manſor, there was no little ſorrow and heavineſs on every ſide, with great fear and doubt in themſelves what was beſt to do. At laſt, when they ſaw no remedy, but they muſt ſtand manfully to revenge the blood of their Brethren, then the King with his Hoſt paſt over the flood of Nilus, and coming to the place where the Battel had been, there they beheld their fellows and brethren, pitifully lying with their heads and hands cut off. For the Saracens for the reward before promiſed by the Soldan or Sultan, unto them that could bring the head or hand of any Chriſtian, had ſo mangled the Chriſtians, leaving their bodies unto the wild Beaſts. Thus as they were ſorrowing and lamenting the ruful caſe of their Chriſtian fellows, ſuddenly appeareth the coming of the Soldan, with a multitude of innumerable thouſands. Againſt whom the French-men eſtſoons prepare themſelves to incounter, and ſo the Battel being ſtruck up, the Armies began to joyn. But alack for pity, what could the French-men here do, their number firſt ſo maimed, their hearts wounded already with fear and ſorrow, their bodies conſumed with penury and Famine, their Horſes for feebleneſs not able to ſerve them? In concluſion, the French-men were overthrown, ſlain, and diſpatched; and ſeeing there was no flying, happy was he that firſt could yield himſelf. In which miſerable conflict, the King with his two Brethren, and a few that clave unto him, were taken Captives, to the confuſion of all Chriſtian Realms, and preſented to the Soldan. All the reſidue were put to the Sword, or elſe ſtood to the mercy of the Saracens, whether to be ſlain or to remain in woful Captivity. And this was the end of that ſorrowful Battel, wherein almoſt all the Nobility of France was ſlain, neither was there one man well-near in the multitude which eſcaped free, but either was ſlain, or taken Priſoner. Furthermore, they that were ſlain or left half alive, had every one his Head and Hand cut off, upon the Soldans Proclamation above-mentioned.

The Sultan or Soldan, after the taking of the French King, fraudulently Suborning an Army of Saracens to the number of the French Army, with the Arms and Enſigns of them that were ſlain, made toward Damiata, where the Duke of Burgundy, with the French Queen, and Otho the Popes Legate, and other Biſhops and their Gariſons were remaining; ſuppoſing under the ſhew of French-men to be let in: but the Captains miſtruſting their haſty coming, and miſdoubting their Viſages, not like to the French-men, ſhut the Gates againſt them, and ſo prevented their fruſtrate of their intent.

The purpoſe of the Soldan was, if he might have gotten Damiata, to ſend the French King up higher in the Eaſt-Countries to Califha, the chief Pope of Damaſcus, to increaſe the Titles of Mahomet, and to be a ſpectacle or gazing-ſtock to all thoſe quarters of the World. The manner of which Califha was, never to let any Chriſtian Priſoner come out, whoſoever came once in his hand. But forſomuch as the Soldan miſſed his purpoſe, he thought by advice of Council, to uſe the Kings life for his own advantage in recovering the City of Damiata, as in the end it came to paſs. For although the King at the firſt was greatly unwilling, and had rather die than ſurrender Damiata again to the Saracens, yet the concluſion fell out, that the King was put to his Ranſom, and the City of Damiata was alſo reſigned; which City being twice won, and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, the Soldan or Saladine afterward cauſed it utterly to be raced down to the ground. The Ranſom of the King, upon condition that the Soldan ſhould ſee him ſafely conducted to Achon (which I take to be Ceſarea) came to 60000 Marks. The number of French-men, and others which miſcarried in that War by Water and by Land, come to 80000 perſons. Hæc Mat. Pariſ. fol. 237, 238.

The ſum of the Kings Ranſom.

The number of the French men ſlain.

And thus have ye the brief Narration of this lamentable peregrination of Lewis the French King: In which when the French-men were once or twice well offered by the Soldan, to have all the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and much more in free poſſeſſion; they not contented with that which was reaſonable and ſufficient, for greedineſs to have all, loſt all, having at length no more than their naked bodies could cover lying dead upon the ground, and all through the original cauſe of the Pope and Otho his Legate. By whoſe ſiniſter means and peſtilent pride, not only the lives of ſo many Chriſtians were then loſt, but alſo to the ſaid Pope is to be imputed all the loſs of other Cities and Chriſtian Regions bordering in the ſame quarters: forſomuch as by the occaſion hereof the hearts of the Saracens on the one ſide were ſo incouraged, and the Courage of the Chriſtians on the other ſide ſo much diſcomfited, that in ſhort ſpace after, both the Dominion of Antioch and of Achon, with all other Poſſeſſions belonging to the Chriſtians, were loſt, to the great diminiſhing of Chriſts Church.

The two Soldans at variance about the French King.

During the time of this good King lying at Achon or Ceſarea: Almighty God ſent ſuch Diſcord betwixt the Soldan of Halaphia, and the Soldan of Babylon for letting the King ſo eſcape, that the ſaid Soldan or Saladine of Babylon, to win the King unto his ſide, entred League with him (whom both his Brethren, and all his Nobles almoſt at home had forſaken) and remitted his Ranſom, and alſo reſtored unto him ſuch Priſoners as were in the ſaid Battel found to be alive. Thus the Lord worketh, where man commonly forſaketh. Matth. Pariſienſi, fol. 261.

What miſchief hath come to Chriſtendom and by what means. How Frederick the Emperor might have ſerved ill good ſtead againſt the Saracens, but the Pope would not ſuffer him.

Another cauſe moreover, why the ruine of this French Army may worthily be imputed to the Pope, is this, For that when Lewis the French King perceiving what a neceſſary friend and helper Frederick the Emperor might be to him in theſe his Affairs againſt the Saracens, and therefore was an earneſt ſuitor for him to the Pope to have him releaſed; yet neither he, nor the King of England by any means could obtain it. And although the Emperor himſelf offered to Pope Innocent with all humble ſubmiſſion to make ſatisfaction in the Council of Lions, promiſing alſo to expugne all the Dominions of the Saracens, and never to return into Europe again, and there to recover whatſoever the Chriſtians had loſt, ſo that the Pope would only grant his Son Henry to be Emperor after him: yet the proud Pope would not be mollified, but would needs proceed againſt him with both Swords, that is, firſt, with the Spiritual Sword, to Accurſe him, and then with the Temporal Sword to Depoſe him from his Imperial Throne. Through the occaſion whereof, not only the French Kings power went to wrack, but alſo ſuch a fire of miſchief was kindled againſt Chriſtendom, as yet to this day cannot be quenched. For after this overthrow of the French King and his Army, the Chriſtians of Antioch and of other Chriſtian Regions thereabouts, being utterly diſcouraged, gave over their Holds and Cities. Whereupon the Saracens, and after them the Turks, got ſuch an hand over Chriſtendom, as to this day we all have great cauſe to rue and lament. Beſides this, where divers Chriſtians were croſſed to go over and help the French King, the Pope for mony diſpenſed with them to tarry ſtill at home.

The Tyranny and diveliſh miſchief of the Pope againſt the Emperor.

But as I ſaid, the greateſt cauſe was, that the Emperor which could have done moſt, was Depoſed by the Popes tyranny, whereby all thoſe Churches in Aſia were left deſolate. As touching the which Emperor Frederick, becauſe we have divers and ſundry times made mention of him before, and for that his ſtory is ſtrange, his acts wondrous, and his conflicts tragical, which he ſuſtained againſt four or five Popes one after another, I thought (not out of ſtory) in a whole Narration to ſet forth the ſame, for the Reader to conſider, what is to be judged of this Cathedral See of Rome, which had wrought ſuch abominable miſchief in the World, as in the ſequel of the ſtory following, faithfully Tranſlated out of Latin into Engliſh, is to be ſeen.

The whole Tragical Hiſtory of Frederick the Second, Emperor, Tranſlated out of the Latin Book of Nich. Ciſnerus.

What houſe Frederick came of.

FRederick the ſecond, came out of the ancient Houſe of the Beblins or Gibillins; which Gibillins came of the moſt famous ſtock of the French Kings and Emperors.

What Father and Mother.

He had Frederick Barbaroſſa to his Grand-father, whoſe Son Henricus the ſixth was Emperor after him; who of Conſtantia, the Daughter (or as ſome write, the Niece) of Roger the firſt, King of Sicily, begat this Frederick the ſecond.

The time and manner of his birth.

This Conſtantia was fifty years of Age before ſhe was conceived with him; whom the Emperor Henry the ſixth, to avoid all doubt and ſurmiſe that of her conception and childing might be thought, and to the peril of the Empire enſue, cauſed his Regal Tent to be pitched abroad in place where every man might reſort. And when the time of his Queens travel approached, Conſtantia (in preſence of divers Ladies and Matrons, and other Gentlewomen of the Empire, a great number) was brought abed and delivered of this Frederick, the ſeventh day before the Kalends of January, in the year of Chriſts Incarnation 1193. who by Inheritance was King of Naples, Apulia, Calabria and Sicilia.

What Patrons he had.

Henricus his Father, ſhortly after he was born, obtained of the Princes Electors, that by their Oath unto him given, they would chuſe his Son Frederick for their Emperor after his deceaſe, and ſo did, and immediately called him Ceſar, being yet but in his Cradle.

This Henry when he died (which was ſhortly after the birth of Frederick) committed the protection of him to Conſtantia his Wife, to Philip his Brother chief Governor of Hetruria, and to the Biſhop of Rome, then Innocentius the third.

Conſtantia, not long after the death of Henry her Huſband, being ſickly and growing into Age, and thereby not ſo well able to govern the troubles and unquiet ſtate of the Empire, reſigned, and willed by her Teſtament the ſafety both of her Son Frederick, and alſo of his Dominions, to the Protection and Government of Innocent the third, thinking thereby ſafely to have provided, &c.

This Pope Innocent, as ſoon as he had the Protection of the young Emperor and his Seigniories, became, inſtead of a Patron and Protector to him and his Dominions, both an Enemy and Conſpirator. The examples are many: One is, he perſwaded Sibylla the late Wife of Tancredus (whom Henry put from the Kingdom of Sicily) to recover the ſame again, and that ſhe ſhould thereunto require Philip the French Kings aid. Whereupon one Walterus being of the Noble Houſe of the Earls of Brenno, which in the Province of Barrencecis had great Living, and Marrying with Ate-

ria the eldeſt Daughter of Tancredus once King of Sicilia (as is ſaid) now by the inſtigation, counſel, and aid of the French King with the Pope (well-hoping to recover the Kingdom) entred and invaded with great power Campania and Apulia. At which time alſo, the ſame worthy Protector Innocentius the third, ſent his Legates with Letters of Excommunication againſt all thoſe that would not admit and take the ſaid Waltherus for their King.

The ſecond Conſpiracy.

Another was, that where the Princes, Electors, and other Nobles, as before is ſaid, had promiſed by their Oath to Henricus, that they would make Frederick his Son Emperor after his deceaſe (whom the Pope ſaw to put their endeavour thereunto to bring it to paſs) abſolved them all from the Oath which they had taken and given for the Election of Frederick the Emperor, as one not content he ſhould obtain the ſame. And further, he raiſed ſlanders and defamations againſt Philip, whom the Electors had choſen to govern the Empire, during the minority of Frederick his Nephew. He wrote his Epiſtle (which is yet extant) to the Duke Barthold of Zaringia to be Emperor. Who for that he gave place to Philip, he went about to procure that Otho the Son of Henry Leo ſhould be made Emperor,

The third Conſpiracy.

The fourth Conſpiracy.

and that the Princes and Lords, Electors of Germany would Crown him forthwith after the manner of Aquiſgrane. He deprived all ſuch Biſhops as he knew to favour Philip as Emperor, in the defence of his Nephews right. But Philip whoſe cauſe was better, his skill in Martial Affairs greater, and in power and ſtrength mightier, after divers and great conflicts, the marvellous diſturbance and vaſtation of the whole Empire, by Gods help put the other to the worſe. All which calamities and miſchiefs Conradus Lichtenanus, at that time living, in his Annals, moſt pitifully complaineth of, and accuſeth the Biſhop of Rome and his Adherents to be the chief Authors and deviſers of this great and lamentable miſchief, as ſuch that, for to make themſelves rich by the ſpoil thereof, ſought by all means and deſired the ſame.

The fifth Conſpiracy.

Not long after, a Peace was concluded between Philip and Otho, and Philip reconciled again to the Pope; who within a while after, between Otho and him, was murthered in his Chamber and ſlain. And then was Otho again brought to the Imperial Seat, and new Elected for Emperor, with the counſel and conſent of this Innocent the third, and ſo continued until that a great variance and diſcord chanced to ariſe between the ſaid Otho and the Pope. Whereupon Innocentius ſought by all means, how againſt him likewiſe he might work miſchief, and bring him unto his end. The occaſion of this ſudden change and alteration my Author maketh no mention of, but that Otho (now being of great power) invaded and deſtroyed the Dominions of Frederick, as Flaminia, Picenum, Umbria, Hetruria, but chiefly Campania, and Apulia, for that thoſe properly appertained to the Inheritance of Frederick.

Philip ſlain.

Variance betwen Otho and the Pope.

Thus you ſee, how firſt by the counſel and conſent of Pope Innocentius, and by his inſtigation, beſides his ſecret Conſpiracies, this good Frederick and his Dominions were hurt and indamaged. Then again through his default what damage he ſuſtained by Otho, who by him and his means was made ſo ſtrong as he was: notwithſtanding the great truſt he was put in for the Protection both of Frederick and his Dominions.

What Learning and Knowledge he was of.

At this time Frederick was come unto the age of twenty years; who in his youth, by the proviſion of Conſtantia his Mother, was ſo well inſtructed in Letters, and with other arts and vertues ſo indued, that at theſe years there appeared and did ſhine in him excellent gifts both of wiſdom and knowledge.

What Vertue he was indued with.

He was excellently well ſeen in the Latin and Greek Tongues, although at that time Learning began to decay, and barbarouſneſs to increaſe. He had alſo the German Tongue, the Italian Tongue, and the Saracen Tongue. He daily exerciſed and put in practiſe thoſe vertues which Nature had planted in him, as Piety, Wiſdom, Juſtice and Fortitude: inſomuch that well he might be compared and accounted among the worthieſt and moſt renowned Emperors his predeceſſors.

Frederick ſuſpected for his Grand-fathers ſake.

Fazellus (the Hiſtorician of Sicilia in this time) writeth, That Fredericus was again after this had in great honor and eſtimation with Innocentius; but yet notwithſtanding he had no ſure confidence in him, for that he had the ſuſpected name of Frederick his Grand-father often in remembrance, and for that occaſion was much deſirous to have him far from Italy.

{KING Hen. 3}

When Frederick had gathered his power, he purpoſed to ſet upon Otho his Enemy; of which thing Otho hearing (as he was painful in travel) came out of Italy with his Army into Germany, thinking to have met Frederick at the river of Rhine, and to have ſtopped his paſſage; but he was deceived of his expectation, and Fredericus was Crowned, as the manner of Aquiſgrane is, before he came. And after that Frederick in the Winter-time took his journey to Franckford, and after many meetings in Norico had, and after that Otho was dead, he ſet the Empire in a ſtay, and the whole Country of Germany he in a manner appeaſed. And then with all his Nobles and Princes he returned to Rome, and of Honorius the third was with great Solemnity Conſecrated and called Auguſtus. Which Honorius ſucceeded. Innocentius the third in the Papal See, and was a great help to Frederick (although he loved him not) in this behalf, to revenge himſelf upon Otho.

The Coronation of Frederick.

The death of Otho.

The Conſecration of Frederick the Emperor.

After the Conſecration of Frederick the ſecond, he gave many great and liberal gifts, as well unto the Biſhop of Rome himſelf, as alſo unto the Court of Rome beſides. Alſo he gave and aſſured by his Charter, to the Church of Rome, the Dukedom of Fundanum. For by the unſatiable covetouſneſs of the Romiſh Biſhops, this wicked uſe and cuſtom grew, that unleſs the Emperors Elect and Crowned would give unto them ſuch like great and large gifts, they could not obtain of them their Conſecration or Confirmation, which for that intent they deviſed.

The liberal munificence of Frederick to the Pope and Church of Rome.

Furthermore, Frederick the Emperor willing to ſhew himſelf more bountiful and liberal unto the Church, neither yet to reſtrain any priviledge that might benefit the ſame, gave and admitted thoſe conſtitutions which the Pope himſelf would deſire, and are yet extant in their Civil Law: by which his doings he delivered to their hands a Sword (as it were) to cut his own Throat: for the Biſhops of Rome now having even what they liſted, and all in their own hands, might by the pain of proſcription, bring what Emperor or King they liſted under Coram nobis, and keep them by their own Laws, as if they were bound in certain bands, out of which they might not ſtart. For whatſoever he were which for the diminution of the Liberties of the Church were Excommunicated, and ſo continued a years ſpace, then he ſhould be within the danger of this Proſcript, and ſhould not be releaſed before he had made ſatisfaction, and were admitted by the Pope to the Church and Congregation of good men again. Whereby it came to paſs, that whatſoever Emperor, in the Government of his Dominions, ſhould in any point diſpleaſe, or do contrary to the luſt of the Biſhop of Rome, he then as Enemy to the Church was Excommunicate. And unleſs within a year he were reconciled to them again (by this their Principal Law) he was in the Proſcript. And often it chanced that Princes, to avoid the pain of this Proſcript, were ready to do whatſoever the Pope would have them, and commanded them to do.

Frederick gave through his liberality a Sword to cut his own Throat.

The Canon of Proſcription granted and confirmed by Frederick.

After the Conſecration of Frederick was with great Solemnity finiſhed, and that the Pope and Church of Rome in all ample manner (as is partly deſcribed) were gratified, and yet larger conſtitutions to them confirmed, he departed from Rome, and went into Italy, there to ſet in order and ſtay the Cities and great Towns, for the better Tranquility of himſelf, and ſafety of his Subjects, and from thence into his own Provinces and Dominions: where he heard of certain that began to raiſe and make new Factions againſt him. Amongſt whom were found Thomas and Richard, the Brethren of Innocentius the third, Earl of Anaquinos, that held certain Caſtles in the Kingdom of Neopolitans from him by force: which Caſtles he beſieged and beat down, and took from them all that he in them found. Richard, he took and ſent as a Priſoner into Sicilia; but Thomas eſcaped and came ſpeedily to Rome; whither alſo repaired certain Biſhops and others that were Conſpirators againſt Frederick, as alſo ſuch others as the fear of the Emperors Laws, and their own guilty Conſciences cauſed to fly, and were (that notwithſtanding) of this Biſhop of Rome, Honorius the third (to gratify again the liberality of the Emperor beſtowed upon him) under his Noſe ſuccoured, maintained and defended. Which thing when Frederick underſtood, he began to expoſtulate with the Biſhop, conſidering the unſeemlineſs of that his Fact. Againſt whom whom the Pope on the other ſide was ſo chafed and vexed, that immediately, without further delay, he thundereth out againſt him, like a Tyrant, his Curſes and Excommunications.

Tho. Fazellus declareth the deteſtation or defiance to happen between them ſomewhat otherwiſe. There were (ſaith he) amongſt thoſe which were found Traitors to the Emperor, certain Biſhops, which lying to the Pope, requeſted his aid: whereupon the Pope ſent his Legates to the Emperor, and requeſted him, that he would admit and receive to favour thoſe Biſhops which he had baniſhed and put from their offices, and that he would not intermeddle with any Eccleſiaſtical charge wherewith he had not to do: and ſaid further, that the correction and puniſhment of ſuch matters pertained to the Biſhop of Rome, and not to him. And moreover, that the overſight of thoſe Churches in that Kingdom, from the which he had expelled the Biſhops, pertained and belonged unto him.

The Emperor repleith to the Popes demands.

Whereunto Fredesick thus replieth, That forſomuch as now four hundred years and more (from the time of Carolus Magnus*) all Emperors and Kings in their Dominions might lawfully commit to apt and fit men for the ſame ſuch Eccleſiaſtical functions and charges as within their Territories and Kingdoms fell; that he looked to have the like privilege and authority alſo, that other his Predeceſſors before him had.* And further ſaid, That he had the ſame and like authority in the Empire that his Father Henry, and Frederick his Grandfather, and other his Predeceſſors before them had; neither had he ſo deſerved at the hands of the Church of Rome, either of Honorius himſelf, to be deprived of thoſe privileges which his anceſtors before him had and kept.

The Emperor ſpeaketh but reaſon, howſoever it pleaſeth the Pope to take it.

And further, Frederick being chafed and moved with theſe demands of the Pope, breaketh forth and ſaith, How long will the Biſhop of Rome abuſe my patience? When will his covetous heart be ſatisfied? Whereunto will his ambitious deſire grow? With ſuch like words more, repeating certain injuries and conſpiracies, both againſt him and his Dominions, as well by Honorius as Innocentius the third his Predeceſſor, as alſo other like injuries of Popes to his anceſtors practiſed. What man (ſaith he) is able to ſuffer and bear this ſo incredible boldneſs and intolerable inſolency of ſo proud a Biſhop? Go, (ſaith he, unto the Legates) and tell Honorius, that I will hazard both the Seignory of my Empire, and Crown of my Kingdom, rather than I will ſuffer him thus to diminiſh the authority of our Majeſty. Tho. Fazellus lib. 8.

The ſtrife between the Pope and the Emperor for the election and deprivation of Biſhops.

Now becauſe much diſquietneſs and controverſie hath ariſen (for the moſt part through all Chriſtendom in every Kingdom and Realm ſeverally) for and about the authority of chuſing and depriving of Biſhops (as may be ſeen by the example of this Frederick) which the Pope only and arrogantly challengeth to himſelf, and ſaith it doth not appertain to another: I thought good not with ſilence to overpaſs, but ſomewhat to ſay, and to prove the authority of Chriſtian Kings and Princes in this behalf to be both ſufficient and good. Which thing not only by the holy Scriptures is right eaſie to be done; but alſo that it is by Synodal Decrees and Councils (divers and ſundry) eſtabliſhed and confirmed, may eaſily be proved; as alſo by the ancient cuſtome and manner of the Primitive Church may further be corroborated and made good.

Authority for the election of Biſhops to be in the Princes and their Subjects.

Whereunto appertain certain places collected and gathered out of the Decrees of Gratianus, and eſpecially in theſe Canons, 12, 13, 14, 26, 27, 32, and 63 Diſtinctions. Furthermore, when Chriſtian Kings and Princes began to embrace Chriſt his Religion, both for honour and orders ſake it was granted, that when the people deſired ſuch miniſters as were convenient, and by them thought meet; that they which were then in the Eccleſiaſtical function, and chieſeſt in authority, ſhould either confirm ſuch as were preſented, or elſe themſelves ſhould place fit men in their Churches as need required. So did the Emperors of Conſtantinople (receiving the order and manner from Conſtantine the Great) uſe and give the right of Eccleſiaſtical function with the conſent both of the people and Eccleſiaſtical perſons, and long ſo retained the ſame. As Honorius the Emperor unto Boniface, can. 8. diſt. 79. and can. 2. diſt. 97. Alſo by the example of Pelagius and Gregorius Magnus; of which one in the Reign of Juſtinian the Emperor, and Totila governing Italy; the other in the time of Mauritius the Emperor (when the Lombards poſſeſſed Italy) were appointed Biſhops to the Church of Rome, Chap. 15. 21. 24.

Authorities of the election of the Biſhop of Rome to be in the Emperor.

And whereas Gratianus in the beginning of the 96 and 97 Diſtinction doth declare, that the Reſcript of Honorius the Emperor is void and of none effect, for that he determined the election of the Biſhop of Rome, contrary to the authority of the holy Canons, when as yet neither to the Civil Magiſtrate, nor to any of the Eccleſiaſtical order, can there be read of any licence given them to diſpence it withal: each man may plainly ſee and diſcern his great folly and want of underſtanding. As though at that time any Decrees were made which ſhould debar Emperors from the conſtituting of the Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters. Or that it were doubtful whether the Emperors at that time had paſt any conſtitutions touching the cauſes of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and the ſame laws then put in ure; when the contrary moſt manifeſtly (both by the Laws and Hiſtories of that age and time, as well of the Church as of the Empire) may appear. And that we need not ſeek far for the matter, this thing is ſufficiently proved by theſe Titles; De ſacroſanctis Eccleſiis, Epiſcopis, Clericis, beſides other Eccleſiaſtical Chapters and matters touching Religion. All which are to be ſeen in the Books of the principal and chieſeſt conſtitutions, collected and ſet forth by Juſtinian. Amongſt the which, many of the Chapters are ſaid to be accepted and allowed of Honorius and Theodoſius: ſo in like caſe, the 21 Can. in the 63 diſtinction doth declare, that the Grecian Emperors, that next enſued after Juſtinian, did obſerve that manner of ordaining and election of the Biſhop of Rome, although then at that time Interpellatum erat, it was ſomewhat ſpurned at. Amongſt whom mention is made of Conſtantinus the 4th. which was ſirnamed Pogonatus.

Gratianus in his diſtinction reproved for the election of Biſhops to be in the Pope.

The titles of Juſtinian for the election.

The Grecian Emperors electors of Biſhops.

Carolus Magnus in like manner followed their ſteps and manner in the ſame, as in the 22d Canon, and the ſame Diſtinction is declared. And further, it was at a Synodal Council in Lateran (Adrian being high Biſhop, where were convented and aſſembled 153 other Biſhops) decreed, That the power and authority of creating the Biſhop of Rome, and ordaining of all other Prelates and Eccleſiaſtical Orders, ſhould be in the power and will of Carolus Magnus, as well in Italy as other his Dominions and Provinces, and that whoſoever was not promoted and allowed by him, ſhould not be conſecrated of any; and that thoſe which repugned and diſobeyed this Decree, ſhould incur the moſt ſharp pain of proſcription and publication of law. The worthy example hereof is extant in the 18 Can. and 18 Title. Yet notwithſtanding, Stephanus the fourth, author of this Reſcript againſt the ſaid Decree, without the Emperors conſent, was made Biſhop of Rome; who, to the intent he might delude the decreed and ſolemnized penalty, thereby to excuſe himſelf, went into France to Ludovicus Pius, the Son of Carolus Magnus, and at Rheims Crowned he him with the Imperial Diadem. Neither could this Biſhop here ſtay himſelf, but ſpying the great lenity of the Emperor, aſſailed to make fruſtrate the foreſaid Conſtitution. For his purpoſe was, and ſo he brought it to paſs, as in the 27 Can. and the ſame Diſtinction appeareth, that it might be lawful for the Eccleſiaſtical order, with the People and Senate of Rome (without the authority of the Emperor) to chuſe the Biſhop of Rome, reſerving that he ſhould not be conſecrated without the will and conſent of the Emperor. Thus it is manifeſt, that the Biſhops of Rome themſelves, not regarding, but deſpiſing the ſtrict penalty and ſanction of the foreſaid Decree of the Lateran Council, were not only the firſt that brake the ſame, but alſo, by contrary reſcripts and conſtitutions, laboured and indeavoured to extol and ſet up themſelves above all others.

The election decreed by 153 Biſhops in the council of Lateran to be in the Emperor.

Stephen the 4th. firſt alterer of this election.

The Biſhop of Rome the firſt breaker of the Decrees of the Council.

Whereupon Lotharius, afterward being Emperor, and Nephew to Carolus Magnus, coming into Italy, there to diſſolve the conſpiracy and confederacy of Leo the fourth about the tranſlation of the Empire, renewed and eſtabliſhed again the Synodal Decree of Lateran touching the Juriſdiction of the Emperor for the election of the Biſhop of Rome and Other Eccleſiaſtical perſons. And hereof it came, that thoſe Epiſtles were written of Leo in the 16 and 17 Can. and the ſame diſtinction, which alſo, as in the 9 Can. and 10 diſt. made a profeſſion, that the ſame imperial precepts ſhould be kept in all ages. This Leo, when he was reproved of treaſon and other evils, pleaded his cauſe before Ludovicus the ſecond, Emperor of Rome, and Son of Lotharius above recited: 2 queſt. 7. Can. 40.

Lotharius renewеth the Lateran decree for election of Biſhops.

Otho depoſeth John the 14th. and ratifieth a new Decree of election.

But after this, as time grew on, the Biſhops of Rome nothing relinquiſhing their ambitious deſires; Otho the firſt Emperor of that name, deprived and put from the See of Rome that moſt filthy and wicked Biſhop John the thirteenth, both for divers and ſundry wicked and heinous acts by him committed, as alſo for his great Treaſons and Conſpiracies againſt his Royal Perſon, and did ſubſtitute in his place Leo the fifth; who, calling a Synod at Lateran in the ſame Temple and place where the other before was kept, did promulgate a new Conſtitution with conſent of the Senate and People of Rome, concerning the Emperors Juriſdiction in the foreſaid Election; which in the 23 Canon is contained and 63 diſtinction. Whereby the old right and power of the Emperor in the Election of the Biſhop of Rome, and other Eccleſiaſtical Prelates, was again with ſharper and ſtricter ſanction confirmed and ratified. Again, John the eighteenth, whom Creſcentius the Roman (uſurping the Imperial Crown) had made Biſhop by the conſent of the people of Rome and the Eccleſiaſtical Order, having his Noſe cut off, and his Eies put out, and ſo thruſt out of the Capitol, was again of Otho the third eſtabliſhed and made Biſhop. But when as yet notwithſtanding, the Biſhops of Rome would not alter their old accuſtomed diſpoſition, but with all their induſtry indeavoured to abrogate that Juriſdiction of the Emperor over the Biſhop of Rome (as people loth to be under ſubjection) Henry the third (then Leo the ninth being conſtituted Biſhop) did once again ratifie the ſame, and cauſed the Biſhop (which extolled himſelf before all his fellow Biſhops) to ſtoop and give place to Moguntius.

Leo the 5th. was inſtituted by Otho the Emperor.

The election once again ratified to be in the Emperors juriſdiction.

Henry the 3d. and Leo the 9th.

So after the death of Henry the third Emperor, Nicholas the ſecond, although in his Decree (which in the 1 Canon, and 23 diſtinction is recited) he gave the primacy for the Election of the Biſhop of Rome by the means of the Prieſts and People of Rome, unto the Cardinals; yet he would after that, that the Prerogative therein ſhould be reſerved to Henry the fourth the young Emperor, from whom the Empire afterwards was for a time wreſted and taken.

Henry the 4th. and Nicholas the ſecond.

But now after this, when Hildebrand, which was called Gregory the ſeventh, was Pope, this prerogative of the Emperors in their Election, which before in the creation of Alexander the Biſhop, was neglected and broken; the Biſhops of Rome not only did ſeek to diminiſh the authority thereof, but alſo to evacuate and quite undo the ſame. For he not only aſpired to that dignity without the conſent and appointment of the Emperor, but alſo made reſtraint, that no Emperor, King, Duke, Marqueſs, Earl or any Civil Magiſtrate, ſhould aſſign and appoint to any, any Eccleſiaſtical function and charge; neither that any of his Prelates ſhould be ſo hardy, as to take them at any of their hands: as queſt. 16. can. 7. 9. and 10. may be ſeen.

The election hitherto in the Emperors, and now beginneth to fail by Hildebrand.

Yet notwithſtanding, after that this horrible Monſter Hildebrand was proſcript and thruſt out of the Papal Seat, and Clement the third put in his ſtead, Henry again challenged his Imperial Prerogative of Election. But yet, when the Biſhops which ſucceeded after this Hildebrand, and led by his example, began to derogate from the Imperial Prerogative of Election; and Henry on the other ſide, by all the means poſſible, ſought to defend and maintain the ſame; by the ſubtil fraud and miſchievous policy of the Biſhops, which ſet the Son againſt the Father, and found means to ſteal from him the hearts of his Nobles and Subjects, and to ſet them all againſt him, and eſpecially the Princes of Germany, he was depoſed and diſappointed of his purpoſe.

Henry the 4th. again challengeth the election.

And although Henry the fifth (coming to Rome) brought Paſchalis the ſecond to that point, that he both in publick concion, and in writing ſealed, and alſo by Oath confirmed, reſtored again to the Emperors of Rome the Prerogative of Election, and of giving Eccleſiaſtical Dignities: yet notwithſtanding, after that Henry the Emperor was gone from Rome, Paſchalis the Pope, greatly repenting and ſorrowing that he had done (in allowing and confirming the priviledges of Emperors through fear) touching the giving and diſpoſing of Eccleſiaſtical functions, excommunicated the Emperor, and in a Synodal Council at Lateran, ordained and decreed that he ſhould be had and accounted a wicked enemy, that would take any Eccleſiaſtical function or preferment at the hands of a civil Magiſtrate; whereupon were made theſe Decrees, qu. 16. chap. 7, 13, 14, 15 and 16.

Henry the 5th. also ſtriveth for the election and faileth.

Prieſts accurſed that take any Benefice at the hands of a Layman.

Therefore when theſe Decrees touching the deſignation of Biſhops, in ſpight and contempt of the Emperor, were practiſed and put in ure; and when that now (eſpecially by the means and procurement of the Biſhops) inteſtine and Civil Wars began to riſe in the Empire; the Imperial Juriſdiction in this matter was not only weakned and much debilitate, but alſo in manner utterly broken and loſt. For when Henry the fifth Emperor was ſharply of Lotharius and his Vaſſals the Biſhops beſet, and laid unto by the provocation of the Pope, and was mightily, by the Biſhops that took his part on the other ſide, requeſted and intreated (in hope of publick peace and tranquility) that he would condeſcend and ſomewhat yield to the Popes demands: he at length (the more was the pity) that he might be reconciled and have peace with Pope Calixtus the ſecond, in the City of Vangio, departed from and with that his Prerogative or Juriſdiction of giving Eccleſiaſtical Preferments, to the Pope and his Prelates, now more than three hundred years (from the time of Carolus Magnus) in the hands of the Emperors of Rome, and until this time with great fortitude and Princely courage conſerved and kept; which reſignation turned to no ſmall detriment both of the Church of Chriſt, and Chriſtian Commonwealth.

{KING} {Hen. 3}

Henry the 5th. compaſſed by civil diſſention for the prerogative of election as his Father had.

Henry the 5th. reſigneth his prerogative of election.

Then firſt, and never before, obtained the Biſhop of Rome, and quietly enjoyed that Prerogative of Election, and beſtowing of Benefices, which he ſo long before with ſuch great policies (now ſecretly, now openly, and now with force) had ſought for. And with what ſufficient and good authority Gratianus will prove, that before this time the ſame authority was given to the City of Rome for the Election of the Pope without the conſent of the Emperor, he ſheweth, as in the 29 and 30 Canon, and what good ſtuff he putteth in the later, and how ſubtily that Papiſtical flatterer or Pontifical Paraſite hath forged the ſame, both Carolus Molineus ſufficiently in divers places hath noted, and by the obſervaon of times may of a mean Hiſtoriographer, that hath read the French and German Hiſtories, ſoon be eſpied and diſcerned. For firſt, five Biſhops one after another ſucceeded this Gregory the 4th. upon whom 29th. Canon is intituled or fathered; that is, Sergius the 2d. John the 8th. Adrian the 2d. John the 9th. and Adrian the third. Which Adrian by force, wreſting the authority of the Election from the People, was made Pope; when as Gregory (ſpecially to be noted) would not take on him the Papacy, before that the Emperor had conſented to his Election. After this, Molineus compareth Raphael Volateranus with the 30 Canon, which again is ſuſpected. For why? When Eugenius was Biſhop, who was the ſucceſſor of this Paſchalis, with whom Ludovicus Pius is ſaid to have made a League or paction, the ſame Ludovicus Pius with his Son Lotharius, together with the help of the King of Romans, at Rome made Laws both to all his Subjects in the Empire, as alſo to the Romans themſelves; ſpeaking nothing of the renewing of the Decree made by Lotharius. Then again, how could Leo the fourth write to Lotharius and Ludovicus Emperors, that counterfeit or forged Decree beginning with Conſtitutio. &c. when in the ſame, mention is made of Henricus Aucupes, and Otho the firſt, which reigned more than fourſcore years after them, and Leo the fourth Biſhop of Rome.

The election gotten to the Biſhops of Rome.

Gratianus found a forger of the Canons.

Sergius the ſecond. John the ſixth, and Adrian 3d.

The ſecond fault found with Gratianus.

The third fault found with Gratianus.

Now with what face dare this fond fellow Gratianus make Otho the firſt to be Authour of the 31 Canon, when as Otho deprived the ſame John the twelfth of the Papacy, and not only took nothing from the Imperial Juriſdiction concerning the Election, nor from the City of Rome, nor any other Biſhops ſubject to the Roman Empire, but added ſomewhat more thereunto, as was ſaid before. And yet notwithſtanding, ſo ſhameleſs and ſenſeleſs was this Gratian, that he durſt obtrude and lay before the Reader ſo manifeſt fraud and evident Legerdemaine (ſained and made of his own Brains in the compiling of this Decree) being ſo neceſſary, as he thought for the Dominion and Primacy of the Roman Biſhops, in the head of good and true laws; neither fearing that the ſame might be after his days reprehended, neither to his great ſhame and diſcredit to him attributed. Where alſo by the way is to be noted; that as this graceleſs Gratianus to pleaſe theſe Holy Fathers, and to erect their Kingdom, would give ſo impudent an attempt to the blinding and deceiving of all Poſterities, inſerting for grounded Truths, and holy How ſhameleſs and impudent Gratianus is in forging the Decrees.

Decrees

5 KING 1 Hen. 3

The corrupting of many good Works to be feared.

Decrees ſuch loud lies and deteſtable Doctrine, what may be thought of the rabble of the reſt of Writers in thoſe days, what attempts might hope of gain cauſe them to work, by whom and ſuch like is to be feared the falſifying of divers other good works now extant, in thoſe perilous times written?

The Election wreſted from the Emperor.

Thus when the Biſhops had once wreſted this authority out of the Emperors hands, they then ſo fortified and armed themſelves and their dominion, that although afterwards Frederick the firſt, Grandfather unto this good Emperor Frederick the ſecond, as alſo Ludovicus Pius, and Henricus Lucelburgenſis (as men moſt ſtudious and careful for the Dignities of the Empire, unfaigned lovers and maintainers of the utility of the Commonweal, and moſt deſirous of the preſervation and proſperity of the Church) did all their endeavours, with ſingular wiſdom and ſtrength, as much as in them lay, to recover again from the Biſhop of Rome this authority of the Imperial Juriſdiction ſoft moſt cruelly and wickedly abuſing the ſame, to the deſtruction both of the Empire, undoing of the Commonwealth, and utter ſubverſion of the Church of God, yet could they not be able to bring the ſame to paſs in thoſe dark and ſhadowed times of perverſe Doctrine and Errors of the People, and moſt miſerable ſervitude of Civil Magiſtrates.

Rome once catcheth that ſhe keepeth.

Not without good cauſe deſired they to muzzle the people in ignorance.

The ſame and like priviledge alſo in the Election of their Biſhops and Prelates, and diſpoſing of Eccleſiaſtical Offices, as the Emperor of Rome had, every Prince and King in their ſeveral Dominions had the like. For by the Decree of the Council of Toletan, which in the 25 Canon and 63 Diſtinction is mentioned, the authority of creating and chuſing Biſhops and Prelates in Spain, was in the power of the King of Spain. The like alſo by the Hiſtories of Clodoveus, Carolus Magnus, Ludovicus nonus, Philippus Auguſtus, Philippus Pulcher, Carolus quintus, Carolus ſextus, Carolus ſeptimus, Kings of France, is apparent and well known; for all theſe Kings had the chief charge and government of the French Church, and not the Biſhops of Rome.

Every King and Prince in their ſeveral Kingdoms, had alſo till that time the Prerogative of Election.

Spain had the ſame.

France had the ſame.

England had the election.

And by our Engliſh Hiſtories alſo, as you heard, it is manifeſt, that the authority of chuſing Eccleſiaſtical Miniſters and Biſhops was always in the Kings of England, till the Reign of King Henry the firſt; who by the labour and procurement of Anſelmus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was deprived and put from the ſame.

Germany had the election.

Alſo the Princes of Germany and Electors of the Emperor, till the time of Henry the fifth, had all (every Prince ſeverally in his own Dition and Province) the ſame Juriſdiction and Prerogative, to give and diſpoſe Eccleſiaſtical Functions to their Prelates at their pleaſure, and after that it appertained to the People and Prelates together. And how in the Reign of Frederick the Prelates gat unto themſelves alone this immunity, Johannes Aventinus in his 7th. Book of the Annals of the Boiores doth deſcribe.

Sicilia had the election.

Alſo it is probable, that the Kings of Sicilia had the ſame faculty in giving and diſpoſing their Eccleſiaſtical promotions and charge of Churches: Andræas de Iſthmia ad 1. conſtit. Neap. nu. 12. And that becauſe Frederick defended himſelf againſt the tyranny of the Biſhop of Rome, therefore (as Fazellus ſaith) he was excommunicated of Honorius; but that Platina and Blondus alledge other cauſes, wherefore he was excommunicate of Honorius, I am not ignorant; howbeit, he that will compare their Writings with others, that write more indifferently between Honorius and him, ſhall eaſily find, that they more ſought the favour of the Roman Biſhops, than to write a verity. But now again to the Hiſtory of Frederick.

The death of Conſtantia Wife of Frederick.

Nicolaus Ciſnerus affirmeth, that whilſt Frederick the Emperor was in Sicilia, his Wife Conſtantia died at Catiana or Catana. In the mean time the Chriſtians which with a great Navy ſailed into Egypt, and took the City Heliopolis, commonly called Dalmatia, and long ago named Peluſinum, being in good hope to have driven Sultanus the Soldan out of Egypt, had a great and marvelous overthrow by the conveying of the Water of the Floud Nilus (which then overflowed into their Camp) and were fain to accord an unprofitable Truce with the Soldan for certain years, and ſo deliver the City again; and ſo departing out of Egypt, were fain to come to Achon and Tyrus, to the no ſmall detriment and loſs of the Chriſtian Army. Whereupon King John ſirnamed Brennus (being King of Jeruſalem) arrived in Italy, and prayed aid of the Emperor againſt his enemies, in whom he had great hope to find remedy of the evils and calamities before declared; and from thence he went to Rome to the Pope, declaring unto him the great diſcomfiture and overthrow paſt, as alſo the preſent peril and calamity that they were in, deſiring alſo his aid therein. By whoſe means (as Ciſnerus ſaith) the Emperor was reconciled again to the Pope, and made friends together; to whom alſo King John gave Joel his Daughter in Marriage, which came of the Daughter of Conradus King of Jeruſalem, and Marqueſs of Montferrat; with whom he had for Dowry the inheritance of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, as right Heir thereunto by her Mother. By whom alſo he after obtained the Kingdom of Naples and Sicilia, and promiſed, that, with as much expedient ſpeed as he might, he would prepare a power for the recovery again of Jeruſalem, and be there himſelf in proper perſon; which thing to do, for that upon divers occaſions he deferred (whereof ſome think one, ſome another) Honorius, unto whom he was lately reconciled, purpoſed to have made againſt him ſome great and ſecret attempt, had he not been by death before prevented, upon whom were made theſe Verſes:

Frederick & the Pope made friends.

Honorius the Pope dieth before he put his practice in ure againſt Frederick.

O pater Honori, multorum nate dolori,
Eſt tibi decori vivere, vade mori.

After whom ſucceeded Gregorius the Ninth, as great an enemy of Frederick, as was Honorius; which Gregory came of the race whom the Emperor (as before ye heard) condemned of Treaſon which they wrought againſt him. This Gregory was ſcarcely ſettled in his Papacy, when that he threatned him greatly with Excommunication, unleſs he would prepare himſelf into Aſia according to his promiſe as ye heard before, to King John; and what the cauſe was why the Pope ſo haſtened the journey of Frederick into Aſia, you ſhall hear hereafter: In effect, he could not well bring that to paſs, which in his miſchievous mind he had deviſed, unleſs the Emperor were further from him. Notwithſtanding, Frederick it ſhould ſeem ſmelling a Rat, or miſtruſting ſomewhat (as well he might) alledged divers cauſes and lets, as lately and truly he did to Honorius.

Gregory the 9th. as great an enemy to Frederick as Honorius.

Frederick refuſeth to go into Aſia at the Popes bidding: The Pope is angry.

Fazellus a Sicilian Writer ſaith, that the ſpecial cauſe of the Emperors ſtay was, for the Oath of Truce and Peace during certain years, which was made between the Saracens and Chriſtians as you heard, which time was not yet expired.

The cauſe of the ſtay of the Emperors journey into Aſia.

The ſame Fazellus alſo writeth thus of King John of Jeruſalem, that when his Daughter was brought to Rome, the Emperor and the Pope were reconciled together. And being called up to Rome to celebrate the Marriage, Pope Gregory (as the manner of thoſe proud Prelates is) offered his right foot unto the Emperor to kiſs. But the Emperor, not ſtooping ſo low, ſcarcely with his Lip touched the upper part of his knee, and would not kiſs his foot; which thing the Pope took in very evil part, and was therewith marvelouſly offended. But for that no opportunity at that time ſerved to revenge his conceived grudge and old malice, he diſſembled the ſame, as he might for that time, thinking to recompence it at the full, as time would ſerve, and fall out therefore.

The Pope diſſembleth his grudge.

After this, it fortuned that the Emperor hearing how the Chriſtians were oppreſſed by the Soldan in Syria, and that from Arſacida, there came a great power againſt the Chriſtian Princes; he made the more haſte, and was with more deſire incouraged to ſet forward his journey into Aſia. Wherefore, aſſembling the Nobility of the Empire at Ravenna and Cremona, he gave in commandment to Henry his Son (whom not long before he cauſed to be created Ceſar) that he ſhould perſwade the Nobles and Princes of the Empire, that they all would be ready to put to their helping hands, in furthering this his journey and enterpriſe. This writeth Fazellus; howbeit, ſome others affirm that theſe things were done in the time of Honorius. But howſoever the matter is, this thing is manifeſt; that Frederick to ſatisfie the Popes deſire, which never would lin, but by all means ſought to provoke him forward, gave him at length his promiſe, that by a certain time he would prepare an Army, and fight himſelf againſt thoſe which kept from him the City of Jeruſalem (which thing he alſo confeſſeth himſelf in his Epiſtles, and alſo how he deſired and obtained of the Peers and Nobility of the Empire, their aid thereunto) and alſo appointed a convenient time when they ſhould be at Brunduſium.

The preparation of the Emperors War againſt the Turk.

In the mean ſeaſon, he with all his power and indeavour, made ſpeedy and haſty preparation for the Wars: he rigged and manned a puiſſant Navy; he had the pickedſt Men and beſt Souldiers that were in every Country, and made warlike provition and furniture for every thing that to ſuch a Voyage and Expedition appertained. Neither was the matter ſlacked, but at the time appointed great Bands aſſembled and muſtred both of German Soldiers and others, and under their Captains appointed, ſet forth and marched to Brunduſium: (Their Generals were Thuringus and Sigibertus, and Auguſtinus the Biſhop) where they long time lying, and attending the Emperors coming, being let by infirmity and ſickneſs, great Peſtilence and ſundry Diſeaſes moleſted them, by reaſon of the great heat and intemperance of that Country; and many a Souldier there loſt his life; among whom alſo died Thuringus, one of their Generals. The Emperor when he had ſomewhat recovered his health, with all his Navy lanched out, and ſet forward to Brunduſium. And when he came to the Straits of Peloponeſus and Creta, being Iſlands lying in the Sea, and there for lack of convenient Wind was ſtayd, ſuddenly the Emperor (his Diſeaſes growing upon him again) fell ſick; and ſending before all or the moſt part of his Bands and Ships into Paleſtina, promiſing them moſt aſſuredly to come after and follow them ſo ſoon as he might recover and get never ſo little health; he himſelf with a few Ships returned and came to Brunduſium, and from thence for want of health, went into Apulia.

Great ſickneſs in the Emperors Army.

The Emperor himſelf ſick.

The Pope excommunicateth the Emperor for ſtaying his Voyage. He layeth falſe accuſations to his charge.

When tydings hereof came to the Popes ear, he ſent out his thundring Curſes and new Excommunications againſt the Emperor. The cauſes whereof I find noted and mentioned by his own Letters, that is, How that when he had robbed and taken from Brunduſius, Prince of Thuring, his Horſes, his Mony and other rich furniture of his houſe at the time of his death, he ſailed into Italy; not for the intent to make War againſt the Turk. but to convey his prey that he had ſtoln and taken awa- from Brunduſius; and ſo neglecting his Oath and promiſe which he had made, and faigning himſelf to be ſick, came home again: And that by his default alſo, Damiata was loſt, and the Hoſt of the Chriſtians ſore afflicted. Fazellus, beſides theſe cauſes ſpoken of before, doth write that the Pope alledged theſe alſo; that he defiled a certain Damſel which was in the Queens Nurſery; and that he ſlew his Wife when he had whipped her in the Priſon, for declaring the miſchievous act to her Father King John. But all the Writers, and alſo Blondus himſelf doth declare, that this Joel died after the publication of the Proſcript and Excommunication; wherefore the Pope could not without great ſhame allege the cauſe upon the death of Joel; for undoubtedly the truth is, that ſhe of her Son Conradus died in Childbed. Then Frederick, to refel and avoid the foreſaid ſlanders, ſendeth the Biſhop of Brundis and other Legates to Rome, whom the Pope would not ſuffer to come to his preſence, neither yet to the Councils of the Cardinals to make his purgation. Wherefore the Emperor, to purge himſelf of the crimes which the Pope did ſo falſly accuſe him of, both to all Chriſtian Kings, and eſpecially to the Princes of Germany, and all the Nobles of the Empire, writeth his Letters (which are to be ſeen) that thoſe things are both falſe and alſo fained, and of the Popes own head invented; and ſheweth, how that his Embaſſadors with his purgation could not be ſuffered to come to the Popes preſence; alſo doth largely intreat, how unthankful and ungrateful the Biſhops of Rome were towards him for the great benefits, which both he and alſo his Predeceſſors had beſtowed upon them and the Roman Church: which Letter, for that it is over tedious here to place, conſidering the diſcourſe of the Hiſtory is ſomewhat long, the ſum of the purgation is this:

The Emperor purgeth himſelf of thoſe crimes the Pope laid againſt him, by his Letters dedicated to all Chriſtian Princes.

He proteſteth and declareth univerſally, that he had always great care for the Chriſtian Commonwealth, and that he had determined even from his youth to fight againſt the Turk and Saracens. And for that occaſion he made a promiſe to the Princes Electors of Aquiſgrane, how that he would take the War upon him. Afterward he renewed his promiſe at Rome when he was conſecrated of Honorius; then when he married the Daughter of the King of Jeruſalem, which was an Heir of the ſame. And for becauſe that Kingdom might be defended and kept from the injuries of the enemies, and becauſe he favoured it even as he did his own, he prepared an huge Navy, and gathered together a ſtrong Army of Men, neither did he neglect any thing that belonged to the furniture of the War. But when the time was come, and his Band was gathered together, his ſickneſs would not ſuffer him to be there. And afterward when he had recovered the ſame, and came to Brunduſium, and from thence without any diſturbance went forthwith to Sea, he fell into the ſame ſickneſs again, by the which he was let of his purpoſe, which thing (ſaith he) he is able to prove by ſufficient teſtimony. How the Pope alſo doth lay the loſing of Damiata, and other things which proſpered not well with him, unjuſtly to his charge, when as he had made great proviſion for the ſame journey, both of Soldiers and other neceſſary things. But he that will underſtand theſe things more plainly, among other Epiſtles of Petrus de Vineis, written in the name of Frederick, let him read theſe eſpecially which begin thus: In admirationem, & juſticiam, & innocentiam, & Levate oculos. And truly, even as Fredericus the Emperor declareth in his Letters concerning this matter, all the old Writers of Germany do accord and agree in the ſame.

The Emperors purgation.

The Emperors Epiſtle beginning thus: In admirationem & juſticiam, and again, Levate oculos.

Matth. Pariſienſis alſo briefly collecteth the effect of another Letter which he wrote to the King of England, complaining unto him of the Excommunication of the Pope againſt him, whoſe words are theſe: And amongſt other Catholick Princes (ſaith he) he alſo wrote his Letters unto the King of England, embulled with Gold; Declaring in the ſame, that the Biſhop of Rome was ſo inflamed with the fire of avarice and manifeſt concupiſcence, that he was not contented with the Goods of the Church which were innumerable, but alſo that he ſhamed not to bring Princes, Kings and Emperors to be ſubjects and contributors to him, and ſo to diſherit them, and put them from their Kingly dignities: And that the King of England himſelf had good experiment thereof, whoſe Father (that is to ſay, King John*) they ſo long held excommunicate, till they had brought both him and his Dominions under ſervitude, and to pay unto him tribute. Alſo that many have experience of the ſame by the Earl of* Tholouſe and divers other Princes, which ſo long held their Perſons and Lands in interdict, till they might bring them into like ſervitude. I pretermit (ſaith he) the Simonies and ſundry ſorts of exactions (the like whereof was never yet heard) which daily are uſed amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical perſons, beſides their manifeſt Uſury (yet ſo cloaked and coloured to the ſimple ſort, that therewithal they infect the whole world) They be ſugard and embalmed Simoniſts, the inſatiable Horſe-leaches or blood-ſuckers, ſaying, that the Church of Rome is our Mother and Nurſe, whereas it is indeed the moſt polling Court in the univerſal World, the root and right Mother of all miſchief, uſing and exerciſing no motherly doings or deeds, but bringing forth the right exerciſes of a wicked Step-dame, making ſufficient proof thereof by her manifeſt fruits to all the world apparent. Let the Barons of England conſider whether this be true or not, whom Pope Innocent by his Bulls with one conſent encouraged to riſe and rebel againſt their Soveraign Lord and Prince King John your Father, as an obſtinate enemy to the Church of Rome. But after that the King (far out of ſquare) remembring himſelf had crouched unto him, and obliged both himſelf and Kingdom to the Church of Rome, more like a Woman than a Man; and that the wiſe Barons, whom the Pope had firſt maintained and ſtirred up, without all ſhame, either of the World, or fear of God, had done the ſame, he ſought how he might with gaping mouth devour and conſume the ſweet fat from them, whom he had miſerably to death betraied and diſherited, as the manner of the Roman Biſhops is. By whoſe greedy avarice it came to paſs, that England the Prince of Provinces was brought under miſerable ſubjection and tribute. Behold the manners and conditions of our Roman Biſhops: behold the ſnares wherewith theſe Prelates do ſeek to intangle men withal, to wipe their noſes of their money, to make their children bond-

The effect of the Emperors Letters.

KING Hen. 3

bondmen, to diſquiet ſuch as ſeek to live in peace, being clothed with Sheeps clothing, when indeed they be but ravening Wolves, ſending their Legates hither and thither to excommunicate and ſuſpend; as having power to puniſh whom they liſt, not ſowing the Seed, that is the Word of God, to fructifie, but that they may bribe and poll mens perſons, and reap that which they never did ſow. Thus cometh it to paſs, that they ſpoil the holy Churches and Houſes of God, which ſhould be the refuge for the poor, and the Manſion-Houſes of Saints, which our devout and ſimple Parents to that purpoſe builded and ordained to the refection of poor Men and Pilgrims, and to the ſuſtentation of ſuch as were well diſpoſed and religious. But theſe degenerate Varlets, whom only Letters have made both mad and malepert, do ſtrive and gape to be both Kings and Emperors.

Who be the ravening Wolves in Sheeps clothing.

The Treaſure of the Church belongeth to the Pope.

Doubtleſs the Primitive Church was builded and laid in poverty and ſimplicity of life, and then as a fruitful mother begat the thoſe her holy Children, whom the catalogue of Saints now maketh mention of; and verily no other foundation can be laid of any other Church, than that which is laid by Jeſus Chriſt. But this Church as it ſwimmeth and wallowеth in all ſuperfluity of riches, and doth build and raiſe the frame in all ſuperfluous wealth and glory; ſo is it to be feared leſt the Walls thereof fall to decay, and when the Walls be down, utter ruine and ſubverſion follow after. Againſt us, he knoweth that is the ſearcher of all hearts, how furiouſly theſe Catholicks rage and go to work, ſaying, and therefore excommunicating me, that I will not take upon me the journey I have promiſed beyond the Seas, whereas inevitable and moſt urgent cauſes and perils, as well to the Church of God, as alſo to the Empire, beſides the annoyance of mine infirmity and ſickneſs, do detain me at home, and ſtay the ſame, but ſpecially the inſolency of the rebellious Sicilians. For why? neither do we think it ſafety to our Empire, nor expedient to the Chriſtian State, that we ſhould now take our journey into Aſia, leaving behind us at home ſuch inteſtine and Civil Wars; no more than for a good Surgeon to lay a healing Plaiſter to a grievous wound new made and ſtricken with the Sword. In concluſion alſo this he addeth, admoniſhing all the Princes of the world, that they would beware and take heed (by their avaricious iniquity) of like peril and danger to themſelves, becauſe that, as the Proverb is, It behoveth him to look about, that ſeeth his neighbours houſe on fire. Thus much out of Pariſ. pag. 69.

Chriſts Church was builded in humility: the Popes Church is all ſuperfluity. Ergo, the Popes Church is not Chriſts Church.

But now, that Frederick the Emperor might in very deed ſtop the mouth of the cruel Pope, which did perſiſt and go forward ſtill in his Excommunication againſt him: and that he might declare to the whole World, how that the laſt year he forefollowed not his journey by his own voluntary will, but by neceſſity; when he had deviſed and prepared all things meet for the War, and that he had gathered together, and levied a great Army of Men, he departed from thence to Brunduſium, committing the government of his Kingdom to Reinaldus the Son of Duke Spoletus, and to Anſelmus a Baron of Inſtigenſis, and came by Sea to Cyprus with his Hoſt.

Another journey of the Emperor to Jeruſalem.

From Cyprus the Emperor with his whole Navy, ſailed into Joppa, which City he fortified, for that the paſſages by Land were ſtopped and kept of the enemies; and by Sea he might not paſs nor travel, by means of the extream Weather and Tempeſt; whereby it came to paſs, that within ſhort ſpace they lacked Victuals, and were ſore afflicted with Famine. Then fell they to prayer, and made their humble ſupplication to God; with whoſe tears his wrath being appeaſed, the great Tempeſt, and long continued foul Weather ceaſed, whereby (the Seas being now calm) they had both Victuals great plenty, and all other neceſſary things for their need brought unto them, whereby immediately it came to paſs, that both the Emperor and his Army, as alſo the Inhabitants of Joppa were greatly refreſhed and animated; and on the other ſide, their enemies being diſappointed of their purpoſe, were greatly diſcouraged; inſomuch that the King of Egypt, who with great power (accompanied with Scarapho his Brother, Prince of Gaza, and the Prince of Damaſcus their Nephew, with many other Dukes and Nobles) had incamped themſelves within one days journey of Joppa, thinking to have beſieged the ſame, were contented upon the coming of the Emperors Heralds unto them, to intreat of a peace. Whereupon Embaſſadors were ſent unto them with the Emperors demands, right profitable to the Chriſtian Commonweal. The Saracens (immediately conſulting upon the ſame) granted thereunto; ſo that a peace for ten years was concluded, and was confirmed by ſolemn Oath on the behalf of both Princes, according to their ſeveral uſages and manner: the form and condition of which Articles of Peace briefly collected, are theſe:

The Emperor oppreſſed by famine, and by prayer miraculouſly relieved.

A concluſion of a profitable peace during ten years, between the Turks & the Chriſtians.

Firſt, That Frederick the Emperor ſhould be crowned and anointed King of Jeruſalem, according to the manner of the Kings of Jeruſalem before him.

The Articles of the Peace agreed upon.

Secondly, That all the Lands and Poſſeſſions which were ſituate betwixt Jeruſalem and Ptolomaida, and the greateſt part of Paleſtina, and Cities of Tyrus and Sidon, which were in Syria, and all other Territories which Baldwinus the fourth at any time had and did occupy there, ſhould be delivered unto him, only certain Caſtles reſerved.

Thirdly, That he might fortifie and build what Fortreſſes and Caſtles, Cities and Towns he thought good in all Syria and Paleſtina.

Fourthly, That all the Priſoners which were in the Saracens hands, ſhould be ranſomed freely and ſent home: And again, That the Saracens might have leave without Armour, to come into the Temple where the Lords Sepulcher is, to pray; and that they ſhould hold and keep ſtill Chratum, and the Kings Mount.

Frederick now, for that he thought the concluſion of this peace to be both neceſſary, and alſo profitable for all Chriſtians, and had alſo gotten as much thereby, as if the Wars had continued, he ſhould; ſent his Legates with Letters unto the Weſt to all Chriſtian Kings, Princes and Potentates, as alſo to the Biſhop of Rome, declaring unto them the circumſtance and ſucceſs of his Journey and Wars, as partly ye have heard; requiring them that they alſo would praiſe and give God thanks for his good ſucceſs and profitable peace concluded: And deſireth the Pope, that forſomuch as he had now accompliſhed his promiſe, neither was there now any cauſe wherefore he ſhould be with him diſpleaſed, that he might be reconciled and obtain his favour.

The Letters of Frederick, to the Princes & Pope of his ſucceſs.

In the mean ſeaſon the Emperor with all his Army marcheth to Jeruſalem; where, upon Eaſter day, in the year one thouſand two hundred twenty and nine, he was with great triumph and comfort of all his Nobles, and alſo the Magiſtrates of that Kingdom (only the Patriarch of Cyprus the Kings Legate, and Oliver the Maſter or Captain of the Temple with his company excepted) ſolemnly and with great applauſe crowned King.

The Emperor crowned King of Jeruſalem.

After this, he re-edifieth the City and Walls thereof, which by the Saracens were beaten down and battered. After that, he furniſheth it with munition, he buildeth up the Churches and Temples that were ruinous, he fortifieth Nazarethum and Joppen with ſtrong Gariſons, Victuals, and all other things neceſſary.

Now ſee and behold I pray you, whilſt Frederick was thus occupied in the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, what practices the Pope had in Italy; not I warrant you, any whit at all careful in the affairs of the Chriſtian Commonwealth, but ſtudying and labouring what miſchief and ſpight he might work againſt the Emperor, whom of ſet purpoſe he had ſo occupied (partly for hate, and partly to inrich himſelf) in Aſia and Jeruſalem, ſo far out of Italy ye may be ſure. Firſt, he cauſed the Souldiers, which the Emperor ſent for out of Germany to the maintenance of the holy wars, to be ſtaied as they paſſed through Italy, letting them of their journey, and took from them, and ſpoiled them of all ſuch proviſion as they had. And not only this, but he ſent ſecretly alſo his Letters into Aſia to thoſe that were of his own faction, that is, to the Patriarch of Jeruſalem, and Souldiers that kept the Temple and the Hoſpital, inticing and inciting them to rebel againſt the Emperor; which thing Blondus himſelf, that Popiſh Paraſite, or Hiſtoriographer, diſſembleth not nor hideth not. But furthermore, he diſſwaded the Princes of the Saracens, that they ſhould make no League nor take any Truce with Frederick, neither deliver up unto him the Crown and Kingdom of Jeruſalem. Which Letters, as they were manifeſt niſeſt teſtimonies of his Treachery and Treaſon towards him, whom God had inſtituted and made his Liege Lord and Sovereign, and mightieſt Potentate upon the Earth; ſo was it his will that he ſhould come to the knowledge thereof, and that thoſe Letters ſhould fall into his hands. And that he kept the ſame Letters for the more credible teſtimony thereof, in the ſame his laſt Epiſtle unto the Chriſtian Princes he proteſteth. The Copy of which Letters amongſt his other Epiſtles you ſhall have expreſſed.

The firſt and ſecret practice of Pope Gregory the Ninth.

The Emperor withſtandeth the ſecret treaſon which the Pope had wrought againſt him at Jeruſalem.

Neither were the Popes Letters written to that leavened and factious Sect in vain; for the Patriarch and his Collegioners, which took their name of the Temple, did mightily repugne againſt Frederick. They raiſed a Tumult in Ptolomaida againſt him; they accuſed him and his Legates openly of Treaſon, and did malapertly and boldly withſtand the right worthy and good order he made amongſt them. But as God would, by the help of the inhabitants of Piſa and the Genoways, and the Dutch Soldiers, both their falſe accuſations were refelled, and alſo their ſeditious purpoſe and tumult repreſſed. And this was the cauſe that when all other Men rejoiced and were glad of the Emperors Coronation, they, as wicked confederators, were heavy therefore, and obtrectors of his worthy laud and fame.

The ſecond and manifeſt treaſon of the Pope againſt Frederick.

The Pope, when he had thus conſpired againſt Frederick, and had betrayed him to the publick Enemy of all Chriſtian Men, the Turk, he could not diſſemble this his miſchievous fact, nor content himſelf therewith, but he would deviſe and practice yet another. For, by reaſon of thoſe ſlanders (which a little before I touched) of the death and ſlaughter of his Wife Joel, he incited John Brennus his Father-in-law to make War againſt him, who cauſed the Subjects of his Empire to withdraw from him their Allegiance, as alſo the inhabitants of Picenum, and inhabitants of Lombardy. And thus joyning themſelves together, they craved further aid of the French King, whereby they made a great power. That done, they divided their Hoſt in two Armies, invading with the one the Empire, and with the other the proper Territories and Ditions belonging to the inheritance of Frederick; John Brennus and Pandolph Savellanus leading the one (as Generals) into Campania and the Kingdom of Naples; and the other (with John Columma Cardinal, his Legate, and that Thomas before convicted of Treaſon, being his Lieutenant) he ſendeth into Picenum.

Brennus, Pandolphus, Johannes Columna, & Thomas the Traitor, the Popes Generals and Leaders of his Hoſt.

Of this Treaſon of the Pope againſt Fredericus doth alſo Matthæus Pariſienſis make mention, during his Wars in Aſia, who (ſaith he) purpoſed to have depoſed him, and to have placed Alium quemlibet filium pacis & obedientiæ loco ejus ſubrogare; That is, any other, he cared not whom (ſo that he were the child of peace and obedience) in his ſtead. And for the more certainty thereof, the ſaid Matth. Pariſienſis, pag. 71. repeateth the Letter which a certain Earl of Syria wrote unto him concerning the ſame, which Letter hereunder enſueth word for word.

TO the High and Mighty Prince, Fredericus, by the grace of God Emperor of Rome, and ever Auguſtus, and moſt puiſſant King of Sicilia, Thomas Earl of Actran, his faithful and truſty Subject in all things, humble ſalutation. After your departure, moſt excellent Prince, Gregory the Biſhop of Rome, and publick enemy to your magnificence, gabering together a great power and Hoſt of Men by Johannes Brennus, late King of Jeruſalem, and other ſtout Captains, whom he hath made Generals of the ſame his Hoſt, as a foreign enemy invading your Dominions and Poſſeſſions of your Highneſs Subjects, againſt the Law of Chriſtianity, hath purpoſed and determined to vanquiſh and ſubdue you with the material or temporal Sword, whom he cannot maſter and overcome with the ſpiritual Sword he ſaith. For he foreſaid John Brennus gathering out of France, and other Provinces near adjoyning, a great Army, giveth unto them of the Treaſure he hath gotten together (by what means I cannot tell) great Wages, in hope to recover and get from you the Empire. And furthermore, the ſame John and others (the Captains of the See Apoſtolical) invading your Land, burn and deſtroy all as they go, driving away, and taking for their booties all that they can come by, as well Cattel as other things, and ſuch as they take priſoners, they conſtrain, by afflicting them with grievous puniſhments, to ranſom themſelves for great Summs of Mony: neither ſpare Man, Woman nor Child, but take and keep your Towns and Caſtles, having no regard that you be in the ſervice of Jeſus Chriſt. And further, if any make mention of your Majeſty unto him, he ſaith, there is none other Emperor but himſelf. Your friends and ſubjects, moſt excellent Prince, much marvel hereupon; yea, and alſo the Clergy themſelves of the Empire, do marvel with what Conſcience, or upon what conſideration the Biſhop of Rome can do the ſame, making ſuch bloudy Wars and ſlaughter upon Chriſtian men; eſpecially ſeeing that Chriſt commanded Peter, when he ſtrook with the material Sword, to put up the ſame into the Scabbard, ſaying; All that ſtrike with the Sword, ſhall periſh with the Sword, Or elſe, by what Law he daily can excommunicate ſuch Pirats, burners of Mens Houſes, and Robbers, when he is the patron and maintainer of ſuch himſelf: hereat they greatly muſe and marvel. Wherefore moſt mighty and renowned Emperor, I beſeech your Highneſs to conſider your own ſafety, for that the ſaid John Brennus hath laid and fortified all the Ports and Havens with no ſmall company of Men and Souldiers; that if (not knowing thereof) your Grace ſhould arrive in any of them, the ſame Garriſons of his may apprehend and take you as a Priſoner, which thing to chance God forefend.

KING Hen. 3

Thus whilſt the Hoſt of this Hoſtile enemy the Pope was incamped in the Dominions of Frederick, he received the Letters which Frederick by his Legates ſent into Europa, as you heard, whereby he underſtood the good ſucceſs he had in Aſia; who not only took no delectation at all therein, but was alſo in a vehement perturbation therewith. Whereby manifeſtly it may appear, what was the cauſe and meaning of the Pope, that he was ſo ſolicitous and urgent to have Frederick the Emperor make a Voyage into Aſia. Doubtleſs even the ſame that Pelias had, when by his inſtigation, he procured Jaſon, with all the choſen youth and flower of Grecia, to ſail into Colchus to fetch away the golden Fleece; and that by the opportunity of his abſence he might uſe, or rather abuſe his power and tyranny; and that Frederick might either be long afflicted and moleſted in the Aſian War, or that he might periſh and loſe his life therein, was that he ſought, and all that he deſired.

What meaning the Pope had to ſend Frederick to fight againſt the Turk.

And when he ſaw, that Fortune neither favoured his fetches, nor ſerved to his longing luſt, he was as a Man bereft of his wits, ſpecially at theſe tidings of the proſperous ſucceſs of the Emperor. He tore and threw all his Letters on the ground, and with all opprobrious words rebuked and reviled the Legates for the Emperor their Maſters ſake; which thing alſo Blondus himſelf denieth not, though he write altogether in favour of the Pope. And to the intent that he might cover this his rage, and unbridled fury with ſome cloak and colour of juſt deſerved dolor, he fained himſelf therefore ſo much to miſlike therewith, as though the Emperor therein had only reſpected his own private commodity, not regarding the utility of the Chriſtians; for that the Saracens had licence (although without armour and weapon to have repared unto the Sepulchre of Chriſt, and had left for them ſomewhat near the ſame an Hoſtery or lodging place; for which occaſion (ſaith Blondus) his Lord Pope rebuked the Emperors Legates, by the name of Traitors and ſuch like other opprobrious words. Now go to, friend Blondus, by what ſtrong arguments prove you and your Lord Pope, either that the peace which the Emperor hath concluded, was againſt the Chriſtian Common-wealth, or that the Emperor was a Traitor? But who is it that ſeeth not theſe things either by reading of old and ancient Writers, or elſe partly by me that have gathered and collected the ſame out of divers Monuments and Hiſtories, and plainly perceiveth not the conſpiracies and treaſons of your good Lord the Pope, ſo notable and filthy, as alſo his manifeſt ſhame and infamy? What? there be divers that write how the Pope commanded theſe Legates of Frederick to be made ſecretly out of the way, and alſo how he commanded divers Soldiers, returning out of Aſia, to be ſlain, to the end that none ſhould hear the report of thoſe good News which were in Aſia, nor any go thither to tell the fetches he had in hand at home. But I will make report of no more than of thoſe thing which all the Writers with moſt conſent agree upon. This is moſt certain, that

How the Pope chafeth and fretteth at the proſperous ſucceſs of the Emperor.

Blondus reproved, that wrote ſo greatly in the Popes favour.

{KING Hen. 3}

that the Pope cauſed this rumour to be ſpread of the death and taking of the Emperor upon this conſideration, that he might allure unto him the fidelity of thoſe Cities in the Kingdom of Naples, which yet kept their Allegiance unto Frederick, of whom they ſhould now hope for no longer refuge. And of that doth the Emperor, in his Epiſtle Intituled Levate oculos, greatly againſt him complain.

The third practice of Pope Gregory againſt the Emperor.

Great are theſe injuries of the Pope againſt Frederick, and moſt wicked Treaſons. But herewith could not the cruel and tyrannical mind of him be contented, nor his luſt ſatisfied, but it ſo far exceeded, as ſcarce is credible that it could: for he preſumed not only to ſet variance between Henry (whom Frederick his Father had cauſed to be made King of Germany) and him, but alſo by his allurements, he cauſed him to become an enemy unto him. To whom when his Father had aſſigned the Duke of Boioria (named Ludovicus) to be his Overſeer and Counſellor; neither knew he amongſt all the Princes of Germany, a Man more faithful to him in his office and duty, or elſe more vertuous, or elſe more grave and apt to be in authority: Henry fearing leſt he ſhould underſtand and know of theſe ſecret counſels, which he with his Conſpirators had in hand againſt his Father, or that he ſhould utter the ſame unto him, or that he ſhould go about to diſſwade him from that he was purpoſed to do by authority of the Court and Senate of Rome, he put him out of Office. And this was the fetch of all their policy, that together and at one inſtant (but in divers and ſundry places far one from another) ſharp and cruel War might be made againſt the Emperor, ſo that, his power being diſtract to the appeaſing of variable contention, he might himſelf be the eaſier oppreſſed of a few.

The Pope ſetteth the Son againſt the Father, as a good father of peace.

Henry Ceſar at the Popes inticement, putteth from him his true Counſellor Ludovicus.

When the Emperor now underſtood what ſtir the Pope kept in all his dominions in his abſence, and when he had ſomewhat reformed and appeaſed the troubles which he ſecretly had wrought him in the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, thinking to prevent the Popes purpoſe in that he went about, and alſo to confirm the friendſhip towards him of them whom in his abſence he found his truſty Subjects: he left in Aſia Renaldus with his Garriſons, commanding all the other bands to be under his appointment; and with all ſpeed he came forth in certain Gallies to Calabria. During the time of his there being, which unlooked for came thither, he aſſembled his power, and made with his friends all the ſpeedy preparation that he might. From thence he went to Berleta, where he tarried twenty days, to whom came the Duke of Spoletanum with all his Garriſons; and ſo from thence with all his power he came into Apulia, and removed John Brennus his Father-in-law from the Siege of Calatia, and within ſhort time by Gods help recovereth again all his Holds and Dominions there. And from thence going into Campania, he winneth Beneventum, and as many othere Towns and Holds as the Pope had there, even almoſt to Rome, and ſo after that Umbria and Picena. And now although the Emperor (being moved thereunto upon good occaſion, and upon the Popes worthy deſert) had gotten and recovered this ſo likely an entrance upon the Popes Dominions, whereby he might have revenged him of all the injuries done to him: yet notwithſtanding, for that he preferred nothing before the Chriſtian and publick tranquility (for the love of which he reſtraining his wrath ſo vehemently urged and kindled) he ſendeth unto him his Legates to intreat a peace, declaring unto him, that if no other conceived grudge towards him were than that he diſſembled and pretended, he promiſeth that he would make to him an account voluntarily, of all things that ever he had done in his life, and that he would and was contented to ſubmit himſelf unto the Church; and alſo that for this cauſe he willingly offered unto him both duty and obſervance. Furthermore, to the intreating of this peace, and deciding of all controverſies, he ſent to the Pope eight or ten of the nobleſt and chiefeſt about him that were Princes and Dukes of the Empire; as Bartolduſt the Patriarch of Aquileia, and his Brother Otho Prince of Dalmatia and Hiſtria, Eberhardus, Juvanenſis, Sigifridus, Reginoburgenſis, Sibbotus, Auguſtanus a worthy Prelat, Leopaldus of Auſtria and Styria, and Bernhardus, being all Dukes; beſides others of the Nobility to accompany them.

The Emperor hearing of the Popes practices, returneth ſecretly out of Aſia.

John Brennus removed from the Siege of Calatia.

God proſpereth Frederick in all his affairs.

Frederick intreateth for the Popes favour, although he have no need.

But yet ſo great was the inſolency and pride of the ſtubborn Pope, that by no gentleneſs or beneficence he could of thoſe Princes be brought that year to the profitable concord of the Church and Chriſtian Commonweal. O worthy head, that challengeth all authority to himſelf in the Church of Chriſt, and in reſpect of his own wilful revenge, ſetteth nothing by the health and utility of all Chriſtendom! Then therefore, when nothing could be done in the matter, and the moſt part of theſe Noblemen departed from Rome, the next year after (with much ado) a peace was made and concluded them, by the help and induſtry of Leopaldus of Auſtria, Hermanus Captain of the Dutch Souldiers, and the Prelident of Meſſania. The Pope then abſolving the Emperor Fredericus of his Excommunication, took therefore of him 120000 ounces of Gold, reſtoring unto him again the Titles both of his Empire, and alſo of his Kingdoms. Now conſidering the uncourteous dealing of the Pope with Frederick the Emperor herein, who can ſufficiently muſe and marvel at the unſhamefaſtneſs of Blondus, which hath the face to write, that the Poe (yet notwithſtanding) had dealt more gently and courteouſly with Frederick than was meet, or beſeemed him to do? Who is it that doth not ſee his manifeſt flattery, coloured neither with reaſon nor ſecret diſſimulation? But much more truly and better writeth Cuſpinianus concerning this matter, which ſaith, that the Pope doth occupy very profitable Merchandize. which for ſo much mony ſelleth that he received freely paying nothing therefore, if he had received it of Chriſt indeed, as he ſaith he had.

The Pope refuſeth a peace with the Emperor.

The price of the Emperors abſolution.

Unſhameful Blondus.

Cuſpinianus pretily girdeth the Pope.

And yet although the Emperor Frederick concluded with the Pope this unprofitable peace for himſelf, yet he performed thoſe things that were agreed upon faithfully and diligently. But the Pope which thought it but a triffle to break his promiſe, would not ſtand to the conditions of that peace he made. For by the way, to paſs over other things, neither had he reſtored, as he promiſed, the Cuſtoms of the Land of Sicily, neither yet the City Caſtellana, which he before the peace concluded between them, did occupy and enjoy. And that do both Frederick in his Epiſtles teſtifie, and alſo Fazellus in his eighth Book, writing of the affairs of Sicilia. Yet notwithſtanding Frederick, for the quieteneſs and utility of the Commonwealth, purpoſed with himſelf to bear and ſuffer theſe ſmall injuries, and further ſtudied in all that he might, as well by liberal gifts as otherwiſe, to have the Pope to be to him a truſty friend. As when the Romans and others of the Eccleſiaſtical number made War againſt the Pope for certain poſſeſſions which he kept of theirs, he coming to him at Reat, and as one that tendered the unity of the Church, and thinking to help the Pope at his earneſt requeſt in theſe matters, ſent his Legates unto them, willing them to lay down their armour which againſt the Pope they bare. And when that would not ſerve, at the Popes further requeſt and deſire, he levied an Army againſt them at his own charge, and drave them from the Siege of Viterbium; with other ſuch like aſſured tokens of amity and friendſhip which he ſhewed him. Who notwithſtanding, ſo ſoon as the Emperor was departed with a ſmall company which he took with him into Sicilia, leaving with him the greater and moſt part of his Army for the maintenance of his Wars, concluded a peace with the Romans (unknown to the Emperor) whom he had procured to travel and labour therein with great expences; affirming, that without his will and commandment, the Emperor had expelled them, and driven them out of the Territories of Viterbium. And hereof doth Frederick alſo himſelf make mention in his ſecond and third Epiſtle, where he complaineth of the injuries of the Pope towards him.

What beneficence the Emperor uſeth to have the Popes friendſhip, which he ſhall never get.

A well recompenced good turn of the Pope to the Emperor.

Therefore greater commendation had Blondus deſerved, if he had written of theſe treacheries of the Pope, than forgetting himſelf (as unto liers often it chanceth) in writing both contrary to himſelf in the effect of this matter, and contrary to the verity of Fredericus his ſtory; which ſaith, that the Romans were incited to theſe new tumults by his inticing and ſetting on. Although ſimple men of underſtanding could not both by the offering of his Son in Hoſtage, by the great preparation of the Wars, and by the event ſpecially of the thing it ſelf gather the contrary. But too too impudent will Blondus needs ſhew himſelf.

Blondus taken with untruth.

The Emperors Sons no longer ſuborned, make manifeſt rebellion againſt their Father.

Whilſt that theſe things were done in Italy and Sicilia, great rebellions were moved in Germany againſt the Emperor by Henricus Ceſar, and Frederick of Auſtria, his Sons being the chief Authors thereof. For Henry being diſappointed and ſhaken off from his Lord Pope, and other Conſpirators, by reaſon of the peace between his Father and him (as ye heard) began now to make open challenge to the Empire. And for that cauſe he (as before is ſaid) put from him Ludovicus, whom he knew to be unto the Emperor his Father ſo loving and aſſured a friend; who as willingly (perceiving and ſmelling what miſchief he went about) forſook his Court, and came to Boioria; who had not there remained a year, but was, as he walked abroad at a certain time, ſtabbed in with a Dagger of one Kelhemius, and preſently died, his ſervants not being far from him, of whoſe death divers diverſly write. Notwithſtanding the ſequel doth ſhew them to write truleſt, that affirm the ſaid ſtriker to be ſuborned by Henry Ceſar; who coming unto him in the habit of a Meſſenger, delivered unto him certain Letters, which he fained to be ſent from the Emperor; And whileſt Ludovicus was in reading the ſame, he ſtrake him in with a Dagger, and gave him his mortal wound, and with ſpeed fled upon the ſame. After whoſe death ſucceeded in that Dukedom his Son Otho, who when ſolemnly according to the manner of the Boiores he ſhould have been created, was alſo let by the ſame Henry Ceſar; who forbad the Aſſembly of the Magiſtrates and Citizens the ſame. They notwithſtanding, neglecting his unjuſt reſtraint, created him; wherefore he firſt beſieged Reginoburgh, and with another company ſacked, burnt, and waſted Boioria; with many more ſuch great outrages and rebellions.

A wicked murther by Henry Ceſar, for true and faithful ſervice.

The outrage of Henry Ceſar againſt the Emperor his Father.

When intelligence was brought of theſe things to the Emperor, he ſent his Legates, and commanded that both the Ceſar his Son, and other Princes of Germany, which had aſſembled their Armies, ſhould break up and diſperſe the ſame. And becauſe he ſaw and perceived now manifeſtly that his Son made ſo apparent rebellion againſt him, and fearing greater inſurrections to inſue in Germany, he thought good to prevent the ſame with all expedition. Wherefore he determined to go in all haſte to Germany with his Army, from whence he had now been abſent fourteen years, and hereunto he maketh the Pope privy. The Pope promiſed the Emperor hereupon, that he would write his Letters in his behalf to all the Princes of Germany; but perſwaded him to the uttermoſt of his power, that he ſhould in no caſe go into Germany himſelf. For why? his conſcience accuſed him that he had written to the Nobles in Germany, even from the beginning of his Papacy (for the hate and grudg he had againſt the Emperor) that they ſhould not ſuffer him, nor any of his heirs to enjoy the Empire; and further, had ſtirred them all up to rebel againſt him; and had moved Henry the Emperors Son, by his bribes and fair promiſes to conſpire againſt his Father. And to conclude, he was the Author and procurer of the Conſpiracy which the Lombards made then againſt him; and fearing leſt theſe things ſhould come now to the Emperors ear, he was greatly troubled and careful. But the Emperor not thinking it good at ſo needful a time to be abſent, he (all doubt ſet apart) with his ſecond Son Conradus, went ſpeedily into Germany. And aſſembling there a Council in the City of Nurenburgh, Henry Ceſar his Son, after his Conſpiracy was manifeſtly detected, which he had in practice with the Longobards (whereof the Pope was chief Author) was by judgment and ſentence of ſeventy Princes condemned of High Treaſon: And being commanded by his Father to be bound, was as priſoner brought to Apulia, where not long after in priſon he died. In whoſe ſtead he ordained Conradus his ſecond Son Ceſar, by conſent of all the Peers and Princes. Furthermore, by publick commandment he renounced Frederick Auſtriacus for his Son, and he cauſed him to be proclaimed an enemy to the publick weal. And further, when he ſaw that neither that puniſhment could cauſe him to remember himſelf, and acknowledg his abuſe, the Emperor with a great Army (accompanied with divers of the Noblemen of Germany) took from him all Auſtria and Stiria, and brought them again under his own obedience and fidelity.

The Emperor 14 years out of Germany.

The Pope feareth that his treaſon ſhould be ſpied by the Emperor going into Germany.

Henry Ceſar condemned of treaſon, and dieth in priſon.

Fredericus Auſtriacus proclaimed an open enemy to his Father, and diſherited.

The Emperor marrieth King John's Daughter of England.

The ſame year married he with his third Wife named Iſabel, the Daughter of King John of England. Then when he had ſet Germany in a ſtay and quietneſs, he left there Conradus Ceſar his Son; and with his Hoſt returneth again into Italy, there to puniſh ſuch as had with Henry his Eldeſt Son conſpired againſt him; whoſe Treaſons were all detected at the condemnation of Henry Ceſar his Son, chiefly ſet on by the Pope. When the Pope had underſtanding that the Emperor with Warlike Furniture marched toward Italy; although he fained himſelf reconciled, and to be a friend to Frederick, yet was he notwithſtanding to him a moſt ſecret and infeſtive enemy. And underſtanding that he brought with him ſuch a power both of Horſemen and Footmen, to do execution of ſuch as he underſtood to be Conſpirators againſt him in the late tumult and rebellion; thoſe which were faulty herein and guilty (and all other that took their parts) he admoniſhed to joyn themſelves together, and that they ſhould furniſh ſtrongly their Cities with Garriſons, that they ſhould ſend for aid to their friends, and that with all the force they were able, they ſhould prepare them for the war. The reſt of the Cities alſo in Italy, whether they were the Emperors or his own, he endeavoureth to make them all his, and proper to himſelf.

{KING Hen. 3.}

The Pope again beginneth to play his part.

The Popes Ambaſſage to the Emperor.

Furthermore, unto the Emperor he ſendeth his Ambaſſadors; to whom, under the pretence of nouriſhing a peace, he had given a ſecret commandment that they ſhould Interdict him and his Hoſt, ſo ſoon as he came within the borders of Italy. To the preſervation of which peace ſaith he, he had (but late ſince) promulgate a Subſidy to be gathered amongſt the Chriſtians, when he began the Holy War. And alſo to ſay (not by way of intreaty, but commandingly) that what cauſe of controverſie he had with the Longobards, the ſame he ſhould commit to him, and ſtand to his arbitrement. Whereunto the Emperor replying maketh his Legate this anſwer:

The Emperors again unto the Pope.

Shortly after, ſaith he, the peace was made between the Pope and me, he called me for a chief defence both of the Church and himſelf, againſt the Romans which made war with him; and at his requeſt, with mine own proper charge I maintained that his War, and gave his enemies the overthrow. And further ſaid, that he ſhould not do well, through the pretence of peace, to be a let to him from that which both by Law and right he might and ought to do; but rather he ought to diſpoſe himſelf, with force to reſtrain and expell them, which gathered them together as rebels, thinking to exclude themſelves from the ſubjection both of him and the Empire; and that ſuch rebels as both had reſtrained the Souldiers which the Emperor ſent for when he was in Aſia, and divers others alſo (which for neceſſary cauſes he had called to him) which they had ſo wickedly dealt with and abuſed, he (as they had deſerved) ſhould rather deſire to ſee puniſhed and reformed, than to maintain them (under colour of peace) being ſo wicked and manifeſt evil doers. And touching that he demandeth of him, that he ſhould commit and defer ſo great a cauſe, wherein the wealth and ſafety of the Empire conſiſteth, to his arbitrement, by him to be determined, without either aſſignment of any time when, or adding thereunto any condition or exception for not doing the ſame, neither the diminiſhing and impairing the Dignity and Regality of his Empire conſidered, he could not but marvel; ſeeing that neither it appertained to his calling and faculty, nor to the benefit or commodity of the Empire. To this effect alſo writeth Frederick in his laſt Epiſtle unto the Pope: the effect whereof amongſt other Epiſtles you may read.

A ſecret Conſpiracy of the Pope againſt the Emperors

And in the ſame his Letters he ſheweth that, when the Emperor at a certain time had been with the Pope, at his going away he requeſted, that when he came again, he would come into Italy but with his houſhold-band and family; for that if he ſhould come as before he did accuſtom with his Army, he ſhould terrifie them over-much; amongſt whom (ſaith he) you may aſſure your ſelf to be in great ſafety, and find all things in reſt and quiet; where quite contrary (as the Emperor for a certainty had tried) he had there all things ready and prepared for his deſtruction; ſo that when he pretended unto him greateſt friendſhip, he was buſieſt in conſpiring his death. The certain time when the Pope had this exerciſe in hand againſt the Emperor, I cannot ſearch out, neither may it be in his Epiſtles undated eaſily found out; but that of the certainty thereof no man need to doubt, I have aſſigned you to the Emperors Epiſtle, where he maketh mention of the ſame.

The Emperor marcheth into Italy, notwithſtanding the Popes forbidding.

The Emperor then as he had determined, proſecuted his purpoſe, and marcheth into Italy, where he brought under his ſubjection thoſe Cities that againſt him rebelled, as Mantua, Verona, Terniſium, Patavium, and others. And then he afterward ſet upon the great Hoſt of the Mediolanenſes, the Brixians, the Placentines, and other Confederators, unto whom the Popes Legate Georgius Longomontanus had joyned himſelf, of whom he took one thouſand priſoners, and alſo their General, being the chief Magiſtrate in the City of Mediolanum, and Petrus Tenopolus the Dukes Son of Venice, and ſlew divers Captains more, and took all their Enſigns. And in this Battel, eſpecially at the recovering of Marchie and Terniſſana, he uſed the friendly aid of Actiolinus.

The Emperor loth to break the peace of late concluded.

The Pope now ſomewhat diſmaid at this overthrow of his Confederates and Mates (though not much) began yet ſomewhat to fear the Emperor; and whereas before, that which he did he wrought ſecretly and by others, now he goeth to work with might and main to ſubdue and deprive the Emperor. And although the Emperor ſaw and perceived what inward hate and mortal malice he bare towards him, not only by that he ſo apertly ſtood with his Conſpirators againſt him, but alſo that on every ſide he heard, and from all parts was brought him certain word how greatly he laboured againſt him, as with opprobrious words, naughty reports and ſlanders, to the intent to pull from him the hearts and fidelity of his ſubjects, and make thoſe that were his friends his enemies, neither that he meant at any time to take up and ceaſe from ſuch evil and wicked practices; yet notwithſtanding, for that there ſhould be no default in him found for the breach of the league and peace between them a little before concluded, he ſendeth four Legates to the Biſhop of Rome, which ſhould anſwer unto and refute thoſe criminous objections which he laid unto him, as alſo make him privy unto his purpoſe, and what he meant to do, thereby to declare his innocency towards him (in ſuch cauſes) and ſimplicity.

The Pope refuſeth to ſpeak with the Emperors Legate.

The Biſhop when he underſtood theſe Ambaſſadors to be not far off from Rome, and knew the cauſe of their coming, he thought with himſelf that in hearing the excuſe and reaſonable anſwer of the Emperor, perhaps he might be provoked to deſiſt from his purpoſe, and ſo degenerate from others of his Predeceſſors, he refuſeth to ſpeak with them, and at the day appointed pronounceth the ſentence of Proſcription againſt him, depriving him of all his Dignities, Honours, Titles, Prerogatives, Kingdoms, and whole Empire. And that he had no occaſion hereunto, as well Pandulphus and Colonucius, as the Letters of the Emperor himſelf, do both right well declare. For it may appear he dedicated as it were himſelf to his utter ruin and deſtruction, when he did ſolicite againſt Frederick. Jacobus Tenopolus the Venetian Duke, whom for the diſpleaſure he took with the Emperor in the impriſoning of his Son, he was in good hope he ſhould allure unto him, he being in ſo troublous time ſuch a comforter and aider unto him, that as Blondus writeth, in a certain Epiſtle Gratulatory, he calleth him Lord of the fourth part of Croatia and Dalmatia, and Lord of half of the Roman Empire. And calling unto him the Venetian and Genowetian Legates, he made a peace betwixt them (which for certain cauſes about their Sea-coaſts were at variance) and Covenanted with them upon this condition, that at their publick charges they ſhould rig and man five and thirty Gallies, which ſhould ſpoil and burn all alongſt the Sea-coaſts of the Kingdoms and Dominions of Frederick.

The new ſentence of proſcription againſt the Emperor.

The Pope wageth and hireth 35 Gallies to ſpoil the Coaſts of the Emperor.

But the Pope when he ſaw the good will and fidelity which the Duke of Venice bare unto the Emperor, and ſaw alſo what aid the Emperor had of him, neither that he was like to win him to his purpoſe; then had he recourſe again to his old crafty practices and ſubtilties. And further, he deviſed to put forth an Edict at Rome to the Univerſal Church and people, the beginning whereof is, Aſcendit de mari bellica beſtia; wherein he declareth the cauſes wherefore he cunſeth and giveth the Emperor to the Devil of Hell, and hath dejected him from all his Princely dignity. He in the ſame accuſeth him of ſo many and ſo huge a heap of miſchiefs, as to nominate them my heart deteſteth. And beſide that he reſtraineth his Soveraign Lord and Emperor of the Appellation, which every private man by law may have. He ſlandereth him of Treaſon, Perjury, Cruelty, Sacriledg, killing of his kindred, and all impiety; he accuſeth him for an Heretick, a Schiſmatick and a Miſcreant: and to be brief, what miſchief ſoever the Pope can deviſe, with that doth he charge him and burthen him. All this doth he, ſaith the Pope, that when he hath brought our Holineſs and all the Eccleſiaſtical eſtate to beggery, he might ſcoff at, and deride the Religion of Chriſt, which as a miſcreant he deteſteth. And now for that the Pope had a great and ſpecial truſt in Albertus Behavus of the noble houſe called Equeſtri (as crafty an Apoſtle as the beſt) as one whom he ſaw ready to lean to his luſt; to him the Pope delivered two other Mandates in ſeveral Letters ſealed, in which he commanded all Biſhops, Prelates, and other of the Clergy, that they ſhould ſolemnly recite the ſame in their Churches inſtead of their Sermon, that by his Decree he had Excommunicated Frederick out of the fellowſhip of Chriſtian men, put him from the procuration or Government of the Empire, and that he had releaſed all his ſubjects of their Allegiance and fidelity towards him. And furthermore chargeth them; and all other Chriſtian men, under pain of curſing and damnation, that neither they ſuccour the Emperor, nor yet ſo much as wiſh him well. Thus he, being the Popes ſpecial and truſty Servitor, and made to his hand, cauſed a moſt horrible confuſion and chaos of publick unquietneſs, as ſhall after appear.

Albertus Behavus the Popes one hand.

The Pope threateneth to curſe all thoſe that wiſh well to the Emperor.

Amongſt all other Noblemen of Germany at that time, was Otho the Governour of Rhenus, and Duke of Boiora, towards the Emperor both moſt ſerviceable, and alſo a Prince of great honour, riches, and eſtimation. This Prince both with fair promiſes and alſo rewards, he enticed from him; for that he was made by him to believe, that Ludovicus his Father, of whom we ſpake before, was by the Emperor murthered and ſlain. And the ſame Otho again cauſed three other Princes and Dukes to revolt from the Emperor to the Pope, which were neighbours, and near adjoyning unto him, Urvenceſlaus, and Belus, Princes of the Hungarians, and Henry Duke of Polonia. To whom came alſo Fredericus Auſtriacus his Son; who becauſe he was proſcript or out-lawed of his Father, and had his Dukedom waſted and burnt, as you heard, was eaſily won unto the Pope. Theſe gathering a Council (when they had thought to have tranſlated the Empire unto the Kings Son of Denmark) deſired to have the Popes Legates to be ſent from him, to the effect of that Election.

Otho with divers other Princes of Germany, by the Popes means, do forſake the Emperor.

The Emperor was at Patavium when theſe news were brought unto him, what the Pope had done at Rome. Therefore he commanded Peter de Vineis his Secretary (upon Eaſter-day) to make a Narration to the people of his great and liberal munificence to the Biſhops and Church of Rome, and again, of the injuries of them toward him in recompence thereof; of his innocency alſo in that whereof he had accuſed him, and of the unſeemlineſs of ſuch an act or deed, of the right uſe of the Eccleſiaſtical cenſure, and of the errors and abuſe of the Church of Rome. By which Oration of his, he ſo removed the cloud from many mens hearts of blind ſuperſtition, and the conceived opinion of holineſs of the Church of Rome, and Biſhops of the ſame, and alſo of their uſurped power, and ſubtil perſwaſion, that both they plainly ſaw, and perceived the vices and filthineſs of the Church of Rome, and Biſhops of that See, as alſo their fraudulent deceits, and flagitious doings, moſt vehemently lamenting and complaining of the ſame. Albertus maketh mention of certain verſes which were ſent and written between the Biſhop of Rome and the Emperor. The which verſes in the later end of this preſent Hiſtory of Frederick you ſhall find.

What great good the Oration of Peter de Vineis did in the Emperors behalf.

The Emperor moreover both by his Letters and Legates, giveth intelligence unto all Chriſtian Kings, to the Princes of his own Empire, to the Colledg of Cardinals, and people of Rome; as well of the ſained crimes wherewith he was charged, as alſo of the cruelty of the Biſhop of Rome againſt him. The Copy of which Letter or Epiſtle follows here under inſerted.

The Emperor to the Prelates of the World.

The Emperors Letter to all Prelates to bridle the Pope and reſtrain him of his will.

IN the beginning and creation of the World, the ineſtimable foreknowledg and providence of God (who asketh counſel of none) created in the Firmament of Heaven two Lights (a greater and a leſs) the greater he created to govern the Day, and the leſs to govern the Night: which two ſo do their proper offices and duties in the Zodiack, that although oftentimes the one be in an oblique aſpect unto the other, yet the one is not enemy to the other; but rather doth the Superior communicate his light with the inferior. Even ſo the ſame eternal foreknowledg hath appointed upon the earth two Regiments, that is to ſay, Prieſthood and Kingly power; the one for knowledg and wiſdom, the other for defence; that man which is made of two parts (over-wanton and diſſolute) might have two reins to govern and bridle him withal, that peace thereby, and love might dwell upon the face of the earth. But alas, the Biſhop of Rome ſitting in the Chair of perverſe Doctrine or peſtilence, that Phariſee anointed with the oyl of iniquity above the reſt of his conſorts in this our time, which for his abominable pride is fallen from Heaven, endeavoureth with his power to deſtroy and undo all, and thinketh (I believe) to ſtellifie again himſelf there, from whence he fell. His purpoſe is to darken and to ſhadow the light of our unſpotted life, whilſt that (altering the verity into lies) his Papal Letters, ſtuft with all untruths, are ſent into ſundry parts of the world; of his own corrupt humor, and upon no reaſonable cauſe, blemiſhing the ſincerity of our Religion. The Lord Pope hath compared us unto the Beaſt riſing out of the Sea, full of names of blaſphemy, and ſpotted like a Leopard. But we ſay, that he is that monſtrous Beaſt of whom it is ſaid, and of whom we thus read: And there ſhall come another red horſe out of the Sea, and he that ſhall ſit on him ſhall take peace away out of the earth: let them therefore that dwell upon the earth deſtroy him. For ſince the time of his promotion he hath not been the father of mercy, but of diſcord; a diligent ſteward of deſolation, inſtead of conſolation, and hath inticed all the world to commit offence. And to take the words in right ſenſe and interpretation, he is that great Dragon that hath deceived the whole world; he is that Antichriſt, of whom he hath called us the forerunner; he is that other Balaam hired for money to curſe us; the Prince of darkneſs, which hath abuſed the Prophets. This is the Angel leaping out of the Sea, having his Vials filled with bitterneſs, that he may both hurt the Sea and the land; the counterfeit Vicar of Chriſt, that ſetteth forth his own imaginations. He ſaith, that we do not rightly believe in the Chriſtian faith, and that the world is deceived with three manner of deceivers, which to name, God forbid we ſhould open our mouth; ſeeing that openly we confeſs only Jeſus Chriſt our Lord and Saviour to be the everlaſting Son of God, coequal with his Father and the Holy Ghoſt, begotten before all worlds, and in proceſs of time ſent down upon the earth for the ſalvation of mankind; conceived, not by the ſeed of man, but by the Holy Ghoſt; which was born of the Glorious Virgin Mary, and after that ſuffered and died, as touching the fleſh; and by his Godhead the third day he raiſed from death that other nature which he aſſumed in the womb of his mother. But we have learned that the body of Mahomet hangeth in the air, and his ſoul is buried in Hell: whoſe works are damnable and contrary to the Law of the moſt High. We affirm alſo, that Moſes was the faithful ſervant of God, and a true Teacher of the Law; and that he talked with God in mount Sinai, unto whom the Lord ſaid, Rubum, &c. By whom alſo God wrought miracles in Egypt, and delivered the Law written to the Iſraelites, and that afterwards with the Elect he was called to Glory. In theſe and other things our enemy and envier of our ſtate, cauſing our Mother the Church accuſe her Son, hath written againſt us venemous and lying ſlanders, and ſent the ſame to the whole world. If he had rightly underſtood the Apoſtles meaning, he would not have preferred his violent will, which beareth ſuch ſway with him, before reaſon; neither would he have ſent out his Mandates to the ſuggeſtion of thoſe which call light darkneſs, and evil good; which ſuſpect honey to be gall, for the great good opinion they had conceived of that holy place, which indeed is both weak and infirm, and converteth all truth into falſhood, and affirmeth that to be which is not.

Man being made of two parts hath two ſeveral Regiments, Gods word and the materiall ſword.

{KING Hen. 3.}

Truly my opinion (ſo indifferent on every ſide) ought not in any caſe to be infringed and averted from the Faith, to ſuch enemies of ſo corrupt a conſcience. Wherefore we greatly are inforced not a little to marvel, which thing alſo doth much diſquiet us to ſee; that you, which be the pillars and aſſiſtants in office of righteous dealing, the Senators of Peters City, and the principal beams in Gods building, have not qualified the perturbation of ſo fierce a Judg; as do the Planets of Heaven in their kind, which to mitigate the paſſing ſwift courſe of the great Orb or Sphere of Heaven, draw a contrary way by their oppoſite movings. In very deed our Imperial felicity hath been (almoſt even from the beginning) ſpurned againſt, and envied at of the Papal See and dignity: As Simonides being demanded why he had no more enemies and enviers of his ſtate, anſwered and ſaid, Quia nihil feliciter geſſi: Becauſe (ſaith he) I have had no good ſucceſs in any thing that ever I took in hand. And ſo for that we have had proſperous ſucceſs in all our enterprizes (the Lords name be bleſſed therefore) eſpecially in the overthrow (of late) of our rebellious enemies, the Lombards, to whom in their good quarrel he promiſed life and abſolution, with remiſſion of their ſins, is the cauſe wherefore this Apoſtolical Biſhop mourneth and lamenteth. And now not by your counſels (I ſuppoſe) he laboureth to impugn this our felicity, but out of his own power of binding and looſing, whereof he glorieth ſo much, he impugneth it. But preſently where power and ability wanteth to redreſs, there doth abuſe take place. We ſee in him which was ſo mighty a King, and the worthieſt Prince amongſt all the Prophets, to deſire and crave the reſtitution of Gods holy Spirit, when he had polluted the dignity of his Office. But the Proverb is, Uti indiſſolubilia non ſolvuntur, ita inligabilia non ligantur: As things indiſſoluble are not to be looſed, ſo things that cannot be bound, are not to be bound. Which thing manifeſtly is proved in him. For why, the Scriptures of God do inſtruct men how to live, they mortifie our ſouls which are immortal, and quicken the ſame which are dead for want of life. And doubtleſs he is able to humble and bring down thoſe that are unworthy of dignity, as much as him pleaſeth, and when him pleaſeth. Doubtleſs if the Biſhop of Rome were a true Biſhop indeed, innocent, impollute, and not aſſociate with wicked livers and evil men, his life ſhould declare him ſo to be. He would not then be an offerer of diſſentious ſacrifice, but a peaceable offerer of love and charity, and would cenſe, not with the incenſe of grief and hatred, but with the ſweet ſmelling incenſe of concord and unity, neither yet would alter Suum Pontificium in maleficium: that is, make of a ſanctified Office an execrable abuſe. If he were ſuch a Biſhop as he ought to be, he woud not wreſt or abuſe the preaching of the Word into the fruit and gain of his own diſſention, neither ſhould we be accuſed for ſuch an enemy of our Mother the true Church, as is laid unto her Sons charge by ſuch a Biſhop. Which true and Mother-Church with all reverence we honour, and benignity embrace, ſo beautified and adorned with Gods holy Sacraments. Some ſingular perſons notwithſtanding, faining themſelves to be our Brethren by that Mother, and yet are not, but of a ſtrumpet begot; ſuch, I ſay, as are ſubject and ſlaves to corruptible things (putting them from amongſt us) we utterly reject: eſpecially for that injuries by them done are not only tranſitory and mundane, wherewith our Majeſty is ſo moleſted, vexed and grieved. Wherefore we cannot ſo eaſily mitigate our mood, neither otherwiſe very deed ſo to do, and therefore are we inforced the more to take the greater revenge of them. You therefore that are men of grave and deliberate counſel, having the excellent gift (as from God) of wiſdom and underſtanding; refuſe you that roaring enemy of ours in theſe his proceedings, whoſe beginnings are ſo wicked and deteſtable, wiſely comparing things paſt, with thoſe to come. Otherwiſe you that are under our ſubjection, as well of our Empire as other our Dominions, ſhall feel and perceive (both of my chief enemy and perſecutor, as alſo of the Princes that are his favors and adherents) what revenge by ſword Fredericus Auguſtus ſhall take upon them, God ſo permitting.

The anſwer of Simonides applied.

The Emperor prophecieth of the Popes fall.

The Emperor utterly rejecteth the Pope and Church of Rome.

This

{KING Hen. 3.}

The Emperor calleth a Parliament or Council to expreſs the Popes malice.

This done he denounceth a ſolemn Parliament or Council of all the Princes and other Nobility of the Empire at Aegra; whither came Conradus Ceſar, Moguntinus Preſul, the Saxon Dukes, the Lords of Brandeburgh, Miſna, Thuringus, and the Legates of all the Nobles of Brabant to aid the Emperor. But the Princes Boiemus and Palatinus, being diſſwaded by the Legates, unto whom the Auſtrians had joyned themſelves, refuſed to come to the Council holden at Aegra. And being at their wits end, not knowing well what they might do, forſook at laſt the Emperor, and took part with the Pope and the other Conſpirators. Then Fredericus Auſtriacus the Emperors ſecond Son (whom he diſherited as ye heard) by the aid of the Boiors and Bohemians recovered again the Dukedoms of Auſtria and Stiria, putting to flight and diſcomfiting the Emperors Bands and Garriſons which he had there. And although the Cardinals (eſpecially that honeſt man Albertus Boiemus) had allured to the Pope Otho the Duke of Boiora, as ye heard, and divers other Noblemen of Germany; yet notwithſtanding certain Biſhops in Boiora (as Eberhardus Juvanenſis, and Sigrefridus Reginoburgenſis, being at that time the Emperors Chancellor, Rudicenus Rathevienſis, Conradus Friſingenſis, and others) left not nor yet forſook the Emperor. All which the foreſaid Albertus not only did excommunicate, but alſo by proceſs ſought to bring them up to Rome before the Pope, giving commandment to their Collegioners and Cloyſterers, that they ſhould deprive them of their offices, and chuſe ſuch others in their ſtead as would obey the Pope. All which things the Pope underſtanding by Albertus, and of this their fidelity to the Emperor, corroborated and confirmed the ſame his doings, commanding them to chuſe other Biſhops in their ſteads.

The godly Biſhops of Germany are obedient to their King and Prince.

But the Biſhops and Prelates with one conſent contemning the Popes Mandates and Writs, and alſo the curſes and threatnings of Albertus, accuſed, reproved, and greatly blamed his temerity, and alſo tyranny which he uſurped againſt the Churches of Germany, and eſpecially againſt the good Emperor; that without his conſent he durſt be ſo bold as to meddle in Churches committed to the Emperors Government againſt the old and ancient cuſtoms; and that he had Excommunicated the Emperor without juſt cauſe; that he had condemned the Emperors faithful ſubjects as enemies to the Church, for ſtanding with their Liege and Soveraign Prince (which Allegiance to violate, without horrible iniquity they might not) and ſo had ſought to diſquiet them likewiſe in their charges and adminiſtrations; and had alſo in that quarrel given ſuch defiance to the Emperor. They accuſed and condemned the ſame Albertus alſo for a moſt impudent impoſtor and wicked varlet, and for a moſt peſtiferous botch and ſore of the Chriſtian Commonweal; and they do give him to the Devil as a ruinous enemy, as well of the Church as of his own natural Country, and further think him worthy to have his reward with the reſt of the Popes Purſevants, being the moſt wicked inventers and deviſers of miſchief that were in all Germany. This done they make relation hereof to the Emperor by their Letters; and further, they advertiſe all the Princes of Germany (eſpecially thoſe which were of the Popes faction or rebellion, and were the favourers of Albertus) that they ſhould take heed and beware in any caſe of his ſubtil deceits and pernicious deceivable allurements, and that they ſhould not aſſiſt the Pope for all his words againſt the Emperor. And doubtleſs by the counſel of the high Prelate or Archbiſhop of Boiora (whoſe name was Juvanenſis) and by his induſtry and perſwaſion, Fredericus Auſtriacus was again reconciled unto the Emperor his Father, from whoſe aid and obedience after that, by no promiſes, threatning, bribes, nor pains, no nor for the execrable curſes of the Popes own holy mouth, he would be induced or removed. But Albertus proſecuteth ſtill his purpoſed miſchief, alluring and inticing by all means poſſible (and that not amongſt the worſt but the beſt) friends to the Pope, and enemies to the Emperor. Unto ſome he gave their Tythes to fight againſt the Emperor, to otherſome he gave the Glebe-lands of Benefices, and to otherſome he gave the ſpoil of ſuch Colledges and Monaſteries as took not part with the Pope; and to ſome other alſo he gave the Colledges and Monaſteries themſelves. And aſſuredly I find by Johannes Aventinus, Lib. 7. Annalium Boiorum, that there were certain of the Popes own birds, that had their Eccleſiaſtical Tythes taken from them; and otherſome had the rents and revenues of their Colledges pluckt away by force to the maintenance of the Popes quarrel againſt the Emperor. Hereby was there a window opened to do what they luſted (every man according to his ravening and deteſtable luſt) and all things lay open unto their greedy and inſatiable deſires. Who liſteth to hear more hereof, let him read Aventinus in his Book before noted, and there ſhall he ſee what vaſtation grew thereby to the whole ſtate of Germany, who largely intreateth of the ſame.

The Biſhops of Germany Excommunicate the Popes Legate and Cardinal.

Juvanenſis the Biſhop a true ſubject to his Prince.

The paſſage of the Pope to maintain the War againſt his Lord and Maſter.

While theſe things were thus in working in Germany, Frederick leaving in Lombardy Actiolinus with a great part of his Hoſt (he paſſing with the reſt by Apeninum) came to Hetruria and ſet the ſame in a ſtay, after that he had allayed certain inſurrections there, and from thence to Piſas, where he was with great amity and honour received and welcomed. This City was always aſſured and faithful to the Emperors of Germany. The Pope underſtanding of the Emperors coming into Hetruria, and knowing what power the Emperor had alſo left in Lombardy, with a great Army beſieged the City Ferraria, that always loved the Emperor full well; which City when the Popes Legate had aſſaulted ſharply the ſpace of five months, and could not win the ſame; he deviſed with himſelf to ſend for Salingwerra out of the Town by way of a parlee, promiſing his faith and truth to him for his ſafe return. Who by the perſwaſion of Hugo Rambartus, that ſaid without peril he might do the ſame (being but by way of parlee) was coming to the Legate; who preventing him in his journey, took him as priſoner, contrary to his truth and fidelity. And thus gat he Ferraria, and delivered the keeping thereof to Azones Aſtenſis. And that the Popes Legate thus falſified his truth, and circumvented the Captain and old man Salingwerra, the ſame is confeſſed of the Popes friendly Hiſtoriographers, to be but a ſtratagem or warlike policy. But to return again. About the ſame time alſo the Venetian Navy, at the Mount Garganum, chaſed twelve Gallies of the Emperors, which were appointed to the keeping of that Coaſt, and ſpoiled, burnt, and waſted all the region; and further took one of the Emperors great Ships, being driven by tempeſt and weather into the Haven Sipontium, fraught with men and munition.

The Pope beſiegeth Ferraria.

The fidelity of Papiſts learned by this example.

The Emperors Gallies chaſed, and one of his Ships taken by the Pope.

Fredericus again getting on his ſide the Lucenſes, the Volaterans, the Genenſes, the Aretines, and divers Cities beſides in Hetruria to help that Country, came to Piſas and Viterbium, which took part with him. Some ſay, that the names and factions of Gibellins and Guelphs ſprang from Frederick, that by them he might ſpie and know (having recourſe to all the Towns and Cities in Italy) which took part with, and favoured the Pope, and which the Emperor; and called the one by the name of Gibellins, and the other by the name of Guelphs. But for that both Blondus and Platina, and ſome others, bring no ſufficient proof thereof, but only ſlender conjecture, I rather cleave to the opinion of Nauclerus, Hermanus, Antonimus, Florentinus, and other ſuch writers, which ſay, that theſe Guelphs and Gibellins in Italy took their beginning of Conradus the Third, Fredericus his great Uncle being Emperor, and that theſe Guelphs were dedicated to the Pope, of Guelphs the younger Brother of Henry the Proud; and that thoſe which were called the Gibellins, were appointed either of Conradus himſelf, or elſe of his Son, being brought up in the Lordſhip of Vaiblingen. But to our purpoſe.

The Gibellins and Guelphs from whence they came.

The Pope when he underſtood that Frederick was come to Viterbium, he was very heavy; for that he feared he would come to Rome, the good will of which City the Pope much miſtruſted. He therefore cauſed a ſupplication to be drawn, portraying about the ſame the Heads of Peter and Paul, and with a ſharp and contumelious Oration he much defaced the Emperor; promiſing them everlaſting life, and gave the badg of the Croſs to as many as would arm themſelves and fight againſt the Emperor, as againſt the moſt wicked enemy of God and the Church. Now when the Emperor, marching ſomewhat near to Rome-Gates, beheld thoſe whom the Pope had, with his goodly ſpectacle of St. Peter and St. Paul, and with his alluring Oration, ſtirred up againſt him, and marked with the badg of the Croſs to come forth in battel againſt him; diſdaining to be accounted for the enemy

The Pope afraid of the Emperors coming into Italy.

The Emperor hangeth all the Croſſed Souldiers.

my of the Church, who had been thereunto ſo beneficial, giving a fierce charge upon them, he put them ſoon to flight, and as many as he took (cutting off that badg from them) he cauſed to be hanged. From thence he marching into Campania, and his own Kingdoms, levied a great maſs of money, and muſtered the new bands, and augmented his Army; and in theſe bands he retained the Saracens alſo. And to the intent he might find the Saracens the more truſty to him, he appointed them to inhabit in a City named Luceria. For which thing, although the Papiſtical writers do greatly blame and opprobriouſly write of Frederick, yet notwithſtanding Nicholaus Machiavellus doth write, that therefore he retained them, leſt that through the Popes execrable curſes he ſhould be quite deſtitute of Soldiers, as was Fredericus Barbaroſſa his Grandfather, a little before, when that of Alexander the Pope he was Excommunicated, as ye have heard.

The Emperor retaineth the Saracens in his Wars againſt the Pope.

After this when the Emperor had greatly afflicted by battel the Popes Eccleſiaſtical conſorts, ſuch as conſpired with the Pope againſt him, and that he had waſted and deſtroyed Beneventum, the Mount Caſenum and Sora, for that they took part with the Pope againſt him; Frederick when he had manned the City of Aquilia, marched forth with a great Hoſt both of Horſemen and Footmen to Picenum, that he might vanquiſh his enemies in Italy. And by the way he beſieged the ſtrong Town of War named Aſculinum, which was alſo converted to the Popes faction and rebellion. He there having underſtanding what the Popes aſſiſtants had done with the Princes Electors, and other Princes of Germany, eſpecially with Wenceſlaus King of Bohemia, and Otho Palatinus, writeth his Letters unto them. In the which, firſt he ſhewed how that thoſe contumelies and ſpightful words, which the Pope bluſtred out againſt him, are lighted upon himſelf; and how the Biſhops of Rome have taken to them of late ſuch heart of grace, and are become ſo lofty, that not only they ſeek to bring Emperors, Kings, and Princes under their obedience, but alſo ſeek how to be honoured as Gods, and ſay that they cannot err, neither yet be ſubject or bound to any Religion; and that it is lawful for them to do all things what they liſt, neither that any account is to be ſought or demanded of their doings, or elſe to be made of them to any; ſo impudent are they in theſe their affirmations. And further, as Princes they command (and that under pain of curſing) that men believe every thing they ſay, how great a lye ſoever it be. Inſomuch that by this covetouſneſs of his all things go backward, and the whole ſtate of the Commonweal is ſubverted, neither can there any enemy be found more hurtful or perillous to the Church of God than he. He wrote unto them furthermore, that he (to whom the greateſt charge and dignity was in the whole Commonweal appointed and committed) ſeeing and perceiving to his great peril, their good hearts, wills and practices towards him, would with all the power and ability that God had given him, do his endeavour that he which in the likeneſs of the ſhepherd of the flock, and the ſervant of Chriſt, and chief Prelate in the Church, ſheweth himſelf ſo very a Wolf, Perſecuter and Tyrant, may be removed from that place, and that a true and careful ſhepherd of Gods flock may be appointed in the Church. Wherefore he exhorteth them, if they deſire the ſafety and preſervation of the whole ſtate of the Commonweal and Empire, that they be unto him no hinderers, but furtherers of his purpoſe and proceedings; leſt otherwiſe they alſo ſhould happen to fall into the ſame ſnare of ſervitude with the Biſhop of Rome. And further, he gave them to wit, that if he ſhould aſpire to that he ſought for, (that is, to be an Emperor, and King over Kings) yet ſhould that be no ſtay of his inſatiable deſire, but he would be as greedy and ravenous as now he is. Therefore if they be wiſe, to withſtand him betimes, leſt hereafter when they would, it ſhould be too late, neither were able to withſtand his tyranny. The effect of this Epiſtle I took out of Aventine, which more largely dilateth it, who alſo writeth that the Emperor (by his Legates) ſent the ſame to Wenceſlaus.

The effect of a Letter ſent by the Emperor to the Princes of Germany.

No enemy more hurtful to the Church of God than is the Pope.

The Emperor moveth to remove the Pope, and put another more careful ſhepherd into the Church of God.

Boiemus ſomewhat relenting at this Letter, promiſeth to accompliſh the Emperors biddings and precepts, and forthwith gathereth the aſſembly of Princes and Nobles at Ægra; where by common conſent they think to renovate with the Emperor a new League and Covenant. And furthermore, they find Otho Boius (which was abſent, and would not be at this their aſſembly to be the Author of this defection, and an enemy to the Commonweal. Otho then ſeeing himſelf not able to ſtand againſt Ceſar and the other Princes with whom he was aſſociate, deſiring aid of the Pope by his Letters, came with all ſpeed to Beiomus his Kinſman; whom when he could not perſwade unto him again, neither would he to their parts alſo be won, he obtaineth notwithſtanding yet thus much at their hands, that the League and Covenant (which they were in hand to make with the Emperor) might for a time be deferred, and that another aſſembly might be made, whereat he alſo would be, and joyn himſelf with them. Thus had they, who killed (as you heard) his Father, bewitched alſo his Son, and brought him to be both a Rebel and a Traytor. In the mean ſeaſon the Pope ſent his reſcript unto the King of Bohemia and to Otho, tending to this effect; that in no caſe they ſhould either forſake him, or elſe the Church, to take the Emperors part. And ſo much prevailed he by the means of Bohuſlaus and Budiſlaus (which were the chiefeſt of the Senate Regal) and by his fair promiſes and bribes to ſuch as he before had made to him, that again at Libuſſa by Boiemus and Boius new aſſemblies were gathered for the Creation of a new Emperor, in deſpite of Auguſtus the Emperor, and Ceſar his Son. And whilſt that this was thus in hand, Conradus Ceſar eſpouſeth Landſhuta the Wife of Otho (being abſent) in the teeth for great benefits and poſſeſſions which her Husband had, and poſſeſſed by the anceſtors of him, and that unleſs her Husband took a better way with himſelf, and ſhewed his obedience to the Emperor his Father, that he ſhould not enjoy one foot of that land which now he had by his predeceſſors. The promotion and dignities which Otho had by the anceſtors of Conradus Ceſar came thus: Fredericus Barbaroſſa in the year of our Lord 1180, at a Parliament holden at Reginoburgh, condemned Henricus Leo of High Treaſon, and deprived him of his Dominions of Boiora and Saxony, and gave Boiora to Otho Wiltaſpachius, for that he had done him ſo faithful ſervice in his Italian Wars. After that, Ludovicus the Son of this Otho, obtained of this Emperor Frederick the Second, in recompence of his aſſured and truſty fidelity, the dition of Palatinatum Rheni ſo called, which gave alſo Agnetes the Daughter of Henry Earl of Palatine, to Otho his Son in marriage. This Henry was the Son of Henry Leo the Traytor, unto whom Henry the Sixth, the Father of Frederick, gave in marriage Clementia his Brothers Daughter, Conradus Palatine of Rhenus, and gave unto him the keeping of the Palace of the ſame. And as touching the inheritance of Boiora, that he had alſo now long poſſeſſed by the heirs of Otho Wiltaſpachius. But to our purpoſe again.

The practice of Otho with the Pope againſt the Emperor.

The Emperor Reſcript diſſuadeth all the matter again.

By what means Otho attained to great poſſeſſion by the Emperor and his anceſtors.

At the ſame time alſo the Governour of Colonia Agrippina revolted to the Pope; who not long after, in a skirmiſh between Brabantinus and him, was vanquiſhed and taken priſoner. And doubtleſs, Fredericus Auſtriacus, after he was received into favour again with the Emperor (keeping moſt conſtantly his promiſe and fidelity renewed) during this time made ſharp war upon the Hungarians, which took part with the Pope, and greatly annoyed them. As theſe things thus paſſed in Germany, the Emperor when he had gotten Aſcalum, and led his Hoſt into Flamminia, having Ravenna at his Commandment, from thence came to Faventia, which City never loved the Emperor; the circuit of whoſe walls is five miles in compaſs, and pitched his Camp round about the ſame. And although the ſiege was much hindered by auſterity of the time and weather (being in the very cold time of Winter) yet notwithſtanding through his great fortitude and courage, ſo animating his Soldiers in the painfulneſs of the laborious ſiege, he indured out the ſame, who thought it no little ſhame, having once made that enterpriſe, to come from thence without any aſſault given. And therefore when now the Winter (ſo extream cold and hard) was well near ended, and the Spring-time now hard at hand, and by long battery he had made the ſame in divers places faultable; the Citizens (being greatly diſcouraged, and in no hope of the defence thereof) ſent their Legates to the Emperor, craving pardon for their offence, and that he would grant unto them their lives, and ſo yielded themſelves unto his mercy.

The Governour of Agrippina revolteth to the Pope.

Boiemus relenteth at the Emperors Letter.

KING Hen 3. The Emperors great lenity and clemency, but yet marvelouſly inforced.

The Emperor inforced to make his Money of leather.

The Pope fendeth for foreign aid which is prevented.

The Emperor riggeth forth a Navy to the Sea.

A great Victory on the Sea againſt the Popes confederats by the Emperors Navy.

The Emperor obtaineth another Victory by Land at Ticinum againſt the Pope and his confederates.

The Emperor thinketh to make the Pope afraid.

The Turk invadeth Chriſtendom with a great and mighty power.

The unmerciful cruelty and ſlaughter of Chriſtian Men by the Turk.

The King of Hungary craveth aid of the Emperor, for the which he offereth him his Land.

The Emperor, having againſt them good and ſufficient cauſe of revenge, yet for that his noble Heart thought it to be the beſt revenge that might be, to pardon the offence of vanquiſhed men: He thought it better to grant them their requeſts, to ſave the City and Citizens thereof, with innumerable people, than by Arms to make the ſame his Souldiers prey, to the deſtruction both of the City, and great number of People therein. So doth this good Emperor in one of his Epiſtles, Adacta nobis, confeſs himſelf. Which Epiſtle, to declare the Lenity and thereiful Heart of ſo worthy a Prince, if that with great and marvellous provocations and wrongs he had not been incited, I thought good in the midſt of the Hiſtory here to have placed. But thus I have kept you long herein, and yet not finiſhed the ſame.

In this ſiege the Emperor, having ſpent and conſumed almoſt all his Treaſure both gold and ſilver, cauſed other Money to be made of Leather, which on the one ſide had his Image, and on the other ſide the ſpread Eagle (the arms of the Empire) and made a proclamation, that the ſame ſhould paſs from man to man for all neceſſaries in ſtead of other money; and therewithal promiſed, that whoſoever brought the ſame Money unto his Exchequer when the wars were ended, he would give them gold for the ſame, according to the value of every Coin limited: which thing afterward truly and faithfully he performed, as all the Hiſtoriographers do accord.

Thus when the Pope, as before is ſaid, had ſtopped his ears, and would not hear the Emperors Legates that came to intreat for peace, but rejected and deſpiſed his moſt courteous and equal demands; neither yet had he left any wily policy unattempted or force unpractiſed, that with his confederates he thought himſelf either able to revenge or elſe reſiſt: he by his Legates calleth to a Council at Rome, all ſuch Prelates out of Italy, France, and England, as he thought to favor him and his proceedings, that hereby, as his laſt ſhift and only refuge, he by their helps might deprive Fredrick of his Empire, as an utter enemy to God and to the Church. All which things Fredricus having underſtanding of, and knowing that theſe aſſemblies ſhould be but to the deſtruction and ſupplanting of him, determined to ſtop and let their paſſages to Rome, as well by Sea as by Land, in all that ever he might. So that all the paſſages by Land being now ſtopped and prevented, he commanded his Son Henry with certain Gallies to go and keep the Coaſts of Sardinia, which Kingdom the Italians call Entimum: and from thence to go to Piſas, and with the Piſans to rig out a Navy to meet with (if it were poſſible) ſuch as ſhould come to aid the Pope at Rome. The Popes Champions underſtanding that by Land they could not ſafely repair to Rome: they procured of Gallies and Ships out of Genoa (having Gulielmus Braccius for their chief Captain or Admiral) Forty ſail for their defence; thinking hereby, that if they ſhould Fortune to meet with any of the Emperors Ships or Gallies, which ſhould lye for them in wait, they ſhould be able to make their part good, and give them alſo the repulſe. Encius in like manner and Huglinus (being Captain and Admiral of the Piſan Navy for the Emperor) Lanched forth to Sea with Forty Ships and Gallies: and betwixt the Iſles of Lilium and Mons Chriſti, which lye between Liburnium and Corſica, they met with the Genowaies Ships; and ſtraightways fiercely began to grapple with them and board them, in which fight at length were three of the Genowayes Ships both boulged and ſunk, with all the riches and Treaſure in them. In theſe were taken three Legates of the Popes, whereof were two Cardinals, Jacobus Columna, Otho Marchio, and Gregorius de Romania (all cruel enemies againſt the Emperor) and many other Prelates more; beſides a great number of Legates and Procurators of Cities, with an infinite number of Monks and Prieſts, beſides of Genowayes Souldiers 6000, with divers others.

Pandolphus Colonutius, in deſcribing the Circumſtances of the great loſs and misfortune of theſe Champions of the Pope by Sea, amongſt the reſt declareth, that beſides the great prey and booty which the takers had from them, they alſo found many Writings and Letters againſt Fredrick, which much helpt them in the defence of thoſe cauſes, wherein they had labored againſt him. The like miſchance alſo almoſt about that time happened on the Popes ſide, by the Emperors Souldiers which lay in the gariſon at Ticinum, thus: There went forth upon a time out of Ticinum into the borders of Genowaies, certain bands to give them Larums in the Country: which bands the ſcuriers of Mediolanum (where lay a great Gariſon of the Popes) deſcrying, told the Captain of the Town, that now a very Opportune and fit time was to give an aſſault to Ticinum; for that (ſay they) the greateſt part are now gone a Foraging. Whereupon they immediatly calling together the Captains and ſuch as had charge, ſet their Souldiers in Array, and marched forward to Ticinum. And now when they were come almoſt thither, the Ticinian bands (whom they thought to have been far a Foraging) were returned and met with them, and fiercely gave a full charge upon them: Who being diſmayed at the ſuddenneſs of the matter, fought not long, but gave over and fled. In which skirmiſh were taken (beſides thoſe that were ſlain) three hundred and fifty Captains, and brought priſoners into Ticinum with all their Enſignes with them.

News hereof was brought to the Emperor not long after, who then was removing from the ſiege of Faventia (as ye heard) to the City of Benonium, thinking to have deſtroyed the ſame. But upon the hearing of theſe good News, he altereth his purpoſe, and thinking to have hereafter a more convenient time thereunto, leadeth his Army towards Rome: and in the way he reconciled to him the City of Piſarum. But Fanum, for that the Townſmen ſhut their Gates and would not ſuffer the Emperor to come in, he took by force and deſtroyed. For the Emperor, ſeeing that neither by Petition made to the Pope, nor yet by his Lawful excuſation, he could do any good with him, thought, that by his ſudden coming thither, and with fear of the peril imminent, he might be brought to ſome uniformity, and cauſed to leave off his accuſtomed pertinacy. And although the Emperor was too ſtrong for him, yet for that he regarded nothing more than the publick tranquiſity of the Empire, and that he might then take the Tartarian wars in hand, if he could by any means conclude, he refuſed not ſo to intreat a peace with him, as though he had been both in force and Fortune much his inferior.

Whileſt that this ruffle was betwixt the Emperor and the Pope Ochodarius the Emperor of the Tartarians his Son, with a great power and proviſion made, invaded the borders next adjoyning unto him, and there wan Roxolanum, Bodolium, Mudanum, with divers other Cities, Towns, and Villages, deſtroying, waſting, and burning the Countries all about, killing and ſlaying Man, Woman, and Child, ſparing none of any Sex or Age. At whoſe ſudden invaſion, the people being in ſuch fear and perplexity (having no City, no refuge, nor aid to ſtand in defence for them) were fain to leave all that ever they had, and diſperſe themſelves, into Woods, and fly into Mariſhes and Mountains, or whereſoever any ſuccour elſe did offer it ſelf to them. And by this time the Tartarian Hoſt was come as far as Uratiſlavia, where Henricus of Polonia and the Duke of Sileſia with their Armies met with them; who, for the inequality of the number and ſmall ſtrength they were of, had ſoon an overthrow, and almoſt all their Souldiers being ſlain, they themſelves were taken and put to the Sword. From thence they came to Moravia, and from thence to the Kingdom of Bohemia, which Country, while the King kept himſelf in ſtrong defenced Forts, and durſt not come abroad, he invaded, and deſtroyed all Hungary, putting to flight and vanquiſhing Colmannus the Brother of Belus, the fourth King of Hungary, by whom alſo was great ſpoil made in both the Pannonias, Miſiaxum, Bulgaria, and Servia. When Belus the King of Hungary had gotten to Pola (which is a City of Hiſtria) unto Otho the Duke of Dalmatia, he ſent his Legates to Fredrick the Emperor, promiſing that if he would ſend him aid that the Tartarians might be expelled, then Hungary ſhould ever after be under the juriſdiction of the Emperor: which thing if he refuſed to do, that then the ſame were in great danger to be ſubject to the Tartarians, to the no little peril of the whole Empire. And he ſaid further, that the cauſe wherof he with more inſtance required the ſame, was, that ſo many Chriſtian Men and Countries made ſuch pitiful Lamentation in this their great calamity and miſery, and that there was none able to help them; which (ſaith he) is as great ſhame as may be to the whole Chriſtian State and Empire. And alſo he ſaid, that if the malice of this barbarous people were not ſuppreſſed, then he thought they would make invaſion upon the Empire and Provinces of the ſame.

The Pope will grant to have no peace.

The Emperor although he thought it very requiſite, that with all convenient ſpeed this miſchief ſhould be remedied and prevented: Yet notwithſtanding, his great Enemy the Pope, with his confederates, was the only let and hinderance thereof. For when he ſaw and perceived that he himſelf could do no good, and only labored in vain in ſeeking peace with the Pope, he gave commandment to Bojemus and Bojus, to intreat and perſwade with him. And (conſidering the imminent peril like to inſue by reaſon of ſuch civil diſſention to the whole State of Chriſtendom) that he would take up and conclude a peace, and mitigate ſomewhat his fierce and wrathful mood. Wherefore when he ſaw further, that neither by that means of intreaty, nor any other, the Pope would deſiſt from his ſtubborn and malicious froward purpoſe, he writeth again to the King of Hungary, that he was right ſorry and greatly lamented their miſerable State, and that he much deſired to relieve the need and neceſſity that he and all the reſt ſtood in. But why that he could not redreſs the ſame, nor ſtand him then in any ſtead, he blamed greatly the Biſhop of Rome; who refuſing all intreaty of peace, he could not without great peril to himſelf depart out of Italy, leſt that when he ſhould come to the aid of him (by the Popes miſchievous Imaginations) he ſhould be in peril of loſing all at home. Notwithſtanding, he ſent Conradus Ceſar King of Bohemia, and other Princes more of Germany to reſiſt and withſtand the Enemy, as much as in them lay to do. The great Army and number of ſuch Souldiers, as wore the Croſs by the Popes aſſignement, deferred their journey againſt the Tartarians, and had commandment given unto them by one Albertus (the Popes Procurator) to tarry and abide at Home, until they ſhould be called for in battel to fight againſt the Emperor. This was the loving zeal and affection of the Pope and his adherents: (To conclude) in this time of Calamity towards the Chriſtian State and Commonwealth; that he had rather bend his force and revenge his malice upon the Chriſtian and good Emperor, than either he himſelf to withſtand, or ſuffer and permit, by concluſion of any profitable peace, that this moſt bloody and cruel Tartarian ſhould be let and reſtrained from ſo great havock, ſpoil and ſlaughter of the Chriſtian Men: and yet forſooth theſe men will ſeem to have the greateſt regard of all others to the Chriſtian preſervation, and think to have the ſupremacy given therein: what thing elſe is this, but manifeſt mockery and deceiving of the people? But notwithſtanding, even in the midſt of this ſpoil and havock of Polonia, Bohemia, and Hungaria, was it determined, that at Libuſſa, the Princes confederate ſhould be aſſembled about the depoſing of the Emperor, and creation of another.

The Popes fault that the Turk is not reſiſted.

The Pope had rather fight againſt the Emperor than againſt the Turk.

But now notwithſtanding, the provident foreſight and wiſe policy of the Emperor (as you heard before) in reſtraining the paſſages both by the Sea and Land, who had ſpecial regard thereunto, and gave moſt ſtrict charge that none ſhould paſs without privy ſearch and examination, as one having ſufficient tryal, as wellin his own perſon as by the example of his Predeceſſors, what great miſchief and deſſention by their Legates every way ſent out, they had procured, both to the Imperial State and Dignity, and to the whole Country of Germany: yet found they ſuch means, and wrought ſuch policies, that they had not only ſecret paſſage and repaſſage with their Letters and ſpials into all Chriſtendom where they liſted, but alſo ſo laboured the matter and handled the ſame, That the long continued league of amity between the French King and the Emperor, whoſe Predeceſſors, as alſo they themſelves, had many years reverently obſerved it in Chriſtian concord and unity, was, by this ſeditious Prelate and arrogant Vicar of Satan, now either utterly infringed, or elſe in varaible ſuſpence: as by their Letters each to other, and hereunder inſuing, is to be read and ſeen: which for the more probability of this Hiſtory of Fredrick (not being long or greatly tedious) I thought meet here to intext and place.

The Emperor as well in his own perſon, as his Predeceſſors have tryal of the Popes ſubtil practiſes.

{KING Hen. 3}

The Epiſtle of the French King to Fredrick the Emperor, touching the impriſoning of certain Cardinals of France.

HItherto (Noble Emperor) haſh the good opinion and great confidence (many years in mutual love eſtabliſhed betwixt us) laſted and continued well, hoping that no ſuch cauſe ſhould riſe betwixt us to hatch either hatred or other occaſion offenſive between your Highneſs Empire, and our Kingdom. Eſpecially, ſeeing that all our Predeceſſors, King of France, late of moſt worthy memory (till theſe our days) have been ſo zealouſly affected to the moſt high and regal State of your Empire; and alſo that we, whom God hath placed ſucceſſively to Reign as King, have been no otherwiſe minded nor affected towards the ſame. None otherwiſe alſo on their behalf have the Anoient and renowned Emperors of Rome, our Neighbours and your Predeceſſors, ſhewed themſelves towards us (each other eſteeming the Empire and Kingdom of France as one) and faithfully conſerving together the unity of peace and concord. Inſomuch that there hath not chanced between them theſe many years ſo much as one ſpark of Diſcord and Diſſention. But this notwithſtanding, we for our part cannot but greatly marvel, and not without good cauſe are troubled and vexed; that, without deſert or any offence, you have taken the Prelates of our Realm upon the Sea, making their repair to the See Apoſtolical; to the which, as well by their faith as their obedience they ſtand bound and are obedient, neither could they withſtand the Pope his commandment: Theſe have you impriſoned, and ſo ſtill detain the ſame. Whereat (we do your Majeſty to wit) we are not well pleaſed, neither yet take in ſo good part, as you peradventure think we do. For by their own Letters we underſtand, they had excogitate nothing prejudicial to your Imperial Eſtate and celſitude, although the Pope had proſecuted therein more than became him to do. Wherefore, ſeeing that there is no cauſe why you ſhould detain them; it is meet and becometh no leſs your magnificence, but that you reſtore unto us and ſet at liberty the ſaid Prelates of our Realm: wherein alſo you ſhall appeaſe our Grudge, and keep us your friend; which account the diſpleaſure you do to them as our own and proper injury. For why? It were a great diſhonour to our Realm and Kingly Eſtate, if we would wink hereat and overpaſs the ſame with ſilence. Wherefore if you will conſider and reſpect the thing that we have ſaid, we doubt not but that you will releaſe the Biſhop of Peneſtrum, with the other Legates and Prelates of the Church, which you to our prejudice do detain. In deſiring of our aid doubtleſs we gave unto them a manifeſt nay: neither could they obtain in our Kingdom any thing at all which ſeemed to be againſt or prejudicial to your Majeſty. Let therefore your Imperial Providence ponder in the Ballance of Juſtice, thoſe things which we write unto you, neither let our lawful requeſt unto you be fruſtrate or made in vain. For our Realm and Kingdom of France is not ſo debilitate or impoveriſhed that it will be ſpurned at, or troden under your feet: Fare ye well.

The great amity and long continued league between the Empire and Kingdom of France.

The King without great allurement of the Pope, would not ſo have written to the Emperor.

Here it ſhould ſeem the Emperor found the fault of contradiction.

The Reſcript of the Emperor to the ſame Letter of the King of France.

OUr Imperial magnificence hath peruſed your Kingly Letters; wherein if we had not found manifeſt contradiction, they might peradventure have obtained at our hands all that they required. But even as with a little leven a whole lump of dow is ſowred; ſo a manifeſt untruth alledged hath made the whole argument of your letter both faulty and unſavoury. It is apparent that you wanted the vertue of mediocrity in the concluſion of the ſame your Graces letter: For that they themſelves bewray no leſs than we give you manifeſtly to underſtand, and many more beſides do know. It is notorious alſo, and to all the world revealed, in what ſort that Apoſtolical Father hath impugned our innocency, as well with the one Sword, as with the other; and how that whileſt we at his commandment took our Journey beyond the Seas, the ſame our great enemy and hoſtile adverſary invaded our King-

{KING Hen. 3}

Kingdom of Sicilia: and the ſame, not in one place or two, but in divers and ſundry parts thereof hath waſted, ſpoiled, and deſtroyed. After this, when with great intreaty at our return from Aſia, we had concluded a Peace with him, which with us at his own pleaſure he made, and had taken and received our devotion for the ſame, which in ſerviceable manner we granted him; the ſaid Apoſtolical Father (that notwithſtanding) hath ſince that time rather aggravated his diſpleaſure toward us, than any thing at all qualified the ſame; and further hath to our deprivation and ſubverſion, excogitate and deviſed againſt us all the miſchief he might or hath been able, no cauſe in all the world given of us to provoke the ſame; and further hath promulgated to our great defamation and ſhame (as well by his Letters as Legates) the Sentence of Excommunication againſt us unto all Nations. Laſtly, he aſpiring to our Imperial State, and conſpiring our ſupplantation, hath made War againſt us, as againſt King David, Gods anointed; and hath unto a private Counſel for that purpoſe called all the Prelates he can get, as one that meaneth to ſet all the whole world together by the ears. But ſuch is the marvelous Wiſdom of God, by whom we live and reign; who beholding the wicked purpoſe he went about (confounding the Crafty in their craftineſs) hath given into our hands as well your Prelates of the Realm of France, as alſo of other Regions and Provinces; all which we impriſon and detain, as Enemies and Adverſaries to our Imperial Crown and Perſon. For where there deſiſted not to be a Perſecutor, there hath not wanted alſo a ſufficient Withſtander and Defender. Let not therefore your kingly Highneſs marvel, although Auguſtus detaineth in priſon your French Prelates, which have endeavoured themſelves to Conſpire, and ſo to diſturb our Imperial Eſtate and Regiment. Fare ye well.

120000 ounces of gold, as before you heard.

The crafty compaſſed in their craftineſs.

When Frederick now ſaw there was none other remedy, and that in vain he laboured to have peace with the Pope, he proſecuteth this War to the uttermoſt: and when he had gotten Tudertum and reconciled the ſame, he deſtroyed the Town of Geminum and Narvia, and giveth the ſpoil of them unto his Souldiers: he gently received the yielding up of Siburnium, and waſteth all the Country round about Rome. The Pope herewith diſmayed and troubled with ſuch as otherwiſe diſſwaded and counſelled him, and ſeeing that things proſpered not ſo well with him and againſt the Emperor as he wiſhed and deſired, being in deſpair of obtaining his purpoſe, died for very anger and thought.

Gregory the Ninth dieth for thought and cruſt heart.

What Opinion the Prelates of Germany at that time had of this Gregory is extant, and to be ſeen by the Oration of Eberhardus Biſhop of Juvavence, that he made to the Nobility of Boioria in the Parliament at Reginoburgh, written by Johannes Aventius in his ſeventh Book. Doubtleſs he not only brought great and ruinous Calamities to the whole Chriſtian Common-wealth and alſo the Empire, whilſt he ſought thus to depreſs and bridle the Emperour, and advance his Papal See and Dignity, but alſo brought into the Church of God much horrible Impiety, Blaſphemy and Wickedneſs, whereof both Blondus, Platina, Balæus, and others make mention: and amongſt others that moſt deteſtable Cantilena, Salve Regina, in the which he attributeth the Honour and Worſhip proper only to Chriſt, unto the Virgin his Mother. This is he in whoſe name the Book of the Decretals was ſet out, which (to omit the opinion of divers other learned men) Johannes Balæus calleth it The ſink or puddle of Looliſhneſs and Impiety. Doubtleſs Carolus Molinæus, a man both of ſingular judgment in that Law, which in Tribunal Courts and Judgments is uſed, as alſo in this, painted forth the Decree of this Gregory in his Book of Annotations unto Platina, whoſe words whereof are theſe, Certum eſt, multa capita in iis mutila & decurtata eſſe, ut invidioſum argumentum lateret, &c. That is, Doubtleſs divers Chapters in the ſame Book of Decretals be mangled and unperfect, that many contentious Arguments therein might lurk. For when the ambitious deſire of reigning like Kings took them, they ſtudied nothing elſe but how to inlarge and advance their See and Dominion with the Empire it ſelf and other Kingdoms (oft ſhaken and weakned through Contention:) and this purpoſe and end had they and now other in all their Conſtitutions.

Molinæus upon the Decretals of Pope Gregory the Ninth.

The proof whereof Molinæus declareth in his Book De regibus Galliæ & Angliæ. But many more Examples by the Emperors, Princes, and Lords Electors of the Empire may be gathered, whereof to ſpeak, more convenient place ſhall ſerve hereafter.

In the ſtead of this Gregory was placed Celeſtine, born in Mediolanum amongſt the Caſtellians: who, as Blondus declareth, by fained promiſes offered a League with Fredericus, and the eighteenth day after he was created Pope, he alſo died.

The creation and death of Pope Celeſtinus.

Thus when the Author of all this Conſpiracy was gone, Fredericus now thinking himſelf free and void of that fear which before he had, and not daring to be abſent out of Italy, with all his indeavour levieth an Army, and prepareth his furniture and other neceſſaries for the delivery of the Chriſtians, ſo mightily oppreſſed as ye heard by the Turk or Tartarians. Who, hearing of the coming of the Emperor, left the ſtraight way through Hungary, which they came, and returned by the River of Danubium to Taurica, and ſo through the Fens of Meotida, and by the River Tanaum, into Sarmatia Aſiatica. When the Cardinals had now a long time protracted the creation of the Pope, and would not agree upon the ſame, the Emperor put them in remembrance of their duty, and blameth them for their diſagreeing, and exhorteth them to be more careful for the Chriſtian Common-wealth. His two Epiſtles touching this matter are extant; whereby appeareth, that only for the care and deſire he had of peace and of the Chriſtian unity and ſtate, he did the ſame: and for that (peradventure) the Cardinals refuſed to make peace with him before they had created a new Pope: the one for more brevity I have omitted, and here inſerted the other.

The Emperor prepareth an Army to fight with the Tartars, the Tartarians fly.

An Epiſtle Invective of the Emperor unto the Cardinals, for that they cannot agree upon the creation of the Pope.

Frederick againſt the Cardinals.

UNto you I write, Oh you Children of Ephraim, which evil have bent your Bows, and worſe have ſhot your Arrows, filthily turning your backs in the day of battel; unto you I ſpeak, O you Children of Belial, and diſharkled Flock, you inſenſible people and aſſiſtants of the great Judge, unto you I write, O you diſſentious Cardinals, whom the world for your deſerts doth hate; for whoſe cauſes the whole world being at variance is evil ſpoken of. Doubtleſs, I cannot ſpeak unto you, but to your detraction, becauſe I am wordly and you ſpiritual. I am unperfect, wherefore I muſt do as the unperfect world doth: neither can the part be diſſonant to the whole, nor I contrary to my ſelf that writeth. Attend ye therefore my rude Epiſtle, wanting the dignity of rhetorical ſtile. My provoked Tongue burſteth forth into words, before my conceiving ſpirit hath delivered the ſame; and ſo not attending to the higher Regiment, hath haſtned to expreſs my words not fully conceived or premeditate. Thus, I ſay, a troubled mind oftentimes doth beget diſordered talk, and untimely uttereth the ſame. This therefore it is that our heart hath conceived, that we believe and all men confeſs, that Jeſus Chriſt the Mediator between God and man, which came from Heaven to make peace upon the Earth, is not divided and at variance, being alſo the Maſter and Lord of the Apoſtles. But Satan, being divided in himſelf, that bluſtering Prince is amongſt you, as thoſe to whom he miniſtreth; he, even he, the Perſwader of Diſcord and diſſention, that Man-killer, Father of Lyes, and Spirit of Darkneſs, that hath divided your Tongues, and ſet Diſſention amongſt your ſelves; neither do ye good one to another, nor yet to the World, being by you into ſo perilous a ſtate brought; and the little Ship of Peter, which is toſſed upon the Sea by the vehement winds, you nothing regard; which Ship, though it need not indeed utterly to fear drowning, yet ſuffereth it by your negligence many great ſtorms and perilous tempeſts. Doubtleſs, if ye would diligently conſider how the Nations and People whom ye were wont to judge, in ſcorn ſhake their heads at you; every one of you would be aſhamed of another. And to ſay the truth, they cannot do too much to deteſt your ſo deteſtable Opprobry: for whilſt every one of you aſpireth to the Chair, every one is at variance with Peters Ship by the diſſention of the Cardinals greatly afflicted.

with his Fellow, and whilſt one of you cannot agree with another, none is promoted; and whilſt none is promoted, the Cathedral Dignity vaniſheth. And thus by your diſcord, the peaceable ſtate and concord of the Church is confounded, and the perfection of the Faith and Religion, whereby ye ſhould live, periſheth. And ſurely, through your default it periſheth; ſo that, whereas nature hath placed the ſenſe and underſtanding to be, that part, like a Monſter, remaineth with you both ſenſeleſs and headleſs. And no marvel, for why, your hearing is impaired, and that ſound of the mouth which ſtrilly was heard throughout the whole Earth, is utterly dumb, and become a ſcoffing Eccho. For why, the thundrings of Peter and Paul are now no more heard, the Preachers are become dumb Dogs, and are commanded to ſilence. Perhaps you have hands ready to receive, but there be no bribes; for why, thoſe that were wont to come from Saba, and bring gold with them, now come no more, ſeeing the Lord is not in the Manger, and the Celeſtial ſhining Star refuſing to be their guid. Moreover, ye want feet to walk withall, for ſeeing there is no man to give you ought, you will not remove one foot for any mans pleaſure. Fie ſhameleſs people, the leaſt and ſimpleſt Beaſt may learn you Obedience, for the Birds have their Captain, and the ſilly Bees their King, but you will come under no Government, &c.

Peters ſhrill voice turned into a ſcoffing eccho.

The Emperor releaſeth the Cardinals out of priſon.

The Emperor yet after this, at the requeſt of Baldwinus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, who came to Frederick to Parma, releaſed the Cardinals out of priſon, thinking thereby not only to gratifie the Emperor Baldwinus, but alſo thinking that thereby things would have the better grown to publick tranquility on every ſide. When the Cardinals were all aſſembled at Avignia, they made Sinibaldus, a Genoway, Pope, whom by a contrary name, for that he had determined (as I ſuppoſe) to be hurtful to the Commonwealth, they called Innocentius the Fourth. Of which Election when Fredrick underſtood, he was well pleaſed therewith. And for that he had in all this troublous time been his friend, he well hoped that the Chriſtian Commonwealth ſhould by him have been brought to much peace and concord. Wherefore he ſent both his Legates and Letters gratulatory unto him, letting him to underſtand how well it contented and pleaſed him that he was made Pope; and what peace and quietneſs thereby he promiſed (as it were to himſelf) he maketh full relation thereof; offering again unto him obſervance, help and aid in all things, commending his Dignity to the publick State and quietneſs of the Chriſtian Commonwealth and Empire, &c.

Innocentius the fourth created Pope.

The Emperor rejoyceth of the Popes election, but without cauſe why.

He alſo wrote his Letters to Otho Duke of Bojoria, who a little before was reconciled to the Emperor, that he which was elected Pope was a good Man, a lover of peace, and ſtudious as well for the tranquility of the Chriſtian Commonwealth, as of the Empire.

The Legates of Fredrick alſo, with the furtherance of Baldwinus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, laboured very diligently for the concluſion of the promiſe of peace. And to be brief, every Man was in good hope and looked for no leſs. But far otherwiſe fell the matter out, and contrary to all their expectation. For the Pope (ſet on and incouraged by the Cardinals and others againſt Fredrick) ſecretly and amongſt themſelves wrought contrary to that they openly pretended, and not a little diſappointed both Fredrick and others of their expectation and good opinion they had of the Popes holineſs. For whileſt the Emperors Legates attended the anſwer of their peace before promiſed, Raineras the Cardinal went ſecretly to Viterbium with a certain number of Souldiers, and took the Town which before was on the Emperors part.

The Pope taketh Viterbium while the Emperor hoped for peace.

The Emperor having underſtanding hereof, muſtereth his bands, and with ſufficient power entreth the Popes dition, again to recover Viterbium: But yet, taking this war ſo in hand (not thinking thereby to expel all conditions of peace) at the requeſt of certain of the Cardinals he was contented to leave Viterbium, being furniſhed by the Emperor of war-like proviſion before, and came to Aqua. From thence he ſent again other Ambaſſadors to Rome, and with them alſo the Emperor of Conſtantinople, with the Earl of Tholouſe, who he thought were able to do much with the Pope in the proſecuting of this peace.

And although at the time of Eaſter the matter ſeemed to have been through, and peace concluded, for that his Legates had Sworn in the behalf of the Emperor (and as he willed them) that he would ſubmit himſelf to the Pope. And again, for that the Cardinals and others, commonly called and named him Fredricus the Chriſtian Prince; yet all this was no more but for a further fetch and purpoſe. Not for that they meant indeed to conclude any peace with him, or to go through therewithal, but that through this diſſimulation and likelihood of peace, which they underſtood the Emperor much deſired, he ſhould ſet free and open the paſſages which he ſtraitly kept, that no man could paſs and come to Rome, whether a great multitude daily reſorted and flocked for Religion ſake. But when all came to all, and that the Legates perceived no concluſion of peace was ſimply purpoſed on their behalf, they began to deſpair of the matter; letting the Emperor ſo to underſtand. The Emperor yet notwithſtanding doubted not, but if he might himſelf ſpeak with the Pope, he upon reaſonable conditions ſhould well enough accord with him; wherefore he by his Legates and Letters deſired him to appoint a place where the Emperor might reſort to him. The Pope ſeemed to be contented herewithal, and appointed a day at Feſcennia, where they would talk together; and the Pope promiſed that he would be there before him, and expect the Emperors coming. But the Pope in this while had made a confederacy with the French King againſt Fredricus; who when he knew thoſe three Gallies to be ready and brought unto Centumcellas, which he before had ſpoken for unto the Genowaies, ſecretly in the night with his company (haſtening thither in Poſt ſpeed) took ſhip, and firſt came to Genoa, and from thence to Lions in France; where he (calling a Council) with a loud voice ſummoneth Fredrick, and appointing him a day, commanded him there perſonally to plead his cauſe.

The Emperor hath too much confidence in the Pope.

The Pope mocketh the Emperor and goeth to Lions, where he proſcribeth the Emperor.

And yet although he underſtood that the ſudden departing of him out of Italy, made plain demonſtration of no concluſion or meaning of a peace; and alſo knew the Council which the Pope had called, wherein he was himſelf both Plaintiff and Judge, and at the ſame Council thoſe, which he had by bribes allured, pretended the deſtruction of the Emperor; with many other ſuch evident Demonſtrations, both of his envious and hateful heart towards him: yet the moſt modeſt Emperor, uſing the innocency and uprightneſs of his cauſe, and as one moſt deſirous of peace and Chriſtian Concord, ſent the Patriarch of Antioch, which lately was come out of Syria, the Biſhop of Panormia and Thadeus Sueſſanus the Preſident of his Court (a moſt skilful and prudent Civilian) to the Council at Lions; which ſignified unto them that the Emperor would be there for the defence of his own cauſe; And, for that the day was very ſhort, required a time more convenient for him thither to make his repair. The Emperor alſo being onward on his way, and come as far as Taurinum, ſent before other Meſſengers, as the Maſter of the Flewiſh order, and Peter de Vineis, to give them underſtanding of the Emperors coming, and to intreat that he would Prorogue the day of hearing, till that he might conveniently travel thither. But for any thing that could be either ſaid or done, or upon how juſt cauſe ſoever required, the Pope would not give ſo much as three days ſpace, in the which time the Ambaſſadors aſſured them of the Emperors preſence; as though there had been no common proviſo for every man in that caſe by the law to have uſed upon any reaſonable let. What would I longer protract the time? When the day by them appointed was come, the Pope with his confederates (whom for money and bribes he had gotten to that Council) againſt Gods law, againſt Chriſtian Doctrine, againſt both the Preſcript of the Law of nature and reaſon, againſt the rule of equity, againſt the order of law appointed, againſt the conſtitutions of Emperors, and alſo the Decrees of the Empire, without any obſervation of the Law, or granting dilatory days, without probation of any Crime, or his cauſe ſuffered to be pleaded unto, or heard what might be anſwered therein, taking upon him to be both adverſary and judge, condemned the Emperor being abſent. What more wicked ſentence was ever pronounced? What more cruel fact, conſidering the perſon, might be committed? Or what thing more brutiſh and beaſtly could have been imagined or deviſed?

The Emperor coming to make his appearance before the Pope.

The extremity of the Pope to the Emperor.

{KING Hen. 3}

vised? And yet hereat were those Bishops nothing ashamed; but meaning to leave their doings in writing (as an impudent Testimony to their posterity) established the same for a law to continue.

Vengeance falleth upon the Pope for his false Judgment.

But mark what vengeance God took upon this wicked judge. The writers of the Annals record, that when Fredericus the Emperor, and Conradus his Son being Cesar, were both dead; the Pope gaping for the inheritance of Naples and Sicily, and thinking by force to have subdued the same, came to Naples with a great Host of Men, where was heard in the Popes Court manifestly pronounced this voice, Veni miser ad judicium Dei, Thou wretch come to receive thy Judgment. And the next day after the Pope was found in his Bed dead, all black and blew as though he had been beaten with bats, as before in the History of King John is declared.

When the Emperor had understanding of this cruel and tyrannical sentence of the Pope, passed and pronounced against him (considering his furious purpose and mind therein) thought good by his Letters, to let all Christian Princes and Potentates understand, as well that injurious and manifold displeasure he had sustained by the four Popes in all their times, as also the cruelty and tyranny of this Pope, in pronouncing the sentence of Judgment and condemnation against him (passing the bounds both of justice, equity, and reason) which Letter as he wrote the same, hereunder followeth to be seen.

The Letter of the Emperor to the French King and other Princes, for the sentence given against him in the Council of Lions by the Pope and Cardinals.

ALthough we suppose not the contrary, but that both by true certificate and common rumor you have heard of the indifferency of our cause and good handling thereof: yet for that more credit is commonly given to that the eye seeth, than to that the ear receiveth, we thought good to present unto you the naked truth of such things, which the Popes successively have put forth, and forged against us. To the perusing and consideration of which my cause and letter, I beseech your gentleness amongst other times of leasure, that you will spie out some fit and convenient time therefore. And all other whatsoever that shall have desire to hear Princes counsels and affairs, let them in like sort attentively consider. First, whether our Predecessors have been destitute or not, of Godly zeal, just dealing, and righteousness: and whether we may not lawfully revenge our selves, being so much provoked, of such evils and injuries as have been wrought against us. Secondly, let them consider whether Christs Vicar doth follow Christs steps or not; and whether Peters Successors do follow his example or not; and also by what Law, equity and right, that sentence which they have pronounced against us, may be maintained and allowed: as also what name they may justly give it, and whether that may be said to be a sentence, which is given by an unsufficient Judge or not. For although we acknowledge that the Lord hath given full power in spiritual things unto his Church, that whatsoever the same bindeth in Earth, is bound in Heaven; and whatsoever the same looseth, is also loosed; yet we read neither by Gods Law, nor by any Law of Man, that we ought of duty to be subject unto him, or that an Empire ought at his pleasure to be transformed and transposed, or that he may give any such sentence or Judgment to punish Princes temporally, and deprive them of their Kingdoms. For why? Although our consecration belongeth unto him by right and custom (as he challengeth) yet our deposing and depriving doth no more belong to him, than doth that presumption belong to any other Prelate of other Realms, which do consecrate and anoint their Kings, as the custom and manner is. Or put case it were so (we nothing hindered hereby) that he had such power: hath he that power to the intent to revenge himself upon whomsoever his malicious mind consenteth, and without all equity and law to bring them under his jurisdiction? He hath proceeded of late against us, as is said, but not by the order of accusation, forsomuch as neither was there any sufficient accuser, neither went there out any inscription or process before; neither yet by denunciation, forsomuch as there lacked a lawful denouncer, neither yet by the way of inquisition, for that there went before it no manifest accusation. But he peradventure will say, that all things that he layeth against us were manifest and notorious. But that we deny, and nothing to be notorious, but that which may by a sufficient number of witnesses be approved and tryed. For so may every judge himself (contemning the order of law) affirm what he list to be notorious, and thus condemn whom he list. There were against us (as well it may be said in Council) certain false witnesses, although not many, of whom the Bishop of Calin was one, whose neer Kinsman or Nephew (by our Laws condemned for Treason to be hanged) maketh also to us an infestine Enemy. ¶ To such like effect prosecuting the rest of his Epistle, which for brevity sake I omit.

This policy used the Pope to vex and disturb both the Country of Germany, and the whole Empire; and not so only, but also utterly to destroy and subvert the same: By the ruinous decay whereof, the Pope and his Prelates thought to make up their mouths. And thus, whilst that Germany was now newly again divided, some taking part with Fredrick the Emperor, and Conradus Cesar his Son, and other Nobles and Princes of the Empire; some with those that should by the Popes procurement be the Electors of the new Emperor, othersome with neither of both, as men not minding nor tending to the publick Utility, but to serve their own purposes, armed themselves; and thus was the publick Peace and quiet broken and disturbed, and all together in tumult and hurly burly. For whilst the one part laboured by all force to retain the dominion by publick and common consent first to him committed, the other part in like sort indeavored themselves with all force and power to use and occupy the same, according unto the decree of the Bishop of Rome, and to take it from Fredrick: Thus great conflicts grew on all parts.

Germany all together in hurly burly through the Popes malicious mind.

By these Civil wars, Germany suffered no little calamity; in every place was manslaughter and murther, the Country spoiled, the Towns and villages set on fire and burnt, the Churches and Temples, wherein the Husbandmen had put their goods and substance, violated and robbed: Houses were pulled down, the goods divided, and every Mans cattel driven away. To conclude, in this turmoil and contention of deposing and chooling another Emperor, in this faction of Princes, and this liberty of wearing armour, in this licence of hurting and sinning, the impudent boldness of divers private Souldiers, and especially of such as were the Horsemen, then counted the better sort of Souldiers, were so great, and their unbridled and unsatiable desire in robbing, spoiling and taking of booties, catching and snatching all that came to hand, so much, that nothing could be sure and in safety that any good man enjoyed. Wherefore a little before the death of Gulielmus the King, threescore Cities and Towns which were belonging to Ludovicus Palatinus Duke of Boiora and Rhenus, and Otho his Son, and other Princes, whose names Aventinus in his seventh Book of the Annals of the Boiores maketh mention of, joyned themselves in a league for the expelling of these rebels, and expressing of their so great injurious rapines and slaughter of men. Of which Army the said Ludovicus being Captian, he chaseth and drave the whole rout of them to the uttermost parts of Germany, and pulled down and overthrew their Castles and Fortresses, and every other place where they had intrenched themselves.

Germany spoiled by civil dissention through the Popes only practice against the Emperor.

The robbers and rebels chased out of Germany.

Otho Boius yet notwithstanding, keepeth his promise and faith most constantly made before to the Emperor Fredrick and Conradus his Son. Whereupon Philippus Javavensis, Albertus and others calling a Council at Mildorsus (by the Popes commandment) sent for Otho unto them, unto whom they opened the Popes pleasure and commandment. To all which, when he had heard, Otho answered: I cannot marvel at some of you enough, that when as heretofore you perswaded me to leave and forsake the part I took with the Bishop of Rome, whom you your selves affirmed to be Antichrist, and that I should take part with the Emperor, why that you your selves will not keep your fidelity and promise made unto those good Princes: and he said, that he perceived in them a great inconstancy and levity, both in their words and deeds.

deeds, which now call that wicked, unjuſt and violent wrong, that but lately they thought equal, juſt and right. He ſaid further, That they were overcome with Pleaſures, corrupted with Superfluity, won with Bribes, gaping for Honour and Eſtimation: and that they neither regarded honeſty, godlineſs, nor their duty and office; but ſtudied how to make diſſention and commotions, and longed after war and bloody battel.

He ſaid further, That for his part he would obey God and his Prince, to whom he had ſworn Fidelity; and that he nought eſteemed the ſained Holineſs and deteſtable practices of ſuch Prelates. He ſaid he believed in Chriſt, and would truſt to his Mercy; and that he believed how thoſe whom they curſed and gave to the Devil, were in greateſt favour with God. Howbeit, and notwithſtanding thoſe Prelates took in good part this Expoſtulation of his, and ſeemed to bear Otho no malice or grudge for that he had ſaid, but to be deſirous of peace and unity: yet not long after Otho was curſed as black as all the reſt, and counted as bad as the worſt.

Otho excommunicated for turning from the Pope to take the Emperors part.

Albertus the Popes Champion now in Germany playeth not only Rex amongſt the Citizens, but alſo bethought him of a miſchievous Device againſt Conradus Cæſar the Emperors Son. When by fraud and ſubtilty he had gotten and taken many of the rich Burgeſſes and Citizens of Reginoburgh, which bare the Emperor good will, and had ſent them priſoners to Staffum, Conradus joyning with other Noblemen of the Empire (after he had ſpoiled and waſted much of his Lands and others his Companions) drave him ſo near, that upon certain other conditions he delivered again the Citizens. And ſhortly after coming again to Reginoburgh, and being received and welcomed into the Colledge of D. Hamaranus: Albertus with certain of his Confederates, by the means of Ulricus a Chief Officer of the Monks, came in the dead time of the night into the Chamber, where the Cæſar with a few others about him did lie; and falling upon them, ſome they took, and other ſome they ſlew; and finding no other body in the Chamber or Lodging they thought that Cæſar had been ſlain among the reſt. But he hearing the noiſe, forſook his bed, and hid himſelf under a bench, and ſo eſcaped their hands. The next day he outlawed or proſcribed the Biſhop and his Mates, and alſo the Monks Bayliff of Treaſon, and ſeized upon all the goods of the houſe. But at the Suit of the guiltleſs Monks he releaſed all to them again, taking by way of fine 100 pounds. Ulricus loſt his Office, and Albertus, thereby to eſcape danger of puniſhment, took upon him the habit of a Monk. Conradus Hochenfolſeus, which was the Murtherer of theſe men, though he eſcaped the puniſhment of mans hand, yet the Vengeance of God for the Fact he eſcaped not. For as he rid in the day time abroad, he was ſuddenly ſtricken with a Thunderbolt and died.

Cæſar in danger of Albertus.

Albertus to eſcape puniſhment taketh the order of Monkery.

During all this buſie and contentious time, it may well be gathered, that Frederick the Emperor lay not ſtill, but had his hands full: who notwithſtanding (by Gods help) overcoming and ſuppreſſing theſe or the greater part of theſe rebellious Popiſh Tumults, and having done ſtrict execution on thoſe eſpecially that had conſpired againſt his Perſon, calling a Council, and ſetting in ſome ſtay the troubleſome Affairs of his Kingdom, came to Cremona, with Fredericus Prince of Antioch. Richardus Earl of Umbria, the Governor of Flamminia, and Encius King of Sardinia, with a great number beſides of Souldiers and men of war. And beſides he took with him (which he ſent for out of every part) the wiſeſt, moſt vertuous, and beſt left Learned men that there were, thinking with them to have gone himſelf to Lions to the Pope, and there to have with him Communication, as well concerning the Sentence definitive, as alſo about the concluſion of any peace, if by any means he might. And when all things were prepared and ready, he took the Journey in hand, and came to Taurinum, having with him both a great Army of Souldiers, and alſo a great Company of Legates and Ambaſſadors. From thence ſending his Carriages before, within three days Journey of Lions, he was certified that Parma was taken and kept by the Outlaws of divers and ſundry Factions of the Pope, his near Neighbours and Friends; as by the Popes Legate, and other Citizens, as of Brixia, Placentia, and ſuch like. Which thing when he underſtood, and that the Pope herein was the only and chief doer, he ſaw manifeſtly it ſhould little prevail to attempt any further the thing he went about, and then at length when he ſaw no other remedy, putting from him all hope of peace, determined himſelf to the wars with all his force and might. Thus altering his purpoſe and journey, he took the ſtraighteſt way into Lumbardy, and with an Army of 60000 men he beſieged Parma. And to the intent he might more aptly and near the Town plant his ſiege and battery without diſturbance, firſt he intrenched his Camp, and fortified the ſame about with Bulworks and other defenſible munition. After that, he cauſed divers Victualling-houſes and Taverns in his Camp to be ſleightly builded of timber; and without the Camp he appointed the place where the Market ſhould be kept, and all Victuallers reſort that would. He appointed places for their Churches and Temples, and in ſeemly manner adorned the ſame: and for the moſt part their Tents were builded with wood, ſo that it was like another Parma. All which things when he had finiſhed, which was not long in doing, for this happy and proſperous ſucceſs he called and named it Victoria, and had thought to have made the ſame to be in the ſtead of the City of Parma, the which he purpoſed to have made level with the ground. And in the beginning both there and elſewhere, all things proſpered well with Frederick, and had good ſucceſs; for he ſharply laid to their charges that defended and kept the City of Parma. And further, Robertus Caſtilioneus, which was the Emperors Lieutenant in Picenum near unto Auximum, diſcomfited the Popes Army, and ſlew of them more than 4000, and took many ſuch as were of the Confederate Cities priſoners. And when the Factions or Companies of the Gibelines and Guelphs in Florentia were at controverſie, when Fredericus of Hetruria came to the Gibelines, to whom they had ſent for Aid: the Guelphs therewith diſmaid, fled from thence to Bononia, whoſe goods and ſubſtance came all to the Emperors Coffers, and Florentia alſo it ſelf to the Emperors Obedience. But this good ſucceſs and proſperous fortune laſted not long. For as at a time Fredericus to recreate himſelf (which ſeldom had his health) rode about the fields with certain of his Horſemen to hawk and hunt, many of the Emperors Souldiers, thinking nothing leſs than of ſuch a matter to be attempted of a many ſtarvelings within the Town of Parma, wandred and ranged unarmed out of their City Victoria about the fields. The Souldiers in Parma, having this occaſion offered, with all force and ſpeed poſſible entred the Emperors Camp or Town Victoria: which being not ſtrongly fenced, nor having Gates to ſhut againſt them, was a thing eaſie enough to do. The ſudden ſtrangeneſs of the matter much abaſhed the Souldiers, and they rang out their Larum-bell. The firſt aſſault was given upon Marcus Malaſpina his charge; whom when the Emperor, returning in all haſte, found to be hard beſet, he had thought to have reſcued him. But when that was perceived of the enemy, they bent all their force altogether on that ſide: inſomuch that the Emperor was forced to take the Trench, leſt he ſhould have been of the enemy invironed; and from thence he retired into the City or Camp, where he had thought to have gathered further Aid. But the enemy giving not ſo much time thereunto, with all force entred the City Victoria. The Emperor now, when the enemies were entred, left the Camp, and came to Dominum; who when they had killed and ſlain a great number of the Emperors Souldiers, and had burnt and deſtroyed the ſame Camp Victoria, came again to Parma. The Emperor then ſuſpecting this thing to be wrought by treaſon, whereby the enemy had underſtanding as well of the Emperors abſence, as alſo of the negligence of his Souldiers, impriſoned certain of the chiefeſt about him, amongſt whom alſo was Petrus de Vineis. Yet whilſt he was at Dominum, gathering together his Souldiers and reſidue of his bands; Encius getteth a great Victory of the Manſuanos, who coming to the reſcue of Parma, loſt fifty of their Ships, and all that they had in them.

After this alſo, Richardus in another Conflict in Picenum, diſcomfited the Popes Souldiers, and ſlew their Captain Hugolinus, beſides 2000 others ſlain and taken priſoners. When now Fredericus had gathered again, and new muſtered his Bands at Dominum, he marched forth to Cremona: and notwithſtanding that there he underſtood of the good ſucceſs and victory that Encius had had at Rhegium, yet for that he perceived the defection and backſliding of all or moſt part of Lombardy from him, he determined to take his Journey into Apulia: And when he had there levied a ſtrong and ſufficient Power, he purpoſed to make his ſpeedy return again into Lombardy. Therefore, in his Journey through Hetruria into Apulia, he joyned with his Son Fredericus, which beſieged Capras, and took the ſame: and led with him divers of the chiefeſt Captains priſoners, and after that, ſubduing unto the Obedience of the Empire Miniatum, he came into Apulia.

Capras beſieged and taken of the Emperor.

When news was brought him thither, that Encius his Son (coming to aid the Mutinenſes againſt the Bononians) was taken priſoner two miles from Mutina; and that in his abſence, the Popes Captains with their Bands and Garriſons went throughout all Lombardy, Emilia, Flamminia, and Hetruria, to ſtir and procure the Cities to revolt from the Obedience of the Emperor, and working the ſame partly by ſubtil policies, and partly by force and ſiniſter means to bring them to his purpoſe: he determined with himſelf, with all the force and power he might by any means procure and make to have begun afreſh, and proſecuted this War to the uttermoſt. Neither was it to be doubted (as Pandolphus Colonucius writeth) but that he would have wrought ſome marvellous Exploit and great Attempt, but that he was of this his purpoſe (whereunto he was both willing and bent) prevented by unlooked for death. For when he fell into this Ague, being at a certain Caſtle of his in Apulia called Florentinum, and ſaw by the extremity thereof his days to be ſhort, he remembred that which was once ſhewed him, how he ſhould die at Florence; whereupon he made and ordained his Teſtament. And when unto Conradus and other his Children he had given and appointed the great and innumerable maſs of money which he had collected and levied for the maintenance of his Wars, and godly purpoſe (as it is called) and unto them alſo had given all other his Kingdoms and Dominions (to every one according to their ages and years) he departed this wretched and miſerable world.

The Emperor purpoſeth to make ſome great attempt.

The Emperor prevented by death.

Pandolphus writeth, that Fredericus was very willing to die, and as they made certain report to him which were preſent at his death, that his mind was altogether ſet and bent on the heavenly joy and felicity. Which thing alſo Guilielmus Puteanus, Andreas Pandalus, and Manardus the Biſhop, being Italian Writers do all affirm, of whom this laſt writeth, that he aſſuredly believeth Frederick to be one of the number of Gods Elect.

Frederick one of Gods Elect.

The Writers notwithſtanding are of ſundry Judgments and Opinions touching this good Emperors death. Some write, that he was traiterouſly poiſoned by his Cupbearer, being hired thereunto. Some others, that he was ſtrangled with a pillow, of Manfredus the Son of Pherus. But Pandolphus a good Writer as the beſt, maketh no mention of any poiſon that was given him, but only that he died of an Ague. The laſt opinion of Manfredus he manifeſtly refuteth, and ſheweth that there is no manner of likelihood of the ſame: and further, that the contrary is affirmed by divers other Writers that were of that time. He died in the year of our Lord, 1268. the thirteenth day of December, in the ſeven and fiftieth year of his age, and ſeven and thirtieth year of his Reign, whoſe Corps was brought to Panormum, and there intombed.

Sundry opinions of the death of Frederick the Emperor.

Frederick had three Wives, the firſt was Conſtantia, the Daughter of the King of Aragon; of whom he begat Henry the Duke of Suevia and King of the Romans: the other Jole the Daughter of Johannes Brennus King of Hieruſalem, by whom he had the Inheritance of Hieruſalem, Naples, and Sicily; of whom he begat Conradus Duke of Suevia, King of Hieruſalem and Naples, being Cæſar: the third, Iſabell the Daughter of King John of England, by whom he had a Son named Henry, which is ſaid to die in his Childhood. This Fredericus had not his Peer in Martial affairs and Warlike policies to be compared unto him, amongſt all the Princes of that age: a wiſe and skilful Souldier he was, a greater indurer of painful labours and travels, moſt bold in greateſt perils, prudent in foreſight, induſtrious in all his doings, prompt and nimble about that he took in hand, and in adverſity moſt ſtout and couragious. But as in this corruption of nature, few there be that attain perfection, neither yet is there any Prince almoſt of ſuch Government and godly Inſtitution both in life and doctrine as is required of them: ſo neither was this Frederick without his fault and humane fragility; for the Writers impute to him ſome fault of concupiſcence, wherewith he was ſtained and ſpotted. And it appeareth that he was not clear thereof, forſomuch as by ſundry Concubines he had ſundry Children; as Encius the King of Sardinia, Manfredus the Prince of Sarentinum, and Frederick King of Antioch. And this is all that I find of the Deſcription of Frederick by Colonucius, which he affirmeth that he gathered out of good and probable Authors. But as touching the hainous Acts and flagitious Deeds, which the Pope burtheneth him withall, and in his Sentence againſt him maketh mention of; Fredericus not only purgeth himſelf thereof, but alſo divers Hiſtoricians (as well German Writers as Italians) affirm the ſame to be falſe and of the Popes own brains, invented to do him skath and teen withall. Of which matter thoſe things which Pandolphus (touching the commendation or diſpraiſe of Fredericus writeth) I thought good out of Italian to tranſlate; whoſe words be theſe:

The iſſue of Frederick the Emperor.

Frederick a moſt puiſſant Prince in Martial affairs.

Frederick was not without his fault of humane fragility.

Albeit the Emperor Fredericus was indued with many goodly Gifts and Vertues, yet notwithſtanding was he accounted an Enemy of the Church, and a Perſecutor of the ſame: of which both Innocentius the Fourth in his Sentence hath pronounced him guilty, and the ſame Sentence have other Popes regiſtred in their ſix Books of Decretals, and ſtabliſhed the ſame for a Law, how that he ought to be taken for no leſs. Therefore peradventure it ſhould not become me to fallifie or call in queſtion that, which others have confirmed, or elſe to diſpute and argue much of that matter. Yet notwithſtanding as much as his Acts and Deeds in writing declare, and the Books of the chiefeſt Authors affirm, as alſo his own Epiſtles do teſtifie; I cannot preciſely ſay, whether the Biſhops of Rome ſo call him and judge him therefore: Or elſe for that he was ſomewhat too bold in ſpeaking and telling them but the truth, and reproving the Eccleſiaſtical Order of their great abuſes: Or elſe, whether for that he would have had them gone ſomewhat more near the conditions and lives of the ancient Fathers of the Primitive-Church and Diſciples of Chriſt: Or whether for that he defended and ſtood with them for the Prerogative and Dignities belonging to the Empire or not: Or elſe whether they ſtood in fear and awe of the great Power he was of in Italy, which thing indeed Gregory the Ninth in a certain Epiſtle of his confeſſeth: but of theſe things let them judge and diſcern, that ſhall read the Monuments and Hiſtories of Frederick. Truly (ſaith he) when I conſider with my ſelf that Chriſt (whoſe Vicar the Roman Biſhops boaſt themſelves to be) ſaid unto his Diſciples, that they ſhould follow him, and alſo imitate his example, as of their Maſter and Teacher; and commanded them furthermore, how they ſhould not draw the ſword, but put up the ſame into the Scabbard; and further gave them in precept, that they ſhould not only forgive Injuries ſeven times, but ſeventy times ſeven times to thoſe that offended them; and when I now compare the lives of the Biſhops of Rome, how near they follow him whoſe Vicar they ſay they be; and conſider ſo many and great Conſpiracies, Treaſons, Rebellions, Diſloyalties, lyings in Waite, and treacherous Devices, ſo many Legates of the Popes (being Eccleſiaſtical Perſons) which will needs be called the Shepherds of Chriſts Flock, to be ſuch Warriors and Captains of Souldiers in all the parts of Italy, Campania, Apulia, Calabria, (being the Emperors Dominions) in Picenum, Emilia, Flamminia, and Lombardy, to be ſent out againſt him, and alſo when with my ſelf I meditate the deſtruction of ſo many great and famous Cities, the ſubverſion of ſuch Commonweals, the ſlaughter of ſo many men, and the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian blood: and laſtly, when I behold ſo victorious, proſperous and fortunate Emperors to be, and ſo many miſerable, unfortunate and vanquiſhed Popes put to flight; I am perſwaded with my ſelf to think and believe, that the Judgments of God are ſecret and marvelous, and that to be true which Aeneas Sylvius in his Hiſtory of Auſtria writeth, that there is no great and marvelous ſlaughter, no notorious and ſpecial Calamity (that hath happened either to the Publick Weal, or to the Church of God) of the which the Biſhops of Rome have not been the Authors.

The words of Pandolphus touching the praiſe and diſpraiſe of the Emperor.

Frederick

The Popes Church compared with Chriſt his Church, are like as black and white.

Authors. Nicholaus Machiavellus alſo ſaith, That all the ruinous Calamities and miſerable Chances, that the whole Chriſtian Common-weal, and alſo Italy hath ſuffered, have been brought in by the Popes and Biſhops of Rome.

Many Epiſtles of Fredericus there be, which he wrote unto the Biſhops of Rome, to the Cardinals, and to divers other Chriſtian Princes, all which I have read; and in them is to be ſeen nothing contrary unto Chriſtian Doctrine, nothing wicked and ungodly, nothing injurious to the Church of God, nothing contumelious or arrogantly written of Frederick. But indeed I deny not the ſame to be fraught and full of pitiful Complaints and Lamentations, touching the avaricious ambition of the Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, and pertinacy of the Biſhops of Rome, and that he would receive and take no ſatisfaction nor yet excuſe, in the defence of the right and priviledge of the Empire, which he maintained: alſo of their manifold and infinite Conſpiracies which they practiſed both ſecretly and openly againſt him: and of the often admonitions which he gave to the whole multitude and order Eccleſiaſtical, to attend upon and diſcharge their Functions and Charges. And who that further is deſirous to know and underſtand the truth, and coveteth to ſearch out the renowned Vertues of Magnificent Princes, let them read the Epiſtle of Frederick, dated to all Chriſtian Princes, which thus beginneth, Collegerunt Principes, Pontifices & Phariſæi concilium: and another, wherein he perſwadeth the Colledge of Cardinals to take up the diſſention between the Emperor and the Pope, which beginneth, In exordio naſcentis mundi; and alſo another which thus beginneth, Infallibilis veritatis teſtem; beſides yet another, Ad Reges & Principes orbis Chriſtiani; with divers others more, wherein may well be ſeen the Princely Vertues of this ſo worthy a Peer: all which Epiſtles collected together in the Latine-Tongue, the learned ſort I wiſhed to read, whereout they may pick no little benefit and commodity to themſelves. In his Epiſtle laſt recited, theſe are his words, Non exiſtimetis id me a vobis ideo contendere, ac ſi ex ſententia Pontificia privationis Majeſtas noſtra ſit perculſa. Cum enim nobis ſit rectæ voluntatis conſcientia, cumq; Deum nobiſcum habeamus, eundem teſtem invocamus id nos ſpectaſſe, cum totum ordinem Eccleſiaſticum, tum preſertim primores, nervis potentiæ dominationiſque eorum ſucciſis extirpatiſque tyrannidis radicibus, ad primitivæ Eccleſiæ conditionem & ſtatum revocaremus; That is, Think ye not that we ſo earneſtly deſire or crave this peace at your hands, as though our Majeſty were terrified with the Popes Sentence of Deprivation: when as God (upon whom we truſt and invocate) is our witneſs, and judge of our conſcience, that when we went about to reform the Eccleſiaſtical State, but eſpecially the Ringleaders of the ſame, and ſhould reſtrain their Power, and extirpate their great tyranny, and reduce the ſame to the ſtate and condition of Primitive Church, we looked for no leſs at their hands. For theſe cauſes peradventure, thoſe which had the Government of the Eccleſiaſtical Dignity, decreed and pronounced Frederick to be an Enemy to the Church: which (as I have ſaid) I leave to others to judge thereof. ¶ Hitherto Pandolphus Colonucius.

Deſerved commendation upon the Epiſtles of Frederick.

Frederick purpoſed with the hazard of the Imperial State to reform the Church of Rome.

And doubtleſs Examples to the contrary do appear, that Frederick was no Enemy to the Church of Rome, for that he both gave large and great gifts thereunto, and alſo franchiſed the ſame with great Priviledges and Immunities, which things by his own Conſtitutions, Statutes and Cuſtoms, may be perceived and underſtood. But rather contrariwiſe that the Biſhops of Rome moſt filthily recompenced the ſame his great liberality, and princely Benevolence again, which he gave and beſtowed upon the ſame, as partly in the diſcourſe of this Hiſtory you have heard: who notwithſtanding they ſo moleſted and tired him with ſuch and ſo many Injuries as you have ſeen, he nevertheleſs, forgiving and pardoning all the ſame, for the great zeal he had to the common Chriſtian wealth (whereof he more forced, than of any other thing) ſought by all means he might for to have peace, although it were to his own great hinderance. Therefore ſeeing he was of neceſſity by the Biſhops of Rome provoked to that War, if he did them any ſkath in revenge of his Imperial Dignity, let them thank their own ſelves which might otherwiſe have remedied the ſame. Notwithſtanding upon this occaſion divers (both Italian and German Writers, which at that time ſought for fat Benefices, and ever ſince even unto theſe our days have done the like, by flattery rather to obtain that which they hunted for, than to bear true and faithful Teſtimony of things as they were indeed) took great occaſion to write and ſlander this good Emperor. But let us paſs over theſe Paraſites, and return to thoſe, which although they themſelves were of that Calling, I mean of the Eccleſiaſtical Order: yet notwithſtanding, for that they rather preferred the ſtudy of verity, and to reverence the truth before Popiſh authority, and flattering ſervitude, greatly extolled and commended this good Emperor Frederick. So did Nicolaus Cuſanus a Cardinal in his writing affirm this Emperor to be an Alter Carolus Magnus, both for his wiſdom and alſo diligent regard to the Common-weal. So alſo writeth Aegidius Biturigum the Biſhop, in his Books of the inſtitution and bringing up of a Prince, which he wrote to the French King, exhorting him and all others to take a pattern of this moſt worthy and excellent Prince: in commendation of whoſe worthy praiſe and vertue theſe Verſes are written on his Tomb.

Wherefore, inſomuch as it appeareth by the approved Writers, of whom I have made mention, who and what manner of Prince Frederick this Emperor was, and that becauſe he diligently laboured, as well in the preſervation of the Chriſtian Commonweal, as in the conſervation of the Imperial Dignity, he procured to himſelf the great hatred and diſpleaſure of the Roman Biſhops (who have been to all the good Emperors for the moſt part utter foes and enemies) and with what wicked ſlanders and other injuries both by them, and by their Miniſters they continually moleſted him: this Leſſon ought to be ours, that having the ſame in our memory, we imitate and follow his vertues, hating and deteſting the wicked and flagitious doings of thoſe holy Fathers that will ſo be called, and Biſhops of Rome; deſiring God that he will ſo guide the hearts of all Kings and Princes, that they may by his Grace advance and ſet forth his Glory, and reform the corrupt and vitious manner and order of the Church to all ſincerity and purity both of Life and Doctrine.

Theſe Verſes which here inſue were ſent and written between the Emperor and Pope Innocentius the Fourth, which, for that to the learned they are both commodious and profitable, at the end of this Hiſtory I thought good to place.

Certain Preachers in Suevia.

As ye have heard of the iniquity and raging pride of the Popiſh-Church againſt their lawful Emperor; ſo now ſhall ye hear (Chriſt willing) how God beginneth to reſiſt and withſtand the corruption of that Whoriſh-Church, by ſtirring up certain faithful Teachers in ſundry Countries; as in the Country of Suevia about the time of this Emperor, Anno 1240. or near upon the ſame; where were many Preachers, mentioned in the Chronicle of Urſpergenſis, and alſo in Crantzius, lib. 8. cap. 16. & 18. which preached freely againſt the Pope. Theſe Preachers (as Crantzius ſaith) ringing the Bells, and calling the Barons in Hallis of Suevia, there preached that the Pope was an Heretick, and that his Biſhops and Prelates were Simoniacks and Hereticks; and that the inferior Prieſts and Prelates had no authority to bind and looſe, but were all Seducers. Item, that no Pope, Biſhop or Prieſt could reſtrain men from their duty of ſerving and worſhipping of God, and therefore ſuch Cities or Countries, as were then under the Popes Curſe, might notwithſtanding lawfully reſort to the receiving of Sacraments as well as before. Item, that Fryers, Dominick and Franciſcan, did ſubvert the Church with their preaching. And that the Indulgence of the Pope and his Popelings was of no regard; but that remiſſion which they did preach unto them, they preached it not from the Pope, but as from the Lord. And thus much I thought here to recite, whereby it may appear how the reſiſting of the Popes uſurped Power and corrupt Doctrine is no new thing in theſe days in the Church of Chriſt, &c.

Ex chro. Abbat. Urſperg. Cranz. lib. 8. cap. 16. & 18.

Reſiſtance againſt the Pope no new thing in Chriſts Church.

Arnoldus de nova villa condemned of hereſie.

And not long after theſe aforeſaid, roſe up Arnoldus De nova villa, a Spaniard, and a man famouſly learned and a great Writer, Anno 1250. whom the Pope with his Spiritualty condemned among Hereticks for holding and writing againſt the corrupt Errors of the Popiſh-Church. His teaching was, that Satan had ſeduced the world from the Truth of Chriſt Jeſus. Item, that the Faith (which then Chriſtian-men were commonly taught) was ſuch a Faith as the Devils had; meaning belike, as we now affirm, that the Papiſts do teach only the Hiſtorical Faith, which is the Faith Hiſtoriæ, non fiduciæ. Item, that Chriſtian-people (meaning belike, for the moſt part) are led by the Pope unto Hell. Item, that all Clotterers are void of Charity and damned; and that they all do falſifie the Doctrine of Chriſt. Item, that the Divines do evil in mixing Philoſophy with Divinity. Item, that Maſſes are not to be celebrated; and that they ought not to ſacrifice for the dead. Certain other Opinions there be, which the ſlanderous Sects of Monks and Fryers do attribute unto him; but (as they are wont in all others to do) rather upon envious taking, than of any juſt cauſe given.

Vide librum de teſtibus veritatis.

Johannes Semeca the Gloſs-writer of the Popes Decrees Excommunicated.

And as this Arnoldus was condemned, ſo alſo the ſame time Johannes Semeca, the Gloſs-writer of the Popes Decrees, and Provoſt of Halberſtat was excommunicated and deprived of his Provoſtſhip, for reſiſting Pope Clement the Fourth, gathering certain Exactions in Germany; and therefore he appealed from the Pope to a General-Council, and had many great Favourers on his ſide, till at laſt both the Pope and he died.

Gulielmus de S. Amore.

Conſequently in this order and number followeth the worthy and valiant Champion of Chriſt, and Adverſary of Antichriſt Gulielmus de S. Amore, a Maſter of Paris, and chief Ruler then of that Univerſity. This Gulielmus in his time had no ſmall ado writing againſt the Fryers, and their Hypocriſie, but eſpecially againſt the begging-Fryers, both condemning their whole Order, and alſo accuſing them, as thoſe that did diſturb and trouble all the Churches of Chriſt by their preaching in Churches againſt the will of the Ordinaries and Paſtors, by their hearing of Confeſſions, and executing the charges of Curates and Paſtors in their Churches. All the Teſtimonies of Scripture that make againſt Antichriſt, he appleth them againſt the Clergy of Prelates, and the Popiſh Spiritualty. The ſame Gulielmus is thought to be the Author of the Book, which is attributed to the School of Paris, and intituled, De periculis Eccleſiæ: where he proveth by nine and thirty Arguments, that Fryers be falſe Apoſtles.

The place of the Goſpel expounded, Go and ſell all and come follow me.

Moreover, he doth well expound this ſaying of Chriſt (If thou wilt be perfect, go and ſell away all thou haſt, and come follow me) declaring there, poverty to be injoyned us of Chriſt, Non actualem, ſed habitualem; not in ſuch ſort as ſtandeth in outward action, when no need requireth; but inward affection of heart when need ſhall require. As though the meaning and Precept of our Lord were not, that we ſhould caſt away actually all that we have; but that, when the Confeſſion of the Name of God and the Glory of Chriſt ſhall ſo require, then we be ready to leave and relinquiſh what things ſoever for the ſake of him, &c. As when he requireth in us after the like phraſe, hatred of Father and Mother, and of our own lives, he biddeth us not to diſhonour Father or Mother, much leſs to hate them; but that then, when caſe ſhall require, we ſet all things behind the love of Chriſt. Many other worthy Works he compiled, wherein albeit he uttered nothing but what was truth, yet notwithſtanding he was by Antichriſt and his Rabble condemned for an Heretick, exiled, and his Books burnt; whoſe heretical Arguments, as they called them, that thou mayſt better judge thereof, hereunder I thought good to place.

Gulielm. de S. Amore condemned of the Pope for an Hereſtick.

Againſt falſe Prophets with ſigns to know them by, theſe his words do follow: For becauſe theſe Seducers (ſaith he) name themſelves to be Apoſtles, and ſay that they are ſent of God to preach, to abſolve and diſpence with the Souls of men, by means of their Miniſtery, read the ſaying of the Apoſtle in his ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, Chap. 11. For ſuch Apoſtles are ſubtil and crafty Workmen, diſguiſing themſelves to be like the Apoſtles of Chriſt. Therefore, we mean to ſhew ſome certain infallible Tokens and probable, by the which falſe Apoſtles may be diſcerned from the true Preachers and Apoſtles of Chriſt.

The firſt ſign and token to know a falſe Fryer and Prophet by.

The firſt ſign or mark is, that ſuch as be true Preachers do not enter into ſimple Womens houſes laden with ſin, and take them as it were captive, as many of the falſe Preachers do; as in the ſecond Epiſtle of S. Paul to Timothy the third Chapter is manifeſt, ſaying, Of thoſe ſorts are they, which enter into Womens houſes, &c. Therefore thoſe Preachers which come into Womens houſes, to the intent they may take them captive, be not true Preachers, but falſe Apoſtles.

True Preachers do not deceive men with painted flattering words.

The ſecond ſign and token is, that thoſe that be true Preachers do not deceive ſimple men with painted and flattering words, whereby they preſer their own Traſh and Tradition, as all falſe Prophets do, as in the laſt Chapter to the Romans appeareth, ſaying, By their pleaſant pleaſant and ſugred talk, and by their bleſſing and croſſing they deceive and beguil the hearts of innocent men and women, Gloſſ. Which gay glorious words they extol and ſet forth their Traditions, whereby they deceive ſimple men. Very greatly do they deceive the Souls of ſimple men, which cauſe them to enter into their Sect, which they term Religion. And they which before led a naughty life, by reaſon of their ignorance or ſimplicity, after their entrance, become ſubtil and falſe deceiving Hypocrites, entring together with the reſt into poor mens houſes; yea, and oftentimes become worſe than the others. Whereupon, Mat. 22. Woe be unto you Scribes and Phariſees, Hypocrites, which go about, &c. Therefore they which do this, are no true Meſſengers, but falſe Apoſtles.

The third ſign is, that the true Apoſtles, if they be reproved, ſuffer the ſame patiently, 2 Cor. 12. ſaying, The Tokens of my Apoſtleſhip are accompliſhed among you, in all patience and ſufferance, meaning that patience, which pertaineth to the manners of the Preachers. Therefore they, which ſuffer not correction or puniſhment, be no true Apoſtles, but rather ſhew themſelves to be no Chriſtians at all, 1 Cor. 12. No man can ſay that Jeſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt, Gloſſ. It is meet that Chriſtians ſhould be humbled, to the intent that they may ſuffer themſelves to be reproved, and not to be holden up with Yea and Nay. And alſo ſuch men do ſhew themſelves to be carnal, and not ſpiritual at all, although they fain themſelves to be ſpiritual, Gal. 3. Therefore am I become an enemy unto you. Notwithſtanding the Gloſs ſaith, No carnal man will be reproved although he err. Wherefore, thoſe Preachers which ſuffer not correction, ſeem not to be true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The third ſign is, that true Apoſtles take in good part when they be reproved

The fourth ſign is, that true Apoſtles commend not themſelves, 2 Cor. 4. For we dare not join our ſelves, nor yet compare our ſelves unto others which commend and boaſt of many of their acts, when God alloweth none of them at all. Alſo true Preachers, although they be indeed praiſe-worthy for their good deſerts, in the conſciences of men are they praiſe-worthy, and not to the outward ſhew alone, 2 Cor. 3. We commend our ſelves (ſaith the Apoſtle) to the conſciences of all men. Then they do not commend themſelves in compariſon of others. Wherefore the Gloſs ſaith upon the ſame place, Thoſe, that deſerve no Commendation, but in compariſon of other, do challenge to themſelves other mens deſerts and praiſe. Wherefore in the ſecond Epiſtle of Saint Peter the laſt Chapter, it is ſaid, Even as our welbeloved Brother Paul, according to the Wiſdom that God hath given unto him, hath written unto you, Gloſſ. The chiefeſt of the Apoſtles hath here forgotten his Papal Authority, and alſo his Keys that were delivered unto him; for he is aſtonied as it were at the great wiſdome given unto his Brother Paul. For indeed it is the manner of the Elect Children of God, to be more in love with the vertues of other men, than with their own. Wherefore in the ſecond Chapter to the Philippians it is written, Let thoſe that are Superiors eſteem of themſelves in all humility. They therefore that do the contrary, ſaying, That their ſtate or doings be better than other mens, although they be Preachers, yet are they no true Apoſtles indeed, but falſe Prophets.

The fourth ſign is, that true Preachers commend not themſelves.

The fifth ſign is, that true Preachers need no Commendation; nor yet deſire to have themſelves praiſed of men, as in the 2 Cor. 3. the Apoſtle ſaith, We need not the Letters of Commendation of any man; that is to ſay, of falſe Prophets.

The fifth ſign is, that true Preachers need no letters commendatory.

The ſixth ſign is, that true Apoſtles do not preach unleſs they be ſent, as in the 10. Chap. to the Romans, How ſhall they preach, unleſs they be ſent? There be no true Apoſtles, but thoſe that be ſent: for they have no need of ſigns which are true Witneſs-bearers, but thoſe that be not ſent and do preach are falſe Prophets.

The ſixth ſign is, that true Apoſtles preach not unleſs they be ſent.

The ſeventh ſign is, forſomuch as falſe Prophets have their authority in their own names; wherefore in the ſecond Epiſtle of S. Paul to the Corinthians it is written, For we dare not boaſt of our ſelves, or make compariſon, Gloſſ. That is to ſay, with thoſe that be falſe Prophets, not taking their authority from God, but uſurping the ſame, deſirous to bear Rule, claiming in their own name their authority. And therefore although peradventure by preſumption they ſay that they are ſent of God, as all Hereticks will ſay; yet notwithſtanding, unleſs they ſhall prove their ſending either by ſpiritual Propheſie, as John Baptiſt did, ſaying, I am the Voice of a Cryer in the Deſert; as out of the Prophet Eſay in the firſt Chapter of Saint Johns Goſpel is alledged; or elſe by Miracles, as Moſes did, which turned his Rod into a Serpent, and again, from a Serpent to a Rod, as in the ſeventh Chapter of Exodus; they ought for to be excommunicated, till ſuch time as they ceaſe from preaching. Yet notwithſtanding, a Miracle ought not to be a ſufficient teſtimony of their ſending, forſomuch as they be done oftentimes and that of evil and wicked men, 1. q. 1. we may perceive towards the end. But Miracles ought to be ſuſpected, forſomuch as our Saviour ſaith in the three and twentieth of Matthew, Then ſhall falſe Prophets ariſe, &c. Therefore they which do challenge authority in their own name, forſomuch as they have not their authority from God, they are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Preachers.

The ſeventh ſign is, when thoſe falſe Prophets preach, that were never ſent.

{KING Hen. 3}

The eighth ſign is, that falſe Prophets, pretending great Wiſdom and Holineſs to be in Superſtition, have named their own Traditions to be Religion, the which are rather to be counted Sacriledge or Church-Robbery, and do uſurp unto themſelves, for the deſerts of other men, by boaſting and bragging among ſtrange and unknown people. Wherefore the Apoſtle ſpeaking of falſe Prophets in the ſecond Chapter to the Coloſſians, ſaith, According to the Precepts of men, which having a face of wiſdom conſiſt in Superſtition, interlaced with humility, Gloſſ. That is to ſay, mingled with fained Religion, that it might be called Religion, when in very deed it is nothing elſe but Sacriledge, becauſe it is contrary to all authority; that is contrary to God himſelf, that any man ſhould deſire to have Government of a multitude without publick commandment, as in Deuteronomium the three and twentieth Chapter, Thou haſt entred into thy Neighbours Vineyard, Gloſſ. That is to ſay, Into the Church of another Biſhop. May a man warn and admoniſh others, or elſe correct that Congregation which is not lawful for him to govern, nor yet to take ſo great a charge on him? No. And that it is not lawful to enter into another Biſhops Dioceſs, it is apparent, becauſe it is not lawful for the Archbiſhop ſo to do. To this effect appertaineth that which is read, 6. q. 3. And alſo it is written 9. q. 2. throughout Therefore thoſe Preachers, which againſt God and his Divine Scriptures do call their own Traditions Religion, are not Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The eighth ſign is, that falſe Preachers pretend great Holineſs in Superſtition

The ninth ſign is, by the authority which they have: for although they be no Preachers of the Goſpel or Miniſters of the Sacraments, yet they will live by the Goſpel, and not by the labour of their own hands, againſt the Text in the 2 Theſſ. 3. Neither have we eaten any mans bread for nought, or of free coſt, Gloſſ. Then thoſe falſe Prophets ought much more to live by their labour, which have not that authority which we ought to have; that is to ſay, to live by the Goſpel. And S. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of this more expreſſly in his Book De opere Monachorum, by theſe words; Thoſe our Brethren do claim to themſelves (very raſhly as me thinketh) that they have any ſuch authority, to live by the Goſpel. If they be Preachers of the Goſpel, I grant that indeed they have ſuch authority; if they be Miniſters of the Altar, if they be diſpoſers of the Sacraments, they cannot well but take to themſelves this authority, as alſo manifeſtly to challenge the ſame; if at the leaſt they have not wherewithall to ſuſtain this preſent life, without labour of their hands. As though he would have ſaid, If they be not ſuch manner of men, then have they no authority to live by the Goſpel. Therefore thoſe Preachers which have no authority to live by the Goſpel, or elſe Miniſter the Sacraments, becauſe they have no Congregation whereby to take charge of Souls, and yet for all that will needs live upon the Goſpel; they be no true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The ninth ſign is, that when they neither preach nor miniſter, yet they live upon other mens labours.

The tenth ſign is, that falſe Teachers rejoyce more to be commended themſelves, than that the word of God ſhould have the commendation and praiſe. But they that are true Preachers and Apoſtles are far otherwiſe minded, as to the Theſſ. 2. Not ſeeking the praiſe of men, &c. And herein he toucheth thoſe falſe Prophets, which deſire rather to be commended themſelves, than that the word of God which they preach ſhould have the commendation:

The tenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets take that to them which pertaineth to the word of God.

but

{KING Hen. 8} but he is an Apoſtle, which not ſeeking the glory of this preſent world, but for the glory to come, doth abaſe himſelf, to the intent that the preaching and word of God might be commended and exalted. They therefore which deſire to have praiſe and to be commended of others, rather than that the word of God ſhould have the praiſe, be no true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The eleventh ſign is, that true Apoſtles do preach only for Gods cauſe, and for the health of Souls, and for no Temporal gain, as in the 2 Cor. 4. ſaying, We preach not our ſelves, &c. Gloſſa. Our preaching tendeth not to our glory and gain, but only to the glory of Chriſt. But the preaching of Chriſt, by thoſe that are falſe Prophets, tendeth to the contrary. Whereupon in the Philip. 1. is ſaid, Whoſoer it be upon occaſion given, or elſe for the veritie ſake, let Chriſt be preached, &c. Gloſſa. Falſe Prophets do preach the Goſpel upon ſome occaſion, as either by ſeeking ſome commodity at the hands of men, or elſe becauſe of getting goods, honour, or praiſe among men. Which notwithſtanding that they be ready and willing, as it ſhould ſeem, to bear and ſuſtain Injuries; yet they ſeek not ſo much the health of him to whom they preach, as in very deed they do their own commodity and gain. Whereupon, 2 Corinth. 12. Becauſe I ſeek not the things that be yours; that is to ſay, not your Treaſure, as gold and ſilver, but only you your ſelves, Gloſſa. For otherwiſe it could by no means be gathered that they ſhould underſtand him to ſpeak or mean of their ſubſtance, becauſe he more eſteemeth them than their money, to the intent that they might underſtand his great good will towards them. Therefore theſe evil and naughty Preachers which preach for wordly gain or honour, or elſe for the praiſe and commendation of men, be no true Apoſtles but falſe Prophets. But it may be asked, how ſhall men underſtand when theſe good Fellows preach for their own vainglory ſake? It may be anſwered thus, When they preach before they be called, as in the 2 Cor. 11. Whoſoever boaſteth, let him boaſt and rejoyce in the Lord, Gloſſa. Which thing he can not by any means do that hath not his Authority from God. For if any ſuch Prophet preach, he ſeeketh his own glory, and that may eaſily be perceived. Becauſe he is not called of God, he hath no ſuch Authority of him; that is to ſay, of his Church or Congregation, as to the Heb. 7. No man taketh to himſelf any dignity, but he that is called of God, as Aaron was, Gloſſa. He is called of God, that is, lawfully choſen of the Congregation.

The twelfth ſign or token of a falſe Prophet is, becauſe ſuch Prophets do counterfeit themſelves to have greater care and love to mens Souls, than thoſe that be their very Governors and Paſtors have, although they have no charge at all of them; againſt whom the Gloſs ſpeaketh, and the 1 Theſ. 2. We are become meek and loving towards you, even as the Nurſe which giveth her Child ſuck, Gloſſa. A woman nurſeth other mens Children for wages, and not for love alone; but ſhe giveth her own ſuck of very love without reſpect of money. Therefore thoſe Preachers which fain themſelves to have a greater love and affection to the Souls of men, than they that have the charge over them, ſeem not to be true Apoſtles. The Apoſtles ſtudy not for Eloquence, nor for the curious placing of their words, but falſe Prophets do them both, as in the 2 Cor. 11. If the ſimple and uneloquent man, &c. Gloſſa. The Apoſtles were not eloquent, but falſe Prophets are full of curious Eloquence. Alſo upon the ſame another gloſs, The Corinthians were led away from the Goſpel by over-nice Eloquence, 2 Cor. 7. Let us ſhew our ſelves before all men as the Miniſters of God, Gloſſa. The Miniſters of God do not flatter as falſe Prophets do. And for this occaſion thoſe that be true Apoſtles have not their abiding in Princes Courts and Noblemens houſes, knowing this ſaying of Chriſt in S. Matthews Goſpel, Behold, thoſe that are clothed with Silks dwell in Kings Courts. And therefore true Apoſtles are not converſant in Princes Courts, and Noblemens houſes, Gloſſa. Hard and ſtrict life with the preaching of the Goſpel loveth not to come near Princes Palaces, and Noblemens houſes. Oftentimes it cometh to paſs that Courtiers are found great Flatterers, therefore thoſe Preachers that have their abode in Princes Courts, or that in any other place do uſe to flatter, are no true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirteenth ſign is, that true Apoſtles or Meſſengers do not circumvent or ſubtilly go about to deceive men, that they ſhould give unto them their goods, either in their life-time, or elſe at the time of their death, as in the 2 Cor. 7. We have falſly deceived no man, Gloſſa. By the ſubtil and deceitful getting away of your ſubſtance, as falſe Prophets do, which get away from you thoſe things that be yours under pretence of great Friendſhip. Alſo Mat. 2. Woe be unto you Scribes and Phariſees, you Hypocrites, which ſpoil widows houſes by your long prayers; which mean nothing elſe by your Superſtition, but that you may ſpoil and rob the people, as Luke 20. Which devour widows houſes by diſſembling of your long prayer, Gloſſa. The which make over-long prayers, to the intent they may ſeem more devout, and that they may get both money and great commendation of all ſuch as be ſick and troubled with the burthen of their ſins; whoſe prayers be turned into ſin, which neither are profitable for themſelves nor any other, but rather ſhall have for making thoſe prayers greater damnation, forſomuch as by the ſame they deceive others: for by this, that they receive and take, both gold and ſilver, it appeareth that they preach not for Souls health ſake, but only for filthy lucre and gain ſake, Mat. 10. Be ye Poſſeſſors neither of gold nor ſilver, Gloſſa. If they then have theſe things, they cannot ſeem or be thought to preach for the health of the Soul, but for lucres ſake. And ſo ſaith Hierome upon the Prophet Malachi, Becauſe ſome Prophets took money their Prophetie became Divination; that is to ſay, their Propheſie appeared not to be Propheſie, but Divination, or Inchantment: that is, that ſuch Propheſie proceedeth not from God, but from the Devil. And this appeareth in 1. q. 1. having this beginning, Nunquam Divinatio, &c. Therefore thoſe Preachers which circumvent and beguile men, to the intent that they ſhould give them their goods, either in their life-time, or after their death, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The fourteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets when any Verity is preached, which for the moſt part they are not acquainted withall, or that toucheth them, then begin they to chaſe and bark againſt the ſame. Whereupon the Apoſtle in the third Chapter to the Philipians ſaith, Behold the Dogs, &c. Gloſſa. Underſtand you that they are not Dogs by nature, but by their uſage and conditions, barking againſt the Truth, which they were never acquainted with. And ſo he compareth them right well to Dogs, becauſe Dogs follow rather cuſtom than reaſon: ſo falſe Apoſtles do keep the cuſtom of the Law, and do bite and bark againſt the Truth, as though they were without the gift of reaſon. And alſo in the ſecond Epiſtle to Timothy, the fourth Chapter, ſaying, They get them Inſtructors according to their own deſires, Gloſſa. Which may teach them what things they themſelves are willing to hear, becauſe the Truth ſeemeth nothing pleaſant unto them. Therefore thoſe Preachers which bark againſt the late revealed Truth, which toucheth them very near, and therefore cauſe the ſame to be hidden and kept under, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The fifteenth ſign is, that the true Apoſtles do not inforce any to receive or hear them which be unwilling thereunto, but ſend them away rather, leſt they ſhould ſeem to ſeek after ſome earthly and tranſitory thing, Mat. 10. Whoſoever will not receive you, get you out of that City, and ſhake the duſt from off your feet, &c. Gloſſa. That you may thereby ſhew that the deſire of earthly things hath no power in you. Therefore thoſe Preachers which ſtrive and wreſtle (as it were) to the intent they would be received and heard, are no true Apoſtles, forſomuch as the Apoſtle ſaith, 1 Corin. 11. If any man appear among you to be over-contentious or full of ſtrife, ſuch cuſtom have we none, nor yet the Congregation of Chriſt.

The ſixteenth ſign is, that the Apoſtles did not procure the Indignation of thoſe Princes, with whom they were eſteemed and regarded, againſt ſuch perſons as would not receive them and hear them, according as we read in the life of Simon and Jude, the Apoſtles. The chief Ruler, being very angry, commanded a very great fire to be made, that the Biſhops might be caſt into the ſame, and all others which went about to defame the Doctrine of the Apoſtles of Chriſt. But the Apoſtles fell

The eleventh ſign is, that falſe Prophets do preach for gain, and not for Gods cauſe.

The twelfth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do counterfeit love where they have.

The thirteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do circumvent men to have their goods, and care for nothing elſe

The fourteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets cannot abide to have the truth preached.

The fifteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do inforce them to hear that are not willing to hear.

The ſixteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do cauſe errinces to hate and puniſh them that will not hear them.

fell down before the Emperor, ſaying, We beſeech you Sir, let not us be the Authors or Cauſers of this deſtruction or calamity; nor let us which are ſent to be the preſervation of Men, and to revive thoſe that are dead through Sin, be killers of thoſe that be alive. Therefore thoſe Preachers which ſeek to ſtir up the diſpleaſure of Princes againſt them (whoſe favours now they enjoy) that will not receive and hear them, or rather whom they themſelves hate, are no true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The ſeventeenth ſign is, that the Apoſtles of Chriſt have not only the knowledge of thoſe things which God hath already done, but alſo of thoſe things which he will hereafter do, as in the Apocalypſe 3. Chapter, The beaſts were full of eyes both behind and before, Gloſſa. Obtaining the knowledge of thoſe things which God had done, as alſo what he would do hereafter in the end of the World. Therefore thoſe that ſay they know not the perils of the Church in the later time which are propheſied before, or that they care not for them, or elſe if they know them, they have not eyes behind and before, are no true Apoſtles; therefore what time as they call themſelves Apoſtles, they are falſe Prophets.

The ſeventeenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do not know neither what God hath done, or yet will do, as true Prophets do.

The eighteenth ſign is, that true Apoſtles do not deſire the riches and goods of them to whom they Preach, whereby they are diſcerned from Wolves, that is to ſay, from falſe Prophets, Act. 20. I have deſired no mans gold nor ſilver, Gloſſa. By this are Wolves diſcerned, for they deſire ſuch things. And again in the ſame place; For thoſe things which I have need of, and thoſe which were with me, theſe hands have miniſtred, Gloſſa. This example alſo of labouring is a Spectacle for Biſhops whereby they are diſcerned from Wolves. For ſuch as ask or beg of thoſe to whom they Preach, or ſet any other to ask or beg in their names, do ſeem to commit Simony, like Gehazi, of whom it is read in the 2. Book of Kings the fifth Chapter, that he craved certain apparel of Naaman the Syrian, to whom his Maſter Elizeus had reſtored the benefit of health, notwithſtanding he had gotten thoſe Garments unwitting to his Maſter. Whereupon Gregory Nazianzen ſaith, 1. q. 1. Qui iſti debetur. But ſome Man perhaps will ſay, Cannot the Preacher ask Money or Money-worth of thoſe to whom he Preacheth? Or at the leaſt, may not he beg? To this may be anſwered; If the Preacher by Authority Preach and feed his flock as a true Paſtor with the food of Gods word, he may take money or money worth; but then it is not begging or craving, but it is by Authority, as the 2 to Timothy 2. Chapter. It is meet that the husbandman that tilleth the ground, ſhould firſt and after others receive the commodity of his increaſe. Gloſſa. He putteth the Vertuous Preacher out of doubt, not Preaching for that intent to make Merchandize of the Goſpel, and giveth him to underſtand, that it is lawful for him to take of them whom he feedeth as his flock, what things ſoever he hath need of, and doth it not in begging or craving, but by good Authority. It is manifeſt that it cannot in any place of the holy Scripture be found, that the Preacher ought to beg. But begging is forbidden of all the Apoſtles of Chriſt, and is abhorred of Salomon and S. Auguſtine, and reproved by divers other Holy Men. Therefore it is manifeſt that the true Apoſtles do not deſire the Temporal goods of them to whom they Preach, neither do they beg or crave the ſame. They therefore that require any thing of them to whom they Preach, or elſe ſet any other man to ask for them, or in their names, do not ſeem to be true Apoſtles, but falſe Preachers.

The eighteenth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do Preach for Money, and are not to be diſcerned from Wolves.

If the Preacher do his duty in Preaching, he may take lawfully for his neceſſary things.

The nineteenth ſign is, that true Apoſtles do not render evil for good, as falſe do.

The nineteenth ſign is, that true Apoſtles do not render evil for good, as falſe do.

The twentieth ſign is, that true Apoſtles are not ſo well intertained as falſe Prophets be.

The twentieth ſign is, that true Apoſtles are not ſo well intertained as falſe Prophets be.

The nineteenth ſign is, that true Apoſtles do not render evil for good, as falſe do

{KING Hen. 3} away by that curſed one, and doth neglect and contemn the ſame, or elſe peradventure conſenteth unto the ſame to the outward appearance of the world; and yet, becauſe he will keep his temporal dignity and eſtimation, refuſeth to ſtir up ſtrife and contention about the ſame, and ſo to be evil ſpoken of, ſeemeth not to be an Apoſtle of Chriſt, but rather a falſe Prophet, if he be a Preacher.

The twenty ſixth ſign is, That falſe Prophets are not contented with neceſſary things, but look after ſuperfluous.

The twenty ſixth ſign is, That true Apoſtles ſeek not after ſuch fine lodgings and wealthy habitations, where they may have all things at their commandments; but rather ſuch homely reſting places where they may have neceſſary things for themſelves, with their good wills of whom they have it. And they take nothing of ſuch whom they ſee to be ſo ready and liberal in giving, nor think that they do him more pleaſure in receiving the gift, than the other do in giving them the ſame. According to that in the tenth of Matthew, ſaying, Into what City or Town ſoever ye ſhall enter, inquire out thoſe that be of good report in the ſame, and abide you with them ſo long as you tarry in the ſame City or Town. Gloſſ. Your Hoſt, with whom ye lodge, ought to be choſen by the good report of neighbours, leſt your preaching be evil ſpoken of, by reaſon of his infamy. Neither ought ſuch Men to run from Houſe to Houſe. But whom ſhall we call worthy of good report? Gloſſ. Him who knoweth better to do other Men good, than to receive a good turn of another. And this is he which giveth willingly for Chriſts cauſe, and not in reſpect of any commodity. Alſo true Apoſtles receive nothing of ſuch Men as lie weltering in their ſins, but rather of thoſe that are waſhed and cleanſed from their ſins, whereupon the 2 to the Corinthians the ſeventh Chapter, They have given themſelves firſt to the Lord. Gloſſ. Becauſe they now amending their old errors and vicious manners have vowed themſelves unto the Lord, and afterward gave of that which they had to their Brethren: for otherwiſe they ought not to have taken any thing of them, becauſe gifts do blind the eyes; but thoſe that give where there is no cauſe of reproof in their doings, have juſt cauſe to give. Therefore thoſe Preachers that ſeek how to come by dainty fare, and do receive bribes and rewards of naughty Men that have this world at will, to the intent that thoſe Preachers may cover and hide their faults, and get of others what they can by ſubtilty, which give indeed to remove the ſhameleſs importunity of the craver, or elſe for avoiding of preſent ſhame, rather than for any love they have to God, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets, according to that in the 2 to the Corinthians the 9. Chapter, The Lord doth love a willing giver, Gloſſ. He that giveth for preſent ſhame, or elſe for that he may be free from the importunacy of him that asketh, doth loſe his ſubſtance and merit: wherefore he that hath reſpect to theſe things, doth not ſeek the fruit and profit of the giver, but the gift it ſelf, as the Apoſtle to the Philippians the 4*th.* Chapter, ſaith, Seek not the gift, but the fruit or benefit of the giver.

The twenty ſeventh ſign is, That falſe Prophets, whoſe Belly is their God.

The twenty ſeventh ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not endeavour themſelves to ſeek and enjoy the fruit of other Mens labours that they may be fed thereby, becauſe that the belly is ſuch Mens God, according to that in the 2 to the Theſſalonians the 3. Chapter, We have heard of ſome amongſt you which walk inordinately, not labouring at all, but living delicately, or idly. Gloſſ. Of other Mens labours, and deſerve they to be fed? The Diſcipline of the Lord cannot away with that doing; for the Belly is their God, which provide to have more than neceſſary diſhes of meat. Therefore thoſe Preachers which ſo do, are no true Apoſtles, but falſe.

The twenty eighth ſign is, That falſe Prophets rejoyce not in miracles, as falſe Prophets do.

The twenty eighth ſign is, That true Apoſtles rejoyce only of the miracles or other excellent works, which the Lord doth by them; but they rejoyce rather of the ſalvation which they look for from the Lord, than that by doing thoſe miracles they deſire any honour; according to that which is written in Luke the 10*th.* ſaying: Rejoyce ye not for that the ſpirits be ſubject unto you, but becauſe your names are regiſtred in Heaven. They therefore that boaſt of their own miracles, or of any that belong unto them, for this cauſe that they are ſaved by the doing of them, as many do ſay, ſeem not to be true Apoſtles, but falſe.

The twenty ninth ſign is, That falſe Prophets ſeek not their own glory, as falſe Prophets do.

The twenty ninth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do never ſeek their own glory in this life, but the glory of Chriſt; as in John 7. He that ſpeaketh of himſelf doth ſeek his own glory, but he that ſeeketh the glory of him which ſent him (that is, of whom he is ſent) is a true Apoſtle. Therefore thoſe which ſeek the things that pertain to the glory of this world, of the which one is to be aſſiſtant to thoſe that bear rule and authority, according to that ſaying of Boetius De conſolatione; Thoſe that do deſire to be extolled, either they Reign and bear Rule themſelves, or elſe do deſire to be near about them that have ſuch dominion. Another is, They deſire to have the fame and victory of that which they have nothing at all deſerved before God, whereupon is written that ſaying of the Apoſtle, in Gal. 5. Let not us become deſirous of vain glory. Gloſſ. To be deſirous of vain glory, is to have victory without any merit or deſert; and thoſe, I ſay, that do ſuch things, ſeem not to be true Apoſtles, but falſe.

The thirtieth ſign is, That falſe Prophets do not force upon the ſolemn ſalutations of men, as falſe Prophets do.

The thirtieth ſign is, That true Apoſtles care not for the ſolemnities of Men, neither their ſalutations, nor feaſtings, nor any other benefit of theirs. They therefore which love and ſeek the company and fellowſhip of Men, their feaſtings, and other their commodities, do not ſeem to be true Apoſtles, but falſe.

The one and thirtieth ſign is, That falſe Prophets reſort to other mens boards and flatter them for a meals meat, which true Prophets do not.

The one and thirtieth ſign is, That falſe Prophets reſort not to other Mans Table, being given to idleneſs, cannot chuſe to flatter him which feedeth him; but Chriſt's Religion calleth Men to liberty and to no ſuch bondage: they therefore that reſort oftentimes, and that of their own minds, to other Mens Tables (living idlely) are not true Apoſtles, but falſe.

The two and thirtieth ſign is, That falſe Prophets do hate their enemies, as the falſe Prophets do.

The two and thirtieth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not hate their enemies, and ſuch as hate them; which Doctrine the Lord taught, Matthew the fifth, ſaying: Love your enemies, do well to them which hate you; but falſe Prophets do hurt and defame their Neighbours, according as Jeremiah 14. ſaith, The Prophets of Jeruſalem have defiled the whole earth, Gloſſ. They are not contented to hurt their Neighbours only, but alſo whom they before this time have hated, they defame and ſpeak evil of in every place they come: therefore thoſe Preachers which hate them whom they think are their enemies, and do defame them, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Preachers.

The thirty third ſign is, That falſe Prophets do not perſecute men as the falſe Prophets do.

The thirty third ſign is, That falſe Prophets, when they are examined and proved whether they be true Apoſtles or liers, take that very grievouſly, and perſecute all thoſe that can prove them to be ſo, and alſo do ſtir up and provoke others to perſecute the ſame Men, which alſo joyn themſelves together by ſecular power, even as certain falſe Prophets did in the Primitive Church againſt the Biſhop of Epheſus, to whom the Lord ſaid, Apoc. 2. I know, that is to ſay, I do allow thy works and thy labour; that is, thy tribulation, becauſe thou canſt not away with thoſe that be evil men. Gloſſ. But that thou haſt a deſire to amend them, or elſe to expel them, and haſt examined thoſe which ſay, that they are. Apoſtles, and are but liars, and alſo haſt ſuffered this patiently. Gloſſ. The evils which theſe falſe Prophets, joyned together by ſecular power, do bring in, are not the doings of true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirty fourth ſign is, That falſe Prophets preach to thoſe which be not yet converted, which the falſe Prophets do not.

The thirty fourth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not Preach to thoſe which are converted already by other Men, but rather do convert thoſe which are not yet converted, leſt that they ſhould build upon another Mans foundation, as S. Paul, Romans 15. ſaith, I have laboured ſo, that from Jeruſalem to Illyricus, I have repleniſhed the Goſpel in every place. Gloſſ. That is, I have preached the ſame abundantly, in whom the great vertue of the Holy Ghoſt appeareth, becauſe ſo many Nations, that is, the Gentiles have received the Goſpel by me preaching.

{KING Hen. 3}

But I have preached the Goſpel there where Chriſt was not preached before, leſt I ſhould build upon another mans foundation, Gloſſ. I ſhould not preach to thoſe that were converted by another Man. Alſo 2 Cor. 10. We are not ſuch as boaſt and glory in other mens labours, Gloſſ. Where another man laid the foundation, for that ſhould be to boaſt inordinately. Alſo in the ſame place, not thinking to boaſt where another man hath government, but in thoſe things which are put in experience, Gloſſ. Of other Preachers; Becauſe the Apoſtle did Preach to thoſe to whom the Goſpel was never preached, that he might get praiſe by his own proper labour. Therefore, thoſe preachers which go not to that people which have need to be converted, but to thoſe which are converted already, which have Apoſtles of their own, that is to ſay, Biſhops and Prieſts, and yet do boaſt over another mans flock, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirty fifth ſign is, That true Prophets chiefly preach in their own Dioceſs, and not in other mens.

The thirty fifth ſign is, Becauſe true Apoſtles, when they are ſent, go to their own Dioceſs, and not to another mans Dioceſs, even as Paul being ſent, went to the Gentiles when he purpoſed to preach, Acts 13. Separate Paul and Barnabas for the buſineſs which I have choſen them unto: Gloſſ. According to the appointment and decree of James, Cephas, and John, went he forth to be a Teacher unto the Gentiles. But thoſe preachers that ſtand upon their feet, that is to ſay, thoſe Preachers which have but ſmall worldly ſubſtance, for which cauſe they are more ready to go which way ſoever it ſhall pleaſe the Lord to ſend them, I ſay, the Lord hath ſent them to preach, not to thoſe that be ſufficiently learned, but to thoſe that are infidels, as we read in Ezek. 2. After that, the Spirit of the Lord ſet Ezekiel upon his feet, In quam ſpem ſitus unus tangitur, and he ſaid unto him, O Son of Man, behold I ſent thee to the Nations which have ſtart back from their poſſeſſion, which have gone from me, that is, to the Jewiſh Hereticks, and to thoſe Nations which ſometimes have been Chriſtians, as the Egyptians, the Babylonians, and all thoſe that obſerve the Law of Mahomet. Therefore, if ſuch go to thoſe that are already inſtructed, having both Apoſtles, Biſhops, and Prieſts of their own; they go not into their own Dioceſs, but into another mans Dioceſs, and are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Preachers. And it is greatly to be feared, leſt the Church be in hazard and danger by ſuch, unleſs they be thruſt out of the ſame betime; even as Jonas, when he was ſent to Niniby of the Lord, which is interpreted large or wide, and leadeth to the Hill, that is to the Infidels we ſpake of before: They go not to thoſe Infidels according to the commandment of the Lord, but they turn another way, take their journey into Tharſis, which is interpreted, ſeeking after joy and pleaſure; that is, they go unto thoſe which receive them with joy and gladneſs, and do well provide for them, that is to ſay, to godly and devout Chriſtians: and therefore it is to be feared, leſt the Ship in which they be (that is the Church) be in great peril, unleſs they be thrown forth. And therefore the Apoſtle ſpake of ſuch falſe Prophets not without good cauſe, 2 Tim. 2. And ſhun thou thoſe: Gloſſ. That is, ſuch men as thoſe be.

The thirty ſixth ſign is, That falſe Prophets do attribute to themſelves that which they never did.

The thirty ſixth ſign is, Becauſe true Apoſtles do not boaſt, neither do they attribute unto themſelves any other thing, but in that God hath wrought the ſame by them. Paul, Rom. 15. ſaith, I dare not ſay any thing but that which Chriſt hath wrought and accompliſhed by me, Gloſſ. That is, I ſpeak only thoſe things (which by me) that is, by my miniſtry Chriſt hath wrought. They therefore that boaſt of many things, and do attribute much unto themſelves which they never did, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirty ſeventh ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not cleave and lean to Logical and Philoſophical reaſons.

The thirty ſeventh ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not apply themſelves or lean at Logical or Philoſophical reaſons. Therefore thoſe Preachers which do indeavour themſelves to ſuch kind of reaſons, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirty eighth ſign is, That true Prophets do not hate carnally, but ſpiritually.

The Thirty eighth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not love carnally, or after the fleſh, but hate what thing ſoever doth reſiſt them in the ſervice of God, as Luke 14. He that doth not hate his Father and Mother, his Son and Siſter, and alſo himſelf, he cannot be my diſciple, Gloſſ. That is, He that doth not hate whatſoever doth reſiſt or let him in the ſervice of God, is not worthy to be a Diſciple, neither can he abide in that Office. Therefore forſomuch as true Preachers are the true Diſciples of the Lord, it muſt needs follow that thoſe Preachers which do promote their Nephews and Kinſfolk (how unworthy ſoever they be) to Eccleſiaſtical promotions and livings, contrary to the will of God, or do any other thing that letteth or hindereth them in the ſervice of God, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets.

The thirty ninth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not hunt for the friendſhip of this world, for he that is the friend of this world, is the enemy of God; therefore thoſe Preachers, which purchaſe the friendſhip of this world, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets. Therefore forſomuch as the Scripture is infallible, in the twenty fourth Chapter of Matthew, ſaying, Heaven and Earth ſhall periſh, but my words ſhall indure for ever; and the Holy Ghoſt which ſpake in the Apoſtles cannot lie; for Prophelie (for the moſt part) is not ſpoken by the will of Man, but the Holy Men of God ſpake by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, as it is read in the firſt Epiſtle of Peter, the firſt Chapter; it remaineth, That all Men which are bound to defend the Church, may riſe up in the defence of the ſame, according unto that in the 24. Chapter of the Proverbs; deliver thoſe that are led to death, and ceaſe thou not to reſcue thoſe which are drawn to deſtruction. Neither may he alledge vain accuſations, becauſe it is ſaid in the ſame place, If he ſay he is not able or ſtrong enough, he that beholdeth the thoughts of Mens hearts, ſhall know it, &c. Whatſoever periſheth in the Church of God for want of preachers, all that ſhall be demanded of them at the day of Judgment; as Jacob confeſſeth to Laban, whoſe Sheep he fed, Geneſis 31. I did reſtore all the loſs, and that which was ſtoln I made anſwer for. I will demand his blood at thy hands, Ezekiel 3. This is ſaid to the Paſtor or Prelate. But if the other things which we have ſpoken of before could not move the Prelates and Cardinals, this at the leaſt ſhould move them; becauſe that then the Spiritual power which doth conſiſt for the moſt part in the exerciſe of Preaching, in hearing Confeſſions, and enjoyning of Penance, ſhall be taken away from them by little and little, for by piecemeal doth the Wolf devour the poor and needy Man: 3. Queſt. Chap. 1. When the authority Eccleſiaſtical therefore ſhall be quite taken from them and diſpoſed to others, ſuch as either by their Order, or Apoſtolical grant do challenge to have the ſame; then doubtleſs ſhall neither the juriſdiction of Civil cauſes and pleadings, nor any authority that ſuch Prelates have yet remaining, neither yet the poſſeſſions of the temporal goods of the Church any longer remain amongſt them. Shall ſuch have the temporal goods of the Church which miniſter not the ſpiritual Treaſure thereof? 1 Cor. 9. Know ye not that they which kill the Sacrifice ought to eat of the Sacrifice? and they that ſerve at the Altar are partakers of the Altar? for as the body without the ſoul cannot ſtand; ſo corporal things without ſpiritual things cannot continue, 1 Queſt. 1. if any ſhall take away the ſame. Thus have you had the 39 Arguments, for the which both he the ſaid Gulielmus was condemned, and his Books burned.

The thirty ninth ſign is, that falſe Prophets do hunt after the friendſhip of this world.

The thirty ninth ſign is, That true Apoſtles do not hunt for the friendſhip of this world, for he that is the friend of this world, is the enemy of God; therefore thoſe Preachers, which purchaſe the friendſhip of this world, are not true Apoſtles, but falſe Prophets. Whatſoever doth periſh in the Church of God for want of preachers ſhall be required.

Deteſtable book of the Fryers called Evangelium æternum.

In the days of this Gulielmus, there was a moſt deteſtable and blaſphemous Book ſet forth by the Fryers (mentioned alſo in Matth. Pariſienſis) which they called Evangelium æternum, or Evangelium Spiritus Sancti, That is, The Everlaſting Goſpel, or the Goſpel of the Holy Ghoſt. In which Book many abominable errors of the Fryers were contained, ſo that the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt was utterly defaced, which, this Book ſaid, was not to be compared with this Everlaſting Goſpel, no more than the ſhell is to be compared with the kernel, than darkneſs to light, &c. Moreover, that the Goſpel of Chriſt ſhall be preached no longer but fifty years, and then this Everlaſting Goſpel ſhould rule the Church, &c. Item, That whatſoever was in the whole Bible, was in the ſaid Goſpel contained. At length this Fryers Goſpel was accuſed to the Pope, and ſo ſix perſons choſen of the whole Univerſity to peruſe and judge of the Book: as Chriſtanus Canonicus Baluacenſis, Odo de Doaco, Nicolaus de Baro, Johannes de ſicca Villa Anglus, Johannes Belim Gallus. Among whom this Gulielmus was one, who mightily impugned this peſtiferous and diveliſh Book. Theſe ſix, after the peruſing of the Book, were ſent up to Rome. The Fryers likewiſe ſent their meſſengers withal, where they

The eternal and ſpiritual Goſpel of the Fryers condemned with much ado of the Pope.

KING H. 3. they were refuted, and the errors of the Book condemned; but ſo, that the Pope with the Cardinals commanded the ſaid Book to be aboliſhed and condemned not publickly (tendering the eſtimation of the Religious Orders, as of his own moſt chief Champions) but that they ſhould be burned in ſecret wiſe, and the Books of the foreſaid Gulielmus to be burnt withal.

Beſides other his Books, two Sermons we have of his yet remaining, one upon the Goſpel of S. Luke, of the Phariſee and the Publican, the other upon the Epiſtle read in the Church on May-day; where in the firſt he reſembleth the Phariſees to our Monks, and that he proveth by all the properties of the Phariſees deſcribed in the Goſpel. The Publican reſembleth to the Laity, ſuch as becauſe the ſooner they are reduced to acknowledge their ſins, the more hope they have of mercy. The other, becauſe they ſtand confident in their own righteouſneſs, are therefore further from their juſtification. In the later Sermon he ſetteth forth and declareth what perils and dangers be like to fall upon the Church by theſe Religious Orders of Monks and Fryers.

Lawrentius Anglicus condemned of the Pope.

Among the other beſides of that age, which withſtood the Biſhop of Rome and his Antichriſtian errors, was one Lawrence an Engliſh-man, and Maſter of Paris; another was Petrus Johannes a Minorit. Of whom the foreſaid Lawrence was about the year of our Lord 1260. who in his teaching, preaching and writing, did ſtoutly defend the part of the foreſaid Gulielmus and the reſt of his ſide againſt the Fryers. Againſt the which Fryers he wrote two Books; one in the defence of William afore-mentioned; the other upon this Argument and Title, To beware of falſe Prophets, &c. Certain other things alſo he wrote, wherein by divers proofs and teſtimonies he argued and proved, That Antichriſt was not far off to come.

Defenſio Gulielmi.

Cavendum a Pſeudoprophetis.

The other Petrus Johannes was about the year of our Lord 1290. which taught and maintained many things againſt the Pope, proving, That he was Antichriſt, and that the Synagogue of Rome was Great Babylon. He wrote upon Matthew, upon the Epiſtles, and upon the Apocalypſe. Mention of this Petrus Johannes is made in Nicolaus Emericus, in libr. Inquiſitionum, &c. And he ſaith moreover that Michael Ceſenas (of whom, Chriſt willing, ſhall follow hereafter) took of him a great part of his opinions: and becauſe the Pope could not burn him alive, after his death, he cauſed his bones to be taken up and burned.

The Pope Antichriſt. The Synagogue of Rome to be great Babylon.

Petrus Johannes burned after his death.

To theſe, and with theſe above ſpecified, is to be added Robertus Gallus, who being born of a right noble Parentage, for devotion ſake was made a Dominick Fryer, about the ſame year of our Lord above touched, Anno. 1290. This Man as appeareth by his writing, had divers and ſundry Viſions whereof part is annexed with the Viſions and Prophecy of Hildegardis. His Viſions all tend againſt the ſpirituality of Rome, where in the firſt Chapter he calleth plainly the Pope an Idol, which having eyes ſeeth not, neither luſteth to ſee the abominations of his people, nor the exceſſive enormity of their voluptuouſneſs, but only to ſee to the heaping up of his own treaſure, and having a mouth ſpeaketh not; but ſaith, I have ſet good Men over them (which is ſufficient for me) to do them good either by my ſelf, or by ſome other. And it followeth in the ſame Chapter, Woe to that Idol, woe to the mighty and proud, who ſhall be equal in all the Earth to that Idol? He that exalteth up his name in Earth, ſaying, Who ſhall bring me under? Is not my Houſe compared with the mighty Potentates of the Land? I am higher than Dukes, Knights on their Horſe back do ſervice unto me, that which my Fathers had not before me, that I have done to me. My Houſe is ſtrowed with ſilver; gold and pearl are the pavement of my Palace, &c.

Robertus Gallus prophecieth againſt the Pope.

The Pope deſcribed.

Again in the twelfth Chapter, and alſo in the firſt, under the name of a Serpent he painteth out the Pope, whom he declareth to extol himſelf above meaſure, and to oppreſs the few that be godly, and to have many falſe Prophets about him, which neglecting the word and name of Chriſt, do preach and extol him only, obſcuring the name of Chriſt. The Church of Rome and the Pope he deſcribeth in theſe words: I was praying (ſaith he) on my knees, looking upward to Heaven, near to the Altar of Saint James in Paris, on the right ſide of the Altar, and ſaw in the Air before the body of a certain High Biſhop all clothed in white ſilk; who, turning his back on the Eaſt, lift up his hand towards the Weſt, as the Prieſts are wont in their Maſs turning to the people, but his head was not ſeen. And as I was conſidering adviſedly, whether he had any head or no; I perceived a certain head in him all dry, lean and withered, as though it had been a head of wood. And the ſpirit of the Lord ſaid to me, This ſignifieth the ſtate of the Church of Rome.

The Viſions of Robertus Gallus.

The ſtate of the Church of Rome deſcribed.

Moreover, the ſame Author in his Viſions, well deſcribing the manner of the School Sophiſters and Sorboniſts, addeth in this wiſe; Another day as I was in like contemplation as before, I beheld in ſpirit; and behold, I ſaw a Man apparelled like to the other before, which went about having fine bread and excellent wine that hanged about him on both ſides; and the ſame, having in his hand a long and hard flint ſtone, was gnawing hungerly upon the ſame, as one being hungry is wont to bite upon a loaf of bread; out of which ſtone came two heads of two Serpents, the Spirit of the Lord inſtructing me and ſaying, This ſtone purporteth the frivolous, intricate, and curious queſtions, wherein the hungry do travel and labor, leaving the ſubſtantial food of their ſouls. And I asked what theſe two heads did mean? And he ſaid, The name of the one is Vain Glory, the name of the other is the marring and diſſipating of Religion.

The School men and their frivolous queſtions deſcribed.

Alſo, concerning reformation of the Church, this Viſion he declareth: It happned as I was (ſaith he) in the ſame City in the Houſe of a certain Noble Man (a Britain) and was there ſpeaking with certain, I ſaw a croſs of ſilver very bright, much like to the Croſs of the Earl of Tholouſe. But the twelve Apoſtles, which did hang beſide the arm of the Croſs, were very vile, like the Apples which the Sea is wont to caſt up. And I ſaid, What is this Lord Jeſus? And the Spirit anſwered me, This Croſs which thou ſeeſt is the Church, which ſhall be clear and bright in pureneſs of life, and ſhall be heard and known all over through the ſhrill voyce of the preaching of ſincere verity. Then being troubled with the Apples, I asked what theſe Apples ſo vile did ſignifie? And he ſaid, It is the humiliation of the Church, &c.

Therefor-mation of the Church preſignified.

This godly Man did forewarn (as in a certain Chronicle is declared) how God would puniſh the Simony and Avarice of the Clergy with ſuch a plague that Rivers ſhould run with blood, &c. It is ſaid, That there is remaining a great Volume of his Viſions which are not yet abroad; for theſe that be are but a brief extract out of his Viſions and Revelations.

The ſimony and avarice of the Clergy to be puniſhed.

After that we have thus long ſtrayed in theſe foreign ſtories of Frederick, and in the tractation of other matters pertaining to other Countries; now, after this ſufficient digreſſion, it is time that we return to our own Country again. Wherein following the continuation of time and courſe of the Church, we will now adjoyn to theſe good Fathers and Writers, the Hiſtory of the Learned Biſhop of Lincoln, named Robert Groſthead, a Man famouſly learned (as that time ſerved) in the three Tongues both Latine, Greek, and Hebrew, alſo in all Liberal Sciences; whoſe works and Sermons yet to this day are extant, which I have ſeen in the Queens Majeſties Library at Weſtminſter. Wherein is one ſpecial Sermon written and exhibited in four ſundry ſcrols to the Pope, and to other four Cardinals, beginning Dominus noſter Jeſus Chriſtus, &c. Nicolas Trivet in his Chronicle, writing of this Biſhop, affirmed that he was born in Suffolk, in the Dioceſs of Norfolk: who giving him the praiſe to be a Man of excellent wiſdom, of profound Doctrine, and an example of all vertue, witneſſeth that he being Maſter of Arts, wrote firſt a Commentary In librum poſteriorum Ariſtotle. Alſo that he wrote tractations, De ſphæra, & de arte comput. and that he ſet forth divers Books concerning Philoſophy. Afterward being Doctor in Divinity, and expertly ſeen in all the three Tongues, drew out Treatiſes out of the Hebrew Gloſſes, alſo tranſlated divers works out of the Greek, as namely the teſtament of the twelve Patriarchs, and the Books of Dionyſius, Commenting upon the new tranſlation with his own Gloſs, Hæc ille. Many other Works and Volumes beſides were written by the ſaid Groſthead, as De oculo morali, De dotibus, De ceſſatione legalium, Parvus Cato, Annotationes in Suidam, in Batium, De poteſtate Paſtorali, Expoſitiones in

Gen. in Lucam, with a number more, beſides divers Epiſtles, Sermons, and invectives ſent to the Pope for his unmeaſureable Exactions, wherewith he overcharged and oppreſſed the Church of England.

This godly and learned Biſhop, after divers conflicts and agonies ſuſtained againſt the Biſhop of Rome, after the example of Frederick, of Guliel. de Sancto amore, of Nico. Gallus, and others after named, at length after great labors and travels of life finiſhed his courſe, and departed at Bugden in the month of October, Anno. 1253. Of his deceaſe thus writeth Matth. Pariſ. fol. 278. Out of the priſon and baniſhment of this world (which he never loved) was taken the holy Biſhop of Lincoln Robert, at his Manor of Bugden in the Even of S. Dionyſe; who was an open reprover of the Pope and of the King, a rebuker of the Prelates, a corrector of the Monks, a directer of the Prieſts, an inſtructer of the Clerks, a fautor of Scholers, a preacher to the people, a perſcutor of the Incontinent, a diligent ſearcher of the Scripture, a mall to the Romans, and a contemner of their doings, &c. Hæc Matth. What a mall he was to the Romans in the ſequel hereof (Chriſt willing) ſhall better appear. The ſtory is this:

Anno 1253. The death of Robert Groſthead.

Malleus Romanorum Groſtheadus.

It ſo befel among other daily and intolerable Exactions, wherein Pope Innocent was grievous and injurious (manifold ways) to the Realm of England, he had a certain Couſin or Nephew (ſo Popes were wont to call their Sons) named Frederick, being yet young and under years, whom the ſaid Innocent the Pope would needs preſer to be a Canon or Prebendary in the Church of Lincoln, in this time of Robert Biſhop of the ſaid Church; and upon the ſame directed down Letters to certain his factors here in England for the execution thereof. The Copy of which Letter by chance, yet not by chance, but by the opportune ſending of God, came to my hands, as I was penning this preſent ſtory, written in the end of an old Parchment Book, and otherwiſe rare I ſuppoſe to be found; and it is this:

Which foreſaid Letter is thus in Engliſh.

The Popes unreaſonable Letter.

Unto our beloved Sons the Archdeacon of Canterbury, and to Maſter Innocent our Scribe abiding in England, Greeting and Apoſtolical Benediction. Forſomuch as our well-beloved Son G. of S. Euſtace Deacon Cardinal, upon our ſpecial commandment hath given and granted to our well-beloved Son Frederick de Lavavia (a Clerk and our Nephew) a Canonſhip in the Church of Lincoln with full power and grant of the ſame; inveſting him alſo corporally and preſently with his own Ring in the ſaid Canonſhip, to be from hence-forth Canon of Lincoln, and to have full power of the ſaid Canonſhip in the Church, and a Prebend when any ſhall fall in the Church of Lincoln: from that time ſince which our former Letters of late, concerning this receiving and proviſion to be given to him in the ſaid Church were preſented and exhibited to our Reverend Brother the Biſhop of Lincoln, or elſe after the next avoiding the ſaid Prebendſhip to be reſerved to the Apoſtolical Donation, and to be given to him, making it void and fruſtrate if the ſaid Prebendſhip ſhall be given to any other Man beſide, and alſo denouncing the ſentence of Excommunication againſt all them that ſhall rebel and gainſay the ſame, as in the Letters of the ſaid Cardinal is more fully contained.

Excommunication auſwered.

* We therefore graciouſly inclined by the devout ſupplication of the ſaid Frederick, ratifying and gratefully approving that which hath been done by the ſaid Cardinal in the premiſſes, we thought good by the Authority Apoſtolical to confirm the ſame. Wherefore we give all commandment by our Letters Apoſtolical to your wiſdoms, that you will ſee the ſaid Frederick (or his Proctor in his behalf) to be really and corporally poſſeſſed in the ſaid Canonſhip or Prebend by our Authority, and alſo defend the ſaid party being therein poſſeſſed, denouncing the ſentence of Excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhall withſtand the ſame, all manner of cuſtoms or ſtatutes to the contrary notwithſtanding, corroborated either with Oath, or confirmations of the See Apoſtolick, or by what ſtay or let ſoever; or whether that the ſaid Frederick be not preſent to take the Oath accuſtomed to be given for obſerving the cuſtoms of the ſaid Church, or whether it be given and granted by the ſaid See to the foreſaid Biſhop, or to the Chapter of the ſaid Church joyntly and ſeverally, or to what perſon or perſons elſe, that no Man by compulſion ſhould have admiſſion or proviſion for any perſon in their Church wherein they cannot be Interdicted, Suſpended, or Excommunicate by the Letters Apoſtolical obtained, or to be obtained hereafter, under what form or words ſoever; yea, although the whole tenor of the ſaid indulgence be inſerted word for word in the ſaid your Letters, or by any other indulgences to what perſon or perſons ſoever, of what eſtate, dignity or place ſoever, under any manner or

{KING Hen. 3} or form of words, granted hereafter by the See Apoſtolick, by the which indulgences the effect of the ſaid proviſion may be by any manner of ways hindered or deferred: yet of our certain knowledge we will that they ſhall want their ſtrength in the proviſion made or to be made for the ſaid Frederick in the Church of Lincoln. And if any, upon the premiſſes or any of them, ſhall alledge againſt the foreſaid Frederick, or his procurator; that you will cauſe them to be cited on our behalf: ſo that they, being cited peremptorily, ſhall within the ſpace of two months of your citation, perſonally appear before us there according to the Law, to make anſwer to the ſaid Frederick upon the premiſes; any priviledges or indulgences whatſoever given and granted [illegible] generally to the Kingdom of England, or peculiarly to any other perſon of what ſtate, degree, and place ſoever, granted by the foreſaid See, under whatſoever manner and form of words for them not to be called up beyond the Sea, or out of their own City or Diocеſs by Letters Apoſtolical, under whatſoever form of words obtained, to the contrary in any wiſe notwithſtanding. All which priviledges and indulgences, we will in no caſe ſhall ſtand in any force or effect to the ſaid parties. Moreover, the day and form of the Citation we will that ye faithfully do intimate unto us by your Letters containing the tenor thereof; and if both of you cannot be preſent at the execution hereof, yet we will notwithſtanding that one of you do execute the ſame without fail. Dated the 7th. Kal. February, the 10th. year of our Popedom.

As there is no Man which hath any eyes to ſee, but may eaſily underſtand in reading this Letter of the Pope, how unreaſonable his requeſt is, how impudently he commandeth, how proudly he threatneth, how wickedly he oppreſſeth and rackеth the Church of God, in placing Boys and ſtrangers in the Miniſtry and cure of ſouls, and alſo in making them his Proviſors, to raven up the Church goods: ſo is it no great marvel, if this godly Biſhop Robert Groſthead was offended therewith; who, in my mind deſerveth herein a double commendation, not only that he ſo wiſely did diſcern error from ſincerity and truth; but alſo that he was ſo hardly and conſtant to ſtand to the defence thereof againſt the Pope, according as in this his anſwer to the Pope again may appear, as followeth.

A double commendation of Biſhop Groſthead.

The Anſwer of Robert Groſthead.

The anſwer of Robert Groſthead to the Pope.

Salutem, Pleaſeth it your wiſdom to underſtand, That I am not diſobedient to any the Apoſtolick Precepts, but both devoutly and reverently with the natural affection of a Son obey the ſame, and alſo am an utter enemy to all thoſe that reſiſt ſuch Apoſtolick Precepts, as a Child zealous of his Fathers honour. And truly, I am no leſs than bound thereunto by the Precept and commandment of God. For the Apoſtolick Precepts are none other, nor can be, than conſonant and uniform to the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, and of our Saviour Chriſt being the Maſter and Lord of all the Apoſtles: whoſe type and perſon, ſpecially in the conſonant and uniform Hierarchy of the Church, the Lord Pope ſeemeth to bear the ſame, our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, ſaying; Whoſoever is not with me, the ſame is againſt me. Therefore, againſt him neither is nor can be the moſt divine ſanctity of the See Apoſtolical. The tenor then of your foreſaid Apoſtolical Letter is not conſonant to true ſanctity, but utterly diſſonant and diſagreeing to the ſame. Firſt, for that the clauſe of this your Letter, and many ſuch other Letters like, which clauſe always ye ſo much do urge (Non obſtante) induced and brought in upon no neceſſity of any natural Law to be obſerved, doth ſwarm and flow with all inconſtancy, boldneſs, pertinacy, impudency, lying, and deceiving, and is alſo a Sea of miſtruſt in giving credit to no Man. Which as it ſwarmeth with theſe, ſo in like manner with innumerable other vices which hang and depend upon the ſame; moving and diſturbing the purity of Chriſtian Religion and life agreeable to the ſame, as alſo the publick tranquility of Men. Moreover, next after the ſin of Luciter (which ſhall be in the later time, to wit, of Antichriſt, the Child of Perdition, whom the Lord ſhall deſtroy with the breath of his mouth) there is not nor can be any kind of ſin ſo repugnant and contrary to the Doctrine of the Apoſtles and Holy Scripture, and to our Saviour Chriſt himſelf more hateful, deteſtable, and abominable, than to deſtroy and kill mens Souls, by defrauding them of the myſtery of the Paſtoral Office, which by the miniſtry of the Paſtoral cure ought to ſave and quicken the ſame. Which ſin by moſt evident places of the Scripture, ſuch Men are diſcerned and known to commit, which being in the authority of the Paſtoral Dignity, do ſerve their own carnal deſires and neceſſaries with the benefit of the Milk and Wool of the Sheep and flock of Chriſt, and do not miniſter the ſame Paſtoral Office and charge to the benefit and ſalvation of thoſe their ſheep. The ſame therefore by the teſtimony of the Scripture is not the adminiſtration of the paſtoral miniſtry, but the killing and deſtruction of the ſheep. And that theſe two kind of vices be moſt vile and wicked (although after a differing ſort) and far exceeding all other kind of wickedneſs hereby it is manifeſt: for that the ſame are directly contrary to two vertues moſt chiefly good (although differing in themſelves) and unlike together. For that is called moſt wicked, which is contrary to a thing moſt good. So much then as lyeth in the offenders, the one of their offences is directly againſt the Deity, which of himſelf is always eſſentially and ſupernaturally good; the other is againſt the deification and the image of God in Man, which is not always, but by the participation of Gods lightſome Grace, eſſentially and naturally good. And forſomuch as in things being good, the cauſe of good is better than the effect; and like as again in evil things, the cauſe of evil is worſe than the effect of evil proceeding thereof: hereby it is manifeſt, that the inducers of ſuch wicked deſtroyers of Gods image and deification in the ſheep of Chriſt (that is, the Church of God) are worſe than thoſe chief deſtroyers, to wit, Lucifer and Antichriſt.

And as in theſe degrees of wickedneſs how much more excellent ſuch be, who having a great charge committed to them of God (to edification and not to deſtruction) the more are they bound to keep away and exclude ſuch wicked deſtroyers from the Church of God: ſo much is it alſo off, that this holy ſeat Apoſtolical, to whom the Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath given all manner of power (to edification, as the Apoſtle ſaith, and not to deſtruction) can command, or will go about any ſuch thing, urging unto ſo great wickedneſs, ſo odious, deteſtable and abominable to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and alſo ſo pernitious to mankind. For this ſhould be a great defection, corruption and abuſe of the ſaid ſeat and fulneſs of power, and an utter ſeparation from the glorious Throne of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and a near neighbourhood unto the two moſt principal Princes of darkneſs, ſitting in the Chair of Peſtilence, prepared to the pains of Hell. Neither can any Man, which is ſubject and faithful to the ſaid See (and not cut away from the body of Chriſt, and from the ſaid Holy See) with ſincere and unſpotted Conſcience obey ſuch manner of precepts and commandments, or whatſoever other attempts proceeding, yea, though from the high order of Angels themſelves, but rather ought of neceſſity with all their ſtrength to withſtand and rebel againſt the ſame. Wherefore my Reverend Lord, I, like an obedient Child, upon my bound duty of obedience and fidelity which I owe to both the * parents of this Holy Apoſtolick See, and partly for love of unity in the body of Chriſt joyned with the ſaid See, do not obey but withſtand and utterly rebel againſt theſe things in the ſaid Letter contained, and eſpecially which urge and tend to the foreſaid wickedneſs, ſo abominable to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ſo repugnant to the Holineſs of the Holy Apoſtolick See, and ſo contrary to the unity of the Catholick Faith. Neither for this cauſe can your diſcretion determine any extremity to me, becauſe all my doing and gain-ſaying in this matter is no reſiſtance nor rebellion, but a childly obedience to the divine precept, and honor due both to * Father and Mother. Briefly therefore repeating my words I ſay, That this Holy Apoſtolick See cannot do any thing but to edification, and nothing at all to deſtruction: for this is the fulneſs of power, to be able to do all things to edification. But theſe which you call proviſions be not to edification, but to manifeſt deſtruction. The Holy Apoſtolick See therefore neither can nor ought to attempt any ſuch thing; becauſe that fleſh and blood, which cannot enter into the Kingdom of God, hath revealed the ſame, and not the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt which is in Heaven.

Power given to Miniſters to edification only, not to deſtruction.

Two principal Princes of darkneſs, Lucifer and Antichriſt.

Ex Ta-ry ad ca-tum.

Then ſ hlloweth it in the ſtory both of Matth. Pariſienſis, and of Florilegus, in theſe words: That when this Epiſtle came to the knowledge of the Pope, he, ſuming and fretting with anger and indignation, anſwered with a fierce look and proud mind, ſaying; What old doting frantick wretch is this, ſo boldly and raſhly to judge of my doings? By ſweet S. Peter and Paul, were it not but that upon our own clemency and good nature we are re-ſtrained, we ſhould hurl him down to ſuch confuſion, that we would make him a fable, a gazing ſtock, an example and wonderment to all the world. For is not the King of England our Vaſſal? and to ſay more, our Mancipal or Page (to uſe the very words of mine Author) which may at our pleaſure and beck both hamper him, impriſon him, and put him to utter ſhame? Thus when the Pope in his great fury and rage had uttered amongſt his Brethren the Cardinals, who were ſcarce able to appeaſe the furious violence of the Pope, with mild moderation of words they ſaid unto him; That it was not expedient for them to proceed againſt that Biſhop in ſuch rigorous manner. For, ſaid they, to confeſs the truth to your Holineſs, it is but very truth that he affirmeth, neither can we condemn him therefore. He is a Catholick Man, yea, alſo a Holy Man; more Holy and alſo Religious than we our ſelves; a Man of excellent wit and excellent life; ſo as it is thought, among all the Prelates he hath not his better, nor yet his like. This is not unknown both to the French and Engliſh Clergy univerſally, neither can our contradiction prevail againſt him. The truth of this his Epiſtle perhaps is known now to many, and ſhall ſtir up many againſt us: for he hath the name to be a great Philoſopher, and ſingularly ſeen in all the tongues, both Greek, Latine, and Hebrew: zealous in Juſtice, a reader of Divinity in the Schools, a preacher amongſt the people, a lover of Chaſtity, and a perſecutor of Simony. Theſe words ſpake L. Giles a Spaniſh Cardinal to the Pope, and others more, moved by their Conſcience to ſpeak. And this counſel they gave to the Pope, That he ſhould diſſemble and wink at theſe things, as one not ſeeing or regarding them; leſt otherwiſe perhaps ſome tumult might riſe and ſpring thereof: eſpecially ſeeing this is manifeſt and known to all Men, that once muſt needs come a defection and parting from the Church of Rome.

Well born matter Pope.

Giles Cardinal defendeth Robert Groſthead to the Pope.

Not long after this (about the Canicular days) this Reverend and godly Robert Biſhop of Lincoln, lying at his Manor place in Bugden, fell grievouſly ſick; and thereupon within few days departed. In the time of his ſickneſs he called to him a certain Frier of the preaching Order, named M. John Giles, a Man expert and cunning both in Phyſick and Divinity; partly to receive of him ſome comfort of his body, and partly to confer with him in ſpiritual matters. Thus upon a certain day, the ſaid Biſhop conferring with the foreſaid M. John, and reciting to him the doings and proceedings of the Pope, did grievouſly rebuke and reprehend his fellow Brethren the preaching Friers, and the other Order alſo of the Minorits; That forſomuch as their Order being planted in wilful poverty of the ſpirit, to the intent that they ſhould more freely carp and reprove the vices of the mighty, and not to flatter or ſpare them, but ſharply to rebuke and reprehend the ſame: the ſaid Friers contrary to their profeſſion did not boldly enough cry out and inveigh againſt the abuſes of their ſuperiours and men of power; nor did uncover nor detect their faults and wickedneſs; and therefore, ſaid the Biſhop, I judge them to be no better than manifeſt Hereticks. And he addeth moreover, (demanding of M. John) what is Hereſie? and that he ſhould give him the true definition thereof. Whereat when the Frier did ſtay and pauſe, not remembring the ſolemn definition of that matter; the Biſhop thereupon inferreth, giving this definition in Latine by the true interpretation of the Greek word: Hereſis Græce, electio, Latine, eſt ſententia humano ſenſu electa, Scripturæ Sacræ contraria, palam doctæ pertinaciter defenſa. That is, Hereſie is a ſentence taken and choſen of Mans own brain, contrary to Holy Scripture, openly maintained, and ſtiffly defended. And this definition given, conſequently he inferred, ſharply reprehending the Prelates of the Church, but eſpecially the Romans, which commit the charge of ſouls unto their Kinſfolks, being both in Age unworthy, and in Learning unſufficient. To give (ſaith he) the charge of ſouls unto a Boy, is a ſentence of a Prelate choſen and taken of Mans own head, only for carnal and earthly reſpect, and alſo is contrary to Holy Scripture, the which forbiddeth any ſuch to be made Miniſters or Paſtors, which are not ſufficient to drive away the wolves. And moreover it is alſo openly maintained, becauſe it is manifeſtly born abroad and commanded, with Charts imbulled both with Wax and Lead; and finally, it is ſtiffly defended. For if any Man ſhall dare to preſume to withſtand the ſame, he is ſuſpended and Excommunicated, and open War cryed out againſt him: therefore to whom the whole definition of an Heretick doth agree, he is a very Hereticke. But every faithful Chriſtian man ought to ſet himſelf againſt an Heretick as much as he may. Whoſoever that cauſe-ſiſt him and doth not, he ſinneth, and ſeemeth to be a fautor thereof, according to the ſaying of Gregory; He lacketh not Conſcience of ſecret ſociety, which ceaſeth to reſiſt open impiety. But the Friers both Franciſcans and Dominicks are moſt chiefly bound to withſtand ſuch, ſeeing both of them have the gift of preaching committed to them by their Office, and be more apt to the ſaid Office, by reaſon of their poverty; and therefore they do not only offend in not reſiſting ſuch, but alſo are to be counted maintainers of the ſame, according to the ſentence of the Apoſtle to the Romans, ſaying, Not only they who commit ſuch things, but alſo they that conſent are worthy of death. Wherefore it may be concluded, That as well the Pope (unleſs he ceaſe from that vice) as alſo the ſame Friers, unleſs they ſhew themſelves more earneſt and ſtudious in repelling the ſame, are both worthy of death, that is, perpetual Damnation. Item, ſaith the Canon Decretal, That upon this vice of Hereſie the Pope both may and ought to be accuſed.

The Pope proved here an Heretick.

The ſaying of Gregory.

The Pope accuſed of Hereſie.

After this the vehemency of his diſeaſe more and more increaſing, and becauſe the nights were ſomething longer; the third night before his departure, the Biſhop, feeling his infirmity to grow upon, willed certain of his Clergy to be called to him, thereby to be refreſhed with ſome conference or communication. Unto whom the Biſhop mourning and lamenting in his mind for the loſs of ſouls, through the avarice of the Popes Court, ſaid on this wiſe, as by certain Aphoriſms.

The godly talk of Robert Groſthead in time of his ſickneſs.

1. Chriſt came into the world to ſave and win ſouls: Ergo, He that feareth not to deſtroy ſouls, may he not worthily be counted Antichriſt?

Certain Aphoriſms or Articles laid of Robert Groſthead againſt the Biſhop of Rome.

2. The Lord created the whole world in ſix days, but in reſtoring of Man he laboured more than thirty years. Wherefore he that is a deſtroyer of that, about which the Lord ſo long laboured, is not he worthy to be counted the enemy of God, and Antichriſt?

3. The Pope ſhameth not impudently to annihilate and diſannul the priviledges of his Holy predeceſſors, of Roman Biſhops, by this obſtacle (Non obſtante) which is not done without the prejudice and manifeſt injury of them. For in ſo doing he doth reprove and deſtroy that which ſo many and ſo Holy Men have builded up before, and thus ſeemeth he to be a contemner of the Saints. Worthily therefore he that contemneth ſhall be contemned, according to the ſaying of Eſay; Woe to thee that doſt deſpiſe, for ſhalt not thou thy ſelf be deſpiſed? And who ſhall keep his priviledges, which ſo breaketh the priviledges of others?

The Pope accuſed of his wicked clauſe, No obſtante.

4. The Pope anſwering thereunto, thus defendeth perhaps his error: He that is equal, hath no ſuperiority over his equal; Therefore, no Pope hath power to bind me, being Pope as well as he. To this anſwer again, (quoth the Biſhop) It ſeemeth to me, that he that now preſently is ſailing in the dangerous Seas of this World, and he that is ſafely arived in the haven, having paſt all jeopardies, are not both like and equal. Grant that ſome Popes be ſaved (God forbid any ſhould ſay contrary) Then ſaith our Saviour, He that is leaſt in the Kingdom of Heaven is greater than John Baptiſt, a greater than whom did he not riſe amongſt the Children of Men. Is not therefore ſome Pope greater, being a giver and confirmer of priviledges, than this that is alive? Truly methinks, he is greater, therefore he hath dominion over his inferior.

The Pope accuſed arrogating more unto his due to him, and proud not to be equal but inferior to his predeceſſors.

5. Doth not the Pope thus ſay ſpeaking of all his predeceſſors for the moſt part; This our predeceſſor, and this our predeceſſor of moſt worthy memory, &c. And again,

The Pope accuſed for undoing the acts and foundations of his predeceſſors.

We

Hereſis quid.

Definition of Hereſie.

{KING Hen. 3}

We (ſaith he) cleaving, or following the ſteps of our predeceſſors, &c. And why then do ſuch Popes as come after, deſtroy theſe Foundations which their predeceſſors have laid?

Proved that the Pope alive is inferior to his predeceſſors before him, and therefore to have no authority to infringe the Priviledges of other Popes

6. Many Apoſtolick men coming after, have confirmed ſome Priviledge being granted by others; and be not many Biſhops, being already ſaved by the Grace of God, to be counted greater and better than one Biſhop which hath not yet attained, but ſtandeth in danger to obtain that which the other have got already?

Proved by the example of Benet, that moſt more ancient in time ought to be preferred in higher reverence.

7. Alſo other former Fathers and Biſhops of the Apoſtolical See, in preferment of time, go before the others which in time come after. And thoſe whom the eſtimation of ancient time doth advance, ſuch are we bound to eſteem and to have in more reverence. This did the holy man Benedict well conſider; who in his rule preferreth ſuch as came firſt in time, whatſoever men they were before them, which (albeit being more ancient in years) came after them into the order, and commandeth them to be their Superiors, and to have the Preheminence. Which being ſo (as it is true and certain) how cometh then this injurious and raſh preſumption, which dare repeal and diſannul the old Priviledges of many ancient holy Biſhops, in time and in reverence going before them?

The Pope accuſed for maintaining of Uſury.

8. Moreover, though many Popes have been grievous to the Church, yet this Pope moſt ſpecially hath brought it moſt into ſervitude, and manifold ways hath damnified the ſame. For theſe Caurſini, theſe open Uſurers, whom our holy fore-Fathers and Doctors, whom we have ſeen, and namely our learned Maſter in France Preacher; alſo the Abbat of Flay a Ciſterican, Maſter Jacobus de vetri, and Maſter Stephen, Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the time of his baniſhment, and alſo Maſter Robert Curcun, with his Preaching baniſhed out of France (for before that time theſe kind of Uſurers were never known in England) the ſame Caurſini, theſe wicked Uſurers, I ſay, were by this Pope induced, ſupported and maintained; ſo that if any do ſpeak againſt them, he is miſerably toſſed and trounſed for his labour, whereof partly Roger Biſhop of London hath ſome experience.

Againſt Uſury.

9. The world doth know, that Uſury is counted a deteſtable thing in both the Teſtaments, and is forbidden of God. But now the Popes Uſurers or Exchangers, the very Jews crying out againſt them, being openly ſuffered in London to exerciſe their Uſury, to the great damage and detriment of all Eccleſiaſtical perſons, but eſpecially Houſes of Religion, compelling ſuch as be in poverty to counterfeit and to put to their Seals to forged writings, which is no leſs than to commit Idolatry and to abrenounce the verity which is God himſelf. As for example: I borrow an hundred Marks for a Year, inſtead of a hundred pounds; I am compelled, to make my Writing and to Seal the ſame, confeſſing that I have received and borrowed one hundred pounds, to be repaied again at the years end to ſuch a man, &c. And if it ſhall chance that your occupying be ſuch, that within a month you bring again the principal to the Popes Uſurer, he will receive no leſs notwithſtanding than his full hundred pounds: which condition of Uſury is much worſe than that of the Jews. For to the Jew what principal you bring, he will require no more than proportionably for the commenſuration of ſo much time, wherein his mony hath been out of his hands.

The crafty practice of Uſurers.

The Popes Uſurers worſe than the Jews.

Crafty ſubtilty of the Pope to get mony.

10. Moreover, we have ſeen and known the Pope to have given in charge and commandment to the Friers, Preachers, and Minorites, to inquire diligently for ſuch as lie ſick and like to die; and ſo coming to them diligently to perſwade them to make their Wills and Teſtaments favourably to the profit and ſubſidy of the Holy Land, and to take the Croſs upon them; that if they do amend, they may wring them in the Law; and if they die, they may wreſt the mony from their Executors.

Men ſigned to the Holy Land, ſold for mony like Sheep by the Pope. Remiſſion of ſins ſold for mony.

11. We have known likewiſe and ſeen men, that have taken the Vow and Sign of the Croſs upon them, to be ſold unto Lay-men; as Sheep and Oxen were wont in time paſt to be ſold in the Temple.

We have ſeen with our eyes the Popes Letter, in which we have found this to be written: That they, which bequeath any thing to the behoof or ſubſidy of the Holy Land, ſhall receive ſo much indulgence as they have diſburſed mony.

The Pope accuſed to be injurious to Churches in his proviſions and reſervations

12. Over and beſides all this, the Pope in divers and ſundry his Letters hath willed and commanded Prelates to receive into Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, and to provide ſome ſuch Living in their Churches, as ſhall be ſufficient to ſuch and ſuch a ſtranger (being both abſent and alſo unworthy) which have neither Learning, nor yet the Language of the Country: whereby they are neither able to Preach, nor to hear Confeſſions, nor to keep reſidence to refreſh the poor and way-farers.

The Pope accuſed for injurious to the Abbot of St Albans.

13. Item, We know and have ſeen our ſelves, that the Pope hath written to the Abbot of St. Albans to provide for one called John de Camezana, whom we never ſaw, ſome competent Benefice. Whereupon, in few days after, when proviſion was made for him in a certain Church, worth forty Marks by the year and more, the party being not therewith contented, complained to the Pope, who then writing to the foreſaid Abbot, commanded him to provide for the foreſaid M. John ſome better thing, reſerving notwithſtanding the gift of the former Benefice to himſelf.

The Pope accuſed for violent extortion.

14. Again, not long after came alſo to the Houſe of the foreſaid Abbot, two other perſons like begging Vagabonds, bringing with them the Popes Letters: in the tenor whereof the Abbot was commanded, that, incontinently upon the ſight thereof, he ſhould give and diſburſe to the ſaid perſons for the expedition and diſpatch of his Affairs ten Marks in hand, without any delay or ſticking: the which perſons uttering unto the Abbot proud and threatning words, he was fain to agree with them and ſend them away.

The Pope accuſed for troubling and corrupting learned men of the Spirituality with his Temporal affairs.

15. Item, Of men which are both holy and well Learned, which have left the world for the following of God in ſuch order as they ought not to turn back again, the Pope maketh his Tolners and Bankers to get in his mony: the which charge they are compelled againſt their wills to take upon them, leſt they ſhould ſeem to be diſobedient, and ſo of Spiritual men are made more ſecular than the moſt ſecular. And ſo the baſeneſs of their Chimmers and Scapillers, which they wear, doth prove them to be Lyers; whilſt under the habit of poverty and humiliation there lurketh the ſpirit of pride and elation. And becauſe no Legate may be ſent into England, but being firſt required of the King, the Pope ſendeth Sophiſtical Legates, and ſuch as be diſguiſed and counterfeit in Apparel, and are guarded with great might and power; neither is it hard to bring forth examples thereof: For ſo many ſuch daily do come into the Realm, that to hear the names of them recited, it would be tedious for any man to hear.

The Pope accuſed for unlawful Diſpenſations.

16. Furthermore (as we have ſeen our ſelves) the Pope granteth for ſecular favour, that a man may have a Biſhoprick, and yet be no Biſhop conſecrated, Sed electus ſempiternus, that is, Elect for ever. Which is as much to ſignify, to have the Milk and the Wool of the Sheep and not to keep the Wolves away from the Sheep; to retain the Rents of a Biſhop, and not diſcharge the Function of a Biſhop.

And when this godly Biſhop had thus reproved theſe and ſuch other deteſtable enormities of the Court of Rome; as all kinds of Avarice, their Uſury, their Simony, their Extortion, all kinds of filthineſs, fleſhly Luſt, gluttony, and their ſumptuous Apparel raigning in that Court; then ſaith he, this old Verſe may be truly verified upon it:

Ejus avaritiæ totus non ſufficit orbis,
Ejus luxuriæ meretrix non ſufficit omnis.

All the world cannot ſuffice their greedy covetous mind.
Nor all the drabs & naughty packs their filthy luſting kind.

Afterwards he went about more to proſecute, how the foreſaid Court, like a Gulf never ſatisfied (ever gaping ſo wide, that the flood of Jordan might run into his mouth) aſpired how to uſurp the Goods of them that die unteſted, and of Legacies bequeathed without form of Law; and whereby more licentiouſly to bring this to paſs, they uſed to joyn the King to be fellow and partaker with them in their Spoils, Extortions, and Robbing. Neither, ſaith he, ſhall the Church be delivered from the ſervitude of Egypt but by violence and force, and with the bloody Sword. And albeit, ſaith he, theſe be yet but light matters, yet ſhortly more great and grievous things than theſe ſhall be ſeen. Ex Mat. Paris.

And

The death of Robert Grosthead Bishop of Lincoln.

And in the end of this his prophesying, which he scarcely could utter without sighing, sobbing, and weeping, his Tongue and Breath began to fail, and so, the Organ of his Voice being stopped, he made an end both of his Speech and Life. Ex Matthæo Parisi.

And forasmuch as mention hath been made before of the insatiable Avarice of the Popes Court by his inordinate provisions and reservations, it is testified by the said Author Matthew Paris, that the foresaid Robert Grosthead, being Bishop of Lincoln, caused to be viewed and considered diligently of his Clerks, what the Revenues of Foreiners and Strangers within England, sent in by the Pope, came to by the year; and it was found and evidently tried, that this Pope now present, Innocentius the fourth, did impoverish the Universal Church throughout Christendom, more than all his predecessors from the time the Pope first began. So that the Revenues of Foreiners and Clerks, placed by him here in England, mounted unto the sum of Threescore and ten thousand Marks and above, whereas the meer Revenues of the Crown came not to Thirty thousand.

What the Revenues the Popes Clerks here in England came to by the year.

Ex Cestrensi, lib. 7.

Of this Robert Grosthead writeth Cestrensis in his seventh Book of his History, that partly for that it grieved him to see the intolerable exactions of the Pope in this Realm; and partly because he refused to admit a certain young Nephew of the Pope to be Canon of his Church (as hath been before recited) he therefore writing unto the Pope, and signifying that he could not admit any such persons into his Church, which neither knew themselves nor the Tongue of the people, nor the charges committed unto them, was called up to Rome, and there Excommunicated; who, then appealing from the Pope, shortly after departed, which was in the year of our Lord 1253. It chanced within two years after his decease, the said Pope Innocent being asleep, a certain Bishop, apparelled Bishop-like, appeared unto him, and striking him with his staff on the left-side, said, Surge miser, veni in judicium: that is, Rise wretch and come to thy judgment. The next day after, the Pope was found amazed, as a man stricken on the side with the stroke of a staff. This Robert though he was greatly commended for his Sanctimony, and as Cestrens saith, for his miracles; yet was he not permitted in the Court of Rome to be inscribed in the Catalogue of Saints. And thus much out of Cestrensis concerning this matter. But Mat. Paris, and the Author of Flores Historiarum, prosecuting this story more at large, addeth this more unto it, and saith, That Pope Innocent the next year following, which was An. 1254. being passing angry, contrary to the mind of his Brethren the Cardinals, would have the Bones of the foresaid Bishop of Lincoln cast out of the Church, and purposed to bring him into such spite and hatred of the people, that he should be counted an Ethnick, a Rebel, and disobedient person through the whole world. And thereupon caused his Letters to be written and sent down to the King of England, knowing that the King would gladly serve him therein, to have the spoil of the Bishop and of his Church. But in the Night following the said Bishop of Lincoln appeared unto him as coming in his Pontificalibus, and with a severe countenance, stern look, and terrible voice speaking unto him being in his rest, and smiting him on the side with a vehement stroke, with the end of his Cross-staff, thus said, O thou scurvy, lazy, old, bald, lousie, wretched, doting Pope; hast thou purposed to cast my Bones out of the Church to the shame and slander of me? How cometh this rash wilfulness in thy head? It were more meet for thee being thus advanced by God, and honoured, to make much of the zealous servants of God, although departed. The Lord will not suffer thee henceforth to have any more power over me. I have written unto thee in the spirit of Humility and Love, that thou shouldst correct thy manifold errors; but thou with a proud eye and disdainful heart hast despised my wholsome Admonitions. Wo to thee that despisest, shalt not thou also be despised? And so the Bishop departing from the Pope stricken, as is said, on the side, left him for half dead, and so lying in sorrow and lamentation. Whereupon his Chamberlains being amazed, hearing these things, came running to the Pope to know what him ailed. To whom the Pope much troubled and vexed in his spirit, said, That great terrors in his sleep vehemently disturbed and molested him, in such sort that he thought he should never recover it, nor be restored to himself again. Oh (said he) how sore is my side, and how eagerly it vexeth me, as being run through with a Spear! Neither did the Pope eat or drink all that day, but faining himself to be sick of a burning Ague, kept in. And yet the indignation of the ireful hand of God (saith the story) so left him not.

Senibalde papa miserere me. The Popes new and true stile given by Grosthead Bishop of Lincoln.

{ KING Hen. 3 }

The Pope disquieted in his mind.

For after these wholesome Admonitions given to him by the Servant of God, the Pope not regarding them, but all set upon War, suppression of his Enemies, and secular Affairs, gave his mind wholly unto them; and yet all his labours, counsels, and expences bestowed upon them, could never prosper after that day in that he went about. For the Pope, the same time having War with the Apulians, all his Army, fighting under the Popes Nephew their Captain, were slain and confounded to the number of many thousands: whose lamentable slaughter all the Country of the Romans did much bewail. The Pope, not yet quiet in his mind, directeth his journy towards Naples, although sore vexed in his side like a man sick of a Plurisie, or smitten rather with a Spear, neither could any Physick of his Cardinals help him. For Robert of Lincoln (saith the story) did not spare him; and he that would not hear him gently correcting him being alive, his stripes did he feel when he was dead; so that he never after that enjoyed any lucky or prosperous day, till the time of his death, nor yet any prosperous or quiet Night until the Morning. And so continued he unto his death, which shortly after insued, he being at Naples, An. 1255. or as N. Trivet Recordeth, An. 1254. And thus have ye the whole Discourse between Robert Grosthead and Pope Innocent.

The death of Pope Innocent the fourth.

{ Anno 1255 }

In the which story is to be noted, gentle Reader, that although in the story of Cestrensis, of Matthew Paris, and of Flor. Hist. it is expresly testified and reported, that the Pope was smitten with the staff of Robert the foresaid Bishop of Lincoln; yet thou must wisely understand, that howsoever Gods hand dealeth here in this world in punishing his Enemies, or howsoever the image of things not seen but fantasied, offer themselves to the secret cogitation of man, his Senses being asleep, by the operation or permission of God, working, after some Spiritual influence in our imaginations, certain it is, that no dead man materially can ever arise again or appear before the Judgment-day, to any man with his staff or without his staff, to work any feat, after he have once departed this life.

A Note to the Reader concerning the appearing of dead men.

After the death of this Robert Grosthead, Bishop of Lincoln, great dissention fell between the Archbishop of Canterbury Boniface, and the Canons of the said Church of Lincoln, about the right of giving Prebendships, and about the Revenues of the said Church, in the time of the Bishops See being now vacant. Which right and power the Archbishop claimed to himself, but the Canons of that Church (maintaining the contrary side) stood against him, and for the same were Excommunicated of the Archbishop. Among whom one Master Woolf resisting the Archbishop to the face, in the name of all the other Canons, made up his Appeal to Rome, where much mony on both sides was spent. At length after this Grosthead was Elected Henry Lexinton in the See of Lincoln.

The same or like Fact was also intended by the like Jews at Norwich twenty years before upon a certain Child, whom they had first Circumcised, and detained a whole year in custody, intending to Crucify him, for which the Jews were sent up to the Tower of London, of whom eighteen were hanged, and the rest remained long in Prison: Ex Cestrens. lib. 7. Of this wicked Jewish people I find also in the Book Flor. Hist. that about this year of our Lord 1255. they began first to be expelled out of France, by the commandment of the French King, being then in Palestina, Warring against the Turks: by the occasion that it was objected then by the Turk against him and other Christian Princes, for the retaining the Jews amongst them, which did Crucify our Saviour, and Warring against them which did not Crucify him. *Ex Flor. these Jews moreover King Henry the ſame year, 1255, exacted to be given unto him Eight thouſand Marks in pain of hanging. Who, being much grieved therewith, and complaining that the King went about their deſtruction, deſired leave to be given them of the King, that they might depart the Realm, never to return again. But the King committed the doing of that matter unto Earl Richard his Brother, to inforce them to pay the mony whether they would or no. Moreover of the ſame Jews mention is made in the ſtory Intituled Eulogium. Of the Jews in Northampton, who had among themſelves prepared wild-fire, to burn the City of London; for the which divers of them were taken, and burned in the time of Lent, in the ſaid City of Northampton, which was two years before, about the year of our Lord 1253. Ex Eulogio. And forſomuch as mention here is made of the Jews, I cannot omit what ſome Engliſh ſtories write of a certain Jew, who not long after this time, about the year of our Lord 1257, fell into a Privy at Teukesbury upon a Sabbath-day; which, for the great reverence he had to his holy Sabath, would not ſuffer himſelf to be plucked out. And ſo Lord Richard Earl of Gloceſter, hearing thereof, would not ſuffer him to be drawn out on Sunday for reverence of the Holy day. [illegible] ſuperſtitious Jew, remaining there till Monday, was found dead in the Dung.

And to note the blind ſuperſtition of that time, not only among the Jews, but alſo among the Chriſtians; to omit divers other ſtories, as of Walter Gray Archbiſhop of York, who coming up to the Parliament at London, Anno 1255, with unordinate faſting did ſo over-charge Nature, and pined himſelf, and (as the ſtory mentioneth) did ſo dry up his Brain, that he loſing thereby all Appetite of Stomach, going to Fulham, there within three days died, as in the Compiler of Flor. Hiſt. is both ſtoried and reprehended. Let this alſo be adjoyned, which the fore-named Author, and in the ſame year is Recorded of one named Peter Chaceporce, who dying in France, An. 1255, left in bequeſt his Teſtament 600 Marks for Lands to be purchaſed to the Houſe of Merton for God to be ſerved there perpetually, Pro anima ejus, & omnium fidelium; that is, For his Souls health, and all faithful Souls. As, who would ſay, Chriſtian-Faith were not the ordinary means ſufficient to Salvation of Faithful Souls, without the Quire-ſervice of the Monks of Merton.

Ye have heard it often complained of before, how the uſurped power of the Pope hath violently and preſumptuouſly incroached upon the Church of England, in giving and conferring Benefices and Prebends to his Italians and Strangers, to the great damage and ruine of Chriſts flock manifold ways. This violent injury and oppreſſion of the Pope, as by no Lawful and gentle means it could be reformed; ſo by occaſion and means inordinate, about this time it began ſomewhat to be bridled. The matter whereof was this, as it is in the Collector of Flor. Hiſt. recited: In the year of the Reign of this King fourty and four, the Biſhop of London, named Fulco, had given a certain Prebend in the Church of St. Paul, to one Maſter Ruſtandus, the Popes Meſſenger here in England Who entring into the Profeſſion of the Gray-Friers, and ſhortly after dying on the other ſide of the Sea, the Pope immediately conferred the ſaid Prebend to one of his ſpecials, a like ſtranger as the other was before. About the ſame inſtant it befel, that the Biſhop alſo of London deceaſed, whereby the Biſhoprick now vacant fell into the Kings hands; who, hearing of the death of the fore-named Ruſtandus, gave the ſaid Prebendſhip, given of the Pope before, to one John Crakehale his under-treaſurer, who with all Solemnity took his inſtallation, not knowing as yet that it was beſtowed of the Pope before. It was not long after, as time grew, but this being noiſed at Rome, forthwith cometh down a certain Proctor, named John Gras, with the Popes Embulled Letters, to receive the Collation of the Benefice, by his Commiſſion procuratory, given by the Pope, wherein John Crakehale had been already inſtalled, as is aforeſaid, by the Kings Donation. This matter coming in Traverſe before Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury; he inquiring and ſearching which Donation was the firſt, and finding the Popes Grant to be the former, gave Sentence with him againſt the King; ſo that in concluſion, the Roman Clerk had the advantage of the Benefice, although the other had long enjoyed the poſſeſſion thereof before. Thus the Popes man being preferred, and the Engliſh man excluded, after the party had been inveſted and ſtalled after the uſe and manner; he thinking himſelf to be in ſure poſſeſſion of his place, attempted with the reſt to enter the Chapter-Houſe, but was not permitted ſo to do: whereupon the Popes Clerk, giving place to force and number, went toward the Archbiſhop to complain. This being known, certain Recluſes purſued him; and he being ſo compaſſed about, one in the thickneſs of the throng, being never after known, ſuddenly ruſhing upon him, a little above his Eyes, ſo pareth off his Head, that he fell down dead; the ſame alſo was done to another of his fellows in flying away. This hainous murder being famed abroad, ſtrait inquiry thereof was made, but the deed doer could not be known; and although great ſuſpition was laid upon Crakehale the Kings Chaplain, yet no proof could be brought. But moſt men thought, that bloody Fact to be done by certain Ruffians or other light perſons about the City or the Court, diſdaining be-like that the Romans were ſo enriched with *Engliſh*mens Livings, by whom neither came relief to any *Engliſh*man, nor any godly inſtruction to the flock of Chriſt. And therefore becauſe they ſaw the Church and Realm of England in ſuch ſubjection, and ſo much to be troden down by the Romans and the Popes Meſſengers: they thought thereby ſomething to bridle, as with a ſnaffle, the Popes Meſſengers from their untemperate ranging into this Land. Ex Flor. Hiſt.

The ſtory of Mat. Paris here ceaſeth

Here by the way is to be noted, that, unto the death of this foreſaid Fulco Biſhop of London, continueth the Hiſtory of Mat. Paris Monk of St. Albans, which was to the year of Grace 1260. The reſidue was continued by another Monk of the ſame Houſe, but not with ſuch like commendation, worthy to make any authentick ſtory; as I have ſeen it noted in a written Book.

It were too curious and tedious in order to proſecute what happened in every year, through this Kings Reign; as how it was provided by the King, that whoſoever could diſpend fifteen pounds Land by the year, ſhould be bound to make to the King a Soldier, that watch ſhould be kept every night in Cities; that whoſoever was robbed, or otherwiſe damnified in any Country, he that had the cuſtody ſhould be compelled to make up the loſs again, or elſe to purſue the malefactor, which was An. 1253, witneſſing Flores Hiſt. Item, how the King making his Voyage into Vaſcon, his expences were reckoned to amount to 270000 Marks, beſide 30000 Marks beſtowed upon his Brethren by the Mothers-ſide, and beſides other great gifts given abroad. By reaſon whereof, great Taxes, and Tolonies, and Tenths were required of his Subjects; eſpecially of the Church-men, who, being wont to receive Tithes of others, now were conſtrained to give Tithes to the Laity: Flores Hiſt. Anno 1254. Item, how in the year next following, the Londoners offering one hundred pounds for a gift to the King, with a precious Cup of Gold, at his return out of France, were ſhortly after compelled by the King to pay three thouſand Marks for the eſcape of a certain Priſoner, being a Clerk condemned; which Clerk being granted of the King to the Biſhop, and he having no Priſon ſufficient for him, borrowed of the Londoners the Priſon of Newgate; to have him kept in, who eſcaping thereout, they, as is ſaid, were demanded this recompence aforeſaid, Anno 1255. Item, how the King, greatly complaining of his Debts the ſame year, required the whole Tenths, which ſhould be gathered in three years, to be taken up all at once. To whoſe requeſt the Nobles and Commons agreed to ſtrain themſelves, ſo that the Charter of their Liberties and Cuſtoms might be ratified, and fully by him confirmed: and ſo for that year they were: Flores Hiſt. Item, How Pope Alexander the third to deſtroy the City Michera, with King Menfred the Son of Frederick the Emperor, ſent forth the ſame year Octavianus his Cardinal with a puiſſant Army; who coming to the City with his ſiege, through the Counſel of Marchiſius one of the chief Captains, diſcharged a great part of his Hoſt, whereby the moſt of the Popes Army was ſlain and deſtroyed; almoſt all, ſave only the Family of Marchiſius, An. 1255. *Flor. Lewlinus King of Wales Warreth againſt the King.

Lewlinus and the King concorded.

Many other things during the time of this King might be congeſted, as the riſing of Lewlinus King of Wales, and of the Welch men againſt the King, and waſting the Land unto the Town of Cheſter; who deſtroyed divers of the Engliſh-mens Horſmen taken in the Mariſh; with whom at length they fell to agreement by the means of Octobonus, that his ſucceſſors ſhould be only called Princes of Wales, and ſhould do the King his Homage; and the King ſhould receive of him Three thouſand Marks. And this, being Eſtabliſhed in writing, was confirmed by the Popes Seal, in the year of our Lord 1257. Ex Polychron.

of

Ex Polychro. 17.

Ex Antone Eulogii.

About the ſame time, ſuch Famine and lack of Victuals oppreſſed the Land, that a Somme of Corn was then ſold for Six and twenty Shillings; in ſo much that the poorer ſort was forced to eat Nettle-roots, Thiſtle-roots, and whatſoever they could get: Ex Eulogio. Although ſome refer this to the year 1262.

{Anno 1257} Pope Alexander to make ſhift for mony, maketh the King believe his Son ſhould be King of Apulia. Richard the Kings Brother made King of Almain.

Hereunto moreover might be adjoyned, how Pope Alexander, abuſing and mocking the Kings ſimplicity, made him believe that he would make his Son Edmund King of Apulia, ſo that he would ſuſtain the charges and coſt thereof, to maintain the War which thereto ſhould appertain. Whereby the King, caſt in a ſudden hope, cauſed his Son incontinently to be Proclaimed King of Apulia; and upon the ſame ſent up to the Pope all the Riches he could well make in his Realm. And thus was the Realm manifold ways miſerably impoveriſhed to inrich the Pope: Ex Flor. Hiſt. About which Seaſon, Richard Earl of Exceſter the Kings Brother, was made King of Almain by the Electors.

Here might be ſhewed moreover and added to the ſtories above, how the nex year following, which was 1259, as Nicholas Trivet writeth, the King entring into France, required the reſtitution of ſuch Lands in Normandy and Anjou, as of old right were due unto him, and wrongfully withholden from him. But the French King again alleadged, ſaying, That the Country of Normandy by old time was not given away from the Crown of France, but uſurped, and by force extorted by Rollo, &c. In concluſion, the King fearing and ſuſpecting the hearts of his Nobles, and looking for none other but for Rebellion at home, durſt not try with them, but was compelled to agree with them upon ſuch Peace and conditions as he could get; which was this: That he ſhould have of the French King Thirteen hundred thouſand of Turen pounds, with ſo much Lands elſe as came to the value of Twenty thouſand pounds in yearly Rent: ſo ſhould he reſign fully and purely, to the hands of the French King, all ſuch Lands and Poſſeſſions which he had in France. Whereby the King, giving over his Stile and Titles which he had in thoſe parts, ceaſed then to be called Duke of Normandy, or Earl of Anjou.

What civil diſcord worketh.

Reſignation of the Earldom of Normandy and Anjou.

Ex Gualt. Gisburn.

Albeit it be true that Giſburne writeth, that King, afterward repenting of his deed, did never receive the mony in all his life, neither did he ceaſe during his life to Intitle himſelf Duke of Normandy. But after him, his Son Edward and his ſucceſſors in their Stile left out the Title to be called Duke of Normandy, &c. Ex Gisburn.

The conflict and skirmiſh between the Northern Welſh men and the Southern, men in Oxford.

Beſides many other matters omitted, here I over-paſs alſo the ſore and vehement conflict, not between the Frogs and the Mice which Homer writeth of, but the mighty pitched field, fought in the year of our Lord 1259, between the young Students and Scholars of the Univerſity of Oxford, having no other occaſion, as I read in Mat. Pariſ. but only the diverſity of the Country where they were born. For the Northern men joyning with the Welch men, to try their manhood againſt the Southern part, fell both parts together in ſuch a broil, with their Enſigns and War-like Array, that in concluſion divers on both ſides were ſlain. This heavy and bloody conflict during and increaſing among them, the end was this: That the Northern Lads with the Welch had the Victory. After that fury and fiery fierceneſs had done what it could, the Victorers bethinking at length with themſelves, partly what they had done, partly how it would be taken of the higher powers, and fearing due puniſhment to fall upon them, eſpecially ſeeing the Brother of Leoline Prince of Wales, and Son of Griffin, was newly dead in Priſon; drawing their counſel and helps together, they offered to King Henry 4000 Marks, to Edward his Son 300, and to the Queen 200, to be releaſed of their Treſpaſs. But the King anſwering them again, That he ſet more price by the life of one true Subject, than by all which by them was offered, would in no wiſe receive their mony. And ſo the Students without hope of peace went home with ſmall triumph, learning what the common Proverb meaneth, Dulce bellum inexpertis. Notwithſtanding, the King being then occupied in great Affairs and Wars, partly with Leoline and the Welch men, partly inwrapped with diſcord at home with his Nobles, had no leaſure to attend to the correction of theſe Univerſity men; which was Anno 1259. Ex Matth. Pariſienſi. Likewiſe concerning the Diſſention following the next year after in the Univerſity of Paris, between the Students there, and the Friers; the number of whom then did ſo much increaſe, that the Commons Unneth was able to ſuſtain them with their Alms. Alſo between the Univerſities both of Oxford and Cambridge, for a certain Priſoner taken out of their hands by ſtrength, and brought into ſanctury the ſame year, as is teſtified in Matthew Paris, Anno 1259. In like manner touching the variance between the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Chapter of Lincoln. Again, between the ſaid Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Chapter and Biſhop of London; and how the ſaid Biſhop at his Conſecration would not make his Profeſſion to the Archbiſhop but with this exception, Salvis jure & libertate Eccleſiæ Londinenſis, quæ pro poſſe meo defendam in omnibus, &c. Recorded in Flor. Hiſt. All which wranglings and diſſentions ſuch inſuing rable others raigning daily in the Church at thoſe days, if I had ſo much leaſure to proſecute them as I find them in ſtories remaining, might ſufficiently induce us to underſtand what ſmall peace and agreement was then joyned with that Doctrine and Religion in thoſe days, during the ſtate and raign of Antichriſt.

Little Peace in the Popes Church.

Theſe with many ſuch other matters more, which here might be diſcourſed and ſtoried at large, being more forein than Eccleſiaſtical, for brevity I do purpoſely contract and omit, cutting off all ſuch ſuperfluities as may ſeem more curious to write upon, than neceſſary to be known.

Hiſtories profitable for example.

This that followeth, concerning the pitiful and turbulent commotion between the King and the Nobles, which laſted a long ſeaſon; becauſe it is lamentable and containeth much fruitful example, both for Princes and Subjects to behold and look upon, to ſee what miſchief and inconvenience groweth in Common-weals, where ſtudy of mutual concord lacketh, that is, where neither the Prince regardeth the offending of his Subjects, and where the Subjects forget the office of Chriſtian-patience in ſuffering their Princes injuries by Gods wrath inflicted for their ſins: therefore, in explaining the order and ſtory thereof, I thought it not unprofitable to occupy the Reader with a little more tarriance in peruſing the full Diſcourſe of this ſo lamentable a matter, and ſo pernitious to the publick weal.

The occaſion of commotion between the King and the Nobles.

And firſt to declare the occaſions and firſt beginning of this tumult, here is to be underſtood, which before was ſignified, how King Henry Married with Elenor, Daughter of the Earl of Provens a ſtranger, which was about the year of our Lord 1234. whereupon a great Door was opened for ſtrangers, not only to enter the Land, but alſo to repleniſh the Court: to whom the King ſeemed more to incline his favour, advancing them to more preferment, than his own natural Engliſh Lords, which thing to them was no little grievance. Moreover, before was declared how the King by Iſabel his Mother, who was a ſtranger, had divers Brethren, whom he nouriſhed up with great Livings and Poſſeſſions, and large Penſions of mony; which was another heart-ſore to divers, and alſo an hinderance. Over and beſides hath alſo been declared, what unreaſonable collections of mony from time to time, as Quindecims, Subſidies, Tenths, Mercements, Fines, Payments, Loans, and Taxes, have been Levied by the King, as well of the Spirituality, as of the Lay ſort, partly for maintaining the Kings Wars againſt Wales, againſt Scotland and France, to recover Normandy; partly for helping the Kings Debts, Voyages, and other expences; partly for the Kingdom of Apulia, which was promiſed the Kings Son by the Pope; partly for monying and ſupporting the Pope in his Wars againſt the Emperor. By reaſon of all which ſundry and importable Collections, the Common-wealth of the Realm was utterly excoriate, to the great impoveriſhment of poor Engliſh men. Neither did it a little vex the people, to ſee the King call in ſo many Legates from Rome every year, which did nothing elſe but tranſport the Engliſh mony unto the Popes Coffers. Beſides all

{KING Hen. 3} all this, what variance and altercation hath been between the King and his Subjects about the liberties of Magna Charta, and De Foreſta, granted by King John, and after confirmed by this King, in the former Council holden at Oxford, hath been before declared.

Perhaps this might be alſo ſome piece of a cauſe, that the King conſidering and bearing in mind the old injuries done of the Lords and Barons to his Father King John before him, did bear ſome grudge therefore, or ſome privy hatred unto the Nobility, to revenge his Fathers quarrels but of things uncertain I have nothing certainly to affirm. This is certain by truth of Hiſtory, that the year next inſuing, which was 1260, thus writeth Nic. Triver: That the Kings Juſtices, called Itinerarii, being ſent thither to execute their office, were from thence repelled: the cauſe being alledged, for that they were againſt the King in proceeding and enterpriſing againſt the form of the proviſions enacted and ſtabliſhed a little before at the Town of Oxford.

{Anno 1260} ¶ In this year it pleaſed the King, after ſute to him made, to License an Univerſity or Academical School to be planted in the Town of Northampton; and of a ſpecial favour which he pretended to bear (and like enough did indeed) unto the Scholars that went there to ſeat themſelves, and to proſecute the exerciſes of Studies, wrote his Letters Mandatory unto the chief Officers and others of the ſaid Burrough in the ſaid Students behalf; the Tenor whereof followeth agreeing with the Record:

The Kings Letter to the Maior, Bailiffs, and others the Inhabitants of Northampton in the behalf of certain Scholars minded to plant themſelves there as in an Univerſity.

Turrh Lond. REX dilectis & fidelibus ſuis Majori, Ballivis, & cæteris probis hominibus ſuis de Northampton, ſalutem. Cum quidam Magiſtri & alii Scholares proponant, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

Touching a Univerſity for Scholars to be kept at Northampton.

The King to his beloved and truſty the Maior, Bailiffs, and other honeſt men his Subjects of Northampton, Greeting: Whereas certain Maſters and other Scholars do purpoſe to tarry in your Town Corporate, there to exerciſe Scholary-Diſcipline, as we hear: We hereupon regarding the Service of God, and the great profit of our Kingdom, taking in good part the coming thither of the ſaid Scholars, and liking well their abode there, do Will and Grant that the ſaid Scholars in the ſaid Town Corporate, under our protection and defence, do ſafely and ſecurely abide, and there exerciſe and do ſuch things, as to ſuch Scholars ſhall belong. And therefore we command you and ſtraitly charge you, That when the ſaid Scholars ſhall come unto you, to tarry in your ſaid Corporate Town, you receive them courteouſly, and as becometh the ſtate of Scholars uſe them, not doing or ſuffering to be done unto them any impediment, moleſtation, or grievance. In Witneſs whereof we have cauſed theſe our Letters Patents to be made. Witneſs the King at Windſor the firſt day of February, in the Five and fortieth Year of his Reign.

Strangers having all the Wealth of the Realm under the King. Ex Gualt. Gisburn.

It befel moreover in the ſame year, above other times (as Gualter Heminford writeth) that a great number of Aliens, coming out of France and other Provinces, reſorted into England, and had here the doing of all principal matters of the Realm under the King. Unto whom the rewards and reliefs, and other emoluments of the Land did moſt chiefly redound: which thing to ſee, did not a little trouble and vex the Nobility and Baronage of England. Inſomuch that Simon Mountfort Earl of Leiceſter, offering to ſtand to death for the Liberties and Wealth of the Realm, conferred together with other Lords and Barons upon the matter, who, then coming unto the King after an humble ſort of petition, declared unto him how all the doings of his Realm, and his own Affairs, were altogether diſpoſed by the hands, and after the wills of ſtrangers, neither profitable unto him, nor to the Wealpublick: foraſmuch as his Treaſures being waſted and conſumed, he was in great debt, neither was able to ſatisfy the Proviſion of his own Houſe, but driven to Tally for his own Cates, to no ſmall diſhonor unto his own State. And now therefore, ſaid they, pleaſeth your Highneſs to be informed by our Advice, and to commit your Houſe to the Guiding and Government of your own Faithful and Natural Subjects, and we will take upon us to diſcharge your whole Debt within one year, of our own proper Goods and Revenues, ſo that we within five years may clear our ſelves again. Neither will we diminiſh your Family, but rather increaſe it with a much greater retinue; providing ſo for the ſaftety and ſeeing to the cuſtody of your Royal Perſon, as your Highneſs ſhall find and underſtand our diligence moſt truſty and faithful unto you in the end.

The King granteth to his Lords.

To theſe words ſo lovingly declared, ſo humbly pretended, ſo heartily and freely offered, the King as willingly condeſcended, Aſſigning unto them both Day and Place where to confer and to deliberate further upon the matter, which ſhould be at Oxford the fifteenth day after Eaſter.

A ſitting of the King and Lords at Oxford.

At which day and place all the States and Lords, with the Biſhops of the Realm, were Summoned to appear at the ſaid Town of Oxford, for the behalf of the King and the Realm convented together. Where firſt of the King himſelf, then of the Lords, an Oath was taken, That what Decrees or Laws in the ſaid Aſſembly ſhould be provided to the profit of the King and of the Realm, the ſame Univerſally ſhould be kept and obſerved to the honour of God, and utility of his Church, and Wealth of the Realm. Beſides theſe Lords and the King, were alſo nine Biſhops, which ſwearing unto the ſame, did Excommunicate all ſuch as ſhould gainſtand the ſaid Proviſions there made; the King holding a burning Taper in his hand, and the Lords openly proteſting to riſe with all their force againſt all them that ſhall ſtand againſt the ſame.

The Proviſions or Laws made at Oxford.

The King ſweareth unto the Proviſions made at Oxford.

There were at that preſent in the Realm four Brethren of the Kings (moſt part of them by the Mothers ſide) which would in no caſe agree hereunto, but in anger departed privily unto Wincheſter. The Nobles hearing thereof, in all ſpeedy wiſe purſued them, fearing leſt they ſhould take the City of Wincheſter, and forceably keep the ſame. Wherefore the Lords preventing their purpoſe, and ſeeing them ſtifly to perſiſt in their ſtubborn Sentence, wrought no other violence againſt them, but, returning to Oxford again, preſcribed to them theſe conditions, That they departing the Realm ſhould repair to their own Lands and Poſſeſſions, which they had beyond the Sea: and that forthwith they ſhould put this Injunction in execution. Notwithſtanding, that the King made for them great interceſſion, yet it took no place. And becauſe this ſhould ſeem to proceed of no ſpecial diſpleaſure againſt them, they Enacted moreover, That all ſtrangers and Aliens, of what ſtate or condition ſoever, ſhould forthwith avoid the Realm on pain of death. Divers other proviſions the ſame time were ordained and ſtabliſhed; That if any did hold of the King in whole or in part, and ſhould chance to depart (his Heir being under age) the Wardſhip of him ſhould belong to the King, as hath partly before been ſpecified.

The Kings Brethren againſt the Proviſions at Oxford.

The Proviſions of Oxford.

Ex Hiſt. Guali. Giſburnenſis.

Moreover, it was there Decreed, That the Wool of England ſhould be wrought only within the Realm, neither ſhould it be Tranſported out to ſtrangers.

God grant this Lawe might take place again. God grant the like Lawe again for the Wealth of the Realm.

Item, That no man ſhould wear any Cloth, but which was wrought and made only within the Realm.

Item, That Garments too ſumptuous ſhould not be brought in nor worn.

Item, That all exceſſive and prodigal Expences, waſted upon pleaſure and ſuperfluity, ſhould be eſchewed of all perſons.

Many other Laws and Decrees (ſaith the Author) in this Aſſembly were ordained, wherein they continued the ſpace of fifteen days, and many of them were Impoyſoned, of whom was the Abbot of Weſtminſter, a man in that order much commended. Alſo William Brother to the Earl of Gloceſter: alſo the Earl himſelf, being Impoyſoned, hardly eſcaped with life, his Hair and Nails falling off his Body, whereof the Author not long after was taken, and dilly executed at Wincheſter. In the mean time, the Nobles conſidering thoſe dangers and jeopardies, were conſtrained to break off for that time, appointing the fourteenth day of October next following to convent together at London with Weapon and Harneſs, to proſecute and

The King repenteth of his Oath.

After the Promulgation whereof many things therein diſpleaſed the King, and it began to repent him of his Oath. But becauſe he could not at that preſent otherwiſe chuſe, he diſſembled for a ſeaſon. Thus time paſſing on, Anno 1261. within a year following, which was in the year of our Lord, 1261, the King ſeeing himſelf more and more to grow in Debt, and not to be relieved according to promiſe made, but eſpecially being egged (as may be thought) by his Brethren; taking it to ſtomach, ſent up to the Pope, both for him and his Son Edward to be releaſed of their Oath made before at Oxford. The benefit of which Abſolution being eaſily obtained (or rather bought at the Popes hand) the King ſtepping back from all that was before concluded, calleth another Parliament at Oxford: where he before the Lords and Nobles declared, How in the late Council of Oxford they had agreed among themſelves for the common Utility of the Realm and of the King, as they pretended, for the increaſing of his Treaſure, and his Debt to be diminiſhed: And thereupon bound themſelves with an Oath, cauſing alſo himſelf and his Son Edward to be bound unto the ſame. But now by experience proving and trying the matter to be otherwiſe than their promiſe was; and that they, contrary to their Covenant made, ſought not ſo much the profit of him and of the Realm, as their own, taking him not as their Lord, but going about to bring him under their ſubjection as an underling; and for that moreover his Treaſure greatly decreaſing, his Debts increaſed, and his Princely liberality was cut ſhort and troden under foot: they ſhould not marvel therefore, if he henceforth would be no more ruled by their counſel, but would provide himſelf of ſome other remedy, ſuch as he might. And moreover, as touching the Oath wherewith he and his Son ſtood bound unto them, he had ſent already to Rome, and had obtained Abſolution and Diſpenſation of the ſame, both for him, and his Son Edward alſo, and for all others that would take his part. And therefore he required of them to be reſtored again to that ſtate and condition he had injoyed in times paſt.

The King ſueth to the Pope to releaſe him of his Oath.

The Popes Abſolution abuſed.

The anſwer of the Nobles again to the King.

To this again gave anſwer the ſtate of Nobility on the other ſide, being in the ſame place preſent; in the number of whom was Simon Mountfort Earl of Leiceſter, Richard Clare Earl of Gloceſter, Humfry Ronne Earl Ferrence, with a great number of Barons, as Lord John Fitz-John, Lord Haſtings, Lord Geffery Lucy, Lord John Veſcy, Lord William Segrave, Hugh Spencer, Lord Robert Veſpoint, with divers and many more; whoſe anſwer to the King again was this: That the Proviſions made at the Council at Oxford (whereunto they were ſworn) they would hold, defend and maintain to their lives end: forſomuch as they did ſound, and alſo were agreed upon, both to the honour of God, to the profit of the Prince, and ſtable Wealth of the Realm, &c. And thus parts on both ſides diſcording amongſt themſelves, they would ſo have departed, had not certain of the Biſhops, coming between both, laboured between them to take up the matter. By whoſe means (ſaith Gualter Guisburn) and procurement, the determination of the cauſe was brought in compromiſe, and referred to Ludovick the French King to judge betwixt them, who hearing both the Allegations (ſaith he), like no equal Judge, but a partial Friend, inclined wholly and fully to the Kings Sentence, and condemned the Nobles. But the Author of Flores Hiſtoriarum ſaith, that by the Mediation of diſcreet men, two were choſen, one for one ſide, the other for the other, to whom the third alſo was annexed, who hearing as well what was brought of the Kings part, as alſo what was anſwered of the other ſhould define between them both, and ſo peace was between them concluded till the coming of Edward. All this while, as yet the Popes Abſolution for the King, although it was granted and obtained at Rome, yet was it not brought down in ſolemn writing, neither was Prince Edward as yet returned out of France into England.

The controverſy between the King and the Nobles; or in compromiſe.

The Pope releaſeth the King of his Oath.

At length, the writing of the Kings Abſolution being brought from Rome, the King eftſoons commanded the ſame to be publiſhed throughout the Realm, and ſendeth to the French King and other ſtrangers for help; moreover he ſeizeth all his Caſtles into his own hand, rejecting the Counſel of the Lords, to whoſe cuſtody they where before committed; alſo removing the former Officers, as Juſtices, and the Chancellor, with others placed afore by the Lords, he appointed new in their ſtead.

To this foreſaid Abſolution procured from Rome for the King and his Son, Edward returning out of France, at that time did not give his conſent, but held with the Lords. Who then putting themſelves in Arms, with a great power repaired up to London, keeping there in the Suburbs and places about; while the King kept within the Tower, cauſing the City Gates to be watched and lockt, and all within the ſaid City being above the age of twelve years, to be ſworn unto him. But at length, through the means of certain coming between, this tumultuous perturbation was ſomewhat appeaſed, at leaſt ſome hope of Peace appeared; ſo that the matter was taken up for that time without War or Bloodſhed. Notwithſtanding, ſome falſe pretenced diſſemblers there were, which ſecretly diſcloſing all the Counſels and doings of the Lords unto the King, did all they could to hinder Concord, and to kindle debate. By the means of whom the purpoſe of the Lords came not to ſo good effect, as otherwiſe it might. Ex. Flor. Hiſt.

Wicked make-bates.

¶ In this year the Archbiſhop of C[illegible] Suffragans (after their wonted manner) ſtanding againſt the King, had made their Appeal to Rome: whereupon the King was fain to Anſwer by Proxy, as appeareth by this brief Note drawn out of Record: Rex conſtituit Johannem Hemingford Procuratorem ſuum in Cauſa Appellationis, &c. The King hath appointed and made John Hemingford his Proctor in a Cauſe of Appeal which is moved in the Court of Rome, between the King on the one part, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with his Suffragans on the other part, about certain Ordinances, Conſtitutions and Decrees lately in a Council Provincial at London by them publiſhed, to the prejudice of the Kings Right, his Dignity Royal, the Liberties, Laws and Cuſtoms of his Kingdom.

Ordinances in a provincial Council at London againſt the Kings right.

This matter no doubt was laboured very diligently by the ſaid John Hemingford, who was to that end Authorized by the King to make his abode at Rome, during the time that any manner of proceſs was held and maintained againſt him, to the impeaching of his Royalty. Whereof the King had a ſpecial regard, perceiving the waiwardneſs of his own Clergy, or rather rebelliouſneſs in daring to Decree and Ordain Laws againſt him. And therefore he was the more careful to have all matters depending in the Court of Rome concerning him and his to be earneſtly followed. Inſomuch as he joyned to the foreſaid Hemingford, in the charge of procuration, one Roger Lovel; unto which two, reſiding at Rome, the King ſent his Letters, charging them ſo to manage his Affairs, as that nothing might paſs to the derogation of his Royal Title, the Copy of the ſaid Letter followeth agreeing with the Prototypon or Original.

Biſhops going about to recover Benefices appropriate from religious Houſes. Ex Flor. ib.

In this preſent year alſo (as affirmeth the forenamed Author) it was rumored abroad (as Flores hiſtoriarum reporteth) that all the Biſhops of England went about to recover again, out of the hands of religious Men, all ſuch Churches and Benefices, which were to them impropriated or appropriated: and that they, for the expedition of the ſame, had ſent up to Rome both Meſſengers and Mony, nothing miſdoubting to obtain their purpoſe. But as little good fruit in thoſe days uſed to ſpring out of that See, ſo I do not find that godly ſute and labour of the Biſhops to take any fruitful effect. The ſame year died Pope Alexander, after whom ſucceeded Pope Urban the fourth.

Pope Alexander dieth. Pope Urban

Anno 1262.

Of the which Pope Urban the King alſo obtained (or rather revived) a new releaſement from his Oath made to the Proviſions and Statutes of Oxford. Which being granted, he commandeth incontinently all the foreſaid Laws and Proviſions through England to be diſſolved and broken. This done, the King with the Queen taketh his Voyage into France, where he fell in great infirmity of ſickneſs and the moſt part of his Family was taken with the Fever Quartane, of which many died. In the number of whom, beſide others, died Richard the worthy Earl of Gloceſter and Hereford, after whom ſucceeded Gilbert Clare his Son.

A new releaſe of the Oath from Rome with this Epitaph: Hic pudor Hypoliti, Paridis gena, ſenſus Ulyſſis, Aſtus Pirrhi, Hectoris ira jacet.

The Welchmen rebel. The proviſions of Oxford again grafted by the King.

The Welchmen this year, breaking into the Borders of England, did much annoiance in the Lands of Roger Lord Mortimer, but mightily again by him were expelled, not without great ſlaughter of the Invaders. About which time, the King, through ſome diſcreet counſel about him, inclined to peace and concord with his Nobles, granting of his meer voluntary will the conſtitutions & proviſions of Oxford to take place in the Realm, directing his commandment to every ſhire. Albeit the Realm yet was not altogether pacified for all that.

The Kings Palace at Weſtminſter burnt with fire.

In the later end of this year, the Kings Palace at Weſtminſter was burnt, and for the moſt part was all conſumed with fire, which ſeemed to many an evil prognoſtication againſt the King. Ex Flor. Hiſt.

Uſury puniſhed for taking above two pence a Week in a pound.

In ſome Engliſh Chronicles it is alſo recorded, that the ſame year five hundred Jews at London were ſlain for taking Uſury more than two pence a Week for 20 ſhillings, being before forbidden by the King to take above that rate by the Week.

Anno 1263.

After this followeth the year 1263. in which the Barons of England, confederating themſelves together, for maintaining the Statutes and Laws of Oxford, and partly moved with old grudge conceived againſt the ſtrangers (maintained by the King and the Queen, and Edward their Son, in the Realm of England) joyned powers in all forcible wiſe, and firſt invaded the ſaid ſtrangers, namely, them which were about the King. Their Goods and Manors they waſted and ſpoiled, whether they were perſons Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal. Among whom, beſides others, was Peter a Burgundian (Biſhop of Hereford a rich Prelate) with all his Treaſure apprehended and ſpoiled: alſo his Countrymen, whom he had placed to be Canons of the ſame Church. With like order of handling other Aliens alſo, to whom was committed the cuſtody of divers Caſtles, as of Gloceſter, of Worceſter, of Bridgenorth, were ſpoiled, impriſoned, and ſent away. Briefly, whatſoever he was in all the Land that could not utter the Engliſh Tongue, was of every Raſcal diſdained, and happy if he might ſo eſcape. By reaſon whereof it ſo came to paſs, that a great number, as well of other foreigners, as eſpecially Religious Men, and rich Prieſts (which here had gathered much ſubſtance) were urged to that extremity, that they were glad to flee the Land. In the catalogue of whom was one moſt principal, named John Maunſel, a Prieſt notoriouſly grown in riches and treaſures not to be told, having in his hand ſo many and rich Benefices, that near no Biſhop of this Realm might compare with him in riches. Who notwithſtanding he kept with the King at London, yet was compelled privily to avoid the Realm, and was purſued by Henry the Son of Richard King of Almain. Certain other ſtrangers there were, to the number of 200 and more, which having the Caſtle of Windſor, there immured and intrenched themſelves, to whom at length, Prince Edward alſo adjoyned himſelf.

The Nobles riſing againſt the ſtrangers, having the commodity of the realm

Peter of Hereford a Burgundian, a rich Biſhop.

John Maunſel a rich Prieſt.

The King is gain agreeth with the Nobles.

In the mean time, while this ſtir was abroad, the King keeping then in the Tower, and ſeeing the greateſt part of his Nobles and Commons with the Londoners to be ſet againſt him, agreed to the peace of the Barons, and was contented to aſſent again to the ordinances and proviſions of Oxford; albeit the Queen, by all means poſſible, went about to perſwade the King not to aſſent thereto; who, as it ſeemed, was a great worker in kindling this fire of diſcord between the King and the Barons. Inſomuch, that when as the ſaid Queen Elenor ſhould paſs by Barge from the Tower to Windſor, the Londoners ſtanding upon the Bridge, with their exclamations, curſing and throwing of Stones and dirt at her, interrupted her courſe, cauſing her to return to the Tower again. Notwithſtanding, the peace yet continued with the Nobles and the King, the form whereof was this: Firſt, That Henry the Son of Richard King of the Romans ſhould be delivered by the King and Queen. Secondly, That the Caſtles again ſhould be committed to the cuſtody of Engliſhmen, not of Strangers. Thirdly, That the Proviſions and Statutes decreed at Oxford, ſhould as well by the King, as by all others inviolably be obſerved. Fourthly, That the Realm henceforth ſhould be ruled and governed not by foreigners, but by perſonages born within the Land. Fifthly, That all aliens and ſtrangers ſhould void the Land, not to return again; except only ſuch, whoſe abode ſhould by the common aſſent of the Kings truſty Subjects be admitted and allowed.

The Queen a great cauſe of this debate.

The form of peace concluded between the King and the Nobles.

Thus the King and the Nobles joyning together after this form of peace above prefixed, although not fully with heart, as after appeared, put themſelves in Arms, with all their power to recover the Caſtle of Windſor out of the ſtrangers hands. But Edward, in the mid-way between London and the Caſtle, meeting with his Father and the Barons, entred communication upon the matter. Which being finiſhed, and he thinking to return into the Caſtle again; by the policy of the Earl of Leiceſter, and William Biſhop of Worceſter, he was not permitted to re-enter. Whereupon the ſtrangers within the Hold (deſtitute of all hope to withſtand the great force approaching) rendred the Caſtle unto the King and the Barons upon this convention; That with Horſe and Harneſs they might be ſuffered ſafe to depart the Land, not to return any more. Which being granted, certain of the Barons conducted them in their journey towards the Sea ſide, and there they left them.

The Caſtle of Windſor recovered out of the hands of Strangers.

In the ſame year about the beginning of October, the King and Queen made over to France, with Simon Mountfort and other Nobles, to hear and ſtand to the arbitrement of Lewis the French King, concerning the controverſie between the States of England, and all through the procurement of Elenor the Queen. For ſhe, not forgetting the old contumely of the Londoners, exclaiming againſt her upon the Bridge, wrought always what revenge ſhe could againſt them. Concerning the arbitrement of this matter put to the French King, partly hath been ſaid before, and more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) hereafter. Some ſtories do add moreover, that the King continuing long in France, word was ſent to him out of England, That unleſs he returned again to the Realm, they would elect a new King. Whereupon the King, returning out of France to Dover, would have entred the Caſtle, but he was ſtopped. Wherefore the King, in fierce anger and great indignation, prepared his power towards London; where Simon Mountfort the worthy Earl of Leiceſter, through a ſubtil train, was almoſt betraied and circumvented in Southwark, by the ſudden purſuing of the Kings Army; had not the Londoner's with more ſpeed, breaking Bars and Chains made way to reſcue him, by the means of whom the Earl at that time eſcaped the danger.

Manet alta mente repoſtum judicium Paridis, &c. Virg.

Now to come to the Sentence of the French King. For ſomuch as the arbitrement of this matter was committed to him, as hath before been ſpecified; he in a great frequency both of French and Engliſh perſons about him, conſidering and poiſing the cauſe on both ſides, between the King and the Nobles, clearly and ſolemnly pronounced on the Kings ſide againſt the Barons, ordained that the King of

The ſentence of the French King thus awarded, as it gave to the King of England with his retinue no little incouragement, ſo it wrought in the Nobles hearts great indignation, which, notwithſtanding that partial decreement of the French King, ſped themſelves home out of France to defend themſelves with all their ſtrength and power. And not long after followeth alſo the King, by whoſe train Simon Mountfort Earl of Leiceſter (as is above recited) was well near circumvented in Southwark. Then the King calling his Council together at Oxford (from whence he excluded the Univerſity of Students for a ſeaſon, who were then at Northampton, as you heard before) there conſulted, conferring with his Friends and Counſellors, what way beſt to be taken. And hearing that the Barons were aſſembled in a great number at the Town of Northampton, he went thither with his Hoſt and with his Banners diſplaied, accompanied with Richard his Brother King of Almain, alſo with Edward his Son, John Comin of Scotland, with many other Scots, John of Dallilo Lord of Galoway, Robert of Bruſe, Lord Walter of Anand, Roger of Clifford, Philip of Marmion, John of Waus, Roger of Laiburne, Henry Percy, Philip Baſſet, Roger of Mortimer, and William of Walerce, and many others. Therefore the King commanded the Barons that were within, to yield unto him preſently the City and the Pledges, or elſe he would immediately deſtroy them. But they counſelling with the younger Simon De Monte forti, which by his Fathers commandment had got the reſidue thither to take counſel together (for his Father and the Earl of Gloceſter were not yet come) boldly and with one mind anſwered, That they would not obey the Kings will, but would rather defend themſelves and the City, if need were, even to the death. Which the Noblemen of the Kings part hearing, ſent word again, that at leaſt they ſhould come to the Wall of the City to ſpeak to the King, if by any means peace might be made. And they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed their counſel, and leaving their Holds, came to the Wall towards the Meadow, for there lay the King and his ſtrong Hoſt hard by. But in the mean ſpace, whilſt divers matters were reaſoned and intreated of between the King and the Lords, the Lord Philip Baſſet (which before was appointed to work that feat) with Mattocks and other inſtruments of Iron and Men prepared for the once, near to the Monaſtery of S. Andrew, did undermine the Wall of the City; and by this means the Wall fell down lightly, and there was made a great Plain, ſo that in one forefront there might have gone together on a row forty Horſemen. And of this ſubtilty the alien Monks that were there, were thought to be the workers, becauſe they made way and entrance for them that came in. But when they that paſſed by ſaw this, and the Kings Banners were erected ready to enter in, there was a great howling made, and the noiſe of the People came to the ears of the Barons, and they made ſpeed to reſiſt them; but it was all in vain, becauſe they were already prevented of a great company of their enemies. But Simon Mountfort the younger, after he had valiantly fought a while in the midſt of his enemies, with Peter Mountfort, and a few that were with him, when Edward the Kings Son came, was by his commandment taken and led away Priſoner. But the Clerks of the Univerſity of Oxford (which Univerſity by the Barons commandment was tranſlated thither) did work againſt the Kings Men more hurt than the other Barons, with their Slings, long Bows and croſs Bows; for they had a Banner by themſelves, and that was ſet up on high againſt the King. Wherewithal the King being greatly moved, ſware at his entring in, that they ſhould all be hanged. Which when they heard, many of them ſhaved their Crowns, and they that were able ran away as faſt as they could. And when the King entred the City many fled in their Armor into the Caſtle, others left their Horſe and Harneſs, and ran into Churches, and a few were ſlain, and thoſe were of the common people; but there was not much bloodſhed, becauſe all things were done as upon the ſudden. When the City was at length ſet in quiet, the King commanded his Oath to be executed upon the Clerks. But his Counſellors ſaid unto him, This be far from thee O King, for the Sons of thy Nobles, and of other great men of thy Kingdom were there gathered together into the Univerſity; whom if thou wouldſt cauſe to be hanged or ſlain, even they that now take thy part would riſe up againſt thee, not ſuffering, to the uttermoſt of their powers, the blood of their Sons and Kinſfolks to be ſhed. And ſo the King was pacified, and his wrath againſt the Clerks was ſtaid.

Univerſity of Oxford removed for a time to Northampton.

The Students of Oxford ſpared.

In the ſame day, after little more than an hour, the Kings Hoſt aſſaulted the Caſtle, and the new Hold-keepers were afraid, for that they had not Victuals and other things neceſſary for their reſiſtance; therefore they ſent immediately meſſengers unto the King, and yielded themſelves to the Kings mercy. There were taken that day theſe Knights and Barons under written; Lord William de Ferrers, Lord Peter Mountfort, companion of the ſaid Simon de Mountfort the younger, Lord Baldwin de Wake, Lord Adam de Newmarch, Lord Roger Bertram, Lord Simon the Son of Simon a valiant Warrior, which firſt erected his Banner againſt the King, Lord Berengarius de Watervile, Lord Hugo Gubium, Lord Thomas Maunſel, Lord Roger Botemlam, Nicholas Wake, Lord Robert de Newton, Lord Philip de Driby, and Grimbald de Paſſence. And theſe aforehand did the King take Priſoners, and many more, of whom he committed ſome to the Lord Nicholas of Haverſam, to be kept in the ſame Caſtle well defended: ſome he led away with him; and ſome he ſent to divers Caſtles, and appointed Simon Mountfort to be caſt into Windſor Caſtle. And all theſe things, as touching the taking of Northampton, were done on the Sabbath day in Paſſion Week, being the third of April, in the year of our Lord 1264: and the King went forward even to Nottingham, burning and waſting the Manors of the Lords and Others his enemies, and there he gathered together his Nobles and greatly increaſed his number.

The Lords taken at Northampton.

When this ill luck was told, of them that there were run away, to the Earl Simon, which was coming towards Northampton with a great Hoſt, he was in a great rage, and yet was not diſcouraged: but immediately going to London, he cauſed a Chariot to be made after the manner of Litters or Coaches, wherein he might ride as though he were ſick; for he feigned himſelf to be feeble and weak, whereas he was indeed a ſtout and valiant Warriour, and there gathered to him other Noblemen that were confederate with him, Earls and Barons, every one bringing with them their ſeveral Arms; and preparing their Engines of Wood, they went to beſiege Rocheſter; for the Earl of Worceſter in the Kings behalf, kept both the Town and Caſtle. When they had gotten the firſt Gate and the Bridge, they were partly wounded and compelled to retire, and there that valiant Knight Roger de la Bourn was wounded, and very ill handled. And whilſt they continue Siege there a while, it was told them that the King was coming towards London, with a mighty Hoſt. And they ſaid one to another, If the King at his coming ſhould take London, we ſhall be ſhut in as it were in a ſtrait corner; let us therefore return unto London, that we may keep in ſafety both the place and the people. Therefore appointing certain perſons to keep the Siege, they returned to London. At the length when the King came, they went forth with the Citizens to meet him, not with Flowers and Palms in their hands, but with Swords and Spears. The King ſhunned them, and after he had the Caſtle of Kingſton, which was the Earl of Gloceſters, he went from thence to Rocheſter; where after he had killed a few, he brake the Siege, and from thence the King went to Tunbridge, and the Town and Caſtle now being given up to him, he took there the Counteſs of Gloceſter, and put her into an Abby, not to be kept in hold, but to go at liberty whither ſhe would. And he left for the cuſtody of the Caſtle and City a great part of his Hoſt, to the number of above twenty picked out Enſigns, for that it was commonly ſaid that the Earl of Gloceſter would come out of hand to aſſault them. Which being done, he continued on his journey to Wincheſter, where he received to peace the Seamen of the Haven Towns. And three days after upon the Sunday following, he came to the Town of Lewis, and was received into the Abby, and his Son Edward into the Caſtle. Then the Barons ſent Letters to the King the twelfth day of May, the tenor whereof followeth.

KING Hen. 3

The Letter of the Lords to the King.

TO their moſt excellent Lord Henry, by the Grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitain, his Barons and others his faithful Subjects, being willing to keep their Oath and Fidelity to God and him, ſend greeting and due obedience with honour and reverence. Whereas by many experiments it is manifeſt, that ſome of Your Graces aſſiſtants have reported to Your Majeſty many lies of us, working miſchief, as much as in them lieth not only againſt us, but againſt you alſo, and your whole Realm: Be it known to Your Highneſs, that we have been always willing to defend the health and ſafeguard of Your Perſon, with all our power and Fealty due to Your Grace, purpoſing to vex to the uttermoſt of our power and eſtate not only our ill willers, but alſo your enemies, and the enemies of Your whole Realm. If it be Your good pleaſure, give no credit to them, we ſhall be always found Your faithful Subjects. And we the Earl of Leiceſter, and Gilbert of Clare, at the requeſt of others, for us and them have put to our Seals.

Theſe Letters being read and heard, there was a Council called, and the King writ back to them, and ſpecially to the two Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, in manner and form following:

The anſwer of the King to the Lords.

HEnry by the Grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Aquitain, &c. To Simon Mountfort, and Gilbert de Clare, and their Confederates. Forſomuch as by the War, and general diſquietneſs by your means raiſed up in Our whole Realm, and alſo the burnings and other hurtful enormities, it appeareth manifeſtly, that you keep not your fidelity to Us-ward, nor care any thing for Our health or ſafety; and for that ye have unorderly grieved Our Nobles, and others Our faithful Subjects ſticking faithfully and conſtantly to Us (as you have certified Us) We accounting their loſſes as Our own, and their enemies as Ours; and ſeeing theſe My aforeſaid faithful Subjects, for the keeping of their fidelity, do aſſiſt Us manfully and faithfully againſt your unfaithfulneſs: We therefore care not for your fidelity or love, but deſie you as our and their enemies, Witneſs My Self at Lewis the day and year aforeſaid.

Alſo Richard King of Almain, and Lord Edward the Son of King Henry writ to the Barons in this wiſe:

The Letter of Richard King of Almain and Prince Edward to the Barons.

Richard by the Grace of God, King of the Romans, always Auguſtus, and Edward eldeſt Son of the King of England, and all the other Barons and Nobles conſtantly and faithfully in heart and deed cleaving to the foreſaid King of England, To Simon Mountfort and Gilbert de Clare, and to all and ſingular others their adherents in their conſpiracy. By your Letters which you ſent to our Lord the Noble King of England, we have underſtanding that you deſie us, although before any ſuch word, your defiance towards us was apparent enough by your cruel perſecution in burning our poſſeſſions and ſpoiling our goods. We therefore give you to wit, that we all and every one of us, as your enemies, do deſie you all as our open enemies. And further, that we will not ceaſe, whereſoever it ſhall lie in our power, to the uttermoſt of our force and might, to ſubvert your perſons and all that you have. As touching that you lay to our charge, that we give neither faithful nor good counſel to our Lord the King, you ſay not the truth. And if your Lord Simon Mountfort or Gilbert de Clare, will affirm the ſame in our Lord the Kings Court, we are ready to get ſafe conduct for you to come to the ſaid Court, to try and declare the truth of our innocency, and the falſhood of you both, as forſworn Traitors, by ſome Man equal with you in Nobility and Stock. All we are contained with the Seals of the foreſaid Lords, the Lord Richard and the Lord Edward. Dated the day aforeſaid.

The Battel at Lewis, betwixt the King and the Barons beginneth.

Both which Letters being read, they drew near to the King; for they were not far diſtant from the place which is called Lewis. And for that there wanted to the Kings ſtore proviſion for their Horſes, it was commanded them, on Tueſday to go forth to ſeek for Hay and Provender: which when they were gone forth, were prevented of their enemies, and moſt of them killed; but the reſidue returning ſaw their enemies coming very early on the Wedneſday Morning, and making out-cries, ſtirred up the King and his Hoſt to arm themſelves. Then the Barons, coming to the full Plain, deſcended there, and girding and trimming their Horſes, made fit their Harneſs to them. And there the Earl Simon made the Earl of Gloceſter, and Robert de Veere, and many other new Knights. Which being done, he divided and diſtinguiſhed his Hoſt into four ſeveral Battels, and he appointed Noblemen to guid and govern every Battel. And over the firſt Battel were ordained Captains, Henry Mountfort the Eldeſt Son of the Earl Simon, and Guido his Brother, Lord John de Bruch the younger, and Lord Humfrey de Bohun. Over the ſecond Battel, Lord Gilbert Clare Earl of Gloceſter, Lord John the Son of Lord S. John, and Lord William of Mountcherſie. And over the third, in which the Londoners were, at their requeſt, the Lord Nicholas Segrave was aſſigned: which required alſo very inſtantly, that they might have the firſt ſtroke in the Battel, at the adventure, come what come would. But over the fourth Battel, the Earl himſelf was Captain, with the Lord Thomas of Pinelſton. In the mean ſeaſon, came forth the Kings Hoſt, preparing themſelves to the Field in three Battels, of which Edward the Kings Son led the firſt, with the Earl of Warwick, and Valence the Kings Brother, and the ſecond the King of Almain guided, with his Son Henry; but the King with his Nobles guided the third; and the fourth Legion the King appointed not, by reaſon he had left many of his chief Soldiers behind him to keep the Caſtle and Town of Tunbridge againſt the Earl of Gloceſter. And the moſt part of the Kings Army were but young Men, for the King thought not that his Barons had been come ſo nigh hand. Their Armies being on both ſides ſet in aray and order, they exhorted one another on either party to fight valiantly: and after they buckled together, the Battel was great, and many Horſemen were overthrown even in a moment. But by and by Edward the Kings Son with his Band, as a fierce young Gentleman and valiant Knight, fell upon his enemies with ſuch force, that he compelled them to recoil back a great way, ſo that the hindmoſt (thinking by reaſon of their giving back, that the foremoſt were ſlain) ran many of them away, and taking Water to paſs over, were almoſt threeſcore Soldiers drowned, and a few of them being ſlain, all the reſt fled. Straitway the Londoners which had asked the firſt fight, knowing not how the Battel went, took their Heels: whom Edward purſued with his Band, killing the hindmoſt of them the ſpace of two or three Miles; for he hated them becauſe they had rebelled againſt his Father, and diſgraced his Mother when ſhe was carried by Barge upon the Thames, from the Tower to Windſor, as is before touched.

Whilſt that Prince Edward was thus in the chaſe of the Londoners, who had the Vaward of the Barons Battel; in the mean time, the main Battel of the Barons ſet upon the Kings main Battel, of the which the King of Almain the Brother of King Henry had the leading, which being ſoon diſcomfited, and he with his Son Henry and Robert de Brus, John Coven, with divers other Captains taken Priſoners, the rereward wherein the King himſelf fought, being immediately ſo hardly beſet, and he ſeeing his Knights and Soldiers on every ſide about him beaten down and ſlain, and divers others of his Soldiers to forſake the field and ſhift for themſelves, thought good to take again the Town, and ſo retired into the Abby from whence he came, ſhutting and rampering up the Gates, and cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly warded with Soldiers. To be brief, the Barons thus getting the field, after long fight, and many Men on either ſide ſlain, entred alſo the Town of Lewis, purſuing in chaſe ſuch Soldiers as thither fled for ſuccour.

Richard K. of Almain with his ſon taken Priſoners.

The Kings main Battel at Lewis diſcomfited and the K. fain to take the Abby.

In the mean time, Prince Edward returning from the chaſe of the Londoners, as ye heard, who deſired to give the firſt on-ſet, and eſpying the Chariot of the Earl Simon (which he cauſed purpoſely to be made for him) and the Horſes in the ſame, without either Waggoner, or any other to govern the ſame, fell immediately upon the Chariot, and brake it all in pieces, and ſlew two Burgeſſes that were within the ſame. But when he came nearer to the place where the bloudy Battel had been fought, and ſaw the great diſcomfiture and overthrow, which in his abſence, with great mortality and ſlaughter had happened, his heart was much diſmaied, and his countenance altered. Yet notwithſtanding, comforting and encouraging his Knights and Soldiers, of whom he had a valiant company, in Battel-aray he marched toward the Town; againſt whom came the Barons again with all their power. And thus was begun betwixt them a freſh Field and new Battel, and many Men ſlain on either ſide. But at length the Earl de Warenia, with the Kings two Brethren, forſook the Field and fled: after whom went more than ſeven hundred choſen Soldiers, which were of their Houſe and Family, who the ſame day came to Pevenſie, and there took ſhipping over the Sea. Alſo Hugh Bigot with divers others fled, and left the valiant Prince fighting in the field: which thing he alſo perceiving took the Town. And when he found not the King his Father at the Caſtle, he went from thence to the Abby where he was. In the mean ſeaſon, the Town was divided in parts, ſome fighting, ſome ſpoiling, ſome getting of booties, neither could ſcarcely one of them know and diſcern another, whether he was his friend or enemy. But when within a while the Barons had aſſembled ſome company, they gave an aſſault upon the Caſtle, thinking to have reſcued John Gifford and others, whom the Kings Soldiers had taken Priſoners, and put therein. But the Soldiers within manfully defended the ſame, and in throwing out Balls of Wild-fire, as for the defence thereof they had, they alſo fired part of the Town. Then the Barons retired and left the Caſtle, and purpoſed to have ſet upon the Abby where the King and Prince Edward his Son was, which alſo was ſet on fire by the aſſault given to the Caſtle; but yet it was ſhortly recovered and quenched. Then Edward the Kings Son, perceiving the bold enterpriſe of the Barons, prepared with couragious Knights and Soldiers, as were yet remaining and within the Abby, to have iſſued out, and to have given a new charge upon them. But the Barons, perceiving that, ſent unto the King meſſengers to intreat a truce for that day, and on the morrow to talk and conclude of a further peace between them. This Battel was fought upon the nineteenth day of May, being the year of our Lord 1264.

Prince Edward returning from the firſt chaſe, findeth all together loſt.

The Prince fighteth a new Battel.

Prince Edward alſo put to the worſt, and fain to take the Town.

The Caſtle of Lewis beſieged.

The next day, which was Thurſday, there were ſent on either ſide two preaching Friers between the King and the Barons, with certain Articles and demands of Peace, ſo that with certain others, theſe conditions were agreed on: that on the morrow being Friday, the Prince ſhould give himſelf in Hoſtage for the King his Father, and others of his part: And Henry the Kings Son of Almain alſo ſhould give himſelf the like for his Father. That thoſe things which ſhould be concluded upon for the benefit and commodity of the Realm, and peaceable quietneſs thereof might be performed, and that all ſuch Priſoners as were taken on either ſide, ſhould be freely ranſomed and ſent home.

A peace intreated between the King and the Barons.

The two Princes given in Hoſtage.

The next day which was Saturday, the King diſcharged all his Soldiers, and others that were with him in the Abby, licenſing them to depart whither they liſted. And furthermore, by the advice of his Son and the Barons, he gave commandment to thoſe which he had appointed to the keeping of Tunbridge, that they ſhould make no attempt to the prejudice or hurt of the Barons; but in hope of the peace which was now at the point to be concluded, they ſhould alſo depart every Man to their houſes and habitations. But they giving no credit thereunto, went with their furniture to Briſtow, where they kept themſelves in Gariſon, until the eſcaping of Edward the Kings Son out of Priſon. But firſt before that, when they heard at Tunbridge, that the King was vanquiſhed in Battel, and that the Londoners in the foreward were put to flight by Prince Edward (by a Meſſenger that eſcaped from the ſame) and that alſo the ſame Londoners were at Crowdown, they ſet upon them in the evening tide, and taking from them much ſpoil, ſlew alſo many of them.

The Kings Soldiers in Tunbridge, after they had ſpoiled the Londoners at Crowdown, kept themſelves in Gariſon at Briſtow.

But when Roger Mortimer's part began to decreaſe, and Simon the Earls part on the other ſide to increaſe, he bare himſelf more ſtout, for that both the King and all that was his, did depend upon the good will and favour of the Earl, and led with him the Kings Son to ſuch Holds and Caſtles, as he thought to be moſt ſtrong; as though all were in his hands to do as him liked; and he kept the Hoſtages more ſtraitly than he was wont to do. Inſomuch that when it was blown abroad that the Kings Son was kept as Priſoner, divers that were his friends, counſelled him, that he ſhould deſire to diſport himſelf at the Barriers, that the people might have a ſight of him. But he, being narrowly guarded as he knew, and fearing ſome tumult to ariſe, thought good to refuſe their counſel, and ſo did.

Earl Simon after this Victory, boaſteth himſelf ſo ſtout, that he impriſoneth the Hoſtages of the King.

{KING Hen. 3}

In this troubleſome year, which was Anno 1264, as the Londoners with the Nobles were thus occupied in War and Diſſention, the malignant Jews, thinking to take vantage of that time, with privy Treaſon conſpired againſt the whole City and ſtate of the Nobles; who being taken with the manner, were almoſt all ſlain that dwelt in the City of London.

¶ In this year alſo Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury the Son of Peter Earl of Savoy, and a ſtranger, having been certain years beyond the Seas in diſgrace with the King of England, upon occaſion of ſome miſdemeanor belike (for he was, as Matthew Parker writeth of him, Ut moribus geſtiſque peregrinus, ſic nomine ipſo & appellatione cæteris Archiepiſcopis diſſimilis) the King being of a relenting nature, and bearing much with Clergy-mens inſolencies (which for a while he might perhaps gainſtand, but at laſt bare with them as ſupported by the Court of Rome) did conſult with his Nobles about the return of the ſaid Boniface into England, conditionally as followeth.

Acts paſſed in the Kings Council, touching the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's return into England, under certain conditions.

ANNO Domini 1264. Menſe Martio, in præſentia illuſtris Regis Angliæ, de conſilio Procerum & Magnatum ejuſdem Regni actum eſt, quod venerabilis Pater Bonifacius Dei gratia Cantuarienſis Archiepiſcopus, totius Angliæ Primas, in Angliam revertatur, ſub conditionibus infra ſcriptis, in Regno pacifice moraturus. In primis igitur, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

In the year of our Lord 1264. in the Month of March, it was Enacted in the Preſence of the renowned King of England, by the counſel of the Peers and States of the ſaid Realm, that the Revered Father Boniface, by the Grace of God Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England ſhould return into England, and abide in the Realm peaceably, upon the Conditions under-written.

Firſt, Therefore it is Enacted, that the Archbiſhop at his return, do without any difficulty releaſe in form of Law his Sentences of Excommunication, publiſhed againſt all perſons whatſoever, occaſioning much trouble in the Realm of England; but yet ſo, that they, which ſhall be found excommunicate, be ready to make ſatisfaction for their exceſſes and defaults, and for the ſame receive, as they are bound by the Canonical Commandments of the Archbiſhop, in form hereunder in the next Article contained.

Secondly, It is Enacted, That in making amends for defaults done to the Churches and Churchmen, within ſuch places as are immediately ſubject unto his Juriſdiction, the Archbiſhop may arbitrate according to the Counſel of all his Suffragans, or the greater and ſounder part; and of weighty affairs belonging to the Church and Realm of England, may in time to come after his return, order and diſpoſe likewiſe by their counſel, and the counſel of other diſcreet Men of the Realm.

Thirdly, It is Enacted, that he bring with him Maſter Henry Mortimer Archdeacon of Canterbury, and Pont Sabler his familiar Clerks or houſhold Chaplains, and theſe Clerks only being ſtrangers born, he keep and retain of his Council and Houſhold.

Fourthly, It is Enacted, That other Clerks whereſoever, beneficed in the Church of England, meaning and willing to return with the Archbiſhop, may ſafely return and abide in their Benefices, and diſpend the Church goods within the Realm as they are bound, carrying or ſending

KING Hen. 3 ſending nothing out of the Realm, unleſs neceſſary occaſion, and allowed of the Kings Council do ſo require,

Fifthly, It is Enacted, That the Archbiſhop or the Clerks coming with him, ſhall bring nothing with them in Letters, Meſſage or Commandment, nor ſhall procure any thing elſe, during their abode in this Realm, either by themſelves, or by others, whereby any damage danger or prejudice may redound to the King, or to any of his Realm. And for memory of the premiſſes, the Seal of the ſaid renowned King of England is hanged unto theſe Preſents.

By the whole Council.

Notwithſtanding this concluſion, the Archbiſhop did not preſently return, but continued in Provence and elſewhere, behaving himſelf imperiouſly as a Prelate of the right Romiſh ſtamp. In the mean time many matters incident to this place, were omitted and neglected, which perſonally by him ſhould have been executed; but by reaſon of his abſence the ſame were diſpatched by deputation, and the ſame ordered likewiſe according to his own fancy, which he preferred before the Kings Authority and Commandment. This to be true, the Copy of a Letter deſcribing the contumacy of the ſaid Boniface doth ſufficiently teſtifie, the ſame being ſet down agreeable to the Prototypon.

A Letter of the King to Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, charging him to return into England, there perſonally to diſcharge his Archiepiſcopal Function.

REX Bonifacio Cantuarienſi Archiepiſcopo, totius Angliæ Primati, ſalutem. Licet hactenus per patientiam pluries ſuſtinuerimus electos in Epiſcopos, Abbates, ac Prælatos alios in regno noſtro, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

It the archbiſhop of Canterbury in foreign Countrys abiding?

The King to Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, greeting. Although hitherto by patience we have ſuffered oftentimes Biſhops elect, Abbots, and other Prelates in our Realm, for the benefit of their confirmation to be obtained, to paſs over beyond Sea unto you, we thought not to receive at your hands any ſuch reward, as that againſt the right and cuſtome of our Realm, to the which we mean not by this our patience that prejudice ſhall any way be procured or bred, you ſhould attempt this to be followed. We do marvel therefore, and are moved that you, at the requeſt of us, have refuſed to commit the examination of the election of our wellbeloved in Chriſt, Maſter Walter Gifford late of Bath and Wells Biſhop Elect, and the confirmation of the ſame Election, unto ſome diſcreet perſons of our Realm, we having detained and as yet detaining the ſame Gifford againſt his will, that he might not repair perſonally unto you: whereunto common right and the very cuſtome of the Realm ought to have lead you unrequeſted, whilſt you abide out of the Realm. Leſt therefore our too much patience might breed in you a contempt, we will you to underſtand, that henceforward we mean to bear leſs with ſuch dealing, ſpecially in theſe days, wherein there is no ſafe paſſage for Engliſhmen unto you through the parts of France, as it is reported. Wherefore we thought good to deſire your fatherhood, and alſo to admoniſh you, giving you moreover in charge and commandment, and upon the Fealty wherein you are bound unto us firmly injoyning, that in reſpect of the foreſaid Election, and other Ceremonies, you come perſonally into England, to execute your office and charge, or ſend ſome other in your room; or at leaſt procure and cauſe ſome diſcreet perſons of our Realm, whom you ſhall repute more meet for this matter, to ſerve the turn for you in this behalf: leſt if with contumacy you refuſe to hear our requeſts and commandments the ſecond time, which you are by duty bound to obey, we be compelled to take indignation againſt you, as a contemner of the rights, liberties and the cuſtoms of our Kingdom, and ſo to proceed againſt you more ſharply by way of revenge: neither will we ſuffer, if you ſhould do otherwiſe, that the revenues of your ſaid Archbiſhoprick ſhall henceforth be conveyed unto you out of our Realm; but as you refuſe the burthen, ſo will we in like ſort do what we can to withdraw hereafter the profits and commodities from you during your abode out of our Land. Finally, we, if need ſhall be, are ready to give you a ſure and ſafe conduct. Witneſs the King at St. Pauls of London, the 25 of June, and the 48 year of our Reign.

Now after all this ado, we read that at laſt Boniface returned, and becoming more holy towards his end, he went with other Biſhops to the King, requeſting him, that being mindful of the decay of his Kingdom, by Eccleſiaſtical Livings beſtowed upon ſtrangers, he would hereafter prefer learned and godly men of his own Nation. To whom the King anſwered that he would willingly do it. Wherefore I think it meet that you, which are a ſtranger and unlearned, and alſo my Brother Ethelmer Biſhop of Wincheſter, whom I have preferred to ſuch dignities only for kindreds ſake, ſhould firſt give examples to others, and forſake your Churches, and I will provide other learned men to ſerve in them. Which anſwer of the King ſo pierced this Boniface, that he always after lived a wearieſome life in England. Wherefore perceiving himſelf to be miſliked of the King and the People, he deſired to return into his Country. And thereupon firſt ſelling and ſelling the Woods, letting out the Archbiſhoprick, taking great Fines of his Tenants, and making a great maſs of Mony of the Clergy of his Province, he went with the curſe of all Men unto Savoy, where in the Caſtle of S. Helens, after he had miſgoverned the See ſix and twenty years, ſix months, and ſixteen days from his Conſecration, being nine and twenty years from his firſt election, he died the fifteenth Kalends of Auguſt. And ſo ceaſed the troubles between the King and the ſaid Biſhop, whoſe contumacy in ſtories, with others of the like brood, doth largely appear in this Book.

Boniface his advice diſadvantageable to himſelf.

Boniface, maketh ſale of the Archbiſhoprick, he is hated, and dieth.

¶ But to leave Boniface now dead, note ye this, that in this year, after the death of Pope Urban, ſucceeded in the ſaid year of our Lord Anno 1265. Pope Clement the fourth; which Clement, as affirmeth Nic. Trivet, was firſt a Married Man, and had Wife and Children, and was the Solicitor and Counſellor to the French King; then after the death of his Wife, was Biſhop, intituled Podienſis; after that Archbiſhop of Narbon; and at laſt made Cardinal; who being ſent of Pope Urban in Legacy, for reformation of peace, in his abſence was elected Pope by the Cardinals. About this time flouriſhed Thomas of Aquine, Reader at Paris among the Dominick Friers, and Bonaventure among the Franciſcan Friers. Ex Nic. Trivet.

* Now after all the foreſaid tumults and broils of the King and his Barons, to the vexation of the whole Land, it was thought meet and neceſſary that all parties at variance ſhould be reconciled, Whereupon it was concluded amongſt them as followeth.

A form of Peace between the King and his Barons.

Tenth Leaſt

HÆc eſt forma pacis a Domino Rege, & Domino Edwardo filio ſuo, Prælatis & proceribus omnibus, & communitate tota Regni Angliæ communiter & concorditer approbata, &c.

In Engliſh thus:

'This is the form of peace allowed of the King our Lord, 'of the Lord Edward his Son, of all the Prelates and Peers, 'and the whole Commonalty of the Realm of England, 'with common conſent and agreement; to wit, that a 'certain Ordinance or Decree made in a Parliament holden 'at London about the Feaſt of the Nativity of St. John Bap'tiſt laſt paſt, for the maintaining and keeping of the peace 'of the Realm, ſhall continue all the days of the ſaid King 'our Sovereign Lord, and the time of the Lord Edward, 'after he ſhall be received as King, even till the end and 'term that ſhall be thought meet and convenient. The ſaid 'Ordinance or Decree is this:

'For the redreſſing of the ſtate of the Realm of Eng'land, let there be choſen or named three diſcreet and truſty

'perſons of the Realm, which may have authority and pow'er, from the Lord the King, to chuſe or name in the Kings
'behalf nine Counſellors: of which nine, three at leaſt by 'courſe or turns may always be preſent in the Court. And 'let the Lord the King, by the counſel of the ſaid nine,
'order and diſpoſe of the keeping of Caſtles, and the ma'naging of all the affairs in his Realm. Let the Lord the 'King alſo, by the advice of the foreſaid nine, appoint Ju-
'ſtices, Chancellors, Treaſurers, and other Officers, greater
'and leſſer in thoſe matters that pertain to government of 'his Court and Realm.

'The chooſers or namers ſhall ſwear firſt, that according 'to Conſcience they will chooſe or name ſuch Counſellors,
'as they verily believe will be profitable and truſty in reſpect
'of Gods honour, the Church, the Lord the King, and his 'Realm. The Counſellors likewiſe, and all the Officers
'greater and leſſer in their creation ſhall ſwear, that to the 'uttermoſt of their power they will faithfully execute their 'Offices to the honour of God and of the Church, and to
'the profit of the Lord the King and his Realm, without
'bribe or gift; meat and drink, which are commonly wont
'to be ſet upon the Table, excepted. And if ſo be that the 'foreſaid Counſellors, or ſome or any of them, in the charge
'to them committed (whether they be he or ſhe) have be'haved themſelves ill, or that upon ſome other occaſion ſuch
'officers are to be changed; the Lord the King, by the coun-
'ſel of the three former chooſers or namers, may remove ſuch
'as he ſhall ſee meet to be removed; and in their rooms
'by the ſame mens advice may appoint and place other
'perſons truſty and ſerviceable.

'And if ſo be that either the greater Officers or the leſſer
'do diſorderly demean themſelves in their Offices, the Lord
'the King, by the counſel of the foreſaid nine, may diſplace
'them, and without delay by the ſame advice ſet others in 'their room. And if ſo be that the three firſt or chief chu-
'ſers or namers, in the choiſe or naming of Counſellors, or
'perhaps the Counſellors in the creating of Officers, or in 'other affairs of the Lord the King and the Realm to be 'ordered or done, ſhall be at diſagreement, then whatſoever
'by conſent of two parts ſhall be concluded or decreed, let
'the ſame be firmly kept and obſerved; ſo that of thoſe
'two parts, one be a Prelate of the Church in the buſineſs
'belonging to the Church: And if it ſo happen, that two 'parts of the ſaid nine in ſome matter diſagree; then ſhall
'they for their variance ſtand to the ordinance of the three
'firſt chuſers or namers or the greater part of them.
'And if ſo be it ſeem expedient to all the Prelates and Ba'rons, by conſent that ſome or one in place of ſome or one 'of the three firſt namers be put and appointed: then let
'the Lord the King, by the counſel of all the Prelates and Ba'rons, ordain ſome others, or one other. And let the Lord
'the King do all the premiſſes by the advice of the ſaid nine
'in manner above mentioned, or let them do it in the Lord
'the Kings behalf, and by his authority by this preſent ordi'nance to continue and hold out till ſuch time as this agree'ment, made and afterwards ſealed by the parties, be perfect-
'ed by conſent, or ſome other proviſo be had, which the 'parties by conſent ſhall judge allowable.

'This Ordinance was made at London, by the conſent,
'will and commandment of the Lord the King, and alſo of
'the Prelates, Barons, with the Commonalty then and there
'preſent. In witneſs whereof R. Biſhop of Lincoln, and H.
'Biſhop of Ely, R. Earl of Norfolk and Marſhal of Eng-
'land, Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, Humfrey de Bohune,
'William de monte Caniſo, and the Maior of London, to
'this Writing have ſet their Seals. Acted in the Parlia'ment at London in the Month of June in the Year of our 'Lord 1264.

Reformation of the Church.

'It is alſo ordained, that the ſtate of the Engliſh Church
'ſhall be reformed into a ſtate meet and convenient.

No ſtrangers to be keepers of the Kings Caſtles, &c.

'It is alſo ordained, that the three chuſers aboveſaid and 'Counſellors, of whom mention is made in the ſaid Ordi'nance at London, and the keepers of Caſtles and others the 'Kings Bailiffs be homebred. And as for ſtrangers born, let 'them come, tarry and depart peaceably, as well lay-men
'willing to dwell upon their poſſeſſions, as Clergy-men re-
'ſiding upon their Benefices.

'Merchants alſo, and all others to further and ſee to their 'affairs ſhall come freely, and tarry peaceably; but yet con-
'ditionally, ſo they come without armor and a ſuſpected
'multitude. And that none of them be received in any ſort
'into any office or Bailiwike in the Realm, or otherwiſe
'into the Kings houſe and ſervice be entertained. As for 'the Charters of general Liberties and Foreſts granted un-
'to the homebred of late by the King, and the Statutes
'made upon revoking of grievances, which the Lord the 'King the third year paſt in every Shire by his Letters Pa-
'tents hath cauſed to be publiſhed, with the commend'able Cuſtomes of his Realm, and a long time allowed, let
'be for ever obſerved: and that it might be provided how
'they may be better and more ſoundly obſerved: It is alſo
'provided, that the Lord the King, and the Lord Edward,
'the Barons and thoſe that ſtand with them, let go all in'jury and rancour, ſo that they neither grieve, or ſuffer to
'be grieved by any of theirs, no one of them by occaſi-
'on of things done in the hurly-burly paſt; and alſo cauſe
'all their Bailiffs at the undertaking of their Bailiwikes,
'that they ſhall grieve none by the occaſion aforeſaid, but
'ſhall do juſtice and right to every body with equality.
'And let there be good ſecurity provided how all theſe
'things may be firmly obſerved.

¶ When this agreement was diſpatched, to ſet the Realm in ſome quietneſs, a little leiſure was allowed to look into the loſſes and damages of the Church, whereupon it was provided as followeth.

Of the repairing of Treſpaſſes committed againſt the Church.

IT is provided by common aſſent of the King, of the Prelates, Earls and Barons of the Land, that the treſpaſſes which are committed againſt the Church of England, by reaſon of the tumults and wars that have been in this Realm of England, ſhall be reformed and amended in this manner.

There ſhall be choſen by the Earls and great Eſtates of the Land, with the liking and aſſent of the Prelates, three Biſhops authorized, and having full power to eſtabliſh and provide for ſuch reaſonable amends, as are to be made for the foreſaid treſpaſs committed againſt holy Church, ſo far forth as ſhall be fit and convenient.

Thoſe that ſhall be found excommunicated, ſhall be abſolved in form of right by ſuch as have power and authority ſo to do.

The authority of the Prelates ſhall be eſtabliſhed in this manner: Firſt, it ſhall be faithfully undertaken by the Earls, Juſtices, and the other Lay-men of the Kings Council, and other great Barons of the Realm, that all thoſe things which the Prelates, that ſhall be choſen ſhall reaſonably ordain and appoint by way of reformatiou, they themſelves ſhall obſerve and fulfil, and ſhall do their indeavour faithfully to cauſe the ſame to be obſerved by others, and thereof they ſhall deliver their Letters Patents.

Moreover, unto the Prelates, after they ſhall be choſen, full power ſhall be granted by the King, and the Commonalty, the Earls, Barons, and great men of the Land, to ordain thoſe things which are needful and profitable to the full reformation of the eſtate of holy Church, to the honour due to the fealty of our Lord the King, and to the profit of the Realm. And that the promiſe made by the King, and by the Earls and Barons aforeſaid, and by the other great Men of the Land, may appear to be made in good faith, they ſhall thereof make their Letters Patents, to wit of things that have been done a year paſt before the laſt Eaſter.

If any be found that will not ſtand to the ordinance and appointment of the foreſaid Prelates in the cauſes aforeſaid, and according to the form aforeſaid, he ſhall be compelled thereunto by doom of holy Church; yea, if need be, he ſhall be thereunto forced by the Secular power. And that it may the better be done, the Juſtice ſhall have an hundred or more of choice men at Arms, or Serjeants, Soldiers elect, to diſtrain the Malefactors when by the ſaid Prelates he ſhall be required. Thoſe Soldiers to be ſuſtained of the common goods of holy Church, during the time they ſhall be imployed in that buſineſs. And this Ordinance ſhall continue for a year or two, till ſuch time as matters be quieted, and that the proviſions of the Prelates, and the peace of the Land be well obſerved.

Provided always, that the profits of Benefices of holy Church belonging to aliens, and others that have been enemies

{KING Hen. 3.} enemies to the land, ſhall be collected and ſafely kept in the hands of the Prelate, until ſuch time as order be taken by common advice what is to be done therewithal. And for the more aſſurance and further teſtimony hereof, the King and the High Eſtates of the Land have unto this writing ſet their Seals.

¶ Beſides all this it was conſidered, that Non-reſidency being a default blame-worthy, deſerved reformation. Whereof the King having ſpecial regard wrote his mind to the Biſhop of Hereford for the redreſs of the ſame; whoſe Letter, becauſe it is memorable, and convenient matter therein contained for Non-reſidents of our time, we have here intexted according to the Record.

A Letter of King Henry the Third directed to the Biſhop of Hereford concerning Non-reſidents.

REX Epiſcopo Hereford, ſalutem. Paſtores gregibus præponuntur ut diei noctiſque vigilias exercendo,

In Engliſh thus:

The King to the Biſhop of Hereford ſendeth Greeting: Paſtors or Shepherds are ſet over Flocks, that by exerciſing themſelves in watching over them day and night, they may know their own Cattel by their look, bring the hunger-ſtarved ſheep into the meadows of fruitfulneſs, and the ſtraying ones into one fold by the Word of Salvation, and the rod of correction; and to do their endeavour, that unity indiſſoluble may be kept. But ſome there be who damnably deſpiſing this Doctrine, and not knowing to diſcern their own cattel from others, do take away the milk and the wool, not caring how the Lords flock may be nouriſhed; they catch up the temporal goods, and who periſheth in their Pariſh with famiſhment, or miſcarrieth in manners, they regard not; which men deſerve not to be called Paſtors, but rather hirelings. And that even we in theſe days removing our ſelves into the Marches of Wales, to take order for the diſpoſing of the Garriſons of our Realm, have found this default in your Church of Hereford, we report it with grief; for that we have found there a Church deſtitute of a Paſtors comfort, as having neither Biſhop nor Official, Vicar nor Dean, that may exerciſe any Spiritual function and duty in the ſame. But the Church it ſelf, which in time paſt was wont to flow in delight, and had Canons that tended upon days and nights ſervice, and that ought to exerciſe the works of Charity, they forſaking the Church, and leading their lives in Countries far hence, hath put off her ſtole or robe of pleaſure, and fallen to the ground, bewailing the loſs of her widowhood, and there is none among all her friends and lovers that will comfort her. Verily whiles we beheld this, and conſidered it diligently, the prick of pity did move our bowels, and the ſword of compaſſion did inwardly wound our heart very ſore, that we could no longer diſſemble ſo great an injury done to our Mother the Church, nor paſs the ſame over uncorrected.

Non-reſidents ſtrictly charged to be perſonally incumbent and abiding upon their Cures: Note.

Wherefore we command and ſtraitly charge you, that all occaſions ſet aſide, you endeavour to remove your ſelves with all poſſible ſpeed unto your ſaid Church, and there perſonally to execute the Paſtoral charge committed unto you in the ſame. Otherwiſe we will you to know for certainty that if you have not a care to do this, we will wholly take into our own hands all the temporal goods, and whatſoever elſe doth belong unto the Barony of the ſame Church, which goods for Spiritual exerciſe ſake therein, it is certain our Progenitors of a godly devotion have beſtowed thereupon. And ſuch goods and duties as we have commanded hitherto to be gathered and ſafely kept and turned to the profit and commodity of the ſame Church, the cauſe now ceaſing we will ſeize upon; and ſuffer no longer that he ſhall reap temporal things, which feareth not unreverently to withdraw and keep back Spiritual things, whereunto by office and duty he is bound; or that he ſhall receive any profits which refuſeth to undergo and bear the burthens of the ſame. Witneſs the King at Hereford, the firſt of June, in the 48 year of our raign.

About this time (as appeareth by courſe of Record, and thereby may well be gathered) a redreſs of certain Sects was intended, among which one by name eſpecially occureth, and called the aſſembly of Harlots; a kind of people of a lewd diſpoſition and uncivil. Of whoſe manners and life the King having been informed, addreſſed his Letters to the Sheriff of Oxfordſhire, a place which they haunted; and wherein they practiſed their evil converſation: Whoſe Letter here followeth.

An aſſembly of ill diſpoſed people called Harlots, whereby may be gathered the ancientneſs of that name.

A Letter of King Henry the Third to the Sheriff of Oxfordſhire, concerning the baniſhment of an unlawful aſſembly called Harlots, out of that Country.

REX Vic. Oxon. ſalutem. Quia intelleximus quod quidam, qui ſe Harlotos appellant, vagi & otium foventes, in diverſis partibus regni noſtri, Congregationes & conventicula, necnon contractus illicitos, &c.

Turr. Lond

In Engliſh thus:

The King to the Sheriff of Oxfordſhire ſendeth Greeting: Becauſe we underſtand that there be certain vagrant perſons which call themſelves Harlots, maintaining idleneſs in divers parts of our Realm, moſt ſhamefully making their meetings, aſſemblies, and unlawful matches againſt the honeſty of the Church and good manners, which abuſe we will not, neither ought we to ſuffer; we charge thee that on our behalf thou forbid the ſaid Harlots henceforth in the ſaid Countries to make any more ſuch meetings, conventicle, or contracts; or to preſume according to their lewd manner and wonted faſhion to Rogue about our Realm, and hereto thou ſhalt (if need be) bind them, as by Law may be done. Wherein ſo behave thy ſelf in this behalf, as we may commend thy diligence. Witneſs the King at Reading the 23 of November, in the 48 year of our Reign.

Againſt an aſſembly or meeting of men which called themſelves Harlots.

What manner of perſons theſe were, or what their converſation was, it doth not further appear; nevertheleſs by the premiſſes it may ſeem to be ſome pretenſed order of Religion. And it is moſt probable that the reproachful name of Harlot had his beginning from hence.

To conclude with ſpecial matters of the Church, wherein we have made ſomewhat the longer delay, by occaſion of ſuch neceſſary Records as came to hand, and brought with them their neceſſary uſe, this one remembrance notwithſtanding remaineth, no leſs note-worthy than the reſt, and falling within the revolution of the forty eighth year of this Kings reign, a year of great trouble, as by the premiſes may be gathered.

You are therefore to note that at this time the Prelates of England ſtood upon their Pantophles, and jolly fellows (I tell you) they would be known to be. For in an inquiſition made after the death of one Aluredus de Lincoln, being as is ſuppoſed, a Baron of this Realm, there is found (Inter alia) as followeth: Quod prædictus Aluredus tenuit quandam particulam parcæ de Dunetiſh & Tilei de Abbate de Cerne, per ſervicium tenendi ſtropem ſuum, quando Abbas debet aſcendere equum ſuum, & dare ei locum in comitatu quando præſens fuerit. That is, That the forenamed Aluredus held a certain piece of the Park of Dunetiſh and Tilei of the Abbot of Cerne, by ſervice of holding his ſtirrup when the Abbot ſhould take horſeback, and to give him place in the Shire at ſuch time as he ſhould be preſent. The circumſtances hereof being conſidered, together with the time wherein it was done, giveth probable cauſe to conjecture that the occaſion of this matter came by this means: viz. That whereas the ſaid Alured was deſirous to enlarge his Park, and could not ſo do but by purchaſing of part of ſome other ground next adjoyning, whereof the ſaid Abbot was owner; he was therefore conſtrained either to lack that he liked, or to admit ſuch conditions as pleaſed my Lord Abbot; who like a Lord (as you ſee) was content to let him have his land, reſerving ſuch ſervice as is aboveſaid. Wherein would be noted the pomp of Prelates in thoſe days, and how near they drew in imitation to the Pope, in whoſe treading they traced.

But

But leaving theſe affairs of the Church, and Churchmen, wherein we have been ſomewhat large, we will now enter into other troubles of the Temporal ſtate. You heard before of a pacification concluded between the King and his Barons in the year of our Lord 1264. the ſame having been admitted by mutual and common conſent of the Temporalty and Clergy. Nevertheleſs, as a ſore not well ſearched and tented, but ſuperficially and overly skinned, doth break out into a more dangerous botch; ſo it came to paſs among the Lords and Barons, betwixt whom no ſuch firm reconciliation was made as was like long to laſt. Whereupon inſued after ſecret grudge and privy hatred, open Arms and Conflicts. For in this year 1265. the Sons of Simon the Earl, to wit, Henry; Simon and Guido, being all puſt up, and with the pride of their ſucceſs elevated, did that which nothing contented the Earl of Gloceſter: inſomuch that he challenged Henry the eldeſt Son of the Earl Simon Mountfort at the Barriers, to be tried at Northampton. But that challenge was taken up, leſt ſome further inconvenience might have riſen thereof. But the Earl of Gloceſter, being moved therewith in his mind, ſent unto his Father the Earl, that he ſhould deliver him ſuch Priſoners, being Noblemen, as he took at the Battel of Lewis; among whom the King of Almain was named firſt. But he by countermand anſwered him, and ſaid, that it might content and ſatisfie him, for that he had ſaved and preſerved to him his Lands, that day the Battel was fought at Lewis; and that furthermore, he would not ſend him ſuch Priſoners as he demanded; and that he himſelf kept more noble than they in the Caſtle of Dover: among them was John Baſſet, which undermined and burſt down the Walls of Northampton at that Conflict, as is ſaid before and ſpecified.

Diſſention betweeen Earl Simon and the Earl of Gloceſter.

The Earl of Gloceſter being herewith diſpleaſed, ſo ſoon as he heard this, ſent incontinently to the Lord Roger Mortimer, which always took the Kings part, deſiring that they two might talk together touching the benefit and commodity of the King. Who, doubting ſome deceit, deſired Sureties and Pledges for his ſafe return, and he would come to talk with him, and ſo had. When they met, and had a while talked familiarly, the Earl of Gloceſter ſhewed him all that he was purpoſed to do, and that further he lamented he had ſo much and ſo greatly offended the King; and that he would with all his power and ability make amends for that offence, in the reſtitution of the King again to his Kingly dignity, as much as he poſſibly might. Therefore they ſent ſecretly to Robert the Brother of the Earl of Gloceſter, which was near about the Earl Simon, and made him to conſent with them therein. And to work this thing more circumſpectly, when opportunity ſerved thereunto, Roger Mortimer ſent unto the Kings Son an Horſe excelling all others in footmanſhip, unto whom he might be ſure to truſt, when he ſaw couvenient time thereunto. After which things thus contrived, Prince Edward deſired leave of the Earl to prove his Courſer againſt ſuch time as he ſhould ride at the Tilt, as they might when they liſted. Aſſoon as he had gotten leave, and that with galloping and ranging the field, he had wearied divers of their Horſes: at the laſt, getting up upon that Horſe which for that purpoſe was ſent, and ſpying a ſervant on Horſeback coming toward him with two ſwords, he turned about unto his Keeper, whoſe name was Robert de Roſe, and to others his Play-fellows that were with him, ſaying, My loving Lords, thus long have I kept you company, and have been in your cuſtodies; and now not purpoſing to uſe your companies any longer, I betake you to God. And quickly turning his Horſe about, put to the Spurs, and away went he. The other pricked after apace, but yet came far enough behind, and overtake him they could not. At laſt, when they ſaw Roger Mortimer coming from his Caſtle of Wigmore, accompanied with many armed Men to meet him, as before it was appointed, they returned again home as wiſe as when they came forth. And when this the Princes eſcape was divulgated, much people came unto him out of every Quarter, with great joy thereof. Amongſt whom, the firſt was the Earl of Gloceſter, and the other Soldiers of the King, which had now long lain at Briſtow, and thereabouts, and within a ſhort ſpace he had a great and a mighty Hoſt.

The Earl of Gloceſter & Roger Mortimer conſpire together againſt Earl Simon.

Prince Edward eſcapeth from out of the cuſtody of Earl Simon by a train.

Which thing when the Earl Simon underſtood, he much doubted and miſtruſted himſelf; and ſending into Wales, he got from thence a great many Men, and augmented his power as ſtrongly as he might from every part of England. He ſent alſo Simon his Son to the Noblemen of the North parts, that with all poſſible ſpeed he might bring them with him; who with a great company came with him, and at Kenelworth a while they ſtaid, and there pitched their Tents. But leaving Kenelworth for a certain time, they went to Wincheſter, and ſpoiled the ſame, and then returned again to Kenelworth. And when this was declared to Edward the Kings Son, who then was at Worceſter, by a certain Spial, which he had gotten after he came from Gloceſter a little before; he prepared himſelf with his Soldiers, in the night ſeaſon, to go to the place where the Spy ſhould bring him, which was into a deep Valley, near unto the place where Simon and his company had pitched. And when in the morning they were very early about to arm themſelves, and prepare their Horſes, they heard a great noiſe of their enemies coming towards them. Then thinking that they had prepared themſelves againſt their coming, and ſo had been betrayed, they ſet forth in Battel aray, marching forwards, till that they met certain of their enemies ſtragling in long Wings, thinking to have gone a foraging, and to have ſought for Victuals; whom they took, and with their freſh Horſes new horſed their Soldiers that had their Horſes tired with long travel. And ſo marching forward, came very early in the morning upon their enemies, whom for the moſt part they found ſleeping; and laying luſtily about them, they ſlew divers; ſome they took, the reſt they put to flight, and fifteen of their chiefeſt Enſignes they took, with many other rich ſpoils. But young Simon himſelf lodged in the Caſtle, who with a few with him eſcaped and fled. And this was the fourth day before the nones of Auguſt, Anno 1265.

The Earl Simon ſendeth about, and in all haſte gathereth a power.

The firſt enterpriſe of Prince Edward after his eſcape by the means of a Spy.

But when Edward heard that Earl Simon was coming toward Kenelworth, to joyn with his Sons Battel, he marched forward to meet him the third day after at Euſham, where he divided his Hoſt into three Battels, he himſelf having the leading of one, the Earl of Gloceſter the ſecond, and Roger Mortimer the third, which came upon their backs. The Kings Son Edward came Northward, as though he came from Kenelworth to Euſham: and becauſe he would not be deſcried, he cauſed his own Standards and Enſignes to be taken down, and young Simons, which he had taken before to be advanced. But the Earl Simons Scurier, whoſe name was Nicholas, ſhewed the Earl that ſuch bands and companies were marching towards him; who thinking the ſame to have been Simon his Sons power, not knowing of the overthrow which he had before, gave ſmall credit thereunto, till that the ſaid Nicholas, the better to deſcry them, went up to the Abby Steeple of Euſham, where he might plainly diſcern them all and their Standards; for by this time they were mounted the Hill which they laboured to attain, thinking to have that vantage, when they ſhould give their charge as they had purpoſed, and had alſo advanced again his own Standards, and pulled down Simons, whereby they were the more eaſier deſcried and known. Then he cried aloud to the Earl Simon, and ſaid, We are all but dead men; for it is not your Son, as you ſuppoſe, that cometh, but it is Edward the Kings Son that cometh from one part, and the Earl of Gloceſter from another part, and Roger Mortimer from the third part. Then ſaid the Earl, The Lord be merciful unto our ſouls, forſomuch as our bodies and lives are now in their hands; commanding that every man ſhould make himſelf ready to God, and to fight out the field, for that it was their wills to die for their laws, and in a juſt quarrel. And ſuch as would depart, he gave leave to go their ways, that they ſhould be no diſcomfiture to the reſt.

The diſpoſing of the Princes battel againſt Earl Simon fought at Euſham.

Prince Edwards Hoſt deſcried, whereat the Earl was much abaſhed.

Then came unto him his eldeſt Son Henry, and comforted him, deſiring him to have no deſpair, nor yet miſtruſt in the good ſucceſs of this Victory, with other ſuch chearful words. No my Son (ſaith he) I deſpair not; but yet, it is thy preſumption, and the pride of the reſt of thy brethren that hath brought me to this end you ſee; notwithſtanding, yet I truſt I ſhall die to God, and in a righteous quarrel. After words of comfort given to all his Hoſt, and the Oration made as is the manner, they all armed themſelves. The King alſo (whom the Earl always kept with him) he armed in an armor of his own: and then dividing their Battels, they marched towards their enemies. But before they joyned, the Welſhmen ran their ways, and thinking to ſcape over the river of Dee, were there ſome drowned, and ſome ſlain. Then when the battel joyned and came to handy ſtrokes, within ſhort ſpace many of the Earls part fell and were ſlain; and the King himſelf being ſtrucken at, cried with a loud voice to them, ſaying, Kill me not, I am Henry your King. And with theſe the Kings words the Lord Adam Monhawt knew him, and ſaved him. At whoſe voice and cry came alſo Prince Edward his Son, and delivered him to the guard and cuſtody of certain Knights. In the mean ſeaſon the Earl Simon was hard beſtead and beaten down, and alſo ſlain before Edward the Prince came at him. Howbeit before he fell, when as he fought for life, and Henry his Son, and other Noblemen on his part were about him, he brake out into theſe words unto his enemies, ſaying, What is there no mercy and compaſſion with you? Who again anſwered, What compaſſion ſhould there be ſhewed to Traytors? Then ſaid he, The Lord be merciful unto our ſouls, our bodies are in your hands. And ſo ſoon as theſe words were ſpoken, they mangled his body, and divided his members, and cut off his head; which head Roger Mortimer ſent unto his wife. And not far off from him alſo was ſlain Henry his Eldeſt Son, the Lord Hugh Spenſer, the Lord Radulph Baſſet, the Lord Thomas de Heſtele, the Lord William Mandevile, the Lord John Beauchampe, the Lord Guido Baillofer, the Lord Roger Rowleie, and many other Noblemen beſides, with a great multitude of people, the Lord knoweth how many. This battel was fought in the month of Auguſt, and continued from one of the Clock till it was night; in the which was not ſo much as one man on the Earls part, of any eſtimation, fortitude, and courage, but in that battel loſt his life; more than the Lord John, who by the great grace of God eſcaped death. Neither is this to be forgotten that the ſame day being Tueſday, at that inſtant hour, when the Battel began, which was at one of the Clock at Afternoon, there was ſuch a darkneſs over all, ſuch thunder and ſuch tempeſt, that the like before that time was never ſeen, being very calm and fair weather both immediately before and after; which ſeemed (with mine Author) to give a plain demonſtration of that which afterwards chanced and followed.

K. Henry almoſt ſlain in the battel, at length known by his voice, and reſcued by his Son.

Son and many more Lords ſlain at this battel of Euſham.

Anno 1266.

After this great ſlaughter and overthrow there was a Parliament ſummoned at Wincheſter by the Earl of Glouceſter, and others of his part. Here by the way is to be conſidered, that the King although he was in the Camp of the Earl of Leiceſter, being then in cuſtody, and his Son Edward with the Earl of Glouceſter, yet the King was on that ſide againſt his will, and therefore in the ſaid Parliament the King was reſtored to his Kingly dignity, which was before that time under the cuſtody of the Barons. But after the Battel was ended and done, certain of them that loved the Earl, upon an old Ladder gathered up ſuch parts of his body as remained, and covering the ſame with an old Gown, brought it to Euſham, where they putting the ſame in a fair linnen Cloth, buried it in the Church. But not long after, ſuch as thought not themſelves ſufficiently revenged with his death (to wreak them of the dead corpſe) took up the ſame and threw it in another place, ſaying, That he which was both accurſed, and a Traytor, was not worthy of Chriſtian burial.

A Parliament ſummoned at Wincheſter, where King Henry was again reſtored to his Regality.

The ſame year alſo died Walter Cantilupus Biſhop of Wincheſter, after whom ſucceeded Nicolas of Ely, the Kings Chancellor.

The ſame year the King perceiving that unleſs the Caſtle of Kenelworth were recovered, and the boldneſs of them reſtrained that kept the ſame, many evils and inconveniences might enſue thereupon, to the prejudice of his Kingdom; for that the number increaſed every day more and more, waſting and ſpoiling the Country all about; therefore he gathered an Army and came down to Warwick, where he a while tarried expecting the meeting and aſſembling of his Marqueſſes and Lords, with Enſigns and other munition ſuitable. Who when their bands were furniſhed and muſtered, and all things ready, the morrow after Midſummer day he diſplayed his Banner, and began his voyage, marching towards Kenelworth, and beſieged the ſame. During which ſiege, by the advice and counſel of the King, the Popes Legate, and other Noblemen, twelve perſons were choſen which ſhould have the diſpoſing of thoſe things that pertained to the ſtate of the Realm, and of thoſe that had loſt their lands and inheritances, who amongſt other things, made and eſtabliſhed this one Proviſo, that was commonly called Kenelworth Decree, That all thoſe which had loſt their lands by attainder (although not yet attainted) ſhould fine therefore at the Kings pleaſure, and take their lands of him again; paying ſome three years, ſome four years, ſome two years revenues of the ſame, according to the quality of the crime and offence committed. All which Proviſoes or proviſions were eſtabliſhed and confirmed as well by the corporal Oath, as by ſignment of the ſame with the hands and ſeals of all the Prelates and Clergy of England, there aſſembled for that purpoſe by the Popes Legate upon the Feaſt of All-Saints. When theſe things were thus finiſhed, meſſengers were ſent on the Kings behalf, as well to thoſe that kept the Caſtle of Kenelworth, as alſo to thoſe that were aſſembled in the Iſle of Ely; willing them to come under the protection of the Kings peace, and yield to the foreſaid Proviſoes, eſtabliſhed by the twelve Commiſſioners. Who all together anſwered and ſaid, That they would in no wiſe condeſcend thereunto, both for that it was done without their conſents, not being called unto it, and alſo for that the ſaid Decree was over-ſtrait and intolerable. Within ſhort ſpace after, great Famine and Peſtilence chanced amongſt them which kept the Caſtle, inſomuch that they were without all hope of keeping the ſame; wherefore ſoon after the King ſending again to them to yield the Caſtle and take their pardons, they conſulting together of their own eſtate, thus anſwered the Kings Meſſengers, If it pleaſe the King and his Council to permit us to ſend our Meſſenger to the Lord Simon Montfort, which is beyond the Sea, that he may come by a certain day to the defence of this his Garriſon and Fort, and that in the mean ſpace we be not diſturbed by the Kings Army that hath invironed us, till the return of our Meſſengers; if by the day appointed he come not, we will yield up the ſame, ſo that we may be pardoned of life, limb, and moveables.

Kenelworth Decree againſt the diſherited.

Kenelworth Decree gainſaid by divers.

When the Meſſengers were returned, and had declared to the King their anſwer; he, conſulting with his Nobles about the matter, agreed unto their Petitions, and cauſed the Truce to be proclaimed throughout all his Camp, after that ſufficient Hoſtages were on either ſide given for the performance of the ſame; whereupon they ſet forward their Meſſengers, as before was ſaid they would. But after that many of them within the Caſtle being very grievouſly vexed with the Bloody-flux, and other diſeaſes, inſomuch that the whole men might not abide the corruption and annoyance of thoſe that were diſeaſed, they delivered up the Caſtle before the return of the Meſſengers again, and were permitted to go whither they would to refreſh themſelves, as men moleſted with great vexations and miſeries. After the rendering up of the Caſtle, the King committed the cuſtody thereof to his Son Edmund, and ſo with his Hoſt departing from his ſiege, came upon Chriſtmas Evens Even to Oſnie, where he with great ſolemnity and triumph kept his Chriſtmas during ſeven days, and from thence with his Hoſt came to Windſor, from whence after a few days he marched towards Ely; in which Iſland he beſieged thoſe which were diſherited, and ſharply alſo aſſaulted them.

Kenelworth Caſtle yielded up to the King, before the return of the Meſſengers out of France.

The ſame year Pope Clement the Fourth promoted Maſter Walter Gifford Biſhop of Bath, to be Archbiſhop of York.

In which year alſo the Church of England began to pay the Tenths of all their Revenues, as well Spiritual as Temporal, to the King, to continue for three years ſpace; and this was done by the Authority Apoſtolical.

The Tenths granted to the King by Authority Apoſtolical.

Within a while after the Barons which were yet remaining, gathered themſelves together again; amongſt whom John Daiwill (being a ſubtil and ſtout man of war) began to have a name, and was well eſteemed amongſt them, who altogether did what miſchief they might, and in the month of May they aſſembled at Cheſterfield, under the ſaid John Daiwill and the Earl of Ferarence, upon whom the Kings Souldiers coming ſuddenly in the night, took them ſleeping, and ſlew many of them. Then the ſaid John Daiwill quickly arming himſelf came forth, thinking with more defence both to ſave himſelf and to eſcape. Who in the way ſtruck the Lord Gilbert Humſard ſuch a blow with his Demi-lance, that he fell'd fell'd both him and his horſe to the ground, and ſo fled with a few more after him. And thus while the poor Soldiers fought and were ſlain, the Barons fled away, and ſaved themſelves. Alſo the Earl Ferarence fled, and hid himſelf in a Church; but being bewrayed by a woman, he was taken forth, and led away priſoner. After this the King kept a Parliament at Northampton, where he diſherited all thoſe that took part with the Earl Simon, and all their Children. Where alſo the Popes Legate Octobonus held a Convocation, and Excommunicated all ſuch Biſhops as had taken any part with Simon againſt the King; of whom divers he ſent up to Rome, to be abſolved of the Pope; and further the ſaid Legate cauſed to be proclaimed certain Decrees, which he himſelf had made, and alſo the new grant of Pope Clement to the King and Queen, of all the Tenths for ſeven years to come. And ſhortly after, a Tax alſo was ſined upon the Country of Norfolk; to the gathering whereof Walter the Biſhop of Norwich was appointed. Ex Scala Mundi.

Tenths granted by the Pope to the King and Queen for ſeven years.

After this in the year of our Lord 1267, King Henry beſieged again the Caſtle of Kenelworth, from the ſeventh day before the firſt day of July, until the beginning of December; whither came Octobonus the Popes Legate, by whoſe intreaty Henry Haſtings delivered the ſame unto the King, which ſtoutly had defended the ſame, and reſiſted the King, having pardon granted both for him and his, of his life, lands, goods and cattels. In which time alſo the Barons again aſſembled with John Daiwill in the Iſle of Axioline, and ſo proceeded till they came to Lincoln, which they alſo took, and ſpoiled the Jews, and ſlew many of them; and entring their Synagogue, tare and rent the Book of their Law, and burnt the ſame, and all other writings and obligations which they could come by. Which thing when the King heard, he ſent thither his Son Prince Edward; but as ſoon as they heard that, they fled into the Iſle of Ely, and fortified the ſame with Bulwarks as ſtrongly as they might, at every entrance into the ſame. This was in the month of April, when Edward the Kings Son came thither; who for the great abundance of waters in the ſame, could by no means enter the Iſland, till at length by the counſel of the inhabitants of that Province he cauſed with a number of workmen great Trenches and Ditches to be made, ſomewhat to convey away the water; and ſo long they uſed the counſel of them in making Bridges with Planks and Hurdles, till at the laſt they entred the Iſland; who as ſoon as they were entred, the Barons fled to London, where they were of the Londoners well entertained. The reſt which were in the Iſland yielded themſelves (amongſt whom was Roger Wake, Simon the younger, and Peches) ſaving their lives and members. After this, both the King and Edward his Son came to London with a great power, but yet were kept out of the City by the Barons and Citizens for the ſpace of forty days. And Octobonus the Legate (who for fear was fled into the Tower) they narrowly laid for, that he ſhould not eſcape. At length by the intreaty of the Earl of Glouceſter, and other Earls that were his friends, both the Barons and Citizens were pardoned, and admitted to the Kings favour. And four Biſhops, and eight other Noblemen were choſen, ſuch as were at Coventry firſt nominated, that they ſhould order and diſpoſe all matters betwixt the King and ſuch as had loſt their inheritance, as alſo the form of their peace and ranſome. And Proclamation was made upon the Feaſt of All-Saints, of perfect peace and accord throughout all the Realm.

{Anno 1267.} The Caſtle of Kenelworth again beſieged.

The King kept out of London forty days by the Barons and Citizens.

A peace concluded between the Barons and the King.

In the fifty ſecond year of this King Henry's reign, eight days after the Feaſt of St. Martin, he held a Parliament at Marleberge, in the year of our Lord above recited; where by the advice of wiſe and diſcreet men, and with all the conſents of the Nobles, he ordained and Enacted divers good and profitable ſtatutes for the reformation and bettering of the ſtate of the Realm and execution of common juſtice, which are called the ſtatutes of Marleberge.

The ſtatutes of Marleberge.

The ſame year upon St. Gregories day, Octobonus the Legate called a Council at London, where were five Archbiſhops, and a great number of Biſhops, Abbots, and other Prelates; which Council alſo within three days brake up again.

A Convocation holden at London by Octobonus the Popes Legate.

The ſame year upon St. John's day the Baptiſt, Edward the Kings Son, and divers other Noblemen of England took upon them the Croſs by the Legates hands at Northampton, to the relief of the Holy Land, and the ſubverſion of the enemies of the Croſs of Chriſt. Which done, the Legate the ſame year went out of England, not purpoſing after that to return again. This holy Legate ſaith (mine Author) which might well be reſembled to Lynx the monſtrous beaſt, whoſe quick ſight penetrateth every thing, inrolled to perpetual memory the valuation of all the Churches in the Realm of England ſo narrowly, as by any means poſſible he might inquire the certainty thereof. The ſame was he that made all the Cathedral and Conventual Churches to pay Penſions; ſo that thoſe Churches which gave not the vacancy of their Benefices to their Clerks and ſtrangers, ſhould pay unto them a certain yearly penſion, during the vacancy of the Benefices which they ſhould have.

The ſame year died Pope Clement the Fourth, after whoſe death the Church of Rome was two years vacant; and then was choſen an Archdeacon Cardinal, whoſe name was Theardus, as he was taking his journey into the Holy Land, and they called him Gregory the Tenth.

Then alſo did Edmund Earl of Lancaſter and Leiceſter, and ſecond Son of King Henry, take to Wife the Earl of Albemarle his Daughter, and the Niece of the Earl of Glouceſter; at which Marriage was the King and the Queen, and all the Nobility of England.

The ſame year was the Body of Saint Edward the King and Confeſſor, by Walter Gifford Archbiſhop of York, and other Biſhops, Intombed in a new and rich Shrine of Gold and Silver, beſet with precious ſtones, in the preſence of Henry the King of England. In which year alſo fell a great rain and inundation of waters, ſuch as hath not lightly been ſeen, which increaſed and continued the ſpace of forty days, and more.

Edward the King and Confeſſor ſhrined.

The ſame year died Walter de Laiwill, Biſhop of Sarum, the third day before the Nones of January. After whom ſucceeded Robert of Northampton, the Dean of the ſame Church. And becauſe the See of Canterbury was then vacant, he was confirmed by the Chapter of Canterbury; which Chapter had always the juriſdiction in Spiritual cauſes, during the vacancy of that See, in as ample manner as the Biſhop himſelf had being alive. After this, the Biſhop Elect coming thither, thinking to have had his Conſecration, was notwithſtanding put back for two cauſes; one was, for that there was preſent then no more but one Biſhop; the other was, for that all the other Biſhops had appealed, that he might not be conſecrated to their prejudice; that is, by the authority of the Chapter of Canterbury, ſaying, That they would not be under the obedience of the Monks.

The Biſhop of Sarum conſecrated.

After this ſolemn Meſſengers were for this cauſe ſent to the Cardinals of Rome, for that then the See of Rome was vacant; who received anſwer, That during the vacation of that See, the Confirmation and Conſecration of the Biſhop Elect, pertained to the foreſaid Chapter of Canterbury.

The ſame year alſo was the Lord Henry, the Son and heir of the Lord Richard King of Almain, and Brother to King Henry the Third, ſlain at Viterbium, in a certain Chappel hearing Maſs, by the Lord Simon and Guido, the Sons of the Lord Simon Mountfort Earl of Leiceſter.

During this Kings reign, there was made a great and general Expedition of divers and ſundry Chriſtian Princes to Hieruſalem, taking upon them the Lords Character, that is, the Croſs; among whom was alſo Edward the Kings Son, unto the which Expedition was granted him a Subſidy throughout all the Realm. And in the month of May, in the year of our Lord 1270, or as ſaith Florilegus, Ann. 1269, he ſet forward on his journey.

About the time when Prince Edward was preparing his journey toward Aſia, Boniface of whom ye heard before, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ended his life in the Country of Sabaudia, going beſide to Rome, or coming thence. After whoſe death the Monks of Canterbury proceeding to a new Election granted by the King, agreed upon the Prior of their houſe, named Adam Chelenden. But the King and his Son Prince Edward conſenting and ſpeaking in the behalf of Robert Burnell their Chancellor, did ſollicite the matter with the Monks, partly intreating, partly threatning them, to chuſe the ſaid Robert to be Archbiſhop. Notwithſtanding, the Monks being ſtout, would neither relent to their courteous requeſt no yet bow to their boiſterous threats, but conſtantly perſiſting in their former Election, appealed from the King and Prince to the Pope. Prince Edward being now on his journey, and ſeeing himſelf thus fruſtrated of the Monks, writeth back to the King his Father, devoutly praying and beſeeching him in no wiſe to admit the Election of the foreſaid Monks. And ſo paſſing to Dover with Henry, the Son of Richard his Uncle King of Romans, with their wives, they took their paſſage in the month of Auguſt. After this the Prior thus elected, as is foretold, but not admitted by the King to be Archbiſhop, went up to Rome.

In the mean time the Monks in the abſence of their Elect, obtained one Geffrey Pomenall to be their Official; who ſeeing himſelf advanced to that dignity, and bearing belike ſome old grudg againſt the Prior of Dover, cauſed him to be cited up to appear in the Chapter-houſe of Canterbury. The Prior of Dover ſeeing this Citation to be prejudicial to him and to the Church of Dover, and knowing that the Monks of Canterbury have no ſuch juriſdiction (the See of Canterbury being vacant) but that all things appertaining to that Church, ought to be reſerved whole to the conſecration of the new Archbiſhop, therefore for the ſtate both of him and of his Church, he appealed up alſo unto Rome. But to return to the Archbiſhop again.

The Concordance.

About this time came out the great Concordance by an Engliſh Frier, called John Dernington. Ex Eulogio.

It was above declared how a general Voyage being proclaimed to war againſt the Turks, and a Subſidy being collected in England upon the ſame: Prince Edward with others was appointed to take their Voyage, and now were onward in their journey. Who at Michaelmas following, with his company came to Egermorth, which is from Marſilia eight Leagues weſtward, and there taking Ship again, (having a merry wind and proſperous) within ten days arrived at Sunes at Tunicium, where he was with great joy welcomed and entertained of the Chriſtian Princes that were to this purpoſe aſſembled, as of Philip the French King, whoſe Father Ludovicus died a little before, of Carolus the King of Sicilia, and the two Kings Navar and Aragon. And as the Lord Edward came thither for his Father the King of England, thither came alſo Henry the Son of the King of Almain for his Father; who at his return from the Voyage was ſlain in a Chappel at Viterbium hearing Maſs, by the Lord Simon and Guido, the Sons of the Lord Simon Mountfort Earl of Leiceſter.

When Prince Edward demanded of theſe Kings and Princes what was to be done, they anſwered him again, and ſaid, The Prince of this City, ſaid they, and the Province adjoyning to the ſame, hath been accuſtomed to pay tribute unto the King of Sicilia every year. And now for that the ſame hath been for the ſpace of ſeven years unpayed and more, therefore we thought good to make invaſion upon him. But the King knowing the ſame tribute to be juſtly demanded, hath now according to our own deſires ſatisfied for the time paſt, and alſo paid his tribute before hand.

The great Expedition to invade the Turk, ſtayed by the concluding of a peace.

The great rage of the French King againſt the Turk turned into a money-matter.

Then ſaid he, My Lords what is this to the purpoſe? Are we not here all aſſembled, and have taken upon us the Lords Character to fight againſt the Infidels and enemies of Chriſt? What mean you then to conclude a peace with them? God forbid we ſhould do ſo, for now the land is plain and hard, ſo that we may approach the holy City Jeruſalem. Then ſaid they, Now have we made a league with them; neither is it lawful for us to break the ſame; but let us return again to Sicilia, and when the Winter is paſt we may well take Shipping to Acra. But this counſel nothing at all liked him, neither did he ſhew himſelf well pleaſed therewith; but after that he had made them a Princely Banket, he went into his Cloſet or privy Chamber from amongſt them, neither would be partaker of any of that wicked money which they had taken. They notwithſtanding continuing their purpoſe, at the next merry wind took Shipping, and for want of Ships, left two hundred of their men aſhore, crying out and pitiouſly lamenting for the peril and hazard of death they were in. Wherewith Prince Edward being ſomewhat moved with compaſſion, came back to the land, and received and ſtowed them in his own Ships, being the laſt that went aboard. Within ſeven days after, they arrived in the Kingdom of Sicilia, over againſt the City Trapes, caſting their Anchors a league from thence within the Sea, for that their Ships were of great burthen, and throughly fraught. And from the haven of the City they ſent out Barges and Boats to receive and bring ſuch of the Nobility to land as would; but their Horſes for the moſt part, and all their Armor they kept ſtill within board. At length towards the evening, the Sea began to be rough, and increaſed to a great tempeſt and a mighty, inſomuch that their Ships were beaten one againſt another ſides; and drowned there were of them, at that tempeſt lying at Anchor, more than an hundred and twenty, with all their armour and munition, with innumerable ſouls beſides; and that wicked money alſo which they had taken before, likewiſe periſhed and was drowned. But the tempeſt hurt not ſo much as one Ship of Prince Edwards, who had in number thirteen, nor yet had one man loſt thereby; for that as it may be preſuppoſed, he conſented not to the wicked counſel of the reſt. When in the morning the Princes and Kings came to the Sea-ſide, and ſaw all their Ships drowned, and ſaw their men and horſes in great number caſt upon the land drowned, they had full heavy hearts, as well they might. For of all their Ships and Mariners, which were in number fifteen hundred beſides the common Souldiers, there were no more ſaved than the Mariners of one only Ship, and they in this wiſe: There was in that Ship a good and wiſe Matron (a Counteſs or an Earls wife) who perceiving the tempeſt to grow, and fearing her ſelf, called to her the Maſter of the Ship, and asked whether in attempting to the ſhore, it were not poſſible to ſave themſelves? Who anſwered that to ſave the Ship it was impoſſible, howbeit the men that were therein by Gods help he doubted not. Then ſaid the Counteſs, For the Ship force no whit, ſave the ſouls therein, and have to thee double the value of the Ship. VVho immediately hoiſing the ſails, with all force run the Ship aground ſo near the ſhore as was poſſible. Thus with the vehemency of the weather and force he came withal, he braſt the Ship, and ſaved all that was within the ſame, as the Maſter of the ſame Ship had ſhewed and ſaid before.

The integrity of Prince Edward rewarded of God.

Then the Kings and Princes (altering their purpoſe after this ſo great a ſhipwrack) returned home again every one unto their own lands; only Edward the Kings Son remained behind with his Men and Ships, which the Lord had ſaved and preſerved. Then Prince Edward (renovating his purpoſe) took Shipping again, and within fifteen days after Eaſter arrived he at Acra, and went aland, taking with him a thouſand of the beſt Souldiers and moſt expert, and tarried there a whole month, refreſhing both his Men and Horſes, and that in this ſpace he might learn and know the ſecrets of the land. After this he took with him ſix or ſeven thouſand Souldiers and marched forward twenty miles from Acra, and took Nazareth; and thoſe that he there found he ſlew, and afterward returned again to Acra. But their enemies following after them, thinking to have ſet upon them at ſome ſtrait or other advantage; they were by the Prince premoniſhed thereof, and returning again upon them, gave a charge, and ſlew many of them, and the reſt they put to flight. After this about Midſummer, when the Prince had underſtanding that the Saracens began to gather at Cackbow, which was forty miles from Acra; he marching thither ſet upon them very early in the morning, and ſlew of them more than a thouſand, the reſt he put to flight, and took rich ſpoils, marching forward till they came to a Caſtle named Caſtrum Peregrinorum, ſituate upon the Sea-coaſt, and tarried there that night, and the next day they returned toward Acra. In the mean ſeaſon the King of Jeruſalem ſent unto the Noblemen of Cyprus, deſiring them with ſpeed that they would come and aid the Chriſtians; but they would not come, ſaying, they would keep their own land and go no further.

Prince Edward arriveth at Acra and taketh Nazareth.

Then Prince Edward ſent unto them, deſiring that at his requeſt they would come and joyn in aid with him. Who immediately thereupon came unto him with great preparation and furniture for the war, ſaying, that at his commandment they were bound to do no leſs, for that his Predeceſſors were ſometimes Governours of their land, and that they ought always to ſhew their fidelity to the Kings of England. Then the Chriſtians being herewith animated made a third Voyage or Rode, and came as far as the Fort called Vincula S. Petri, and to St. Georges: and when they had ſlain certain there, not finding any to make reſiſtance againſt them, they retired again from whence they came.

A guileful deceit of the Saracens practiſed againſt Prince Edward. Ex Glab. Scala mundi.

When thus the fame of Prince Edward grew amongſt his enemies, and that they began to ſtand in doubt of him; they deviſed among themſelves, how by ſome policy they might circumvent him, and betray him. Whereupon the great Prince and Admiral of Joppa ſent unto him, feigning himſelf under great deceit to become a Chriſtian, and that he would draw with him a great number beſides, ſo that they might be honourably entertained and uſed of the Chriſtians. This talk pleaſed the Prince well, and perſwaded him to finiſh the thing he had ſo well begun, by writing again, who alſo by the ſame meſſenger ſent and wrote back unto him divers times about the ſame matter, whereby no miſtruſt ſhould ſpring. This meſſenger, ſaith mine Author, was one Ex cote nutritus, one of the ſtony-hearted, that neither feared God, nor dreaded death. The fifth time when this Meſſenger came, and was of the Princes ſervants ſearched, according to the manner and cuſtom what weapon and armor he had about him, as alſo his purſe, that not ſo much as a knife could be found about him, he was had up into the Princes Chamber, and after his reverence done; he pulled out certain Letters, which he delivered to the Prince from his Lord, as he had done others before. This was about eight days after Whitſontide, upon a Tueſday ſomewhat before night; at which time the Prince was laid upon his bed bare headed in his Jerkin, for the great heat and intemperature of the weather.

The meſſenger ſearched before he came to the Princes preſence.

When the Prince had read the Letters, it appeared by them, that upon the Saturday next following, his Lord would be there ready to accompliſh all that he had written and promiſed. The report of theſe news by the Prince to the ſtanders by liked them well, drawing ſomewhat back to conſult thereof amongſt themſelves. In the mean time the Meſſenger kneeling and making his obeiſance to the Prince (queſtioning further with him) put his hand to the Belt, as though he would have pulled out ſome ſecret Letters, and ſuddenly he pulled out an envenomed Knife, thinking to have ſtricken him into the belly therewith as he lay; but the Prince lifting up his hand to defend the blow, was ſtricken a great wound into the arm. And being about to fetch another ſtroke at him, the Prince again with his foot took him ſuch a blow that he fell'd him to the ground. With that the Prince gat him by the hand, and with ſuch violence wreſted the Knife from him, that he hurt himſelf therewith in the forehead, and immediately thruſt the ſame into the belly of the Meſſenger and ſtriker, and ſlew him. The Princes ſervants being in the next Chamber not far off, hearing the buſtling, came with great haſt running in. And finding the Meſſenger lying dead on the Floor, one of them took up a ſtool and beat out his brains; whereat the Prince was wroth, for that he ſtruck a dead man, and one that was killed before. The rumor hereof, as it was ſtrange, ſo it ſoon went throughout all the Court, and from thence amongſt the common people; wherefore they were very heavy and greatly diſcouraged. To him came alſo the Captain of the Temple, and brought him a coſtly and precious drink againſt poyſon, leſt the venom of the Knife ſhould penetrate the lively blood, and in blaming wiſe ſaid unto him, Did I not ſhew your Grace before of the deceit and ſubtilty of this people? Notwithſtanding, ſaith he, let your Grace take a good heart, you ſhall not die of this wound, my life for yours. But ſtraightway the Surgeons and Phyſicians were ſent for, and the Prince was dreſſed, and within a few days after the wound began to putrifie, and the fleſh to look dead and black; whereupon they that were about the Prince began to mutter amongſt themſelves, and were very ſad and heavy. Which thing he himſelf perceiving, ſaid unto them, Why mutter you thus amongſt your ſelves? What ſee you in me, can I not be healed? Tell me the truth, be ye not afraid. Whereupon one ſaid to him, and like your Grace you may be healed, we miſtruſt it not; but yet it will be very painful for you to ſuffer. May ſuffering, ſaid he again, reſtore health? Yea, ſaith the other, on pain of loſing my head. Then, ſaid the Prince, I commit my ſelf unto you, do with me what you think good. Then ſaid one of the Phyſicians, Is there any of your Nobles in whom your Grace repoſeth ſpecial truſt? To whom the Prince anſwered, yea, naming certain of the Noblemen that ſtood about him. Then ſaid the Phyſician unto the two whom the Prince firſt named, the Lord Edmund, and the Lord John Voiſie: And do you alſo faithfully love your Lord and Prince? Who anſwered both, Yea undoubtedly. Then ſaith he, Take you away this Gentlewoman and Lady (meaning his wife) and let her not ſee her Lord and Husband until ſuch a time I will you thereunto. Whereupon they took her out of the Princes preſence, crying out and wringing her hands. Then ſaid they unto her, Be ye contented good Lady and Madam, it is better that one woman ſhould weep a little while, than that all the Realm of England ſhould weep a great ſeaſon. Then upon the morrow they cut out all the dead envenomed fleſh out of the Princes arm, and threw it from them, and ſaid unto him, How cheereth your Grace? We promiſe you within theſe fifteen days you ſhall ſhew your ſelf abroad (if God permit) upon your Horſe-back, whole and well as ever you were. And according to the promiſe he made the Prince, it came to paſs, to the no little comfort and admiration of all his ſubjects. When the great Soldan heard of it, and that the Prince was yet alive, he would ſcarcely believe the ſame; and ſending unto him three of his Nobles and Princes, he excuſed himſelf by them, calling his gods to witneſs, that the ſame was done neither by him, nor his conſent. Which Princes and Meſſengers ſtanding aloof off from the Kings Son worſhipping him, fell flat upon the ground. You (ſaith the Prince) do reverence me, but yet you love me not. But they underſtood him not, becauſe he ſpake in Engliſh unto them, ſpeaking by an Interpreter. Nevertheleſs he honourably intreated them, and ſent them away in peace.

Prince Edward wounded and hurt with an Invenomed Knife by the Turks Meſſenger.

The Prince reſtored to health, and the Soldan forſweareth himſelf.

Thus when Prince Edward had been eighteen months in Acra, he took Shipping about the Aſſumption of our Lady (as we call it) returning homeward, and after ſeven weeks he arrived in Sicilia at Trapes, and from thence travelling through Paleſtina and Metmes, and ſo through the midſt of Apulia, till he came to Rome, where he was of the Pope honourably entertained; from thence he came into France, whoſe fame and Noble proweſs was there much bruted among the common people, and envied of the Nobility, eſpecially of the Earl de Chalons, who ſent unto him and required him that he might break a ſtaff with him at the Tilt in his Country. Which thing to do, for that the Prince would not diminiſh his honour and fame (although he might have well alledged a ſufficient cauſe and excuſe by means of his travel) yet he would not, but willingly conſented thereunto; whereupon it was proclaimed, that Prince Edward by ſuch a day, with thoſe that were with him, had challenged all comers at the Tilt and Barriers. Whereupon great Aſſemblies were made in the Country all about; and divers as well Horſemen as Footmen, had conjured amongſt themſelves, and conſpired againſt the Engliſhmen, ſelling their Horſes and Armor aforehand, and drinking one to another in boun voyage of the ſpoil of them whom they would take as their priſoners. Prince Edward in the mean time ſent into England for divers Earls and Barons, which come unto him. When the day appointed was come, the Prince had with him more than one thouſand Horſemen, which were Knights, beſides his Footmen, but yet there was as many more on the other ſide both in Horſemen and Footmen. When the parties ſhould meet, the French Footmen, which had before conſpired, began both to ſpoil, rifle, and kill. The Engliſhmen reſiſted and defended themſelves both with Bows and Slings; many of them they ſlew, and drave them to the Gates of their City, the other they chaſed over a river, where many of them were drowned. In the mean ſeaſon the Earl with fifty of his Knights, which followed him, came forth and joyned together ſo many for ſo many, and a long time together they tried it with their ſwords, laying one at another. At the laſt the Earl perceiving himſelf not able to match with him at the arms end, incloſ'd with him, & taking him about the neck, held him with his arms very ſtrait. What mean you my Lord (ſaith the Prince) think you to have my Horſe? Yea marry (quoth the Earl) I mean to have both thee and thy Horſe. Hereat Prince Edward, being aſcorned, lifted up himſelf, and gave him ſuch a blow, that therewithal he, forſaking his Horſe, hung ſtill about the Princes neck, till that he ſhook him off to the ground. Herewith the Prince, being ſomewhat in a heat, left the preaſe to take the Air, thereby to refreſh himſelf. But when he ſaw the injury of the French-men towards his men, and how they had ſlain many of them, he then ſaid unto them, that they uſed rather the exerciſe of battel, than of torney. Spare ye not therefore to ſlay from henceforth any of them all, but give them again as good as they bring. Then they aſſailed to kill each other freely on either part, and let their Swords walk.

Exerciſe of battel, inſtead of Barriers and torney.

And when by this time the Engliſh footmen were again returned, and ſaw the conflicts of Horſemen, and many other Engliſhmen overthrown; they put themſelves amidſt the preaſe, and ſome Panching the Horſes, ſome cutting aſunder the girths of the French-mens ſaddles, they overthrew the Riders and gave them holy Bread. Then when the aforeſaid Earl was Horſed again by ſome of his men and amongſt the throng, Prince Edward alſo ruſhed in amongſt the thickeſt, and coupled again with him: To whom he often ſpake and cried, that he ſhould yield himſelf as vanquiſhed; but that he would not do. Notwithſtanding, when his ſtrength began to fail him, he was fain to yield himſelf unto a ſimple Knight, according as Prince Edward him bade, and all the reſt of his Horſemen and Knights fled and ſaved themſelves. Howbeit, many of them in that place were ſlain, and our men returned having the victory. But when after this they thought themſelves to be quiet and at reſt, they were killed of the Citizens, by two and by three at once as they went in the ſtreets. Which thing when the Prince heard, he ſent for the Maior and Burgeſſes, commanding them to ſee the ſame redreſſed, and that immediatly: For otherwiſe, of his Knighthood he aſſured them, that upon the morrow he would fire the City, and make it level with the ground. Whereupon they went their ways, and ſet watchmen in divers places of the ſame to keep peace, by which means the Prince and men were in ſafety and quiet. Thus in this paſtime of torneying and barriers, much blood was ſpilt, whereupon the name of the place was changed: So that it is not called Torniamentum de Chalons, but Parvum bellum de Chalons.

Certain notes of other occurrents chancing in foreign Countries abroad, within the compaſs of the years and Reign of the foreſaid King Henry the Third.

HAving thus accompliſhed the life and Hiſtory of King Henry the Third, with ſuch accidents as happened within this Realm, I thought good to adjoyn unto the ſame ſome other foreign matters not unworthy the note, incident in other Countries during the time of the ſaid King: namely from the year of our Lord 1217 unto this year 1272. which I thought the rather not to be omitted, for that even from and about the beginning of this Kings Reign, ſprang up the very well-ſprings of all miſchief, the Sects of Monkiſh religions and other ſwarms of Popiſh Orders, which with their groſs and horrible ſuperſtitions have incumbred the Church of Chriſt ever ſince.

Firſt, to omit the repetition of Pope Innocentius the Third, the great Grandſire of that foul Monſter Tranſubſtantiation and auricular confeſſion, Friers Dominick, and Franciſcan Friers, Thomas Aquinas, Jacobus de Voragine, Vincentius, with Pope Honorius the Third, Coiner of the Canon Law, and the Cardinal Poſtienſis, as alſo Bonaventure, Albertus Magnus, with Pope Urban the Fourth, firſt founder of the feaſt of Corpus Chriſti, and procurer of the adoration of the body of Chriſt in the Sacrament, beſides Durandus and many more: it followeth further to be noted, that the Tartarians about the year 1240. iſſuing out of Muſcovia into the parts of Polonia, made great waſte in Chriſtendom, ſo much the rather, becauſe the Princes about Polonia, being at variance amongſt themſelves, uſed none other remedy for their defence but heaps of Maſſes, invocation of the dead, and Worſhipping of Images, which indeed did nothing relieve them, but rather increaſe their trouble.

Ex Annalibus Sileſiæ. The Tartarians make great ſpoil in Chriſtendom.

The next year following, the whole Nation of the Scythians (muſtring like locuſts) invaded the parts of Europe with two mighty Armies, whereof the one entring upon Polonia, made great Havock and carried away many Chriſtians from thence Captives; the other, overrunning Hungaria, made no leſs ſpoil there. Add hereunto another freſh Army of Tartarians, to the number of 5000000. who at the very ſame time joyning themſelves together, entred into Muſcovia and Cracovia, and made moſt horrible ſlaughter, ſparing neither Sex nor Age, noble nor unnoble within the Land. From thence paſſing to Uratiſlavia, they made great ſpoil there alſo, and thinking there to win the Caſtle, were by the miraculous working of the Lord, at the inſtance and prayers of good people, diſcomfited beyond all expectation of Man, by Thunder and Lightning falling upon them from Heaven in moſt terrible wiſe.

The Scythians Army like locuſts.

The ſame year immediatly after Eaſter, another Army of Tartarians were gathered againſt Lignicium, drawing near to Germany; by the brute whereof, the Germans, being put in great fears, were altogether diſmaied, but yet not able to help themſelves, by reaſon they lacked a good guid and governor amongſt them. All which came to paſs, ſpecially by the miſchievous practice of the Roman Popes, raiſing variance and diſcord among them. Notwithſtanding, Henry Prince of Polonia and Sileſia, gathering a power as well as he could, did incounter with him; but in fine, his whole Army was vanquiſhed, and the King himſelf ſlain. Notwithſtanding, which overthrow of Chriſtians, it pleaſed God to ſtrike ſuch a fear into the hearts of the ſaid Tartarians, that they durſt not approach any further or neerer into Germany, but retired for that time into their Country again: Who recounting their victory, by taking each man but one ear of every one of the Chriſtians that were ſlain, found the ſlaughter ſo great, as that they filled nine great ſacks full of ears. Nevertheleſs, after this in the year 1260. the ſame Tartarians, having the Muſcovites to their guids, returned again into Polonia and Cracovia, where in the ſpace of three months, they overran the Land with fire and ſword to the Coaſts of Sileſia, and had not the Princes of Germany put to their helping hand in this lamentable caſe, they had utterly waſted the whole Land of Polonia, and the Coaſts thereabout.

This year alſo in the month April, Richard King of Almain died at the Caſtle of Barkhamſted, and was buried at the Abbey of Hailes, which he built out of the ground. The ſame year alſo at Norwich there fell a great controverſie between the Monks and the Citizens, about certain tallagies and liberties. At laſt, after much alteration and wrangling words, the furious rage of the Citizens ſo much increaſed and prevailed, and ſo little was the fear of God before their eyes, that altogether they ſet upon the Abbey and Priory, and burned both the Church and Biſhops Palace. When this thing was heard abroad, the people were very ſorry to hear of ſo bold and naughty an enterpriſe, and much diſcommended the ſame. At the laſt, King Henry calling for certain of his Lords and Barons, ſent them to the City of Norwich, that they might puniſh and ſee execution done on the chiefeſt Malefactors; inſomuch that ſome of them were condemned and burnt, ſome of them hanged, and ſome were drawn by the heels with Horſes throughout the ſtreets of the City, and after in much miſery ended their wretched lives. ## King Edward the Firſt.

Edward the Firſt.

IN the time of the death of King Henry, Edward his his Eldeſt Son was abſent in Vaſconia, as a little before you heard; yet notwithſtanding, by Robert Kilwarby Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other Biſhops and Nobles, he was ordained Heir and Succeſſor after his Father; who, after he had heard of his Fathers death, returned home to his Country, and was Crowned in the year of our Lord 1274. Who then laid down his Crown, ſaying, he would no more put it on, before he had gathered together all the Lands appertaining to the ſame. This Edward as he had always before been a loving and natural Child to his Father, whom he had delivered out of priſon and captivity; and hearing afterward both together of the death of his Son, and of his Father, wept and lamented much more for his Father, than for his Son, ſaying to the French King (which asked the cauſe thereof) that the loſs of his Child was but light; for Children might after increaſe and be multiplied, but the loſs of his Parent was greater, which could not be recovered: Robert Avesbury. So Almighty God, for the ſame his Piety to his Father ſhewed, rewarded him again with great ſucceſs, Felicity, and long Reign: Inſomuch that he being young, as he was playing at Cheſs with a certain Souldier of his, ſuddenly having occaſion given, roſe up and went his way; who was not ſo ſoon voided the place, but incontinent fell down a mighty ſtone from the vault above, directly upon the place where he ſate, able to have quaſhed him in pieces, if he had tarried never ſo little more. In the preſervation of whom, as I ſee the preſent hand and mighty providence of the living God: So in the Kings Order again, I note a fault or error worthy of reprehenſion for that he, receiving ſuch a living benefit at the hand of the living Lord, going therefore on Pilgrimage to Walſingham, gave thanks not only to our Lord, but rather to a rotten block. Ibidem. Of the gentle nature of this couragious Prince, ſufficient proof is given by this one example: that what time he being in his diſport of Hawking, chanced ſharply to rebuke the negligence of one of his Gentlemen, for what fault I cannot tell, about his Hawk; the Gentleman being on the other ſide of the River, hearing his menacing words, was glad (as he ſaid) that the River was between them. With this anſwer the couragious blood of this Prince being moved, upon preſent heat he leaped ſtraight into the flood, both of a ſwift ſtream and of a dangerous deepneſs, and no leſs hard in getting out. Notwithſtanding, either forgetting his own life, or neglecting the danger preſent, and having a good Horſe, ventureth his own death, to have the death of his man. At length, with much difficulty recovering the bank, with his ſword drawn he purſueth his provoker. Who having not ſo good an Horſe, and ſeeing himſelf in danger of taking, reineth his Horſe, and returning back barehead unto the Prince, ſubmitteth his neck under his hand to ſtrike. The Prince, whoſe fervent ſtomack the water of the whole River could not quench, a little ſubmiſſion of his man did ſo cool, that the quarrel fell, his anger ceaſed, and his ſword was put up without any ſtroak given. And ſo both returned to their Game, good friends again. Avesb. Nico. Trivet.

In the firſt beginning of his Reign, the King had much ado in Wales, where he had divers conflicts with the Welſh-men, whom at laſt he ſubdued, and cut down their woods, ſuppreſſed rebellions, and vanquiſhing their Kings Lewline and his Brother, ordained his Eldeſt Son Edward, born in the ſame Country, to be Prince of Wales. This Lewline Captain of the Welſh-men here mentioned, rebelling againſt King Edward, asked Counſel of conjuration, what event ſhould come upon his attempt. To whom it was told, that he ſhould go forward boldly, for doubtleſs he ſhould ride through Cheapſide at London, with a Crown on his Head. Which ſo came to paſs. For being ſlain, his Head was carried through Cheap, with a Crown of Silver to London Bridge. Whereby men may learn not to ſeek nor ſtick to theſe vain Prophecies, which though they fall true, yet are they trains of the Divel to deceive men.

About this time was a great Earthquake, and ſuch a Rot, that conſumed a great multitude of Sheep in the Land, through the occaſion (as they ſay) of one ſcabbed Sheep that came out of Spain. The King returning from Wales to England, ordered certain new Laws for the wealth of the Realm. Among many others, this was one; that Authority was given to all Maiors, Bailifs, and other Officers to ſee execution and puniſhment of all Bakers making Bread under the Size, with pillory. Of Millers ſtealing Corn, with the Tumbrel, &c. And within two years after the Statute of Mortmain was firſt enacted, which is as much to ſay, that no man ſhould give unto the Church any Lands of Rents, without eſpecial Licence of the King.

About which time alſo, being the ſeventh year of his Reign, 1279. Jews for Money clipping were put to execution. In which year began firſt the foundation of the Black-Friers by Ludgate. And the Town of Boſton was greatly waſted the ſame year with fire. The half penny and farthing began firſt to be coined the ſelf ſame time, which was the Eighth year of his Reign. The great Conduit in Cheap began the Fourth year after to be made, Anno. 1284. And the next year following, the new work of the Church of Weſtminſter (begun as is afore premoniſhed in the Third year of Henry the Third) was finiſhed, which was ſixty ſix years in edifying. The Jews were utterly baniſhed this Realm of England the ſame time, for which the Commons gave to the King a fifteenth, &c.

A place in Fabian corrected.

Ex Tho. Walſ. & Gualtero Gisburnenſi.

After that the Countrey of Wales was brought in a full order and quiet, by the hewing down of the Woods, and caſting down the old holds, and building of new; which all was brought to perfect end, about the 24. year of this Kings Reign. Then enſued another broil as great or greater with Scotland, to the great diſquiet of the King and the Realm of England many years after. This trouble firſt began by the death of Alexander King of Scots, who died without Iſſue left alive behind him. Although Fabian in the 7. Book of his Chronicles affirmeth; that he left three Daughters, the Eldeſt married to Sir John Baliol, the ſecond, to Robert Bruce, the third, to one Haſtings. But this in Fabian is to be corrected, as which neither ſtandeth with it ſelf, and is clearly convicted by the witneſs and Hiſtory of Rob. Avesb. and alſo of Gisburn.

For firſt, if King Alexander had left his Eldeſt Daughter married to Sir John Baliol, then what controverſie might riſe among the Lords about ſucceſſion, needing ſo diligent and anxious deciding by the King of England? Secondly, what claim or title could the King of Norway have to the Crown of Scotland, which was one of the Challengers, claiming the ſaid Crown in the behalf of Margaret the Niece of the foreſaid King Alexander her Grandfather, if the Eldeſt Daughter of the Father had been left alive? Thirdly, what can be more plain, when by the affirmance of the foreſaid Story it is teſtified, that King Alexander had two Wives? Of the ſecond whereof he had no iſſue. Of the firſt he had two Children; Alexander which died before his Father; and Margaret married to the King of Norway, which died alſo before her Father, of whom came Margaret the Niece of Alexander, and Daughter to the King of Norway afore mentioned. And ſhe alſo died in the journey between Norway and Scotland, the fourth year after the deceaſe of her Grandfather. Wherefore, as this matter ſtandeth moſt clear, ſo let us now, returning from whence we digreſſed, proſecute the reſt that that followeth. After that Alexander thus, as is ſaid, departed without iſſue, and alſo Margaret his Neece in Norway was deceaſed, the matter came in a great doubt among the Nobles of Scotland (eſpecially twelve by name) to whom the right of the Crown ſhould next pertain. After much variance among Parties, at length the election and determination of the matter was committed to the judgment of King Edward of England: who after ſufficient proof made to the Scots, and firm evidence brought out of all the ancient Hiſtories both of England and Scotland, teſtifying from time to time that he was chief Head and Sovereign of the Realm of Scotland; firſt, by neceſſity of the Law, and by all their conſents took full poſſeſſion of the ſame. And that done, adjudged the right of the Crown to John Baliol, who deſcended of the Daughter of David Earl of Huntington, Brother to David King of Scots in the days of King Henry the Second. This Earl David had three Daughters, Iſabel married to Robert Bruſe, Margaret to Allen Earl of Galloway, and Ellen to Henry Lord Haſtings. Allen Earl of Galloway had Ellen, married to Roger Quincy Earl of Winchester, Conſtable of Scotland, and Dervagile married to John Baliol, Father to Edward King of Scots.

The King of England proved by old Records, chief Head and Sovereign of Scotland.

Anno 1291.

John Baliol made King of Scotland by King Edward.

King of Scots doth homage to the King of England.

When theſe things were thus finiſhed in Scotland, and Sir John Baliol as moſt rightful Inheritor had received the Crown of Scotland at the hands of King Edward, thankfully, and for the ſame, in the preſence of the Barony of England and of Scotland, did unto the ſaid King Edward his Homage, and ſware to him Fealty: the Scots with their new King returned into Scotland, and King Edward removed again to England.

The falſeneſs of the Scottiſh King.

But not long after, the falſeneſs of this Scottiſh King ſoon appeared. Who, repenting him of his Homage done unruly, forſook his former Oath and Promiſe, and made War againſt King Edward, through the counſel of the Abbot of Menros. Wherefore, the King with a great Hoſt ſped him into Scotland, and in proceſs laid Siege to the Town of Barwick, which the Scots did eagerly defend, not only to the diſcomfiture, but alſo to the deriſion of the King and his Engliſh Hoſt. But in concluſion, the Engliſh men prevailed and won the Town, where were ſlain of the Scots the number of twenty and five thouſand. And while the King was there buſied in winning other Holds about the ſame, he ſent part of his Hoſt to Dunbar, where the Engliſh-men again had the Victory, and ſlew of the Scots twenty thouſand: Gisburne ſaith but ten thouſand; ſo that very few were loſt of the Engliſh Company. The King, with a great number of Priſoners returning into his Realm, ſhortly after ſped him over unto Flanders, where he ſuſtained great trouble by the French King, till truce for a certain ſpace was between them concluded. But in the mean while that King Edward was thus occupied beyond the Seas, the French King (reſorting to his practiſed manner) ſet the Scots ſecretly againſt the Engliſhmen to keep the King at home. Which Scots, making themſelves a Captain named William Waleis, warred upon the borders of Northumberland, where they did much hurt. At length the King, returning from Burdeaux into England, ſhortly upon the ſame took his journey into Scotland. Where meeting at York with his Hoſt, he marched into the Realm of Scotland, winning, as he went, Towns and Caſtles, till at length coming to the Town of Frankyrch on Mary Magdalens day, he met with the Power of Scotland, and had with them a ſore fight, but through Gods Providence the Victory fell to the right cauſe of Engliſhmen: ſo that of the Scots were ſlain in the field, as it is of divers Writers affirmed, above the number of thirty and two thouſand; and of Engliſhmen, but barely twenty eight perſons. Whereupon the King, again taking poſſeſſion and fealty of the whole Land, returned home.

The Town and Caſtle of Barwick won of Engliſhmen.

Falſeneſs juſtly puniſhed.

The Scots rebel again.

The ſecond Voyage of King Edward into Scotland.

Anno 1298.

And yet the falſe untruth of the Scots would not thus be ruled, but roſe up in a new broil: ſo that the King was inforced to make his Power again the year following into Scotland; where he ſo ſuppreſſed the Rebellion of the Lords and of the Commons, that they, ſwearing to the Kings Allegiance, preſented themſelves by great Companies, and put them wholly in the Kings Grace and Mercy: ſo that the King, thinking himſelf to be in peaceable poſſeſſion, and in a great ſurety of the Land, cauſed to be ſworn unto him the Rulers of the Boroughs, Cities and Towns, with other Officers of the Land, and ſo returned unto Barwick, and ſo into England, and laſtly to Weſtminſter.

Ex Fabiano. A notable Victory againſt the Scots.

Anno 1299.

The Scots ſworn to the Kings Allegiance.

Theſe Martial Affairs between England and Scotland, although they appertain not greatly to the purpoſe of our ſtory Eccleſiaſtical, yet ſo much by the way I thought briefly to touch, whereby, that which followeth in the ſequel hereof, might the better be underſtood by theſe premiſſes. As the Scots were thus warring and raging againſt the King, and ſaw they could not make their party good, they ſent privily to Pope Boniface for his aid and counſel: who immediatly ſendeth down his Precept to the King, to this effect, that he ſhould hereafter ſurceaſe to diſquiet or moleſt the Scots, for that they were a people exempt, and properly pertaining to his Chappel. And therefore it could not otherwiſe be, but that the City of Jeruſalem muſt needs defend his own Citizens; and as the Mount Sion, maintain ſuch as truſt in the Lord, &c. Whereunto the King briefly maketh anſwer again, ſwearing with an Oath, that he would to his uttermoſt keep and defend that which was his right, evidently known to all the world, &c. Thus the Scots bearing themſelves bold upon the Popes Meſſage, and alſo confederating themſelves with the Frenchmen, paſſed over that year. The next year after that (which was the 29*th* year of the Kings Reign) the ſaid Pope Boniface directeth his Letters again to the King, wherein he doth vindicate the Kingdom of Scotland, to be proper to the Church of Rome, and not ſubject to the King of England. And therefore it was againſt God, againſt Juſtice, and alſo prejudicial to the Church of Rome, for him to have or hold Dominion over the ſame, which he proved by theſe Reaſons:

Ex Chron. Tho. Walſ. Averib. The Popes Meſſage unto the King.

The Kings anſwer to the Pope.

The Pope challengeth the Realm of Scotland to be free from the Dominion of England.

Firſt, That when King Henry, the Father of this King received Aid of Alexander King of Scots in his Wars againſt Simon Mountford, he recognized and acknowledged in his Letters Patents, that he received the ſame of King Alexander, not of any duty, but of ſpecial favour.

Item, When the ſaid King Alexander, coming to England, did Homage to the ſaid King Henry; he did it not as King of Scotland, but only for certain Lands of Tindal and Penteth, lying in England.

Item, Whereas the ſaid King Alexander left behind him Margaret his Heir, being Niece to the King of England, and yet under age; yet the tuition of the ſaid Margaret was committed not to the King of England, but to certain Lords of Scotland, deputed to the ſame.

Moreover, when any Legacy was directed down from Rome to the Realm of England, for collecting of Tenths of other cauſes, the ſaid Legacy took no place in the Realm of Scotland, and might well be reſiſted (as it was in King Alexander his days) except another ſpecial Commiſſion touching the Realm of Scotland, were joyned withal. Whereby it appeareth, that theſe be two ſeveral Dominions, and not ſubject under one.

Adding Furthermore, that the Kingdom of Scotland firſt was converted by the reliques of the bleſſed Apoſtle Saint Peter, through the divine operation of God, to the unity of the Catholick Faith.

Wherefore upon theſe cauſes and reaſons, Pope Boniface in his Letters to the King, required him to give over his claim, and ceaſe his Wars againſt the Scotiſh Nation: and to releaſe all ſuch both of the ſpirituality and Laity, as he had of them Priſoners. Alſo to call home again his Officers and Deputies, which he had there placed and ordained to the grievance of that Nation, to the ſlander of all faithful people, and no leſs prejudice to the Church of Rome. And if he would claim any right or title to the ſaid Realm, or any part thereof, he ſhould ſend up his Procurators ſpecially to the ſame appointed, with all that he could for himſelf alledge, unto the See Apoſtolick, there to receive what reaſon and right would require.

Anno 1301.

The King replieth to the Pope.

The King, after he had received theſe Letters of the Pope, aſſembled a Council or Parliament at Lincoln: By the advice of which Council and Parliament, he addreſſed other Letters reſponſal to the Pope again; wherein firſt in all reverend manner he diſſuadeth him not to give light ear to the ſiniſter ſuggeſtions of falſe reports, and Imaginers of miſchief. Then he declareth out of old Records and Hiſtories from the firſt time of the Britains, that the Realm of Scotland hath always from time to time been all one with England, beginning firſt with Brutus in the time of Helt and Samuel the Prophet: which Brutus, coming from Troy to this Iſle called then Albion, after called by him Britannia, had three Sons; Locrinus, to whom he gave that part of the Land, called then of him Loegria, now Anglia; Albanactus his ſecond Son, to whom he gave Albania, now called Scotia; and his third Son Camber, to whom he gave Cambria, now called Wales, &c.

Scotland all one with England.

¶ Beſides theſe Letters of the King, the Lords Temporal alſo, in the name of the whole Commonalty and Parliament, wrote another Letter to the Pope anſwering to that, whereas the Pope Arrogated to him to be Judge for the title of the Realm of Scotland, which the King of England claimed unto himſelf; which Letter I thought good alſo here to annex, containing, as in the words of the ſame here followeth to be read and ſeen.

The Lords Temporal, and the whole Barony of England to the Pope.

THE Holy mother Church by whoſe miniſtry the Catholick See is Governed, in her deeds (as we throughly believe and hold) proceedeth with that ripeneſs in judgment, that ſhe will be hurtful to none: But like a mother would every mans right to be kept unbroken as well in other, as in her ſelf. Whereas therefore in a general Parliament, called at Lincoln of late by our moſt dread Lord Edward, by the Grace of God the Noble King of England: the ſame our Lord cauſed certain Letters received from you to be read openly, and to be declared ſeriouſly before us, about certain buſineſſes touching the condition and ſtate of the Realm of Scotland: we did not a little muſe and marvel with our ſelves, hearing the meanings concerning the ſame, ſo wonderous and ſtrange, as the like we have not heard at any time before. For we know moſt holy Father, and it is well known as well in this Realm of England, as alſo it is not unknown to other perſons beſides, that from the firſt beginning of the Realm of England, the certain and direct Government of the Realm of Scotland in all Temporal cauſes, from time to time, belonged to the Kings of the ſame Realm of England, and Realm of Scotland; as well in the times of the Britains, as alſo of Engliſh-men. Yea rather, the ſame Realm of Scotland of old time was in fee to the Anceſtors of our foreſaid Lords Kings of England, yea and to himſelf. Furthermore, the Kings of the Scots, and the Realm have not been under any other than the Kings of England; and the Kings of England have anſwered, or ought to anſwer for their rights in the foreſaid Realm, or for any his temporalities before any Judge Eccleſiaſtical or ſecular, by reaſon of free preheminence of the ſtate of his Royal Dignity, and Cuſtom kept without breach at all times. Wherefore, after treaty had and diligent deliberation of the contents in your foreſaid Letters, this was the common agreeing and conſent with one mind, and ſhall be without fail in time to come by Gods grace; that our foreſaid

KING Edw. I. ſaid Lord the King ought by no means to anſwer in judgment in any caſe, or ſhould bring his foreſaid right into doubt; nor ought to ſend any Proctors or Meſſengers to your preſence: eſpecially ſeeing that the premiſſes tend manifeſtly to the diſheriting of the right of the Crown of England, and the plain overthrow of the State of the ſaid Realm, and alſo hurt of the Liberties, Cuſtoms and Laws of our Fathers: for the keeping and defence of which we are bound by the duty of our oath made, and we will maintain them with all power, and will defend them (by Gods help) with all ſtrength. And further, we will not ſuffer our foreſaid Lord the King to do, or by any means to attempt the premiſſes, being ſo unaccuſtomed, unwont, and not heard of afore. Wherefore, we reverently and humbly beſeech your Holineſs that ye would ſuffer the ſame our Lord King of England (who among other Princes of the World, ſheweth himſelf Catholick and devout to the Romiſh Church) quietly to enjoy his Rights, Liberties, Cuſtoms, and Laws aforeſaid; without all impairing and trouble, and let them continue untouched. In witneſs whereof we have ſet our ſeals to theſe preſents, as well for us, as for the whole Commonalty of the foreſaid Realm of England. Dated at Lincoln in the year of our Saviour 1301. & Anno Edwardi primi 28.

Anno 1303. The Pope ſetteth King againſt King.

The year following, which was from Chriſt Anno 1303. the ſaid Pope Boniface the eighth of that name, taking diſpleaſure with Philip the French King, did excite King Edward of England to War againſt him, promiſing him great aid thereunto. But he (as mine Author ſaith) little truſting the Popes falſe unſtable affection toward him well proved before, put him off with delaies. Ex Rob. Avesb. Whereupon, the French King fearing the power of King Edward, whom the Pope had ſet againſt his friendſhip, reſtored unto him again Vaſcone, which he wrongfully had in his hands detained. Concerning this variance here mentioned between the Pope and the French King, how it began firſt, and to what end it fell out, the ſequel hereof (Chriſt willing) ſhall declare, after that firſt I have finiſhed the diſcourſe begun between England and Scotland.

Ex Rob. Avesb.

Another Scotiſh rebellion ſuppreſſed.

In the year 1303. the foreſaid William Waleis which had done ſo many diſpleaſures to the King before, continuing ſtill in his rebellion, gathered great multitudes of the Scots to withſtand the King, till at length the year following he was taken, and ſent up to London, and there Executed for the ſame. After which things done, the King then held his Parliament at Weſtminſter, whither came out of Scotland the Biſhop of Saint Andrews, Robert Bruſe above mentioned, Earl of Dunbare, Earl of Arles, and Sir John Comming, with divers other: The which voluntarily were ſworn to be true to the King of England, and to keep the Land of Scotland to his uſe againſt all perſons. But ſhortly after the ſaid Robert Bruſe, who, as is ſaid, married the Second Daughter of Earl David, forgetting his Oath before made unto the King, within a year or two after this, by the counſel of the Abbot of Stone, and the Biſhop of Saint Andrews ſent up unto Pope Clement the fifth, for a diſpenſation of his Oath made; inſinuating to him, that King Edward vexed and grieved the Realm of Scotland wrongfully. Whereupon the Pope wrote unto the King to leave off ſuch doings. Notwithſtanding which inhibition of the Pope, the King proſecuting his own right, after he had the underſtanding of the doings of the Scots, and of the miſchief of Robert Bruſe, (who had ſlain with his own hands Sir John Comming, for not conſenting with him and other Lords at his Parliament) arreared his power and ſtrength of men, preparing himſelf toward Scotland, where he joyning with the ſaid Sir Robert and all his power of Scotland in a plain, near unto Saint Johns Town, put him to flight, and ſo chaſed the Scots, that of them were ſlain to the number of ſeven Thouſand. In the which Victory, ſuch Biſhops and Abbots as were taken he ſent to the Pope; the Temporal Lords and other Scots he ſent to London, &c. Sir Robert Bruſe after this diſcomfiture, when he had thus loſt both the Field and his chief Friends, ſeeing himſelf not able to make his party good, fled into Norway, where he kept his abode during the time while King Edward lived. When this Noble Edward had thus ſubdued the Scots, he yielded thanks to God for his Victory, and ſo ſetting the Land in a quiet, and an Order, he returned unto London, which was the 35th year, and laſt of his Reign, &c.

The Pope diſpenſeth with due and true obedience of ſubjects towards their Prince.

The Popes inhibition neglected in England.

Another rebellion of the Scots repreſſed.

The Scots again ſubdued.

Now to return to that which I promiſed before touching the variance and grievous diſſention between Philip the French King, and Pope Boniface the eighth of that name: After the Biſhoprick of Rome had been long void through the diſſention of the Cardinals, for the ſpace of two years and three months; at length Pope Celeſtinus was choſen ſucceſſor to Pope Nicholas the fourth. Which Celeſtinus in his firſt conſiſtory began to reform the Clergy of Rome, thinking to make it an example to all other Churches. Wherefore, he procured to himſelf ſuch hatred among his Clergy men, that this Boniface, then called Benedictus, ſpeaking through a Reed in his Chamber wall, nightly admoniſhed him, as it had been a voice from Heaven, that he ſhould give over his Papacy, as being a burthen bigger than he could weild.

A grievous variance between Philip the French King and Pope Boniface.

Pope Nicholas the 4. Popedom vacant two years.

This Pope Celeſtin after he had ſate ſix months, by the treachery and falſhood of this Boniface, was induced to give up and reſign his Biſhoprick, partly for the voice ſpoken of before, partly for fear; being told of certain craftily ſubborned in his Chamber, that, if he did not reſign, he ſhould loſe his life. Who then after his reſignation going to live in ſome ſolitary deſart (being a ſimple man) was vilely taken and thruſt into perpetual priſon by Pope Boniface, craftily pretending that he did it not for any hatred unto Celeſtine, but that ſeditious perſons might not have him as their head to raiſe up ſome ſtir in the Church. And ſo he was brought to his death. Wherefore, this Boniface was worthily called the eighth Nero: of whom it was rightly ſaid, He came in like a Fox, Reigned like a Lion, and died like a Dog.

Pope Celeſtinus 5.

Crafty jugling among Popes and Cardinals. Ex Maſſeo.

The 8 Nero.

This Pope Boniface ſucceeding, or rather invading after Celeſtinus, behaved himſelf ſo imperiouſly, that he put down Princes, Excommunicated Kings, ſuch as did not take their confirmation at his hand. Divers of his Cardinals he drove away for fear, ſome of them as ſchiſmaticks he depoſed and ſpoiled of all their ſubſtance. Philip the French King he Excommunicated, for not ſuffering his money to go out of the Realm; and therefore curſed both him and his to the fourth Generation. Albertus the Emperor not once or twice, but thrice fought at his hands to be confirmed, and yet was rejected, neither could obtain, unleſs he would promiſe to drive the French King out of his Realm. In the factious diſcord in Italy between the Guelphs and Gibellines, which the part of a good Biſhop had been to extinguiſh, ſo little he helped to quench the ſmoak, that he of all other was the chiefeſt firebrand to increaſe the flame. Inſomuch that upon Aſhwedneſday, when Porchetus an Archbiſhop came and kneeled down before him to receive his Aſhes, Pope Boniface looking upon him, and perceiving that he was one of the Gibellines part, caſt his handful of aſhes in his eyes, ſaying, Memento homo quod Gibellinus es, &c. That is, Remember man that a Gibelline thou art, and to aſhes thou ſhalt go. This Pope moreover ordained firſt the Jubile in Rome, in the ſolemnizing whereof, the firſt day he ſhewed himſelf in his Pontificalibus, and gave free remiſſion of ſins to as many as came to Rome out of all the parts of the World. The ſecond day (being arraied with Imperial Enſigns) he commanded a naked ſword to be carried before him, and ſaid with a loud voice; Ecce poteſtatem utriuſque gladii, That is, Loe here the power and authority of both the ſwords, &c.

The Pope miſchief deſcribed.

Guelphs and Gibellins two factions in Rome.

Jubile firſt begun in Rome.

The Pope claimed and practiſeth power of both ſwords.

From the which very year (as moſt Stories do record) the Turks do begin the firſt Count of their Turkiſh Emperors, whereof the firſt was Ottomannus, as you ſhall hear diſcourſed hereafter by Gods grace in the Hiſtorie of the Turks.

By this ſaid Pope Boniface divers conſtitutions extravagants of his Predeceſſors were collected together, with many of his own newly added thereto, and ſo made the Book called Sextus decretalium &c. By whom alſo firſt ſprang up pardons and indulgences from Rome.

Pope Boniface 8. Author of the Book of decretals.

Romiſh pardons firſt begun by Pope Boniface. Ex Hiſt. Nic. Trivet.

Theſe things thus premiſed of Boniface the Pope, now will I come to the occaſion of the ſtrife between him, and the French King. Concerning which matter, firſt I find in the Hiſtory of Nicholas Trivet, that in the year of our Lord, 1301. the Biſhop of Oppanuham, being accuſed for a conſpiracy againſt the French King, was brought up to his Court, and ſo committed to priſon. The Pope hearing this, ſendeth word to the King by his Legate to ſet him at liberty. The French King, not daring to the contrary, looſeth the Biſhop. But when he had done, he diſchargeth both the Biſhop and the Legate, commanding them to void his Realm. Whereupon, Pope Boniface revoketh all the Graces and Privileges granted either by him or his Predeceſſors before to the Kingdom of France; alſo not long after he thundred out the ſentence of his Curſe againſt him. Moreover, he citeth all the Prelates, all Divines, and Lawyers both civil and canon, to appear perſonally before him at Rome, at a certain day, which was the firſt of November. Againſt this Citation the King again provideth, and commandeth by ſtrait Proclamation, that no manner of perſon ſhould export out of the Realm of France either Gold, or Silver, or any other manner of Ware or Merchandiſe upon pain of forfeiting all their goods, and their bodies at the Kings pleaſure: providing withall, that the ways and paſſages, ſhould diligently be kept, that none might paſs unſearched. Over and beſides, the ſaid French King defeated the Pope in giving and beſtowing Prebends, and Benefices, and other Eccleſiaſtical Livings, contrary to the Popes profit. For the which cauſe, the Pope writeth to the foreſaid King in form and effect as followeth.

Philip the French King Excommunicated.

Boniface Biſhop, and Servant to Gods Servants, to his beloved Son Philip, by the Grace of God, King of France, Greeting and Apoſtolical Bleſſing.

Ex lib. Stephan Anfrerii.

BOniface the Servant of Gods Servants, &c. Fear God, and obſerve his Commandments. We will thee to underſtand, that thou art ſubject to us both in Spiritual things, and Temporal; And that no gift of Benefices or Prebends belongeth to thee; and if thou have the keeping of any being vacant, that thou reſerve the profits of them to the Succeſſors. But if thou have given any, we judge the Gift to be void, and call back how far ſoever thou haſt gone forward. And whoſoever believeth otherwiſe, we judge them Hereticks.

Unto this Letter of the Pope, King Philip maketh anſwer again in manner and order as followeth, which is this:

Philip by the Grace of God King of France, to Boniface not in deeds behaving himſelf for Pope, little Friendſhip or none.

A Letter of King Philip of France to Pope Boniface.

TO Boniface bearing himſelf for chief Biſhop, little health or none. Let thy fooliſhneſs know, that in Temporal things we are ſubject to no man, and that the Gifts of Prebends and Benefices, made and to be made by us, were and ſhall be good, both in time paſt and to come. And that we will defend manfully the Poſſeſſor of the ſaid Benefices, and we think them that believe or think otherwiſe, Fools and mad men. Given at Paris the Wedneſday after Candlemas, 1301.

After theſe aforeſaid and other writings paſſing to and fro, between the French King and the Pope; within a year and an half after, the King ſummoneth a Parliament, ſending down his Letters to his Sheriffs and other Officers, to ſummon the Prelates and Barons of the Realm unto the ſaid Court of Parliament, according to the tenor of the Kings Letters here following:

A Parliament ſummoned by King Philip at Paris.

PHilip by the Grace of God King of France, &c. Whereas we would take counſel with the Prelates, Barons, and other our faithful, about weighty matters and hard, and ſuch as belong greatly to our Right, and touching our Honour, State, Liberties, and Laws of this our Realm, Churches, and Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, and would alſo go forward and proceed in the foreſaid matters according to their counſel: We command you, that ye diligently in our behalf require and ſtraightly charge all the Prelates in your Bayliwick, and alſo all and ſingular Abbots and Priors of the ſame your foreſaid Bayliwick, (to certain of the which we have directed down our ſpecial Letters for the ſame cauſe) that as they favour our Honour, the good ſtate both of the Realm, of themſelves and of the Church, they repair to us in their own perſons, all lets and delays ſet aſide, and all other buſineſs left off. Shewing to them moreover, that we can judge none of them to be either to us faithful Subjects, or Friends to the Realm, which ſhall fail herein, or withdraw himſelf in the foreſaid buſineſs, counſels, and helps in time. Wherein if peradventure any ſhall ſlack or refuſe to reſort and come toward us within eight days from the time of this Charge given by you, or your Commandment; then we require you to ſeize all his temporal goods in our hand, and ſo ſeized to hold them until you receive other Commandment from us. Given at Paris the Monday before the Nativity of S. John Baptiſt, in the year of our Lord, 1303.

KING Edw. I.

A Declaration of Maſter William Nagareta, made againſt Pope Boniface the Eighth, with his Appellation alſo made at Paris, before the King and his Council in the Church of Paris.

IN the Name of God, Amen. In the year of our Lord, 1303. Indictione ſecunda, the 12. day of March, and the ninth year of the Popedom of the moſt holy Father the Lord Boniface the Eighth, by Gods Providence Pope, and in the preſence of us common Notaries, and witneſſes under written, the Nobleman Maſter William Nagareta Knight (a worſhipful Profeſſor of the Laws) ſtanding before the moſt excellent Prince the Lord Philip, by the Grace of God moſt noble King of France, ſpake with lively words, and gave in writings theſe things that follow:

The Appe of Nagare gainſt Boniface eighth.

Ex Regiſtro

There have been falſe Prophets among the people, as there have been alſo among you falſe Teachers, &c. Saint Peter the glorious Prince of the Apoſtles, ſpeaking to us by the Spirit, told us things to come; that like wiſe as there were falſe Prophets aforetimes, ſo there ſhould come among you falſe Teachers, bringing in Sects of deſtruction; by the which the way of truth ſhall be defaced; and covetouſly they ſhall make Merchandiſe of you with fained words; and further addeth, that ſuch Maſters did follow the way of Balaam, of Boſor, which loved the reward of wickedneſs, and had his bridled Aſs to correct his madneſs, which ſpeaking in a mans voice, did ſtop the fooliſhneſs of the Prophet. All which things as they be ſhewed to us by the greateſt Patriach himſelf; your eyes ſee them fulfilled this day according to the Letter. For there ſitteth in Saint Peters Chair the Maſter of Lyes, cauſing himſelf to be called Boniface, a well-doer, where he is notable in all kind of evil doing, and ſo he hath taken to himſelf a falſe name; and where he is not a true Ruler and Maſter, he calleth himſelf the Lord, Judge, and Maſter of all men. And coming in contrary to the common Order appointed by the holy Fathers, and alſo contrary to the Rules of reaſon, and ſo not entring in at the door into the Lords Sheepfold, he is not a Shepherd nor Hireling, but rather a Thief and Robber. For he (the true Husband of the Romiſh Church yet living) deceived him that was delighted in ſimplicity, and enticed him with fained flatterings and gifts to let him have his Spouſe to be his wife, againſt truth, which crieth, Thoſe whom God hath coupled, let no man ſeparate: and at length laying violent hands upon him, perſwading him falſly that thing which the Deceiver ſaid to come from the holy Spirit, was not aſhamed to joyn to himſelf with wicked practice that holy Church, which is Miſtreſs of all Churches, calling himſelf her Husband, whereas he cannot be: for Celeſtinus the true Romiſh Biſhop agreed not to the ſaid Divorce, being deceived by ſo great ſubtilty; nothing is ſo contrary to agreeing as error and deceit, as mans Law bear witneſs, that I need not to ſpeak of his violence. But becauſe the Spirit inſpireth where he will, and he that is led with the Spirit, is not under the Law; the holy univerſal Church of God, not knowing the crimes of that Deceiver, ſtumbling and doubting whether it came from the Holy Ghoſt that Celeſtinus ſhould leave off his Government, and the ſins of the people deſerving it, for fear of a Schiſm ſuffered the foreſaid Deceiver: although, according to the Doctrine of our Lord, By his fruits he might be known, whether he came to the ſaid Regiment by the Holy Ghoſt or otherwiſe: his

An invective againſt the placing of Boniface the eighth in the Papal Sea.

KING Edw. I

his fruits (as it is plainly here written beneath) are now manifeſt to all men, by which it is apparent to the world, that he came not in by God, but otherways; and ſo came not in by the Sheepfold. His fruits are moſt wicked, and his end is death; and therefore it is neceſſary that ſo evil a Tree (according to the Lords ſaying) ſhould be cut down and caſt into the fire. This cannot avail to his excuſe, which is ſaid of ſome men, that is, that the Cardinals did agree upon him again, after the death of the ſaid Celeſtinus the Pope, ſeeing he could not be her Husband, whom it is manifeſt that he defiled by Adultery, her firſt Husband yet living, and ſhe being worthy to have the promiſe of marriage kept unto her: therefore, becauſe that which is done againſt the Lord turneth to the wrong of all men; and eſpecially in ſo great a miſchief, by reaſon of the conſequence by which ſhe is judged of the people both a woman adultereſs or defamed: I, like a bridled Aſs, by the power of the Lord, and not by the voice of a perfect man, being not able to bear ſo great a burthen, take in hand to rebuke the madneſs of the ſaid falſe Prophet Balaam, which at the inſtance of King Balack; that is, of the Prince of Devils, whom he ſerveth, ready to curſe the people bleſſed of the Lord. I beſeech you moſt excellent Prince, and Lord Philip, by the Grace of God King of France, that like as the Angel of God in time paſt met in the way, with a Sword drawn, the Prophet Balaam going to curſe Gods people; ſo you (which are unwilling to execute Juſtice, and therefore like the Angel of the Lord, and Miniſter of Power and Office) would meet with a naked Sword this ſaid wicked man, which is far worſe than Balaam, that he perform not that evil which he intendeth to the people.

The Pope well compared to Balaam which was wont to curſe Gods people for reward of money.

Articles propounded againſt Pope Boniface.

Firſt, I propound that the foreſaid man, that nameth himſelf Boniface, is no Pope, but wrongfully keepeth the Seat which he hath, indeed to the great damage of all the Souls of Gods holy Church. I ſay alſo, that his entring many ways was faulty, and he entred not in at the door, but otherways, and therefore is to be judged a Thief and a Robber.

2. I propound alſo, that the ſaid Boniface is a manifeſt Heretick, and utterly cut off from the body of the holy Church, becauſe of many kinds of Hereſies, which are to be declared in convenient time and place.

3. I propound alſo, that the ſaid Boniface is an horrible Simoniack, and ſuch a one as hath not been ſithence the beginning of the world: and the miſchief of this ſin in him is notorious to all the world (which thing is manifeſt to all that will plainly underſtand) inſomuch that he, being openly ſlandered, ſaid openly, That he could not commit ſimony.

The nature of this Pope and all Popes by his linage painted out

4. I propound alſo, that the ſaid Boniface, being wrapt in infinite manifeſt hainous ſins, is ſo hardned in them, that he is utterly not poſſible to be corrected: and lieth in dungeon of miſchief ſo deep, that he may not be ſuffered any longer without the overthrow of the ſtate of the Church. His mouth is full of curſing, his feet and ſteps are ſwift to ſhed blood. He utterly teareth in pieces the Churches, which he ought to cheriſh; waſting wickedly the goods of the poor, and making much of wicked men that give him Rewards: perſecuting the righteous, and among the people not gathering but ſcattering, bringing in new Sects of Deſtruction that have not been heard of: Blaſpheming the way of Truth, and by robbery thinking himſelf equal to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt which is bleſſed for ever. And he being moſt covetous thirſteth for Gold, coveteth Gold, and by ſome device getteth Gold of every people: and utterly not regarding the worſhipping of God, with fained words, ſometimes by flattering, ſometimes by threatning, ſometimes by falſe teaching, and all to get money withall, he maketh Merchandiſe of us all; envying all things but his own; loving no man, nouriſhing War, perſecuting and hating the peace of his Subjects. He is rooted in all unſpeakable ſins, contrarying and ſtriving againſt all the Ways and Doctrines of the Lord. He is truly the abomination of the people, which Daniel the Lords Prophet deſcribed.

The Pope thinks himſelf equal with Chriſt.

Abominatio deſolationis Papæ.

Therefore I anſwer, that Laws, Weapons, and all the Elements ought to riſe againſt him, which thus overthroweth the ſtate of the Church; for whoſe ſins God plagueth the whole world. And finally nothing remaineth to him, being ſo unſatiable to ſatisfie him withall, but only the unſatiable mouth of Hell, and the fire that cannot be quenched, continuing for ever. Therefore ſeeing that in a General Council it ſo becometh, and I ſee this wicked man to be damned, which offendeth both God and all men: I ask and require as inſtantly as I can, and beſeech you my Lord and King aforeſaid, that you would declare thus much to the Prelates, Doctors, People, and Princes your Brethren in Chriſt, and chiefly to the Cardinals and all Prelates, and call a Council. In the which (when the foreſaid wicked man is condemned) by the worſhipful Cardinals, the Church may be provided of a Shepherd: and for that Council I offer my ſelf ready lawfully to purſue the foreſaid things. And whereas the ſaid man, being in the higheſt Dignity, in the mean time cannot be ſuſpended of his Superior; therefore he ought to be taken, ſuſpended indeed for the things aforeſaid, ſeeing his ſtate is called into Judgment, by the means aforeſaid.

I beſeech and require the ſaid Cardinals by you, and I preſently require them and the Church of God, that this wicked man being put in priſon, the Church of Rome may be provided of a Vicar, which may miniſter thoſe things that ſhall appertain, until the Church of God be provided of a Biſhop, utterly to take away all occaſion of a Schiſm. And leſt the ſaid wicked man ſhould let and hinder the proſecuting thereof, I require theſe things of you my Lord King aforeſaid, affirming you to be bound to do this for many cauſes. Firſt, for the Faiths ſake. Secondly, for your King's dignity, to whoſe Office it belongeth to root out ſuch wicked men. Thirdly, for your Oath ſake, which ye made for the defence of the Churches of your Realm, which the foreſaid Ravener utterly teareth in pieces. Fourthly, becauſe ye be the Patron of the Churches, and therefore ye are not bound only to the defence of them, but to the calling for again of their goods, which this foreſaid man hath waſted. Fifthly, ye following the footſteps of your Anceſtors, ought to deliver your Mother the Romiſh-Church, from ſo wicked a Band wherein by Oppreſſion ſhe is tyed and bound. I require that a publick Inſtrument may be made of theſe Requeſts by the Notaries here preſent, under the witneſs of the worſhipful men that be here preſent. Theſe things were done and ſpoken as is aforeſaid at Paris in the Kings Houſe of Lupara.

After this Proteſtation of Maſter Nagareta, immediately inſued the Appeal of the King, pronounced and publiſhed againſt the ſaid Boniface, in form as followeth:

The Appeal made by the King and the Lovers of the Realm againſt Boniface.

The Appellation of the French King and Nobles againſt Pope Boniface the Eighth.

IN the Name of God, Amen. In the year of our Lord, 1303. Indictione prima, 13. day of June, and the ninth year of the Popedom of Boniface the eighth. By the tenor of this publick Inſtrument be it unto all men known, that the moſt noble Prince and Lord, Philip by the Grace of God, King of France, the famous and reverend Fathers in Chriſt, Archbiſhops and Biſhops, religious men, Abbots and Priors here under-named, in the preſence of us common Notaries here under written, eſpecially called and required for this purpoſe, as it is contained in the Subſcriptions here under, the famous and Noblemen, the Lord Lewis, Son of the French King; Guido of Saint Paul, and John Drocem Earls, and William of Pleſiano Lord of Viterob Knight: Moved as they ſaid with a fervent faith, with affection of ſincere love and zeal of Charity to be ſhewed to the holy Romiſh Church, and having pity from their heart, on their Mother the univerſal Church, which, as they ſaid, is oppreſſed dangerouſly under the rule of the ſaid Lord Boniface, and ſuffereth outragious defacing and loſs; and pitying the right Faith (as they ſay) in which ſtands the Salvation of Souls, and which (alas for pity) in their times miſerably pineth away, and periſheth for the lack of wholſome government of the Church through all Chriſtendom, and earneſtly taking pains, as they ſaid, for the repairing and enhaunſing of the Catholick Faith: eſpecially ſeeing it was neceſſary for the ſame Church, for the foundation of the Faith, and health of the Souls that none ſhould rule the Fold of the Lords Flock, but the true and lawful Shepherd; and alſo becauſe the ſame Church was the Spouſe of Chriſt that hath no

no ſpot nor wrinkle, all error, offence, wickedneſs and wrong ſhould be put away; and ſalvation, peace and quietneſs through Gods mercy might be procured to the whole world, which they ſay, lieth in wars and darkneſs by the wicked Deeds, curſed Works, and hurtful Examples of the ſaid Boniface: They ſaid and laid againſt the ſaid Boniface Hereſie, and other divers horrible and curſed faults, wherein they affirmed him to be tangled, and commonly and notoriouſly reported, the King himſelf being preſent with Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates and Church-men (which were aſſembled to intreat of their own matters, and matters of their Churches) beſide Barons, Earls, and other Noblemen, whoſe names are under-written.

The ſaid William propounded and objected againſt him, ſwearing by the holy Goſpel of God, which he corporally touched, that he could prove all and every the premiſſes to be true. And the ſaid William of Pleſiano ſware further this Oath, that he believed he could prove the premiſſes, and that he would purſue to the full end againſt the ſaid Boniface in the General Council, where, when, and before whomſoever of right it ought to be done: requiring earneſtly the ſaid King as a Champion of the Faith, and Defender of the Church; that for declaring of this truth to the praiſe of Gods Name, to the increaſe and promoting of the Catholick Faith, to the honour and wealth of the univerſal Church, and of all Chriſtian people, and the Congregation of the ſaid General Council, he would help and beſtow his profitable labour, with Souldiers and other like, for the love of men, and zeal to Juſtice (becauſe his Kingly houſe was ever a Ruler of the Truth) and that he would earneſtly require the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Prelates, and that he would be effectually inſtant with them. The Earls and Knights themſelves beſought earneſtly many of the ſame Prelates (as they were Pillars of the Church and the Faith) that they would help and effectually beſtow their labour to the calling and aſſembling of the ſaid Council, by all ways and means lawful, according to the Ordinances of the holy Fathers, and Decrees of the Canons. But when the Prelates heard and fully underſtood ſuch Objections, Oppoſitions, and Requeſts, as is aforeſaid; and conſidered that ſuch a matter was not only moſt hard, but needed wiſe counſel, they departed out of the ſame place. But on the Friday next following, the fourteenth day of the ſame month of June, the foreſaid Lord King being preſent, and alſo the Lords, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Priors, and many witneſſes here under written the ſame time being preſent, and in the preſence of us common Notaries here ſubſcribed, and being ſpecially called and required for this purpoſe: the foreſaid William of Plaſiano Knight, ſaid, propounded, affirmed, objected, and read; as was contained more fully in a certain Paper which he held in his hand, whoſe tenor was after this ſort:

I William of Pleſiano Knight, ſay, propound, and affirm, that Boniface which now ruleth the Apoſtolical See is a rank Heretick in Hereſies, and by Hereſies, outragious Deeds, and wicked Doctrines hereafter to be declared, which things to be true, I believe I am able to prove: or elſe, ſuch things as theſe ſhall be ſufficient to prove him a full Heretick, in a convenient place and time, and before whom of right this can or ought to be done. This thing I ſware on the holy Goſpel of God preſently touched of me.

1. Firſt, that he believeth not the immortality of men, and of Chriſtian Souls, but thinking much like as the Sadducees did believe, that there is no everlaſting life, and that men cannot get at the length Joy, but that all the lot and part of comfort and gladneſs is in this world: and by this means he affirmeth, that it is no ſin for the body to live daintily in all dainties. And out of the abundance of this leven, he was not aſhamed to ſay and openly to confeſs, that he had rather be an Aſs, or a Dog, or any other bruit Beaſt, than a French-man; which thing he would not have ſaid, if he believed a French-man had a Soul that could enjoy everlaſting life. This thing, he taught many men, which acknowledged this at the point of death, and the common report goeth on him thus in theſe things.

Pope Boniface had rather be a Dog than a Frenchman.

2. Alſo, he believeth not faithfully, that by the words ordained of Chriſt, and ſpoken over the Hoſt, after the faſhion of the Church by a faithful Prieſt that is lawfully ordered, the body of Chriſt to be there: and therefore it cometh to paſs, that he giveth no reverence to it (no not a little) when it is lifted up of the Prieſt, yea, he riſeth not to it, but turneth his back to it, and makes himſelf and his Seat to be honoured where he ſitteth, rather than the Altar where the Hoſt is conſecrate: and he is commonmonly reported to do this.

{KING Edw. I}

3. Alſo, he is reported to ſay, that Whoredom is no ſin, no more than rubbing of the hands together, and thus commonly runs the voice and brute.

4. Alſo, he ſaid often, that to thruſt down the King and Frenchmen (if it could not be otherwiſe done) he would overthrow himſelf, the whole world and the whole Church. And when he had ſaid ſo, ſome that ſtood by ſaid, God forbid; he anſwered, God grant. And when good men that heard the words replied againſt him, that he ſhould not ſay ſo, becauſe the Church of God and all Chriſtian-men ſhould ſuffer great ſlander ſo: he anſwered, I care not what ſlanders ſoever come, ſo that the French-men and their pride be deſtroyed; for it is neceſſary that ſlanders and offences come.

5. Item, he called again and allowed a Book made by M. Arnold of Newton, containing and ſmelling of Hereſie, condemned by the Biſhop of Paris, and reproved by the Maſters of Divinity, and burned openly by Boniface himſelf: and in the full Conſiſtory of Cardinals being likewiſe reproved, condemned, and burned, yet he allowed it being written again, and containing the ſame fault.

6. Item, that he might make the moſt damnable remembrance of him perpetual, he cauſed his Images of ſilver to be ſet in the Church, by this means bringing men to Idolatry.

7. Item, he hath a private Devil, whoſe counſel he uſeth in all things, and through all things.

8. Item, he ſaid once, that if all men were on one ſide, and he on another, they could not deceive him neither in law nor in deed, which thing could not be done except he uſed a deviliſh Art: and of this he is openly thus reported.

9. Item, he is a Witch, asking counſel at Sooth-ſayers both Men and Women, and thus he is commonly judged.

10. Item, he ſaid openly, that the Romiſh Pope could not commit Simony, which is heretical to ſay. This is a ſin reproved as well in the Old Teſtament as in the New, and generally in the holy Councils. Alſo he is wont to make Merchandiſe of Prelates Livings, Dignities, Superiorities, and Benefices, to the which holy Orders be neceſſarily joyned, and of Abſolutions and Diſpenſations, like as Uſurers and Merchants uſe to buy and ſell common things in the Market, and of this the common brute reports him.

11. Item, he letteth with all his might among Chriſtian men the ſpecial Embaſſage of Chriſt, made to his own Sons, ſaying, Peace I leave to you, and ſoweth diſcord and wars: Wherefore once it was ſaid before him, that certain parties would friendly agree after a good ſort, but he letted the peace: and when the other party did humbly beſeech him, that he would give licence to agree (he ſaid) he would not: yea, if the Son of God or Peter the Apoſtle would come down into the Earth and command him; he would ſay, I will not believe thee.

12. Item, becauſe the French Nation (being manifeſtly a moſt Chriſtian Nation) followeth not his errors in the Faith; he reckoneth and openly calleth all and every of them Paterniani.

13. Item, he is infect with Sodomitical ſin, keeping with him Boys for Concubines, and of this fault he is moſt commonly and openly reported.

14. Item, he hath cauſed many murthers of Clerks to be done in his preſence, commending it and rejoycing at their death: and if they were not deadly wounded at the firſt by his Servants, as oft as he ſaw them ſmiting, he ſaid, Smite, Smite; by which example many were ſlain.

15. Item, when he had condemned a certain Noble man, he forbad the Sacrament to be given him at the point of death, he deſiring it and being penitent, ſaying, That the Sacrament of Penance was not neceſſary to Salvation.

16. Item,
